 “ league with the Bæotians, our allies, which you ought not to have “ done. Everfa and Callicritus, the Theban ambassadors, who were “ coming from us—I would rather ask, who killed them, than accuse “ any body of the crime. The intestine war in Ætolia, and the “ slaughter of the chief men there—By whom but your agents can “ these be supposed to have been effected? In person you invaded the “ Dolopians, oppressed them with the ravages of war. Eumenes, re“ turning from Rome into his kingdom, was almost slain as a victim be“ fore the altars at Delphi——I am loath to mention the person whom “ he accuses. I know you have had an account, by letters from Rome, “ and by your ambassadors, of the discovery, which Rammius of “ Brundisium made to us, of certain secret machinations. The only “ way to have avoided hearing these things from me, was, not to have “ asked why the Romans send an army into Macedon, or why they “ garrison the cities of their allies. My remembrance of the friendship “ between our fathers inclines me to lend a partial ear to what you can “ say in your justification; and I wish you may furnish me with argu“ ments to plead your cause in the Senate.”

To this the King. “ I have a cause unquestionably good if I had “ impartial judges; but I am to plead it before those who are both my “ judges and accusers. Of the things objected to me, some I have per“ haps reason to glory in; some I need not be ashamed to own; and “ others, as they are only asserted, not proved, they will be sufficiently “ confuted by a bare denial. If I were this day to be tried by your “ laws, what could the informer Rammius or Eumenes alledge against “ me, that would not be deemed rather slander than truth? Had Eu- “ menes, who so heavily oppresses many private persons, as well as states, “ no enemy but me? And could I find no fitter instrument than Ram- “ mius, whom I had never seen before, and whom I was never to see “ again? You are pleased to call me to account for the murder of the “ two Thebans and Artetarus. The Thebans, every body knows, perished “ by shipwreck: As to the latter, What does the accusation amount to?
 “ Why truly, that his murderers, when banished, fled into my king“ dom. Will you then grant yourselves to be chargeable with all the “ crimes of those exiles who take refuge in Italy? And how can a man “ be condemned to banishment, if there be no place to which he may be “ banished? Yet, as to those assassins, as soon as I understood from you “ that they were in Macedon, I ordered them to be sought out, expelled, “ and forbid to return into my dominions. These things are objected to “ me, as to a man arraigned before a court of justice; the rest, as to a

G g g 2

“ King,

V. R. 58.
 Eur. Chr.
 170.
 281 Cont.

Y. R. 552.
E. C. 170.
231 C. 170.

“ King, and relates to the treaty between you and me. Was it any “ breach of that treaty to defend myself against the invasion of Abr- “ polis, your ally? What could I do, when he laid waste my territories “ as far as Amphipolis, and carried off many of my subjects, with their “ cattle and effects? Would you have had me sit still, and suffer him to “ enter Pella? Come armed even into my palace? But, it seems, I ought “ not to have vanquished him, nor to have treated him as a vanquished “ enemy. How can he, an invader, complain of suffering what I, “ whom he attacked, was exposed to suffer? As to my reducing the Do- “ lepians by force; Had not I a right to do it? Are they not my subjects?
 “ Their country, is it not a part of my kingdom, assigned to my father by “ your decree? Can any man think that I dealt severely with rebels, “ who took away the life of my lieutenant, Euphrator, their Governor,
 “ by such tortures, that death was the least part of his sufferings?
 “ After visiting Larissa, Antrona and Pteleum, in the neighbourhood “ of which places I had many vows to pay, I went up to sacrifice
 “ at Delphi. This is made a crime; and, to aggravate this crime, “ it is added, that I took my army with me; as if my view had been “ to seize upon towns, and garrison castles, as you now do. Call a “ council of all the Greek cities by which I passed; and, if any one “ can prove he has sustained damage by my soldiers, I am willing it “ should be thought, that under the pretence of a sacrifice I concealed “ other designs. I sent assistance to the Ætolians and Byzantines, and “ made a league with the Boeotians. These actions, of whatever “ nature they be, my ambassadors have not only mentioned, but “ often justified in your Senate, where I met with some arbitrators not “ so favourable to me as you, Q. Marcus, my paternal friend and “ guest. Yet Eumenes had not then been at Rome with his accusations; “ nor by calumnies and misconstructions made me suspected and hated:
 “ He had not yet endeavoured to persuade you, that, while the kingdom “ of Macedon was safe, Greece could not be free, nor enjoy the advantages
 “ you procured her. A complaint of this kind (and better founded) “ you will soon hear; you will be told, that you have done nothing
 “ by confining Antiochus within mount Taurus; that Eumenes is more “ oppressive to Asia than the Syrian ever was; and that your allies will “ never be in quiet while there is a palace in Pergamus.

“ All that you have objected, Q. Marcus, and all that I have an“ swered, will, I know, be construed by the hearers according to their “ dispositions; nor is it of so much consequence what I have done, or “ with what views, as in what light you will see my actions. I am “ conscious to myself that I have not offended knowingly; and, if through “ ignorance I have transgressed, your reprehension will be sufficient to “ make me correct what is amiss. Assuredly I have done nothing “ which cannot be remedied; nor for which you can think I deserve to “ be prosecuted by war. With little reason is your moderation and “ clemency

“ clemency famous among the nations, if, for causes scarce worth com“ plaining of, you take arms against a King, who is your friend and “ your ally.”

1. 2. 3. 2.
 5. 6. 11.
 12.
 28. 1. 11.

Marcus affected to appear much satisfied with the King's discourse, and advised him to send new ambassadors to Rome; that nothing might be omitted which could give the least hope of an accommodation. To this end a truce seemed necessary, and though Marcus's sole view in granting the King a conference, was to draw him to ask a truce; yet, when he did ask it, the Roman raised mighty difficulties, complying at length (as he pretended) merely out of personal regard to the son of Philip. Marcus meant nothing by all this but to make Perſes lose time, who being ready for action, might have done something considerable, before the Consul Licinius with his army could arrive in Greece.

1. 2. 3. 2.
 5. 6. 11.

After this interview the Roman ambassadors went into Boetia, the people of which country had, not long before, made a league with the Macedonian. Great dissensions had since arisen among them; some declaring for the King, others for the Romans. The Thebians, and, after their example, all the other petty states of Boetia, offered now to enter into an alliance with Rome. Marcus would not treat with them jointly, but obliged each city to send its respective minister to Rome to treat separately for itself. By thus dividing them into many independant states, he weakened them all. They were never after united.

c. 43. and 44.
 Polyb. Le-
 g. 63.

From Boetia Marcus repaired to the Diet of the Acheans convened at Argos. He demanded of them a thousand men to garrison Chalcis till the Roman army should come into Greece; which demand was instantly complied with.

About the same time Rome sent deputies into the most considerable islands of Asia, to ask assistance in the war against Perſes. The Rhodians distinguished themselves on this occasion. They thought it necessary to efface the impressions, which their difference with Eumenes, and their complaisance for Perſes in several instances, particularly in conveying his wife to him from Asia, had made in the minds of the Romans. The deputies therefore no sooner arrived, but they were shewed a fleet of galleys equipt for the service of Rome, and ready to put to sea: This mark of zeal had the desired effect.

Polyb. Lib.
 1. 63.

Perſes, in consequence of what had passed between him and Marcus, dispatched ambassadors to Rome to negotiate the treaty of peace, which he imagined to be already begun by that conference. At the same time, he by circular letters to the neighbouring states, gave an account of his conversation with the Roman: and this he did, not only to set forth the justice of his cause, but to learn how they stood affected. To the Rhodians he sent ambassadors, exhorting them to stand neuter, and in case the Romans should refuse him a peace, to take upon them the office of mediators, an office which, he said, more properly belonged to them

Polyb. Lib.
 1. 63.

than

V. R. 31.
Bel. Chr.
170.
281 Conf.

Liv. B. 42.
c. 45. &
46.

than any others, as being the most powerful of the Greek states, and not only zealous for their own liberty, but guardians of the liberty of all Greece. These ambassadors met with a friendly reception, but were answered, "that the Rhodians desired the King, not to ask them to do "any thing which might be disapproved by the Romans."

The same ambassadors going thence into Bœotia succeeded little better in that country. Only Coronea and Haliartus came over to the King's interest, and sent to him for garrisons to secure them against the Thebans, who still adhered to the opposite interest. Perſes answered, that he could not send them garrisons, because of his truce with Rome.

When Marcus and his colleague, at their return home, gave an account to the Senate of their negotiations, they boasted much of having deceived Perſes into a truce, which hindered him from beginning the war with the advantage he was master of, and gained time to the Romans to finish their preparations. Nor did these able ministers forget to mention their dexterity in so dissolving the Bœotian league, that the states of that country would never more be in a condition jointly to make an alliance with the Macedonian. Livy tells us, that some of the older Senators were far from being pleased with the craft and dissimulation of the ambassadors. Be that as it will, the majority of the Fathers approving of what had been done, Marcus was again sent into Greece, with a commission to act there as he should think most for the interest of the Republic.

The Senate, though determined to pursue the war against Perſes, yet, that it might not be too plain how much he had been deluded, granted audience to his ambassadors. But neither their excuses nor their entreaties availed any thing: They were ordered to leave the city immediately, and Italy in thirty days. It is probable that the Fathers thought, they sufficiently covered the deceit of Marcus, by admitting these ambassadors within the walls of the city, and allowing them so long a time for their departure out of Italy; whereas the former ambassadors from the King had been received without the walls, and had been allowed but eleven days for their departure.

C H A P. XVII.

FIRST and SECOND Years of the War.

The Consul Licinius arrives with his army in Thessaly.

Perfes having obtained some advantage over the Romans, makes new proposals for peace, which are rejected.

The Consul declines a general battle.

M. Lucretius robs King Gentius of his fleet.

Hostilius, the successor of Licinius, in vain attempts to penetrate into Macedon.

The management of some Roman ambassadors in Greece.

The Romans receive kindly a gross piece of flattery from a city of Asia.

P E R S E S was so effectually cheated by the arts of Marcius, that the Consul Licinius arrived with his army at Apollonia, almost as soon as the Macedonian ambassadors got back to their Master at Pella. In a council held by the King, a few days before, some had advised him to purchase a peace of the Romans, though it should cost him not only a yearly tribute, but even a part of his dominions. The majority, however, being more magnanimous, and declaring for war: WAR then let us have, said Perfes, and the Gods grant us success. And now he ordered all his forces to be drawn together, and appointed their rendezvous at Citium, a town in Macedon; and thither with his courtiers and his guards he himself repaired. His forces consisted of 39,000 foot and 4000 horse: a more numerous army (says Livy) than any King of Macedon had ever brought into the field, except Alexander the Great. Perfes, in a speech to his troops, recalled to their minds the glory of their ancestors; expatiated on the injustice, treachery and insolence of the Romans; and represented the goodness of his cause, and the ample provision he had made for the war. His harangue was frequently interrupted by the applauses of the soldiers, and loud expressions of indignation and anger against the Romans. The assembly dismissed, he gave audience to the deputies from the several towns of Macedon, which had sent offers of money and provisions, each according to its ability: Having first thanked them, he answered, that he desired nothing of them but carriages for his engines of war.

The Macedonian marched out of his own kingdom into Thessaly, knowing that the Romans were to come that way to meet him. Some towns yielded to him without resistance; others he took by force. Elatia and

Y. R. 582.
Bef. Chr.
170.
281 Conf.
Liv. B. 42.
c. 50.

Y. R. 492.
E. 117.
= 110.

Geras, places of great importance, because standing in the entrance of the Straight of Tenar, opened their gates upon the first summons. Having well fortified this pass, he advanced to Sycurium situated at the foot of mount Ossa, where pitching his camp, he resolved to wait the coming of the enemy.

L. 3. 43.
c. 55.

From Apollonia Lucius marched his army through Athamania to Gomphi in Thessaly: For it was only through Thessaly that they could penetrate into Macedon; unless they would run the hazard of being starved in the mountains of Dyrrhacium. At Gomphi the Consul staid some days to refresh his troops, much fatigued by the rough and difficult roads through which they had passed. On advice that the Macedonians were ravaging the eastern part of Thessaly, he advanced towards Larissa, and encamped by the river Peneus.

About this time Eumenes arrived at Corin with his brothers Attalus and Antiochus. The last staid in this place with 2000 foot to strengthen the garrison: Eumenes and Attalus, with 4000 foot and 1000 horse, joined the Consul; as did also some other auxiliaries, but in small numbers.

c. 57.

To draw the Romans to a good distance from their camp, and fight them with advantage, Perseus sent out some detachments to ravage the territory of Picra, a city in alliance with Rome. The Consul however did not stir; which encouraged the Macedonian to think of insulting him in his intrenchments. At ten o'clock in the morning the King, with his whole army, appeared within a mile of the enemy. Here he made his infantry halt, and went forward with his cavalry and light-armed troops. Perceiving soon after a small party of Romans coming towards him, he detached about an equal number to skirmish with them. The action proved of little importance, and it was hard to say which side had the victory. Perseus returned to Sycurium. Next day he led his army again within sight of the enemy's lines; and there being no convenient watering in the march, which was of twelve miles length, in a dusty road, he brought water with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. The Romans kept close within their trenches, so that no action followed. Perseus repeated this movement for several days together, in hopes that ^a Livy says, that the Romans were exceedingly rejoiced when they arrived at Gomphi, as thinking that they had escaped a very great danger; for had Perseus, with his army ranged in good order for battle, advanced and met them, while they were yet weary and struggling with the difficulties of the way, they would probably have suffered a great overthrow. And Sir W. Raleigh blames Perseus for not having brought his army to defend the pass of Acus, where his father Philip formerly kept the Roman legions for a considerable time. But may it not be questioned, whether Perseus could easily have done either of these things? For at this time, the Thessalians (through whose country he must have marched, to post himself at the pass of Acus, or to attack the Romans in Athamania) were his enemies; whereas in the former war, Philip was master of Thessaly.

the Roman cavalry would be detached to fall upon his rear-guard, and that then, suddenly facing about, he might attack them at a considerable distance from their camp; in which case, as he was superior in horse and light-armed foot, he doubted not of victory. Disappointed of this hope, he came and posted himself seven miles nearer the enemy; and the next day, having, at sun-rising, drawn up his infantry in the same place as before, he led all his cavalry and light-armed troops within less than half a mile of the Roman entrenchments. His coming at such an unusual hour filled the camp with tumult; and though, the troops he brought with him being unfit to assail trenches, the Consul had no apprehension of such an attempt, yet, to check the King's pride, he sent out to battle all his horse, light-armed infantry, and auxiliaries; he himself remaining in the camp with his legions in readiness for action. The honour of this morning was entirely the King's. With the loss of only 20 horse and 40 foot, he slew about 2000 of the Roman infantry and 200 of their horse; and took the like number of horse prisoners. Upon the first news of his victory the captains of his phalanx led it to him, though unsent for, that he might attack the enemy's camp. But success in such an enterprize was an object too great for the hopes of Perfes. Evander, the Cretan, who, probably, from the King's irresolution, inferred the byass of his thoughts, advised him not rashly to hazard all, in an unnecessary enterprize; adding, that the advantage he had already gained would either procure him honourable conditions of peace, or at least many associates in the war. There needed no more to make Perfes lead back his army to the camp.

In the mean time the Romans were fearing what the Macedonian durst not hope. Eumenes advised the Consul to dislodge by night, and remove to the other side of the river Peneus: And Licinius, though ashamed to avow his fear, yet followed the advice, since reason so required.

Next day Perfes advanced with his army, to provoke the enemy once more to battle. When he perceived them safely entrenched on the other side of the river, he became sensible (says Livy) of the error he had committed the day before, in not pursuing his victory; and of the greater error he had been guilty of, by his inaction in the night; because his light-armed troops alone would have been sufficient to destroy a great part of the enemy in their passage of the river.

On the other hand the Romans, though now no longer uneasy with the apprehension of being suddenly attacked, were grievously mortified by the loss they had sustained, especially of their reputation. In a council of war every one threw the blame from himself upon the Ætolians: Five of the chief men among these had been observed to be the first who turned their backs: The Thessalians, who had made a good retreat, were praised, and rewarded with military honours and presents.

Y. R. 58.
Bel. Car.
17.
281 Con.

Plut. Pr. of P. A.
mil. and
Liv. B. 42.
c. 59.

V. R. 12.
 Def. C. 12.
 120.
 281 C. 12.

Perſes, having loſt the opportunity of gaining another victory, endeavoured to draw ſome new advantage from that which he had gained, by extolling it in a pompous harangue to his ſoldiers, and by perſuading them, that it was a ſure prognosſtic of a happy iſſue of the war. They all heard him with delight. Thoſe who had been in the action grew braver from the praiſe; and the Pælonians, from the hope of meriting the like glory. Next day the King made a march, and pitched his camp upon a riſing ground near Mæſſara, between Tempe and Lariſſa. This motion probably obliged the Romans to diſſide. They removed to a ſtronger poſt, ſtill keeping on the banks of the Pærus. Under Mæſſarus, the ſon of Mæſſarus, brought them a reinforcement of 1000 horſe, as many foot, and 20 elephants.

Pl. 1. Le.
 120. 121.

Although Perſes had ſeem'd, as if he meant to preſs hard upon the Romans, he was yet eaſily perſuaded to lay hold of the favourable opportunity, which ſome of his courtiers thought he now had, by his late victory, of obtaining peace. He ſent to the Conſul an offer of ſubmitting to the ſame conditions which had been impoſed on his father Philip. The conſtancy of the Romans ſhew'd itſelf remarkably on this occaſion. They unanimouſly agreed, in council, to return the harſheſt answer poſſible: That Perſes muſt ſurrender himſelf and his kingdom to the Romans, at diſcretion, or expect no peace. Some of the King's counſellors, provoked by the Roman pride, adviſed him, never more to think of an accommodation. Perſes could not reſiſt this advice. He thought that the Romans would not have acted in ſo haughty a manner, but from a well grounded confidence in their ſuperiority of ſtrength. Once more therefore he ſent to Læmus; and now offered a larger tribute than had been paid by Philip. Finding that peace could not be purchaſed with money, he retired to Spartium; for what reaſon is not ſaid.

120. 121.

During theſe tranſactions, C. Læretius, the Roman Admiral, was beſieging Hæſſarus in Bactia. He had ſailed from Italy with only 45 galley-ſhips; but this fleet was now much augmented by the dexterous management of his brother Marcus, whom he had ſent before him, with orders to get what ſhips he could from the Italian allies, ſail with them to Corinthum, and there wait his arrival. Marcus in his way had ſtopt at Dyrrachium, where finding in the haven 76 veſſels, of which 54 belonged to King Gentius, the reſt to the Dyrrachians and Illyrians, he took them all away with him, pretending to believe that they had been fitted out for the ſervice of the Romans, though, in truth, Gentius had not yet declared himſelf for either party.

c. 12

Heliartus, after a vigorous defence, was taken by aſſault, ſacked and razed. From thence the Prætor marched his forces to Tlebes, which “ Over great (ſays Sir W. R.) was the “ ſill of the King in hoping then for “ peace: and in uſing for it, even when “ he had a victory, what elſe did he,

 “ than promiſe to ſuch who were inclined

“ to take part with him, that neither good “ nor bad fortune would keep him from “ yielding to the Romans, whenever they “ would be pleaſed to accept of him?”

opened her gates to him upon the first summons. He put the government of the town into the hands of the Partizans of Rome; and all who had favoured the King of Macedon he sold for slaves. After these exploits in Boetia he returned to his ships.

Perjes, at Securiam, heard that the Romans, having hastily gathered in the corn from the fields around them, were cutting off the ears with sickles before the doors of their tents, so that the camp was full of heaps of straw. This suggested to him the hope of being able to burn their camp; and his men having provided themselves with torches, and all things proper for the purpose, he set out in the middle of the night, that he might fall upon the enemy at day-break. But the alarm being taken in good time, he failed in this enterprize. Once more he offered the enemy battle; which they declining, he again brought his army to Mopsium, because Securiam was at too great a distance from the Romans, and because of the difficulty, before-mentioned, of getting water in the way. From Mopsium he advanced with 2000 foot and 1000 horse, fell upon some parties of the enemy while they were busy in reaping, and took 600 prisoners, and 1000 carts, most of them loaded. Not content with this success, he attacked a body of 800 Romans, that had been stationed to guard the reapers. The Consul, upon notice of the danger his men were in, hastened with the best part of his army to their relief. Perjes faced the Roman Legions, and sent orders to his Phalanx to advance; very unadvisedly (says Livy) because, the great number of carts he had sent off being in the way, the Phalanx could not possibly come time enough to his assistance. He was now overpowered by numbers, and forced to retire, with the loss of 300 foot and 24 of his horse-guards. A few days after this misfortune, the winter approaching, he retired into Macedon.

On the King's departure, Licinius went straight to Gonni, hoping to have taken it, and thereby to have got an entrance into Tempe. But finding the enterprize too difficult, he turned off into Perrhaebia, where he reduced several towns. Thence he went to Larissa in Thessaly, which he also made himself master of; the Macedonian garrison having deserted it. How this place or Demetrias (which it is said the Consul had thoughts of besieging) fell into the hands of the Macedonians is no where related; nor is it easy to guess; unless perhaps Perjes, after his victory, did greater acts than we find recorded; and conquered some part of Thessaly. The accounts of what happened in Greece about this time are very imperfect.

Licinius, having dismissed all his allies except the Acheans, quartered his army for the winter in Thessaly and Boetia, into which latter country

^b Plutarch reports, that Perjes surprised the Roman fleet this year at Oreum; took four quinqueremes, and twenty ships of burthen, and sunk many others loaded with corn. Life of Æmil.

Y. R. 582.
Ecl. Chr.
172.
281 Conf.

Livy, B. 43.
c. 1.

he himself went, at the request of the Thebans, who were distressed by their neighbours, the people of Coronæa.

The Consul had, in the summer, sent one of his Lieutenants, with a body of troops, into Illyricum. This man reduced two opulent towns to surrender, and granted the inhabitants their effects; hoping by an appearance of clemency, to engage another town of great strength, in the neighbourhood, to submit to him. But finding that this town would neither yield to his virtue, nor to his arms, he returned and pillaged the two which he had before spared.

Cassius, the other Consul, whose lot confined him to Gaul, where there was little to do, had, from a spirit of emulation, attempted to make his way into Macedon through Illyria. The Senate in all haste recalled him, being much displeased that he should dare, without orders, to undertake so dangerous a march through many strange Countries, and thereby shew the people of those Countries a way into Italy.

Perjes was not idle during the winter. He had lately dismissed, with large presents, his ally, Cotys, King of the Odrysians in Thrace, to go to the defence of his own country, invaded by some of his Thracian neighbours, in conjunction with a body of Pergamenians. The Macedonians now marched to his assistance, and defeated the invaders.

About the same time Epirus, or a great part of it, revolted to Perjes from the Romans; a revolution brought about by one Cephalus, on occasion of an intestine discord.

AT Rome, the Comitia raised to the Consulship A. Hostilius Mancinus and A. Atilius Serranus; and gave Hortensius the command of the fleet. To Hostilius fell the province of Macedon. Little progress was made in the war during his year. He twice unsuccessfully attempted to penetrate into Macedon; once by the way of Elimæa, where Perjes defeated him in battle; and then by the Cambunian mountains. After this the King marched against the Dardaniens, cut in pieces their army, consisting of 10,000 men, ravaged their country, and carried off a great booty.

In the mean time Appius Claudius, whom the Consul had detached with an army of 4000 men, and who by levies among the confederates had doubled this army, entered Illyricum. Thinking to have taken Ugenta (a town on the confines of that country and Macedon) by the promised treachery of the Cretan garrison that defended it, he fell into a snare: for advancing, in careless order, to the gates of the town, both the garrison and the inhabitants sallied out upon him on a sudden, and attacked him so vigorously, that not above a fourth part of his whole army escaped the slaughter. Yet this town shortly after became Roman, by what means is no where said. But we are told, that Perjes recovered it in the winter, he having then leisure to lead his forces into Illyricum, the only side on which his kingdom was exposed: For Cotys secured it on the side of Thrace; Cephalus on that of Epirus; Perjes himself had lately corp. L. 27.

Poll. Ex-
Livy, B. 43.
c. 14.
Y. R. 583.
Ecl. Chr.
169.
282 Conf.

Plut.

Livy, B. 43.
c. 12.

c. 18.

lately quelled the Dardanians; and the snows made the mountains of Theffaly impassable to the Romans. After reducing Uscana and the neighbouring towns, where he took many prisoners, and among the rest 4000 Romans, he made a painful expedition into Ætolia. He had been promised admission into Stratus, the strongest city in that country. Of this hope though he were disappointed, by the prevalence of the Roman faction in the place, yet in his return home he got possession of Aperantia, and soon after received the agreeable news that Cleves, one of his Lieutenants, had gained a new and entire victory over Appius Claudius.

Y. R. 583.
E. of Chr.
1. 3.
282 C. 11.

As for Hortensius, the Roman Admiral, he performed nothing but against the allies of the Republic, whom he cruelly oppressed, as his predecessor *Lucretius had also done. The heavy complaints brought to Rome against these two Admirals, and some other Roman commanders, put the Senate under a necessity of passing a decree, That no man should be obliged to pay obedience to a Roman magistrate imposing any burthen for the present war, unless he could produce an order from the Senate for such imposition.

c. 17.

The Greeks were at this time indirectly menaced by certain ambassadors from Rome (C. Popillius Lenas and Cn. Octavius) who travelled through all the cities of Peloponnesus, and, while they cried up the great clemency and indulgence of the Senate, so conspicuous in the decree before-mentioned, gave to understand, that they very well knew how every one was inclined; who among them were zealous for the Roman cause, and who were lukewarm. These ambassadors would have accused by name, in the diet of Achaia, Lycortas and his son Polybius as men ill affected to Rome, and waiting only for an opportunity to raise disturbances. But because no colour of truth could be found to countenance such a charge, or perhaps because the Roman affairs had not greatly prospered of late in Greece, it was thought better for the present to forbear the prosecution, and give gentle words, as if all were well. They acted much the same part in Ætolia and Acarnania; using soft words even to those whom they suspected of being in the Macedonian interest; and desisting from some demands, because they found them disagreeable to the people.

Polyb.
Leg. 74.

Id. Leg.
74. and 75.

“ Among the great number of embassies that came to Rome about this time, either to seek redress of injuries, or to offer their services, it is not worthy, that from Alabanda, a town of the Lesser Asia, there was presented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flattery. These Alabanders brought 300 horsemens targets, and a crown of gold to bestow upon Jupiter in the capitol. But having a desire to gratify the Romans with some exquisite token of Sir W. Raleigh from Livy, B. 43. c. 6.

* Lucretius was afterwards accused of this, and condemned in a great fine, by the unanimous suffrages of all the tribes.

V. R. 43.
 Rom. Cons.
 113.
 112 Cons.

“ their dutiful obedience, wherein they would be singular; and be“ ing not able to reach unto any great performance, they built a temple “ unto the town Rome, and appointed anniversary games to be ce“ lebrated among them in honour of that Goddess. Now who can “ wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemy, and “ the like vain men, that would be thought Gods; or at the shameful “ flattery of such as bestowed upon men, and not the most virtuous of “ men, divine honours; when he sees a town of houses, wherein power“ ful men dwell, worshipped as a Goddess; and receiving (without “ scorn of the givers, or shame of the present) the title of Deity, at
 “ the gift of such a rascall city as Atalania?”

C H A P. XVIII.

THIRD YEAR of the War.

The Roman army under the command of the Consul Q. Martius Philippus penetrates into Macedon.

The arrogant conduct of Perſes.

The imprudence of Marcius.

Polybius, sent ambassador from the Achæans to Marcius, conducts himſelf with great discretion.

AFTER the war against Perſes had laſted two years, he was in a better condition to ſuſtain it than at the beginning. He had not only hindered the Romans hitherto from entering his country, but had enlarged his borders on the Ibærian ſide. And his continual ſucceſs had much increaſed the reputation of his arms. On the other hand, the Conſuls Licinius and Heſtilius had ſucceſſively waſted their time in fruitleſs attempts to force a paſſage into Macedon, deſtroying the glorious enterprize of conqueſt by many loſſes received. Nor was it only by the casualties of war, that the army became greatly diminished, but by the facility of the military Tribunes, or perhaps of Heſtilius himſelf (for they laid the blame each upon the other) in licenſing the ſoldiers to go home. The Admirals of the Republic had ſo demeaned themſelves as to make many of the towns, which had declared for Rome, weary of the alliance. And all theſe things together occaſioned, for a time, a general diſcouragement among the Romans.

¹ In the Conſulſhip of Cato the elder, Seneca paid the ſame compliment to Rome. Tacit. Ann. 4. c. 17.

² Lucy reports, that on advice of the bad ſucceſs of the war in Macedon, the Perſians, by order of the ſenate, publiſhed an edict, commanding all the Senators in Italy (who were not abſent on affairs of the Republic) to repair to Rome; and forbidding thoſe who were in the city to go above a mile from it. B. 43. c. 11.

TO Hyllus succeeded Q. Marcus Philistus, who with Cn. Sertilius Cato had been elected to the Consulship for the new year. Marcus, with a large reinforcement, which he had brought from Italy, joined the army at Flanilis. Purposing to prosecute the war with vigour, he presently after his arrival consulted the guides concerning the best way to penetrate into Macedon. Some advised him to go by the way of Pythion; some by the Cambrian mountains, where Hyllus had attempted a passage the last year; and others by the side of the lake Aisciris. The Consul would determine nothing, till he should come to the place where the road, he was now in, branched out into three roads, which led to those passes. In the mean time Perjes heard of the enemy's approach, and being uncertain what way they would take, distributed his own forces to the defence of all places, which might give entrance, or permit ascent. When Marcus was come to the three roads before-mentioned, and had heard the opinion of his council, he determined to proceed by that road which led by the lake ^b Aisciris; and accordingly sent before him 4000 foot to seize the most convenient posts in the way. Two days was this detachment embarrassed in overcoming the difficulty of only fifteen miles. After marching seven miles further they possessed themselves of a safe piece of ground, from whence they had sight of a body of 12,000 Macedonians, which, under the command of Hippias, the King had appointed to defend that pass. Marcus, having received notice of the situation of his detachment, hastened to join it. Hippias, not in the least dismayed at his appearance, met him and fought with him, two or three days successively, each returning to his own camp at night, with little loss on either side. These conflicts being on the narrow ridge of a mountain, where but a small number could march in front, few men were employed; all the rest were spectators. It was impossible for Marcus to get forwards, yet both shameful and dangerous to return. He therefore took the only course remaining. Part of his men he left with Pepilius, to amuse the enemy, whilst he himself with the rest fetched a compass, seeking a passage by ways that had never been trodden, and being compelled to make paths, where nature seemed to have intended that none should be. So steep he found the descent of the mountain, that his men, for the most part, rolled themselves down, not daring to trust their feet. And when they had gone or tumbled four miles of this troublesome journey, they desired nothing more earnestly than that they might be allowed to creep back again, if possible, by the way they had come. To add to the other difficulties, the elephants, through fear, recoiled from the precipices, cast their governors, and made such terrible

V. R. 884.
B. C. 147.
167.
23000.
L. B. 423.
C. 1. 2.
1. 1.

^b Geographers are not agreed where to place the lake of Aisciris; but the situation of it may be conjectured from hence, that when Marcus was got to the top of the hill which overlooked it, he could see Pella, Dium, and all the sea coast. This hill was twelve miles from Dium.

V. R. 352.
B. C. 191.
158.
28: C. 1.

noises, as affrighted the horses: So that they caused among the troops a confusion almost as great, as if an enemy had broke in upon them by surprize. Shift however was made to let down the huge beasts by a kind of bridge, of which the one end was joined to the edge of the cliff, the other sustained by two posts fastened in the ground below. These bridges were covered with turf, that the beasts might not fear to go upon them. When an elephant had got some way upon one of these bridges, the posts upholding it were cut; which made him slide down to the next bridge, that began where the first ended. In like manner he was conveyed to the third, and so onward to the bottom of the descent.

After seven miles, the army came to a plain, and there rested a whole day, waiting for Popilius, who probably stole away in the night; for had the enemy followed him, and set upon him from the higher ground, (which doubtless they would have done, had they known of his motion) he must infallibly have been cut off.

The third and fourth days marches were like the first; only that custom, and the nearness to their journey's end, without meeting an enemy, animated the soldiers, more chearfully to endure the fatigue. The fourth day they encamped in the fields near Heracleum, about midway between Tempe and Dium, where the King had posted himself with the main of his army.

Perjes seems now to have been struck with fear beyond comprehension, and to have entirely lost his reason: for, could he have seen his own advantages, nothing had been more easy for him than to make the Roman General repent of his adventurous march. Marcus had indeed avoided the Streight of Tempe, and got beyond it; but he was inclosed between that Streight and Dium; neither of which could he have forced, had the Macedonians defended them: So that he and his army must have perished for want of provisions, unless he could have gone back the way he came; a thing impracticable, considering that the enemy, being now aware of the path he had made, would have fallen upon him from the tops of the hills, of which they were masters. There was no fourth way. Yet the cowardice of Perjes gave a colour of prudence to the rashness of the Consul: for the King no sooner heard that the enemy were come over the moun-

* Tempe was a valley five miles in length, and very narrow; bounded on one side by mount Olympus, and on the other by mount Ossa; between which, and through the middle of the valley, ran the river Peneus. The road lay on the side of a frightful precipice, along the river, and was so narrow, says Livy, that a loaded mule had scarce room to pass. To defend this stright, Perjes had posted a detachment at Ganis, in the entrance of the valley; another farther on at Condion, an impregnable fortress; a third at a place called Characa; and a fourth in the road itself, and where the valley was narrowest.

* Dium stood at the foot of mount Olympus, on the side towards Thessaly, and about a mile from the sea; of which mile, the river Baphyrus, becoming there a lake, took up the one half; the rest was such as might be easily fortified.

tains

tains to Heracleum, but, crying out, that he was vanquished without fighting, he took from Dium what valuable things he could carry away in haste, abandoned the town, and retired with his army to Pydna. In the same vehemency of amazement he sent strict commands to burn, without delay, his naval stores at Thessalonica, and to throw his treasures, that were at Pella, into the sea; as if the Romans were just at the gates of those two cities, and going to take possession. Nicias, who received the order to drown the treasure, performed it as expeditiously as he could; yet not so desperately, but that, when the King regretted the loss, the greater part was recovered by diving. As to the naval stores, Andronicus, who had charge to set fire to them, deferred the execution, foreseeing that repentance might follow. Whether Nicias, for his absolute and blind obedience, or Andronicus, for his prudent forethought, merited the greater commendation, it lay in the King's breast to determine. The reward of their service was this: Perfes, growing ashamed of his mad cowardice, caused them both to be slain. Those poor men also, who had fetched his treasure out of the sea, were recompensed after the same manner; that so there might be no witnesses of the King's frantic fear.

Y. R. 584.
P. Chr.
168.
213 C. 66.
S. W. P.

To fill up the measure of his folly, he withdrew his garrisons from Tempe, and called Hippias away from the pass of Ascuris, as also Asclepiodorus, from the guard of another pass; and these men he openly reproached, as if they, and not he, had betrayed to the enemy the gates and bars of Macedon.

Marcus took Dium without resistance, and from thence went forwards into the country; but, after three days, was compelled, by want of provisions*, to return. His fleet, which he had ordered to steer along the coast, came to him at this time; but had left the storeships behind at Magnesia. Luckily for him, Lucretius, one of his lieutenants, whom he had employed to seize the fortresses of Tempe (abandoned by the Macedonians) found there plenty of corn; of which good fortune he gave the Consul notice. The sooner to get this corn, Marcus quitted Dium, and went to Phila†, to meet the convoy that was coming to him; by which foolish journey, he lost not only that important place, but his reputation. For he was now thought a coward, or, at least, an unskilful General; since he thus retreated, when it most imported him to have pushed forward.

Liv. B. 44.
C. 7.

The imprudence of Marcus brought the King to see his own error. To correct it in the best manner he could, he quickly repossessed himself of Dium, and repaired its fortifications, having found it dismantled by

* It is likely, that the greater part of his stores (for he had taken a month's provision with him from Pharfalus) was lost among the mountains; otherwise he could not have been in such distress, as, without any opposition from the enemy, to be forced to quit his enterprize.

† A town between Dium and Tempe.

Y. R. 554
 Bef. Chr.
 105.
 283 Cons.
 Sur W. R.

the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly behind the river Enipeus. Less diligence, more early employed, would have been enough to have gained him ample revenge upon Marcus, who had formerly deceived him by an idle hope of peace. And even his recovering and fortifying Dium, and his posting himself on the Enipeus, made it impracticable for the Consul to do any thing towards the conquest of Macedon in all the continuance of his office. He took indeed Heracleum, and made a feint as if he would have driven the King farther off, and retaken Dium; but he had nothing so great either in his intention or hope, his chief care being to provide winter quarters. In order to facilitate the conveyance of provisions from Thessaly to Heracleum, he caused the roads to be cleared, and magazines to be erected in the most convenient places. He also sent the admiral to make attempts upon the maritime towns, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others: But though this commander was assisted by Emmes with twenty ships of war, and had five from King Prusias, he met with no success in any one of those enterprises, but lost a considerable number of men.

Polyb. Lib.
 2. 78.

As Marcus acquired little honour by this campaign, so he shewed himself very unwilling that Appius Claudius, who commanded on the side of Epirum, should acquire more. At the time when Perseus, by the success of his arms against Hestilius, had gained great reputation, Archo, Lycortas, and the patriots among the Acheans, judged it for the good of the nation to assist the Romans, in their adversity, whom, in their prosperity, they were never prone to flatter. Archo therefore proposed a decree, which passed, "That the Acheans should send their whole strength into Thessaly, and share all dangers with the Romans." Polybius and others were appointed ambassadors to Marcus, to acquaint him with this decree, and to know his pleasure. Finding the Consul busy in seeking a passage into Macedon, they went along with the army, but mentioned nothing of their commission till he was got to Heracleum. Then Polybius presented the decree; at the same time setting forth how invariably obedient the Acheans had been, during the course of this war, to every command of the Romans. Marcus in very strong terms expressed his satisfaction in the proofs of their good-will: but said, that he now needed no assistance. Instantly Polybius dispatched his colleagues home to report the Consul's answer, staying himself behind in the camp. After a while, Marcus had advice, that Appius Claudius desired of the Acheans 5000 men, to be sent him into Epirus. There could be no room to doubt but Appius had need of these men, and might, with such an accession of strength, do signal service, by obliging Perseus to divide his forces. Nevertheless Marcus desired Polybius to return into Achaia and take especial care that no such aid were sent to Appius: The Acheans, he said, ought not to be burthened with an expence to furnish troops that were not wanted. Away went Polybius, musing, and unable to resolve whether whether the Consul's earnestness in this affair proceeded from affection to the Achaëans, or from envy towards Appius. And when the matter came to be debated in the Achaëan diet, Polybius was in a new perplexity; the issue nearly concerning himself and those of his party. For should he neglect what the Consul had given him in charge, he was sure to incur his resentment; and, on the other hand, he considered, that words spoken by Marcus to him in private would prove no good warrant to the Achaëans for refusing assistance to Appius. In this dilemma therefore he had recourse to the decree of the Senate, which exempted all their allies from the necessity of submitting to any imposition from a Roman commander, unless the same imposition were authorised by express order of the Conscript Fathers. Appius having no such warrant, the Diet referred his demand to the Consul, by whom they knew it would be opposed. And thus Polybius, by his artful management, saved to the Achaëans above 120 * talents *.

V. R. 534.
Pet. Chr.
163.
283 C. 166.

* 25,250 l.
Atbanot.

C H A P. XIX.

FOURTH YEAR of the War.

L. Æmilius Paullus chosen Consul at Rome.

The report of some commissaries with regard to the state of the war in Macedon.

A negotiation between King Perseus and King Eumenes; each believing the other to be a knave, they come to no agreement.

King Perseus cheats King Gentius.

The base and foolish conduct of the Macedonian towards the Bastarnæ.

PLUTARCH reports, that the people of Rome, weary of the long continuance of the Macedonian war, [in which, through the cowardice, or insufficiency of their Generals, they had got nothing hitherto

* This year was passed at Rome the famous Voconian law, so called from Q. Voconius, the Tribune who proposed it. The law enacted, that no woman should be left heiress to an estate; and that no Census should, by his will, give above a fourth part of what he was worth to a woman. By a Census is meant a person rated high in the Censor's books.

The same year a difference happened between the Censors, T. Sempronius Gracchus and C. Claudius Pulcher, about the freedmen. These, that they might have the less sway in elections, had been confined to the four city tribes: and Gracchus now proposed to deprive the greatest part of them entirely of the right of suffrage. But Claudius insisted that this was illegal; and that though a Censor might remove a man from one tribe to another (which was the full meaning of tribu movere) yet he could remove no man, much less a whole order of men, from all the five and thirty tribes. It was at length agreed, that all the freedmen should be incorporated in one of the city tribes; and it fell by lot to the Esquiline tribe to receive them. Liv. .B 45. c. 15.

but dishonour,] cast their eyes upon L. Æmilius Paullus, as a Captain, from whose courage and abilities they might hope a speedy and fortunate issue to that enterprise.

This man, the son of that Æmilius Paullus, who perished at the battle of Cannæ, had been Consul in the year 571, and had then conducted the war against the Ligurians with so much success, as to deserve the honour of a triumph. He was now near sixty years of age, but in full strength both of body and mind. Some time before this, the people had refused him a second Consulship when he stood candidate for it: But in the present exigency they raised him to that dignity, even against his inclinations; and assigned him the province of Macedon, without suffering him to draw lots with his colleague C. Licinius Crassus *.

Æmilius would propose nothing to the Senate concerning his Province, till by Commissaries, sent thither to view the state of things, the strength and condition both of the Roman and Macedonian forces were perfectly known.

Liv. B. 44. c. 20. The Commissaries at their return reported, "That the army had penetrated into Macedon, but with greater danger than benefit: that the two camps lay near each other, the river Eripus between them: that the King avoided a battle, and the Romans had not strength to force him to it: that the Macedonians were 30,000 strong: that Marcus wanted provisions; the Roman Admiral, men; and, for those few that he had, wanted both money and clothes: that Appius Claudius and his army, on the frontier of Illyricum, were so far from being in a condition to invade Macedon, that they lay exposed to the danger of being cut off, if not speedily reinforced: that Eumenes and his fleet had just appeared, and then gone away; nobody could tell why: that he was wavering in his friendship to Rome, but his brother Attalus unquestionably steady."

Liv. B. 44. c. 23. Valerius Antias reports that Eumenes coming to assist Marcus, in the same friendly manner as he had assisted the former Consuls, was not treated with the distinction he had expected; and thereupon returned home in anger, refusing, though requested, to leave behind him his Gallo-Greek horse. Whether this were truly so, or whether the Pergamenians began, when too late, to apprehend, lest the fire, which he himself had helped to kindle, would soon take hold of his own kingdom, it is certain that about this time he grew cold in his behaviour to the Romans. Perseus took encouragement from it to sound him; and, finding him tractable, made an attempt to disengage him from the interest of Rome. The ambassadors whom he sent to Pergamus on this business, (but under colour of negotiating an exchange of prisoners) were also commissioned to go to Antiochus Epiphanes, King of Syria, then at war with

Ptolemy
Legation
*Liv. B. 44.
c. 24.*

* Liv. says nothing of Æmilius's reluctance to accept of the Consulship; and tells us, that the province of Macedon fell to him by lot.

Ptolemy of Egypt. These ministers had orders to represent to Eumenes, "that there could be no real friendship between a King and a free state: that the Romans had an equal enmity to all Kings, though they used the help of one King against another: that they had oppressed Philip by the help of Attalus; Antiochus the Great by the help of Philip and Eumenes; and now made use of the forces of Eumenes and Prusias to ruin Perjes." They were to exhort the Pergamenians to consider, "that the kingdom of Macedon once destroyed, his own could be no longer safe; and that the Romans already began to look with a better eye upon Prusias than upon him." In like manner they were to admonish Antiochus "not to expect any good conclusion of his war with the Romans, so long as the Romans could make him desist from the prosecution of it, by a bare declaration of their will and pleasure." And lastly they were to request, of both Antiochus and Eumenes, "that they would either, by negotiation, engage the Republic to make peace with the Macedonians; or, in case she persisted in so unjust a war, turn their arms against her, as against the common enemy of all Kings." What answer the Syrian gave is not recorded. Eumenes having perceived that the Romans themselves were weary of so tedious and difficult a war, and thinking it not unlikely that a peace would soon be concluded, whether he used his mediation or not, conceived a project of drawing some pecuniary advantage to himself from the present situation of things. He offered Perjes, for a 1000 talents, to stand neuter; for 1500, to procure him a peace; and, in either bargain, not only to pledge his word, but to give hostages. The Macedonian approved very much the article of hostages; and readily agreed with Eumenes, that they should be sent to Cyrene. But as to paying the money, here he stuck. He was willing to be at some expence for a peace with Rome; but did not care to pay for it before he had it. Till the peace should be concluded, he would needs deposite the money in the temple of Samothrace. As this island belonged to Perjes, Eumenes thought the money would be no nearer to him there, than if it remained in Pella; and therefore insisted upon having at least part of it in hand. Thus the two Kings (says Livy) in vain attempted to over-reach one another, and got nothing but infamy for their labour.

After the like manner acted Perjes with Gentius of Illyricum; with whom he had been treating before, and who had answered him in plain terms, that without money he could not stir. The Macedonian was very backward at that time to diminish his treasures; but, when the Romans had got possession of Tempe, he agreed to pay 300 talents, which Gentius demanded as the price of his friendship; and hostages were to be delivered on both sides for performance of covenants. Gentius sent his hostages, in company with some ambassadors, to the Macedonian camp, where Perjes ratified the treaty by oath, and delivered his

*Y. R. 155.
Bell. C. 11.
16.
234 Conf.*

*Appian. fragmenti
L. 9.*

*Polyn.
Leg. 76.
77.*

*Id. Legat.
85.*

way of Perrhabia, into Thessaly, where ravaging the country, they would have constrained the Romans to abandon Tempe, even for want of provisions. This and much more might have been done; but Perfes was a better guardian of his money than of his kingdom. In conclusion, Antigonus, one of his nobles, and the same messenger who had been with the Gauls before, was sent again, to let them know the King's mind. He did his errand; upon which followed a great murmuring of those many thousands that had been drawn so far from their own country to no purpose. Clondicus asked him, Whether he had brought the money with him to pay those 5000 whom the King would take into his service. And when it was perceived, that Antigonus, for want of an answer, had recourse to shirking excuses, the Gauls, without delay, marched back towards the Danube, pillaging and wasting that part of Thrace through which they passed. Yet, barbarians as they were, they suffered the messenger of fraud to escape unhurt, which was more than he could well have expected.

Y. R. 585.
1st. Chr.
167.
284 Conf.

Thus acted Perfes, like a careful treasurer for the Romans, and as if he meant, says Livy, to preserve his money for them, without diminishing the sum^c.

C H A P. XX.

Gentius of Illyricum conquered by the Prætor Anicius.

Æmilius Paullus arrives in Macedon, and drives the enemy from the banks of the Enipeus.

Perfes defeated at the battle of Pydna.

He takes refuge in the island of Samothrace.

All Macedon submits to the Romans; and the King surrenders himself to Octavius, the Roman Admiral, who sends him prisoner to the Consul.

UPON the report before-mentioned of the Commissaries, returned from Macedon, the Senate ordered into that country a large supply of men; but Æmilius was to have, in his army, only two Roman legions, of 6000 foot, and 300 horse each; and of the Italian allies 12,000 foot, and 1200 horse. What soldiers remained after completing these numbers, were to be disposed of in garrison, if fit for service; if unfit, they were to be discharged. Yet, according to Plutarch, Æmilius had in Macedon 100,000 men under his command. Cn. Octavius the Admiral Liv. E. 47.

c. 21.

^c Dio Cassius imputes this parsimonious conduct of Perfes, to a confidence in his own strength, not doubting but that he should be able, without the assistance of allies, to drive the Romans out of Greece.

Dio. Cass. ap. Vales. p. 611.

Y. R. 23.
E. C. 5.
234 C. 1.

of the fleet had 5000 recruits granted him. And to the Prætor L. Anicius, appointed to succeed Appius Claudius in Illyricum, was allotted an army of 20,400 foot and 1400 horse.

The Consul, before his departure from Rome, made an harangue to the people. The substance of it was a reproof for the liberty they took, while ignorant of the true state of things, to censure the conduct of their Generals. He said, "That, if any of them thought themselves wise enough to manage this war, he desired their company into Macedon, to assist him with their advice; that he had ships, horses, tents, and provisions ready at their service: But if they did not care to exchange the ease and indolence of a town life for the fatigues of war, they would do well to restrain their tongues; for he should not govern his actions by their caprice; nor have regard to any councils but such as were given him in the camp."

In the beginning of April, Emilius the Consul, Ostavius the Admiral, and Anicius the Prætor, set out for their respective provinces.

App. in
Liv. B. 44.
c. 31.

The success of Anicius in Illyricum was as rapid as fortunate. He brought the war to a conclusion in thirty days, and before they knew at Rome, that he had begun it. Gentius, after some loss at sea, and the ready submission of some of his towns to the Romans, shut himself up in Scodra, his capital, with all his army, consisting of 15,000 men. This place being very defensible by nature, and so strongly garrisoned, and the King there in person, it could not possibly have been taken in a short time, had the defenders of it kept within their walls. But they would needs sally out and fight; in this seeming rather passionate than courageous, for they were presently routed: and though they lost but 200 men, yet such was their fright and amazement, that Gentius thought it advisable to ask of the Prætor a truce, in order, as he said, to deliberate concerning the state of his affairs. Three days being granted him, he employed this time in enquiring after his brother Caravantius, whom he had commissioned to raise forces, and who was reported to be approaching to his rescue. Finding the rumour groundless, and having asked and obtained of the Prætor permission to come to him, he threw himself at his feet, lamented with tears his past folly, and yielded himself, together with his wife and children, at discretion: After which the whole kingdom presently submitted. Anicius dispatched Perperna (one of the ambassadors whom Gentius had imprisoned) with the news of all these events to Rome.

Liv. B. 44.
c. 41.
Pant. life
Æmil.
App. in fragment.
Liv. B. 44.
c. 31.

ÆMILIUS PAULLUS, having set sail from Brundisium at break of day, arrived at Cençra before night. Thence in five days he reached Delpi, where he sacrificed to Apollo. In five days more he joined the army at Pbila, not far from the Enipeus.

Perfes, after taking the best measures he could to hinder a descent from the Roman fleet on the coast, spared no labour to fortify his bank of the the Enipeus; so that the Consul had little hope to force him in his camp, and enter Macedon that way^a. On enquiry he learnt, that there was a passage over mount Olympus, and by Pythium; the road not bad, but blocked up by a body of troops which the King had placed there. To force this guard, Æmilius chose out 5000 men, whom he committed to the conduct of Scipio Nasica, his son-in-law, and Q. Fabius his own son by nature, but adopted into the Fabian family. In order to conceal the design, they took the way to Heracleum, as if they were going to embark on board the fleet. From Heracleum they directed their march to Pythium, dividing the journey so as to arrive there the third day before it was light. In the mornings of those two days, when they were passing the mountain, Æmilius, that he might fix the King's attention on something present, detached a part of his velites to attack the advanced guard of the Macedonians. The channel of the Enipeus, which received in winter a great fall of waters from the mountains, was exceedingly deep and broad, and the ground of it such, as though at present it lay almost quite dry, yet it afforded no good footing for heavy armed troops. It was for this reason Æmilius employed only his velites, of whom the King's light armed soldiers had the advantage in a distant fight, though the Romans were better armed for close engagement. The engines from the towers, which Perfes had raised on his own bank, played also upon the Romans, and did considerable execution. Yet Æmilius renewed his assault the second day; when he suffered yet a greater loss than the first. The third day he made a motion as if he meant to attempt a passage over the river near the sea. In the mean time, the King's camp became, on a sudden, full of tumult and confusion. Scipio and Fabius (according to Polybius) had surprized the Macedonian guard upon the mountain asleep and slain most of them; the rest with all speed fled to the army, with the news, that the Romans had passed the mountain, and were at their backs. The King instantly broke up his camp, and made a hasty retreat to Pydna^b. Thus was a passage once more opened into Macedon; an advantage which Æmilius did not, like his predecessor Marcus, neglect to improve.

V. R. 85.
Bel. Car.
167.
224 Conf.

Polyb. ap.
Plut.

^a About this time the Consul introduced some new regulations in the Roman discipline. The word of command used to be given aloud at the head of the legions to all the soldiers, but Æmilius now ordered the Tribune of the nearest legion to give it in a low voice to his Primipile, who was to transmit it to the next Centurion, and thus it was to be conveyed from one to another, till it had gone through the whole army. And whereas it had been the custom for the guards to stand from morning to night in their posts, without being relieved; the Consul altered this method, ordering them to be changed at noon. And because they often fell asleep, leaning upon their shields, he commanded that for the future they should go upon guard without a shield. Liv. B. 44. c. 23.

^b This account differs in some circumstances from Plutarch's.

Y. R. 585.
 Bet. Chr.
 167.
 234 Cons.

Plut. 10 of Hann.

Liv. B. 24.
 c. 36.

Perjes could not determine for a while what course to take; whether to distribute his troops into the fortified towns, and so to protract the war; or to put all at once to the hazard of a battle. Seeing his men in good heart, and eager to fight, he at length resolved to venture a general action. He chose therefore a place near the walls of Pydna, commodious for the Phalanx, and on each side of which were some high grounds, fit for the archers and light armed troops. A river covered the whole front; and this river, though shallow, and of little breadth, must in some measure break the order of the Romans in advancing to him. It was not long before the enemy appeared. He offered them battle; which the Roman soldiers would gladly have accepted the instant they arrived: But Æmilius, knowing that they were fatigued with their march, did not think it advisable to come to an engagement till they had taken some rest. Yet, that he might seemingly yield to the ardour of his men, he began to draw them up as for battle, directing the Tribunes to repair each to his post. As the day advanced, and the sun grew hotter, the countenances of the soldiers appeared less animated, their voices sunk, and some of the men were seen leaning on their shields and javelins for weariness. The Consul hereupon ordered a camp to be marked out. His chief officers, though dissatisfied with this change (as they thought it) of his design, yet remained silent. But young Scipio, whose late success on mount Olympus gave him confidence, took the liberty to remonstrate, begging him not to lose his opportunity by delay. Æmilius told him, he spoke like a young man, and bid him have patience. This said, he commanded the troops in the front of his army to remain in their order, while those in the rear formed a camp and entrenched it: which finished, the whole army at leisure fell back into it, without any confusion or molestation from the enemy.

The next day many in each army blamed their Generals for not having fought the day before. Perjes excused himself by the backwardness of the enemy, who did not advance, but kept upon ground very inconvenient for the Phalanx. On the other side the Consul, who had his reasons before-mentioned, communicated them to those about him.

Str W. R.

In the evening of that day (which, by the Roman account, was the third of September), C. Sulpicius Gallus, a legionary Tribune, foretold to Æmilius, and, with his approbation, to the army, an eclipse of the moon which would happen the same night; admonishing the soldiers not to be terrified, it being a natural event, which might be known long before the time. The Romans (according to their custom) while the eclipse lasted, beat pans of brass and basons, as we do in following a swarm of bees; thinking that thereby they helped the moon in her labour. On the other side the Macedonians howled and made a great noise, and this doubtless because it was their custom, and not because they were frightened at the eclipse, as with a prodigy that foreboded any mischief to them; them; since it did not in the least diminish their ardour for the fight. Æmilius, though not so ignorant concerning this phenomenon as to imagine it any thing supernatural, yet, being very religious, could not refrain from doing his duty to the moon, and, by a sacrifice of eleven young bulls, as soon as she shone out bright again, congratulating with her on her delivery. And early the next morning, when he had given the signal to prepare for battle, he sacrificed to Hercules twenty oxen successively, before any good omens could be found in the entrails. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth ox, was found a promise of victory to the Romans, but conditionally ^c that they acted only on the defensive.

Y. R. 535.
B. C. 177.
253 C. 15.
Plut. Life of Æmilius.

About three in the afternoon, when there was no likelihood of a battle, Perseus keeping his ground, and Æmilius having sent abroad a part of his men for wood and forage, an accident brought that to pass, of which neither of the Generals seemed very desirous. A horse belonging to a Roman broke loose, and ran into the river, whither two or three of the soldiers followed him: eight hundred Thracians lay on the further bank, whence two of them ran into the water to draw this horse over to their own side. These fell to blows with the Romans, as in a private quarrel, and one of the Thracians was slain. Some of his countrymen halted to revenge their fellow's death, and followed over the river those that had slain him. Hereupon assistance came in on each part, till the number grew such as made it past a fray, and caused the Generals of both armies to be anxious about the event. Perseus and Æmilius drew up their men in order of battle; and, to elevate their courage, employed all the arguments which the importance of the occasion suggested. But the King having finished his oration, and ordered his men to the charge, withdrew himself into Pydna; there to offer sacrifice to Hercules: as if Hercules, says Plutarch, could like the sacrifice of a coward; or would grant victory to him that would not fight ^d.

Liv. B. 44
c. 40.

It

^c Sir W. R. pleasantly says, "that Hercules was a Greek, and partial, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than the Roman. That therefore it had been better to call upon the new Goddess lately canonized at Alabanda, or upon Romulus, or (if a God of older date were more authentic) upon Mars the father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of military affairs, and who therefore would have limited his favour with no injunctions contrary to the rules of war."

One of the most distinguishing parts of Æmilius's character was circumspection and caution, which he had inherited from his father, a disciple of Fabius Cunctator. And though Sir W. R. blames Æmilius on this occasion, as vainly consuming a great part of the day, in the sacrifices above-mentioned; yet, considering the advantage which Perseus had of the ground, it is not improbable, that the Consul had better reasons than any he found in the ox's belly, for desiring that the King should quit his post, and be the assailant. Plutarch speaks of the morning sun being full in the faces of the Romans, as a reason for Æmilius's deferring the battle till the afternoon. But it appears from Livy, that the Consul had no intention to fight, even when the sun favoured him.

^d One Pofidonius (an historian quoted by Plutarch) says, that he was present at this battle,

K k k 2

Y. R. 185.
Bel. Chr.
167.
284 Cons.

It is impossible to form any satisfactory notion of this battle, in its detail, from the imperfect accounts of it in Livy and Plutarch. We read that the Macedonian cavalry quickly fled out of the field; that nevertheless the Phalanx pressed on so resolutely as to bear down all that opposed it, in so much that Emilius was astonished and terrified, and rent his clothes for grief. What gave him the victory was the difficulty, not to say the impossibility of the Phalanx's preserving its order for any considerable time. For while some of the Roman battalions pressed hard upon one part of it, and others recoiled from it, it was necessary, if the Macedonians would follow those that gave ground, that some files should advance beyond the rest. Emilius, when he saw the front of the enemy's battle become unequal (by reason of the unequal resistance which they met with) and the ranks in some places open, divided his men into small battalions, ordering them to throw themselves into the void spaces, and charge the Phalangites in flank. The long pikes of the Macedonians by this means became useless: and, with only their weak swords and targets, they were by no means a match for the Roman Legionaries, who had strong swords, and whose shields covered them almost from head to foot. There soon followed a total rout of the Macedonian infantry. More than 20,000 of them are said to be slain, and 5000 taken prisoners. It is also said, that the Romans did not lose above a hundred men; a tale not very consistent with what is related of the exploits of the Macedonian Phalanx.

Plut. Life of Emil

Sir W. R.

Liv. B. 44.
c. 43.

Perjes fled from Pydna towards Pella, attended by a great number of his horse. Some of the foot which had escaped from the slaughter overtook the King and his company in a wood, where they fell to railing at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traitors, and other such names, till at length they came to blows*. The King, fearing lest they should turn their wrath against him, suddenly left the high road. A few followed him: the rest dispersed themselves, and went every one whither his inclinations guided him. Of those that kept with their King the number began in a short time to lessen: for he fell to devising upon whom to lay the blame of that day's misfortune; which caused those that knew his nature to shrink away from him under various pretences. At his coming to Pella about midnight, he found his pages, and Eutrus† the Governor of the town, ready to attend him; but of his great men that battle, and reports, that Perjes, though hurt the day before in the leg by a kick of a horse, did nevertheless, and contrary to the pressing instances of his friends, lead his phalanx to the charge, and that he continued at their head till he was wounded in the side by a javelin.

* Livy says nothing of the foot having overtaken the horsemen, or of the quarrel between them; or that the King blamed any body for the loss of the battle.

† Plutarch says, that Perjes stabbed with his own hand this Eutrus, and one Edcus, for telling him of his faults, and giving him advice with too much freedom.

had had escaped from the battle, though he often sent for them, not one would come near him. Fearing lest they, who had the boldness to disobey his summons, would dare something worse, he stole out of Pella before morning. There went with him only Evander (the Cretan formerly employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other companions of his flight from Pydna. The third day after the battle Perfes came to Amphipolis, where having several times attempted to make a speech to the people, and having as often been hindered by his tears from proceeding, he appointed Evander to speak in his name what he himself had intended to say. The Amphipolitans, upon the first rumour of the King's defeat, had emptied their town of 2000 Thracians that lay there in garrison, sending them out, under colour of an expedition that was to make them rich, and then shutting the gates after them. And now to rid themselves of the King, some of the citizens cried out while Evander was speaking, Hence; depart; must we be ruined upon your account? Perfes therefore put his family, his treasures, and 500 Cretans, on board some vessels which were in the river Strymon, and embarking with them followed the course of the stream. These Cretans are said to have repaired to him, not out of any affection to his person, or his cause, but to his money, of which they hoped to share^{}. The King knowing their wishes and views, caused some gold and silver cups and vases, to the value of fifty talents^{}, to be laid on the shore, as a booty for which they might scramble. He would not make the distribution himself, for fear of disobliging some of them. When the Cretans had loaded themselves with these riches, the little fleet sailed to Galepsos, a maritime town between the mouths of the Strymon and the Hebrus. But now Perfes, repenting of his liberality, pretended to the Cretans, that among the cups and vases there had been put, by mistake, some which Alexander the Great had made use of; for whose memory he had so high a respect, that it grieved him, he said, to part with the least thing that had belonged to that Hero; and he offered to redeem them with more than they were intrinsically worth. Many of the Cretans, imposed upon by this declaration, brought back their urns and vases. The King passed into Samothrace, and spoke no more of the money. By this base artifice he recovered about thirty talents^h.

Samothrace was an island consecrated to Cybele the mother of the Gods. According to tradition she had formerly dwelt in it, on which account it was held sacred by all nations. Perfes, hoping that the Romans would not profane this sanctuary by staining it with his blood, chose to retire thither with his family and the remains of his dear treasure (which

Y. R. 585.
B. E. Chr.
167.
282. C. C. f.

* 9687 l.
108. Arbuthnot.

Plut. life of Æmil.

* This may be true, yet it seems natural, that, without this allurements, they should adhere to Evander, their countryman and General, who continued about the King.

^h Livy makes no mention of this cheat.

V. R. 555.
Bell. Cntr.
16.
284 C. 55.

* 284 C. 55.
A. 284 C. 55.

Liv. B. 44.
C. 45, 46.

still amounted to about * 2000 talents, and he took up his habitation in a place adjoining to the temple of Cæster and Pellux.

It is somewhat singular, that a King whose arms had prospered for three years together, should, after the loss of only one battle, be so deserted by all his subjects, and reduced to such miserable shifts: And it renders credible, in some degree, what the historians have related of his monstrous fallhood, avarice and pusillanimity, in the latter part of his reign. The whole kingdom fell into the power of Æmilius in a few days after his victory. Hippias, who had kept the pass near the lake Æcuris against Marcus; Pantauchus, who had been sent ambassador to Gentius; and Mis, another of the King's principal officers, were the first that came in, yielding themselves and the town of Beræa, whither they had retired out of the battle. With messages to the like effect came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and most of the towns of Macedon, within two days. Pydna held out a day or two longer. About 6000 soldiers of divers nations having fled out of the battle into that town, this confused rabble of strangers hindered the townsmen from coming immediately to any determination. Mis and Pantauchus, by the direction of Æmilius, went thither to parly with the commander of the garrison. It was agreed that the soldiers should yield themselves prisoners of war, and that the Roman army should have the plunder of the city. After this, Æmilius marched to Pella, where, of the King's treasure, he found no more than 300 talents [Livy should have said, 290;] the same of which the Macedonian had lately defrauded Gentius.

B. 45. c. 4.
& seq.

The report that Perjes had taken refuge in Samothrace, was soon confirmed by his own letters to the Consul. He had sent these letters by persons of such mean condition, that Æmilius is said to have wept with compassion for a King so fallen as to have no servants of better rank to employ in this commission. But though Perjes had written in the stile of a suppliant, and not of a King, yet, because the inscription of his epistle was, King Perjes to the Consul Paullus, his folly, says Livy, in retaining the title of King, when he had lost his kingdom, extinguished all the Consul's pity, so that he would return him no answer either by word or writing. The Macedonian now felt the whole weight of his calamity; he wrote again, omitting the word King in the superscription, and desiring Æmilius to send to him some persons with whom he might confer about his present condition. Three went to him from the Consul, but effected nothing; they insisting, that Perjes should yield himself at discretion; and he refusing to part with the title of King. It was perhaps the hope of being able to compound with his enemies, and purchase of them the permission to live in quiet, and retain the title of King, that had made him so carefully preserve his treasures, and retire with them to Samothrace: imagining that the Romans would neither violate a sanctuary, nor yet neglect the riches in his possession.

Presently

Presently after arrived at that island, with the Roman fleet, C. Octavius, who had been ordered thither by the Consul. Octavius endeavoured as well by threats as by fair words, to make the King leave his retreat. All proving ineffectual, a young Roman named Atilius, moved a question to the Samothracians; How they came to pollute their island (which they held to be sacred, by receiving, even into their sanctuary, a man stained with the blood of King Eumenes, whom he wounded and endeavoured to murder, in the holy precincts of the temple at Delphi? As they were now absolutely in the power of the Romans, this question caused no small perplexity and fear. They signified to the King, that Evander, who lived with him, was accused of a sacrilegious crime, of which he must either clear himself, upon a fair trial; or, if through guilt he durst not stand a trial, must cease to profane a holy place, and leave it immediately. The King himself was not charged in this message; yet, what would that avail him, if the instrument of the fact, being brought into judgment, should impeach the author? Perses therefore exhorted the Cretan, by no means to stand a trial, in which neither favour nor justice could be expected; adding that the best thing he could do was bravely to kill himself. Evander seemed to approve the advice; but said, he had rather die by poison than the sword; and, under colour of preparing poison, he prepared to escape. The King, suspecting his intention, found means to get him murdered; and then, to avoid the charge of having polluted the holy place, he bribed the chief magistrate of Samothrace to publish, that the Cretan had killed himself. This monstrous proceeding of Perses, towards so constant a follower of his fortunes, drove almost every body from him, except his wife, his children, and his pages. Thus deserted, he turned his thoughts to make an escape, and fly with his treasures to King Cotys of Thrace, his good friend and ally. Oroandes, a Cretan, who lay at Samothrace with one ship, was easily persuaded to undertake the affair. The dear treasure (as much of it as could be so conveyed) Perses caused secretly to be carried on board by night: After which, having got out at a window, with his wife and his eldest son *Philip*¹, they passed through a garden, and over a wall, and thence to the sea-side. No ship was there. Oroandes had sailed away with the money. Perses wandered some time on the shore, undetermined what course to take. It grew towards day: Fearing therefore to be discovered and intercepted, he made all haste back to his asylum.

Octavius published a proclamation, importing, That all the Macedonians, who yet attended their master in Samothrace, should have their lives and liberty, with whatever estate or effects they had, either in the island, or in Macedon, provided they immediately yielded them-

¹ This elder son is said by Livy to have been the King's brother by nature, and his son only by adoption.

V. R. 585.
B.C. Chr.
167.
284 Conf.

Y. R. 355.
B. A. C. 171.
171.
224 C. 171.

selves to the Romans. Hereupon the pages, who were the sons of the chief nobles, and who had hitherto constantly kept with the King, surrendered themselves to the Prætor. It was also, a Theſſalonian, to whom Perſes had committed the care of his younger children, delivered them up. Lastly, the King, now destitute of all support, and accusing the Gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him, gave himself up, with his son Philip, to Octavius, who sent them away to Æmilius: and thus the Roman victory was compleat ^k.

Perſes entered the camp in a mourning habit; and when he came into the Consul's tent, would have thrown himself at his feet; a behaviour so base and abject, that Æmilius thought it dishonoured his victory. Having made the King sit down, he expostulated with him, in gentle words, on his having, ſo ^l unjustly and with ſo hostile a mind, made war upon the Romans. To this a Prince of more spirit would not have wanted an answer. Perſes said nothing. The Consul went on, "However these things have happened, whether through mistake, to which every man is liable, or by chance, or by the inevitable decrees of fate; take courage: The clemency of the Roman people, which so many Kings and nations have experienced in adversity, affords you, not only a hope, but almost an assurance of life." He then gave the King in custody to Ælius Tubero, who was the Consul's son-in-law.

Thus ended the Macedonian war (which had lasted four years) and with it the Macedonian monarchy, after it had continued in splendor 193 years, reckoning only from Philip the father of Alexander the Great ^m.

Lit. B. 45.
C. 21.
Plut. life of Paul.
Appian.
Strabo.

^k Æmilius Paulus is (by Livy and others) made to boast in a speech to the people, that he finished the war against Perſes in fifteen days. This is absolutely unintelligible, unless he reckons from the battle of Pydna, or the action upon the Enipeus: for no circumstances of the whole story are better, if so well, authorized, than his leaving Rome the first of April to go to the army, his arrival in the camp the eleventh day after sailing from Brundisium, and his fighting the battle of Pydna on the fourth of September.

Petavius says it is evident, from the eclipse which happened the night before this battle, that it was fought in the year before Christ 168. Rationaler. Temp. P. II. B. 2. c. 14.

^l So outrageous an insult upon wretchedness, as Æmilius is guilty of, in this lying expostulation, is hardly to be paralleled.

^m The Roman State, by the entire conquest of Macedon, became exalted to the pitch of an irresistible Power. Sir Walter Raleigh, finishing that part, which he has left us of the History of the World, with this conquest, makes use of a beautiful similitude to express the prosperous condition and high fortune of the Romans at that period, and likewise the future fate, the decline, and total ruin of their empire.

"By this which we have already set down, is seen the beginning and end of the three first monarchies of the world. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field, having rooted up or cut down all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the storms of ambition shall beat her great boughs and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbs wither, and a rabble of barbarous nations enter the field and cut her down." Sir W. R. in fine.

C H A P.

C H A P. XXI.

The ill reception of the Rhodian ambassadors at Rome.

Antiochus Epiphanes haughtily treated by a Roman ambassador.

Compliments to the Senate from Antiochus, the Ptolemys of Egypt, and Masinissa.

The Prætor Anicius reduces the Epirots; and, in conjunction with five Commissioners from Rome, settles the government of Illyricum.

Æmilius Paullus, assisted by ten commissioners, settles the affairs of Macedon.

Their conduct with regard to the Ætolians, Achæans and other Greeks.

Æmilius frames a body of laws for the Macedonians. His cruelty to the Epirots. He with difficulty obtains a triumph at Rome.

The death of Perſes.

The Romans restore to Cotys his captive son.

IT is needless to say any thing of the joy at Rome upon the news of the victory at Pydna. The Romans began now to look with a haughty and menacing eye, upon all those of their allies, whose behaviour had displeased them during the war of Macedon.

The republic of Rhodes (as was before * observed) had arrogantly undertaken to put an end to the war between Perſes and the Romans. At what time soever her ambassadors came to Rome on this affair (for the time is uncertain) they had not their audience till after the news of Æmilius's victory *. The Senate, who knew upon what business these Ministers had been sent, maliciously called for them now, and bid them perform their commission. Ageſipolis, chief of the embassy, said, "That they had come in the view of mediating a peace, believing, that the war was extremely burthensome to the Greeks in general, and, on ac-

V. R. 585.
Bef. Chr.
167.
284 Conf.

* See p. 430.

Liv. B. 45.
c. 3.
Polyb. Legat. 88.

* Livy having before related (B. 44. c. 14.) that these very ambassadors had been admitted to audience in the consulship of Marcus, and had then spoken arrogantly and in threatening terms to the senate, now tells us, that, according to some authors, these ministers had no audience till after the battle of Pydna. That this last account is true, may be gathered from Polybius, who had a share in the transactions of those times. He tells us, that the Rhodians indeed sent ambassadors to Rome, in the Consulship of Marcus; but that their business was to renew their friendship with the Romans, to vindicate Rhodes from the charge of disaffection to Rome, and to ask leave to export a certain quantity of corn from Sicily. He adds, that they were very graciously received, and civilly dismissed. Legat. 80. 86. 88. and 93.

Y. R. 35.
B. C. 197.
197.
234 C. 197.

“ count of the expences that attended it, even to the Romans them“ selves. But since it was now brought to that conclusion, which the
“ A Macedonians had always wished, they congratulated with the Senate and “ people of Rome on so happy an event.” To which the Fathers an“ swered, “ That the Rhodians had not sent this embassy, from any re“ gard to the welfare of Greece, or from affection to the Roman people;
“ but for the service of Perſes. For, had they studied the good of “ Greece, they would have offered their mediation, when Perſes had his “ camp in Thessaly, and, for two years together, ravaged the lands of “ the Greeks. But as the mediating scheme was not thought of till the “ Roman army had entered Macedon, and Perſes had small hopes to “ escape, it plainly shewed, that the only view of the Rhodian Repub“ lic was, as much as in her lay, to rescue the Macedonian out of his “ danger. Her ambassadors therefore had no title to be received by “ the Senate as friends, or to expect a friendly answer.”

How excessively the Roman pride was swelled by their conquest of Macedon, we have a remarkable proof in what past, about this time, between their ambassador and the King of Syria.

54 B. C.
167 B. C.

477 B. C.
197 B. C.

P. 10. L.
234 B. C.
H. 197 B. C.
197 B. C.
197 B. C.
197 B. C.
197 B. C.

197 B. C.
197 B. C.

After the death of Antiochus surnamed the Great (who was killed by the people of Elymais, for plundering the temple of Jupiter Belus in their country) his son, Seleucus Philopater, succeeded him in the throne. Seleu- cus sent for his younger brother Antiochus, who had been a hostage at Rome, ever since the conclusion of the peace between his father and the Republic; and gave in exchange for him his own son Demetrius. Before Antiochus arrived in Syria, Seleucus was poisoned, and the kingdom usurped by Heliödomus, the treasurer. Nevertheless, by the assistance of Eumenes King of Pergamus, Antiochus expelled the Usurper, and seated himself in the throne, assuming the surname of Epiphanes [or the Illustrious.] He entered into a war against his nephew Ptolemy Philometor, King of Egypt, about Cele-Syria and Palestine; vanquished the Egyp- tians in two battles; and took Philometor prisoner. Hereupon the Alex- andrians declared Ptolemy Euergetes or Phyſcon, King, in the room of his elder brother. The Syrian, under pretence of restoring the latter to his kingdom, renewed the war against the Egyptians, defeated them in a sea fight, took Palusium, and laid siege to Alexandria, where Phyſcon had shut himself up with his sister Cleopatra. These applied to the Senate for relief; and the Conscripſt Fathers, not thinking it for the interest of the Republic, that Antiochus should annex Egypt to his dominions, dispatched ambassadors to put an end to the war between the two Kings.
C. Popillius Lænas, C. Decimius and C. Hostilius, the persons commissioned on this affair, had orders to address themselves first to Antiochus, and then to Ptolemy, signifying to each, that if he persisted in carrying on the war, the people of Rome would hold him for their enemy. In the mean time, as the Syrian found it difficult to reduce Alexandria, in it's present

present strength, and hoped that he should succeed better in his designs when the brothers were weakened by the continuation of the war between themselves, he returned home; leaving Philometor in possession of Memphis and all Egypt, except Alexandria and Pelusium. This last town he kept in his own hands, that he might enter the country when he pleased. The brothers perceived the ambitious views of the Syrian; to disappoint which they came to an accommodation, by the good offices of their sister Cleopatra, and agreed to reign jointly. Antiochus, vexed to see his projects disconcerted, resolved now to make war upon both the brothers. In pursuance of this resolution, he sent a fleet to Cyprus, and marched with his land army towards Egypt. At his coming to Rhinocolura, ambassadors met him from Ptolemy the elder, to entreat him that he would not destroy his own work; but suffer their master quietly to wear the crown he owed to his friendship. The Syrian answered, that he would neither draw off his fleet nor his army, unless Cyprus, Pelusium, and all the land on that branch of the Nile where Pelusium stood, were yielded to him in perpetuity. These conditions being rejected, Antiochus by force of arms subdued all Egypt, except Alexandria. He was on his march to besiege this city, and within four miles of it, when the Roman ambassadors (who, having passed through Greece and Asia, had been several months in their journey) came up to him. The Syrian, while a hostage at Rome, had contracted a friendship with Popillius, the chief of the embassy, and therefore immediately offered him his hand. But the Roman, instead of accepting the civility, put into the King's hand a writing, which contained the Senate's decree; and bid him read that. Antiochus read it; and then said, He would consult with his friends. Instantly Popillius, with a vine twig, drew a circle round the King: Your answer, said the ambassador, before you go out of this circle. *Antiochus, stunned at the imperiousness of the command, hesitated for some moments; after which he replied, The Senate shall be obeyed. He would hardly have been so submissive (says Polybius) had he not received advice of Æmilius's victory over Perfes. And it may be worth observing, that this haughty Popillius was the man who, when the Roman affairs went ill in Macedon, employed such soft and gentle words to the Acbeans and Ætolians. Nor did Antiochus, during that war, pay any regard to the mediation of the Romans, who had sent ambassadors to terminate the war between him and Ptolemy. But times were changed; and the Syrian now most obsequiously withdrew his fleet and army, and went back into his own country.

Popillius and his colleagues having sent away Antiochus, and established a peace between the two Ptolemys, left Egypt, and returned to Rome.

* It was this Antiochus who pillaged Jerusalem, filled the streets with dead bodies and the temple with profanations.

A memorable event which the prophet *Daniel had foretold.

* Dan. ix. 31.

Y. R. 83.
P. 1. C. 1.
110.
110.

Polyb. Legat. 92.

Legat. 91.

Livy, B. 45. c. 12.

1 Maccab. c. i. Joseph. Antiq. B. 12.

Y. R. 485.
Bel. Chr.
167.
284 Cons.

They were followed thither by ambassadors from Syria and Egypt. The Syrians, on the part of their King, assured the Conscrip Fathers, "That he preferred a peace, that was agreeable to the Senate, before any victory; that he had obeyed the orders of their ambassadors, as if they had been the commands of the Gods; that he congratulated the Romans on their victory over Perfes; and that, had they required it of him, he would have zealously assisted them in the war." The Senate answered, "That Antiochus had done well in obeying the ambassadors, and that his conduct herein was very agreeable to the Republic." Then the Egyptian ministers, and, after them Masgaba, the son of Masimissa, had audience of the Fathers. Their speeches were such as if they had vied one with another, which should flatter the Romans most. The Egyptians said, "That the two Kings and Cleopatra thought themselves more indebted to the Senate and people of Rome, than to their parents, or even the immortal Gods." And as for Masgaba, he truly, on the part of his father, (having first reckoned all the horse, foot, elephants, and corn, he had sent into Macedon in four years past) "was overwhelmed with confusion on two accounts; the one, that the Senate, to have these supplies, had employed a request, and not a command; the other, that they had sent money for the corn." He added, "Masimissa never forgets that he owes his kingdom and all its augmentations to you: He indeed, by your favour, enjoys the revenues of it, but always considers you as the Proprietors and Lords of Numidia. This, at my departure, he instructed me to say. Having afterwards heard of your victory over Perfes, he dispatched some horsemen after me, to bid me assure you that he was overjoyed at your success; and beg that you would permit him to come to Rome, if he should not be troublesome, and offer, in thanksgiving, a sacrifice to Jupiter in the capitol." The substance of the Senate's answer was, "That the Romans had done Masimissa the favours he mentioned; that he had deserved them; and that he was a very grateful and a very honest man. As to his journey, they said, it would be sufficient if he thanked God at home; his son might do it for him at Rome."

Y. R. 486.
Bel. Chr.
166.
285 Cons.

Liv. B. 45.
c. 16.

c. 26.

Q. Ælius Petus and M. Junius Pennus were raised to the Consulate. But the Senate continued Æmilius in his command in Macedon, as Proconsul; and Anicius and Ostacius in their respective provinces as Proprætors. They also appointed ten Commissioners to regulate the affairs of Macedon, and five to settle those of Illyricum, in concert with the two Generals.

Anicius, before these Commissioners arrived, marched with part of his army into Epirus. All the country immediately submitted to him, except four towns, Passaron, Tecmon, Phylax, and Horreum; and not one of these stood a siege. Two men, Antinous, and Theodotus, who in concert concert with Cephalus, had brought about the defection of the Epirots, and who despaired of pardon, would have persuaded the inhabitants of Passaron to hold out against the Romans, and prefer death to slavery: But the council of a certain young citizen of rank, who advised them to open their gates, had more weight with the multitude. Antinous and his friend, seeing themselves thus deserted, rushed out of the town, attacked a Roman guard, and there found the death they sought. Cephalus, who had engaged the people of Tecmon to shut their gates, being also slain, both these towns were rendered to the Proprætor; and their example was soon followed by Phylax and Horreum.

Y. R. 586.
Bef. Chr.
166.
285 Conf.

The reduction of Epirus being thus compleated, Anicius distributed his troops into winter quarters, and returned to Scodra in Illyricum. Here he found the five commissioners from Rome; with whom having consulted, he called an assembly of the principal men of the country, and, in conformity to a decree of the Conscript Fathers, declared, “ That the Senate and people of Rome granted liberty to the Illyrians: That the Roman garrisons should be withdrawn from all the towns, fortresses and castles in the country: That those of the Illyrian towns which, before or during the war with Gentius, had come over to the Romans, should be exempted from all taxes: the rest pay but a moiety of what they had used to pay to their Kings.” Illyricum was then divided into three parts, independent of each other.

During these transactions Æmilius was making a tour of pleasure, and visiting all the famous cities of Greece: He would not, any where, inquire into the dispositions of the inhabitants with regard to Perfes, that he might give them no alarm. Soon after his return from this excursion, he proceeded to business; the ten commissioners, who were to assist him in settling the affairs of Macedon, being arrived. He had ordered ten of the principal men out of each city of the kingdom, to attend him on a certain day at Amphipolis, bringing with them all the public registers, and the King’s money. When this day came, he ascended the tribunal with the Roman commissioners, and, having caused silence to be made, pronounced, in Latin, to the assembly, what had been determined by the Senate of Rome and the council present, in relation to Macedon. The Prætor Octavius afterwards explained to them the whole in Greek. It was to this effect. “ All the Macedonians shall be free, and enjoy their cities, lands and laws, and create annual Magistrates. They shall pay to the Roman Republic half the tribute they formerly paid their Kings. Macedon shall be divided into four cantons, of

Liv. B. 45.
c. 29.

^b When Livy says Laws, he must mean the By-Laws of the several cities or communities; for we find that Æmilius made a body of laws for the government of the whole: If it be not rather true that, in pro-misg them that they should retain their own laws, he acted, as in other parts of his conduct, without the least regard to truth or humanity.

■ which

Y. R. 585.
Bel. Chr.
167.
284 Cons.

They were followed thither by ambassadors from Syria and Egypt. The Syrians, on the part of their King, assured the Conscrip Fathers, "That he perferred a peace, that was agreeable to the Senate, before any victory; that he had obeyed the orders of their ambassadors, as if they had been the commands of the Gods; that he congratulated the Romans on their victory over Perfes; and that, had they required it of him, he would have zealously assisted them in the war." The Senate answered, "That Antiochus had done well in obeying the ambassadors, and that his conduct herein was very agreeable to the Republic." Then the Egyptian ministers, and, after them Masgaba, the son of Masniſſa, had audience of the Fathers. Their speeches were such as if they had vyed one with another, which should flatter the Romans most. The Egyptians said, "That the two Kings and Cleopatra thought themselves more indebted to the Senate and people of Rome, than to their parents, or even the immortal Gods." And as for Masgaba, he truly, on the part of his father, (having first reckoned all the horse, foot, elephants, and corn, he had sent into Macedon in four years past) "was overwhelmed with confusion on two accounts; the one, that the Senate, to have these supplies, had employed a request, and not a command; the other, that they had sent money for the corn." He added, "Masniſſa never forgets that he owes his kingdom and all its augmentations to you: He indeed, by your favour, enjoys the revenues of it, but always considers you as the Proprietors and Lords of Numidia. This, at my departure, he instructed me to say. Having afterwards heard of your victory over Perfes, he dispatched some horsemen after me, to bid me assure you that he was overjoyed at your success; and beg that you would permit him to come to Rome, if he should not be troublesome, and offer, in thanksgiving, a sacrifice to Jupiter in the capitol." The substance of the Senate's answer was, "That the Romans had done Masniſſa the favours he mentioned; that he had deserved them; and that he was a very grateful and a very honest man. As to his journey, they said, it would be sufficient if he thanked God at home; his son might do it for him at Rome."

Y. R. 586.
Bel. Chr.
166.
285 Cons.

Liv. B. 45.
c. 16.

c. 26.

Q. Ælius Petus and M. Junius Pennus were raised to the Consulate. But the Senate continued Æmilius in his command in Macedon, as Proconsul; and Anicius and Ostacius in their respective provinces as Proprætors. They also appointed ten Commissioners to regulate the affairs of Macedon, and five to settle those of Illyricum, in concert with the two Generals.

Anicius, before these Commissioners arrived, marched with part of his army into Epirus. All the country immediately submitted to him, except four towns, Passaron, Tecmen, Phylax, and Horreum; and not one of these stood a siege. Two men, Antinous, and Theodotus, who in concert concert with Cephalus, had brought about the defection of the Epirots, and who despaired of pardon, would have persuaded the inhabitants of Passaron to hold out against the Romans, and prefer death to slavery: But the council of a certain young citizen of rank, who advised them to open their gates, had more weight with the multitude. Antinous and his friend, seeing themselves thus deserted, rushed out of the town, attacked a Roman guard, and there found the death they sought. Cephalus, who had engaged the people of Tecmon to shut their gates, being also slain, both these towns were rendered to the Proprætor; and their example was soon followed by Phylax and Horreum.

Y. R. 586.
Bef. Chr.
166.
285 Conf.

The reduction of Epirus being thus compleated, Anicius distributed his troops into winter quarters, and returned to Scodra in Illyricum. Here he found the five commissioners from Rome; with whom having consulted, he called an assembly of the principal men of the country, and, in conformity to a decree of the *Conscrip*t Fathers, declared, “ That the Senate and people of Rome granted liberty to the Illyrians: That the Roman garrisons should be withdrawn from all the towns, fortresses and castles in the country: That those of the Illyrian towns which, before or during the war with Gentius, had come over to the Romans, should be exempted from all taxes: the rest pay but a moiety of what they had used to pay to their Kings.” Illyricum was then divided into three parts, independent of each other.

During these transactions Æmilius was making a tour of pleasure, and visiting all the famous cities of Greece: He would not, any where, inquire into the dispositions of the inhabitants with regard to Perses, that he might give them no alarm. Soon after his return from this excursion, he proceeded to business; the ten commissioners, who were to assist him in settling the affairs of Macedon, being arrived. He had ordered ten of the principal men out of each city of the kingdom, to attend him on a certain day at Amphipolis, bringing with them all the public registers, and the King’s money. When this day came, he ascended the tribunal with the Roman commissioners, and, having caused silence to be made, pronounced, in Latin, to the assembly, what had been determined by the Senate of Rome and the council present, in relation to Macedon. The Prætor Octavius afterwards explained to them the whole in Greek. It was to this effect. “ All the Macedonians shall be free, and enjoy their cities, lands and laws, and create annual Magistrates. They shall pay to the Roman Republic half the tribute they formerly paid their Kings. Macedon shall be divided into four cantons, of

Liv. B. 45.
c. 29.

^b When Livy says Laws, he must mean the By-Laws of the several cities or communities; for we find that Æmilius made a body of laws for the government of the whole: If it be not rather true that, in pro-misg them that they should retain their own laws, he acted, as in other parts of his conduct, without the least regard to truth or humanity.

“ which

Y. R. 436.
Erf. Chr.
160.
293. Cæſar

“ which Amphipolis, Pella, Thessalonica and Pelagonia shall be the capi“ tals. In these chief cities shall be held the particular Diets of each “ canton; and there the Magistrates shall be elected, and the tribute “ money paid. No person shall be suffered to marry, or to purchase “ lands, or houses, out of his own canton. No Macedonian shall be “ suffered to work in gold or silver mines; but they may in those of “ copper and iron.”

The article of chusing their own Magistrate, and that of paying but half their former tribute, were some consolation to the Macedonians; but did not compensate them for separating the members of the national body, and thereby depriving each member of all assistance from the rest. Livy says, the Macedonians themselves were not aware how contemptible each part became by this division.

1. E. 43.
2. 21.

Æmilius, in his return from his tour of pleasure, had been met by a crowd of Ætolians in mourning, who came to make heavy complaints to him. Lyciscus and Tisippus, two of their countrymen, whom their credit with the Romans rendered all powerful in Ætolia, had, with a body of soldiers, lent them by Bæbius, surrounded the Diet, and massacred 550 of the principal men of the nation, banished others, and given the estates, both of the murdered and the exiled, to their accusers^d. The Proconsul had deferred his answer to these complainants, and bid them meet him at Amphipolis. He now, in conjunction with the Commissioners, examined into the affair. But the only enquiry was, Who had favoured Perseus, and who the Romans; not who had done, or who had suffered wrong. The murderers were consequently acquitted of all injustice, and the banishment of the exiles confirmed. Only Bæbius was condemned for having employed Roman soldiers in the massacre.

2. 31.

SE. W. R.

Whatever might be said to palliate the cruelty of the Roman proceedings, in regard to those nations that had been conquered by them, certainly their behaviour towards the Greeks, that were not subjects to Rome, could deserve no better name than mere tyranny and shameless perjury. The Greeks, during the war, had been divided into three parties, which we may call by the names of the Romanists, the Perseites, and the Patriots; which last had nothing at heart but the preservation of the laws and liberty of their country. The two former may properly be stiled factions; because, as Livy tells us, they acted upon views only of private interest. Since the defeat of Perseus, the Romanists had every where got possession of all offices and honours; and these men employed their credit with the Romans to ruin both the Patriots and the Perseites. Coming in great numbers to Æmilius, they gave information

^d Lyciscus had been instrumental in disappointing Perseus of his hopes, when, during the war, he made a journey into Ætolia, as has been mentioned, p. 421; and the men on whom this massacre was committed, were probably those who had invited Perseus thither.

against

against the open and secret enemies of Rome; by the latter, meaning the Patriots. The Proconsul, by his mandates, summoned, from Ætolia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Bœotia, all those whose names had been given in to him; and ordered them to follow him to Rome, there to be tried.

With regard to the Achèans, Amilius, and the other ten Tyrants, proceeded with more form. Callistrates, that traitor to his country before-mentioned, had given in a list of all those of his countrymen whom he had a mind to destroy; but it was not judged advisable to summon these by letter; because the Achèans, having more spirit than the other Greeks, might possibly not obey; and perhaps they might massacre Callistrates and his parents. Besides, though the Commissioners had, among the King of Macedon's papers, found letters from the leading men of the other States; yet they had found none from any Achèan. They deputed therefore two of their own body, C. Claudius and Cn. Domitius, to negotiate with the Achèan diet. One of these deputies, having first complained in the assembly, that some of the chief among them had, with money and other means, befriended Perſes, modestly desired, that all such men might be condemned to death: whom, after sentence given, he would name to them. After sentence given! (cried out the whole assembly) What justice is this? Name them first, and let them answer. If they cannot clear themselves, we shall quickly condemn them. Then said the Roman impudently, All your Prætors, as many as have led your armies, are guilty of this crime. If this be true, answered Xeno, (a man of temper, and confident in his innocence) then have I also been a friend to Perſes; for I have commanded the Achèan army. But if any one accuse me, I am ready to answer him, either here immediately, or before the Senate at Rome. The Roman, laying hold of these words, replied, You say right: that will be the best way. Do you, with all the rest, clear yourselves at Rome before the Senate. Then, by an edict, he ordered above a thousand of the principal Achèans, there named, to be carried to Rome: a proceeding unprecedented, and more tyrannical than any thing done by Philip of Macedon, or his son Alexander the Great. Those Princes, all powerful as they were, never thought of summoning their enemies, among the Greeks, to come to Macedon to be tried; but left the judgment of such matters to the Council of the Amphyſians.

This may be justly termed the captivity of Greece, so many of the worthiest men being torn from their native homes, for no other cause but their love to their country, and for being Grecians in Greece; though the Romans held it the greatest of crimes for a member of their Republic not to be a Roman. At the coming of the accused to Rome, the Senate without hearing them, and under pretence that they had been already condemned by their own countrymen, dispersed them into several cities of Etruria, there to be held in custody. Frequent embassies were

Y. R. 586.
P. C. 166.
285 C. 16.

See p. 395.

Person in Achæan
C. 16.

Sir W. R.

Polybius,
Legat. 105.
157.

Y. R. 586.
 Bel. Chr.
 166.
 285 Conf.

were sent from Achaia to remonstrate to the Senate that these men had not been condemned by the Acbaeans; and to beg that the Fathers would either take cognizance of the cause themselves, or send the captives to be tried at home; where strict justice should be done. The Senate answered, That they thought it not for the interest of Achaia that those men should return thither. Neither could any sollicitation of the Acbaeans, who never ceased to importune the Senate for the liberty of their countrymen, prevail, till after seventeen years, when scarce 300 of them were enlarged; of whom *Polybius the historian was one. All the rest had either died in confinement; or, for attempting to escape, had suffered death as malefactors.

Liv. B. 45.
 c. 32.

To return to Æmilius. After Claudius and Domitius had performed their commission in Achaia, the Proconsul convened a second general assembly of the Macedonians; and gave them a body of new laws for their better government: laws so wise, and so judiciously contrived, says Livy, that time and experience found nothing to correct in them. And the more effectually to secure the peace of the government, he ordered that all the chief nobles, all those who had been Generals of armies, Commanders of fleets and garrisons, or had been employed in embassies, or in any ministry under the King, should, on pain of death, with their children (those above fifteen years of age) leave Macedon and go into Italy. These men, accustomed to luxury and expence, to make servile court to the King, and to insult their inferiors, would, he thought, be impatient of that equality, which laws and liberty introduced.

After this the Proconsul celebrated games at Amphipolis, and made sumptuous feasts for his friends; that is to say, for those who had betrayed the liberty of their country to the Romans. One part of the shew was burning, in a great heap, all such of the Macedonian weapons as he did not think worth carrying to Rome: another was exposing to view all the statues, paintings, and rich moveables, of which he had plundered the King's palaces; doubtless a most agreeable sight to the Macedonian spectators. All these magnificent spoils he gave in charge to Octavius the Admiral; and, having exhorted the Macedonians to make a good use of the liberty granted them by the Romans, and preserve union among themselves; and having dispatched his son Fabius and Scipio Nasica to ravage the country of the Illyrians, who had assisted Perſes, [and to whom Anicius, by order of the Senate, had granted pardon and liberty*] he set out for Epirus.

* See page
 445

The Senate being desirous to preserve entire the Macedonian treasure, and yet to gratify the soldiers of Æmilius, had sent orders that all the towns of Epirus, which had favoured Perſes, should be given up to be plundered by the army. To use the words of a great historian, "This

SE W. R.

* Polybius had not been sent into Hetruria; ing obtained leave for him to stay at Rome.
Scipio and Fabius, the sons of Æmilius, hav- Polyb. Excerpt. B. 31.

" was

“ was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed “ by Æmilius with mischievous subtilty.” Being come to Passaron, he, by letter, communicated to Anicius, who lay encamped not far off, what was going to be done, that he might not be alarmed at the execution. He then dispatched into the several towns, certain Centurions, who were to pretend commission from him to withdraw the garrisons, that the Epirots might be free like the Macedonians. The same officers had also instructions to send to him ten of the principal inhabitants of each town. To these, when they came, he gave strict command to see, that all the gold and silver, both in the temples and private houses, were, on a certain day, carried into the market places of the respective towns; and (according to Appian) assured them, that, on their punctual obedience to this command, those towns should have a full pardon of all past faults. Under pretence of assisting these collectors in their business, and of furnishing a guard to take charge of the money, he sent with them some cohorts; contriving it so, that these cohorts should arrive at the respective towns at one and the same time. On the day appointed, and to the places appointed, the gold and silver was all brought and delivered to the Roman officers; who then, pursuant to their instructions, gave the signal for the soldiers to pillage the houses and seize the inhabitants. Seventy towns were sacked in one day, and 150,000 persons made slaves^f. The walls of these places were afterwards demolished.

“ It may be granted,” (says Sir W. R.) “ that some of the Epirots “ deserved punishment, as having favoured Perfes. But since they “ among the people that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or “ but coldly affected to the Romans, had been already sent into Italy, “ there to receive their due; and since this nation, in general, was not “ only at the present in good obedience, but had, even in this war, “ done good service to the Romans, I hold this act so wicked^g, that I “ should not believe it, had any one writer delivered the contrary.”

After

^f When the booty came to be divided, the share of each foot soldier amounted, according to Livy, to 6*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* and of each horseman, to 12*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* of our money. But according to the text of Plutarch, as we have it, each man's share came to no more than about 7*s.* It would seem, that neither of these reckonings can be true, if we suppose the slaves to have been sold for the benefit of the soldiery.

^g Polybius, who was an intimate friend of Scipio, the son of Æmilius, reports, that the Pro-Consul, with regard to what has been above related of the Ætolians and Acheans, did not approve of the calumnies brought by Lyciscus and Callicrates against their respective countrymen. And Plutarch tells us, that in this treatment of the Epirots, Æmilius acted contrary to his natural temper, which was gentle and humane: but he does not say, that Æmilius wept for the miseries of this wretched people, as he did (when the shabby ambassadors came to him) for the humiliation of a King, whom the same Historian represents as the most cowardly, avaritious, perfidious; cruel, ignominious tyrant that ever disgraced a throne. Æmilius is reported to have

Y. R. 586.
 Bef. Chr.
 166.
 285 Conf.

Liv. B. 45.
 c. 31.

V. R. 183.
 Ed. Cant.
 160.
 183. C. 18.

After this exploit, Æmilius marched to Oricum, where being rejoined by Nasica and Fabius, he embarked with his whole army, and arrived safe in Italy. Antius and Octavius, with the fleet, followed him a few days after. The Senate decreed triumphs to all three. But the triumph of Æmilius was opposed, in the assembly of the people, by his own soldiers, who complained of his excessive severity in discipline, and of his injustice in withholding from them the spoils of Macedon. Servius Galla, a Tribune of the second Legion, and a personal enemy of the General, harangred for four hours against him. The question was not put till the second day; when the Comitium being thronged with soldiers, the first Tribes that gave their suffrages refused the triumph. Hereupon the principal Senators cried out, It was a shame to deny Æmilius an honour he had so well deserved; and that, at this rate, Generals would become subject to the caprice and covetousness of their soldiers. M. Sertilius, a man of consular dignity, and, if we may believe Plutarch, of such prowess that he had slain twenty-three enemies in single combat, prevailed with the Tribunes of the Commons, to call back the Tribes which had already voted, and make them give their suffrages anew. The same Consular, with permission of the Tribunes, made a long speech of exhortation to the people, and with such effect, that the Tribes unanimously decreed a triumph to Æmilius.

The number and excellence of the statues and paintings, the costly vases, the rich arms, the great quantities of gold and silver exposed to view in this triumph, made it more pompous ^b than any that had preceded have been disinterested, inasmuch, that notwithstanding the great opportunities he had of amassing wealth, he died but moderately rich: It may be so. Cicero says, a disregard of wealth was the virtue of those times: But whatever virtues Æmilius possessed, it is very manifest, that the Roman Senate never had an abler minister of execrable fraud and cruelty.

^a Mr. Kennet, from Plutarch, gives us the following description of Æmilius's triumph.

“ The people erected scaffolds in the Forum and Circus, and all the other parts of the city, where they could best behold the pomp. The spectators were clad in white garments; all the temples were open and full of garlands and perfumes; the ways cleared and cleansed by a great many officers and tipstaves, that drove away such as thronged the passage, or straggled up and down. This triumph lasted three days: On the first, which

“ was scarce long enough for the sight, “ were to be seen, the statues, pictures and “ images of an extraordinary bigness, which “ were taken from the enemy, drawn upon “ 250 chariots. On the second was carried, “ in a great many wains, the fairest and the “ richest armour of the Macedonians, both “ of brass and steel, all newly furnished “ and glittering; which, although piled “ up with the greatest art and order, yet “ seemed to be tumbled on heaps carelessly “ and by chance: Helmets were thrown “ on shields, coats of mail upon greaves, “ Cretan targets, and Thracian buck- “ lers, and quivers of arrows lay huddled “ among the horses bits; and through “ these appeared the points of naked “ swords, intermixed with long spears. “ All these arms were tied together with “ such a just liberty, that they knocked “ against one another as they were drawn “ along, and made a harsh and terrible “ noise; so that the very spoils of the con- “ quered preceded it¹. What rendered it yet more glorious, was the person of so considerable a monarch, as the King of Macedon, led in chains before the chariot of the Victor. Perfes had earnestly begged of Æmilius to spare

V. R. 589.
Ecc. C. 16.
205 C. 16.

“ quered could not be beheld without “ dread. After these waggons loaden with “ armour, there followed 3000 men, who “ carried the silver that was coined, in “ 750 vessels, each of which weighed three “ talents, and was carried by four men.
“ Others brought silver bowls, and gob“ lets, and cups, all disposed in such or“ der as to make the best show, and all “ valuable, as well for their lignets, as the “ thickness of their engraving work. On “ the third day, early in the morning, first “ came the trumpeters, who did not sound
“ as they were went in a procession, or so“ lemn entry, but such a charge as the “ Romans use when they encourage their “ soldiers to fight. Next followed young “ men girt about with girdles, curiously “ wrought, who led to the sacrifice 120 “ stalled oxen, with their horns gilded, and “ their heads adorned with ribbons and “ garlands; and with these were boys that “ carried platters of silver and gold. After “ this was brought the gold coin, which “ was divided into vessels that weighed “ three talents, like to those that contained
“ the silver; they were in number four“ score wanting three. These were fol“ lowed by those that brought the conse“ crated bowl, which Æmilius caused to “ be made, that weighed ten talents, and “ was all beset with precious stones: Then “ were exposed to view the cups of Anti- “ gonus and Schucus, and such as were “ made after the fashion invented by The- “ riclus, and all the gold plate that was “ used at Perfes’s table. Next to these “ came Perfes’s chariot, in the which his “ armour was placed, and on that his “ diadem. And, after a little intermission,
“ the King’s children were led captives,
“ and with them a train of nurses, masters,
“ and governors, who all wept, and “ stretched forth their hands to the specta“ tors, and taught their little infants to beg
“ and intreat their compassion. There “ were two sons and a daughter, who, by “ reason of their tender age, were altoge“ ther insensible of the greatness of their “ misery; which insensibility of their con“ dition rendered it much more deplor“ able; insomuch, that Perfes himself was “ scarce regarded as he went along, whilst “ pity had fixed the eyes of the Romans

“ upon the infants, and many of them “ could not forbear tears: All beheld the “ sight with a mixture of sorrow and joy, “ until the children were past. After his “ children and their attendants, came Per- “ fes himself, clad all in black, and wearing “ slippers, after the fashion of his country:
“ He looked like one altogether abenished “ and deprived of reason, through the “ greatness of his misfortunes. Next fol“ lowed a great company of his friends, “ whose countenances were disfigured with “ grief, and who testified, to all that be“ held them, by their tears, and their con“ tinual looking upon Perfes, that it was “ his hard fortune they so much lamented,
“ and that they were regardless of their “ own.—After these were carried 400 “ crowns, all made of gold, and sent from “ the cities, by their respective embassa-“ dors, to Æmilius, as a reward due to “ his valour. Then he himself came seated “ on a chariot magnificently adorned (a “ man worthy to be beheld, even without “ these ensigns of power): he was clad in “ a garment of purple interwoven with “ gold, and held out a laurel-branch in “ his right hand. All the army, in like “ manner, with boughs of laurel in their “ hands, and divided into bands and com“ panies, followed the chariot of their “ commander, some singing odes (accor“ ding to the usual custom) mingled with “ raillery; others songs of triumph, and
“ the praises of Æmilius’s deeds, who was “ admired and accounted happy by all “ men, yet unenvied by every one that “ was good.” Kenect. Antiq. P. II. B. 4.
c. 16.

¹ Authors are not agreed about the sum Æmilius brought into the treasury. Valerius Antias reckons this sum at (millies ducenties) 120 millions of little sesterces *. Livy thinks, from the number of waggons employed to carry

* 968, = c. 1.
Arbutnot

Y. R. 356.
Bef. Chr.
166.
285 Conf.

Chr. in Verr. 5.
30.
* See p.
420.
Plut. &
Diod. Sic.
27. Phot.

Diod. Si-
c. in frag.
Scrip.
frag. L. 4.

Elr. B. 45.
c. 40.
Plut. life of Æmil.

spare him this indignity; and had received for answer, That what he asked was in his own power.

It was the custom, that, when the triumphant Conqueror turned his chariot up towards the capitol, he commanded the captives to be led to prison, and there put to death; that so the glory of the victor, and the misery of the vanquished, might be, in the same moment, at the utmost. But as *Æmilius had encouraged Perfes to an almost certain hope of life, from the known clemency of the Romans to conquered Kings and nations; this King was only thrown into the common gaol at Alba [in the country of the Marfi.] "He was afterwards", at the intercession of "Æmilius, removed to a more commodious habitation; where, according to most authors, he starved himself, but, according to some, the soldiers who had him in custody destroyed him, by not suffering him to sleep." Thus writes Plutarch. Mithridates, in a letter to Arfaces, King of Partbia, says, "That the Romans, after many battles, between them and Perfes with various success, entered into a treaty with him; and though upon the altars of Samotheace, they pledged the Roman faith for the safety of his person; yet did these subtle deceivers, these inventors of the arts of perfidy, put an end to the life of that Prince, by depriving him of the necessary refreshment of sleep."

The King's daughter and one of his sons died soon; it is uncertain how: his other son earned his living by following the trade of a working toyman; but was afterwards preferred to be a writing clerk in one of the offices at Rome. In such poverty ended the Royal house of Macedon, about 160 years after the death of that monarch, to whose ambition this whole earth seemed too narrow.

Æmilius Paullus, in the height of his glory, had the mortification to lose two sons; the one five days before his triumph, the other three days after it: A loss which he bore wisely, telling the people (when, according to custom, he gave them an account of his services) that, in the course of human things, great prosperities, such as they had lately experienced, being usually followed by great adversity, he had prayed to the Gods that the calamities to be apprehended, might fall upon carry it, that it must have been much more. Velleius Paterc. values it at (his milies centies) 210 millions of little sesterces†; and Pliny at (his milies trecenties) 230 millions of the same species‡. Cicero (de Offic. L. 2. c. 22.) tells us, that Æmilius brought so much money from Macedon, that the Roman people were no more taxed from that time. And Plutarch (in Æmil.) says, that they were not taxed till the Consulship of Hirrius and Pansa, i. e. the year after Julius Cæsar was killed, and of Rome 710. But this immunity from taxes was no doubt chiefly owing to the great tribute paid by the provinces, and the immense sums brought into the treasury, at several times, by Roman Generals.

* Livy speaks, as if Perfes, by the Senate's direction, was decently lodged and entertained, even at his first going to Alba. B. 45. c. 42.

† 1,695,312 l. 10 s. Arbuthnot.

‡ 1,856,770 l. 16 s. 8 d.

him,

him, rather than on the public: That his triumph having been immediately preceded by the funeral of one of his sons, and closely followed by that of another (so that, of four sons, not one remained to perpetuate his house and name; his two elder having passed by adoption into other families) he hoped, the Gods, satisfied with his private misfortune, would spare the commonwealth, and continue to make it flourish in all prosperity.

V. R. 586.
Bel. Chr.
166.
23: C. 11.

The triumph of Æmilius was soon followed by those of Octavius, Admiral of the fleet, and Anicius, the conqueror of Illyricum. In the latter appeared King Gentius with his wife and children, and many of the Illyrian Nobles: But Octavius had neither captives in his procession, nor spoils to adorn his shew.

Among the prisoners taken in the Macedonian war, was a son of Cotys, King of the Ordrysians in Thrace. Cotys sent ambassadors to apologize for his having aided the enemies of Rome. He alledged, in excuse, that he had been forced to give hostages to Perses; and he offered a ransom for his son, and for those hostages now in the hands of the Romans. The Fathers answered, "That they had not forgot the ancient friendship between the Republic and the Thracian Kings his ancestors: That his having given hostages was the accusation; and would never serve for a defence; since Perses could at no time be very formidable to the Thracians; least of all, when engaged in a war against the Romans: That though Cotys had preferred the friendship of the Macedonian King to that of Rome, yet they would less consider his demerit than what became their own dignity: That they would send back his son and the hostages: And that the gifts, bestowed by the Roman people, were always free; because they preferred the gratitude of the receivers to any compensation whatsoever."

Livy, B.
45: c. 42.

The Romans having compassed all their views in that part of the world, it was much for their interest, that Cotys should cease to be their enemy; who might otherwise have disturbed their new settlement: And it cost them very little to make this parade of beneficence and magnanimity.

Polybius
Legat. 96.

C H A P. XXII.

Attalus, who comes from his brother Eumenes to congratulate the Romans, on their victory, disobliges the Senate, by declining their favours. The Rhodians largely treated by the Romans. The servile flattery of King Prusias to the Senate. They refuse to receive a visit from Eumenes King of Pergamus.

V. R. 585.
D. C. 165.
= 85 C. 165.
—
Liv. B. 45.
C. 13.
Pol. D. L.
E. 23.

OF the many ambassadors that came to Rome from Kings and States, after the victory over Perſes, Attalus, and the Rhodian Ministers engaged the attention and curiosity of the public more than all the rest. Attalus came from his brother Eumenes to congratulate the Romans, and to ask their assistance, or countenance at least, against the Gallo-Greeks, who molested him. The Senators in general entertained the ambassador in a friendly manner; and some of the most considerable privately incited him to request of the Senate a part of his brother's kingdom for himself; assuring him that it would be granted. Attalus not disliking the motion, promised to do as he was advised. But Stratius a physician (whom Eumenes, suspecting what might happen, had sent to watch Attalus's conduct) represented to him, That, by the unanimity between his brother and him, he already reigned in Pergamus, and had every thing of a King but the title; that Eumenes was infirm, could not live long, and had no heirs but him. [For the King of Pergamus had not yet owned that son who reigned after him.] By such arguments, Attalus, though with difficulty, was prevailed upon to bridle his mad ambition. In his speech therefore to the Senate, he only congratulated the Romans on their victory over Perſes; desired that they would, by their authority, restrain the Gallo-Greeks from making incursions into Pergamus; and, in reward of his services in the late war, grant him Ænos and Maronea. These cities of Thrace had been formerly conquered by Philip the father of Perſes, and had since been disputed with him by Eumenes. The Senate, imagining that Attalus designed to take another opportunity to ask a part of his brother's kingdom, not only granted him what he now asked, but, in their presents to him as ambassador, shewed singular magnificence. Attalus would not understand their meaning, but left Rome satisfied with what he had already obtained. This so highly displeased the fathers that, while he was yet in Italy, they passed a decree, declaring Ænos and Maronea free cities. As to the Gallo-Greeks, the Senate dispatched an embassy to order them to keep within their own bounds; doubtless not caring that they should make a conquest of Pergamus.

The

The Rhodians had lately sent two embassies to Rome; the one close after the other; the first occasioned by the rough answer before mentioned, that was given to Agisipolis; the second, by the haughty and tyrannical behaviour of Popilius and his Collegues at Rhodes. These Roman ambassadors, in their way to Antiochus Epiphanes, had landed at Loryma in Caria. Thither came to them the principal men of the Rhodians, earnestly entreating them “to visit Rhodes,” (which was but twenty miles distant) “it greatly concerning the honour and safety of the city, that they, by informing themselves upon the spot, of the state of things, should be able to report the truth to the Senate.” The Romans were not without great difficulty prevailed upon to stop their voyage. And, when they came to Rhodes, it was necessary to use pressing instances before they would condescend to honour, with their presence, an assembly of the people. And this honour did not cease the terror of the Rhodians, by the manner in which Popilius delivered himself. His discourse was nothing but reproaches, uttered in the tone of an angry accuser, and with a stern menacing countenance. But C. Decimius, another of the ambassadors, spoke with more moderation, says Livy; yet he mentioned all the faults of which he could possibly accuse the Rhodians; and these faults amounted to no more than that they had made decrees, flattering Perfes, and sent embassies of which they had reason to be ashamed and repent: “Nevertheless he would by no means have these crimes imputed to the body of the people, but to some turbulent citizens, on whom alone the punishment ought to fall.” In short, he was so moderate, as to desire, that only all those who had shewed themselves favourers of Perfes, by attempting to bring about a peace, should be put to death. The multitude, glad to have the blame removed from themselves, applauded the discourse; and instantly passed a decree, condemning to death all who should be convicted of having done or said any thing for Perfes, and against the Romans. Of those whom this decree affected, some had left the city before Popilius arrived; others killed themselves; the rest were executed.

Such absolute submission to the will of the Romans, one would naturally think, should have procured the Rhodian ambassadors a ready and favourable audience of the Senate. Yet they were not only refused a hearing, but the Consul, by order of the Fathers, signified to them, that they should not be entertained as ambassadors from a state in friendship with Rome. More than this, Juventius Thalna, the Prætor Peregrinus, moved the people to declare war against Rhodes. Hereupon the ambassadors went about, in mourning habits, soliciting with tears the favour of the principal citizens. And now two of the Tribunes took the part of this distressed people; and having made the Prætor come down from the rostra, suffered two of the Rhodian ambassadors, Philophon and Astymedes, to take his place, and, one after another, harangue the assembly. They received

V. R. c. 1.
L. C. 1.
100
255 C. 1.
B. P. 1.
C. 10.

B. 45. c.
20.
Polyb. L. 1.
21. 93.

such

V. R. 458.
P. C. 166.
255. C. 166.

such an answer as freed them from the apprehension of a war. At length the Senate also admitted them to audience. Ajtymedes humbly confessed before the Fathers the folly of his Republic, in the late steps she had taken with regard to the war between Rome and Macedon; yet he hoped that her former services would be remembered, and make her faults be overlooked: and in conclusion declared, that if Rome should resolve upon a war against the Rhodians, they were determined not to defend themselves.

A. Gell.
B. 1. c. 3.

The ambassadors then prostrated themselves on the ground, holding out olive branches to the Conscrip Fathers. All those of the Senators who had commanded in Macedon as Consuls, Prætors, or Lieutenants, declaimed with heat against the Rhodians. Cato spoke in their behalf. There remain only some fragments of his speech, preserved by A. Gellius. They are to this effect. "I am very apprehensive, Conscrip Fathers, " lest intoxicated with our present great prosperity, we should be hurried " into some resolutions that will, in the end, overthrow it. Let us not " be too hasty; but take time to come to ourselves.—

" I believe indeed that the Rhodians did wish, that Perfes might not " be conquered by us; and I believe also that many other States and " Nations wished the same. Some of them, perhaps, not out of ill will " to us, but fear for themselves; lest, if there should be no power re- " maining to check us, and keep us in awe, we should become their " absolute lords and masters. Yet the Rhodians never openly assisted " Perfes. Do but consider with how much more precaution we act " with regard to our private affairs. There is not one of us, who does " not set himself to oppose, with all his might, whatever he thinks is " doing against his interest. Yet the Rhodians in the like case were " quiet and passive.—

" Their bitterest accusers have not charged them with any thing worse " than an inclination to be our enemies. And is there any law that " makes inclinations penal? Is there any one of us that would care to " be subject to such a law? For my part, I would not. Who has not " wished to have more land than the laws allow? Yet nobody is pu- " nished for this. Does any man think of rewarding another, for having " had an inclination to perform a good action, which he did not perform? " And shall we think of punishing the Rhodians, because they are said " to have had an inclination to do some ill, which however they did not " do?—

" But it is said the Rhodians are proud. Be it so. What is that to " us? Are we angry because there is, in the world, a people prouder " than we?"

Cato's discourse had probably some effect, and the weight of his character more; but it would seem (from Cæsar's speech in Sallust) that what chiefly moved the Senate to drop entirely the design of attacking

I Rhodes,

Rhodes, was the apprehension, lest it should be thought, that, not revenge, but covetousness, the desire of plundering that wealthy city, was their motive to the war. They returned however a very harsh answer, That they would not treat the Rhodians either as friends or as enemies. The Fathers soon after declared Lycia and Caria free; provinces which they had given to the Rhodians for their services in the war against Antiochus the Great. And, not long after, they were ordered to evacuate the cities of Caunus and Stradonicea, which produced a yearly revenue of 120 talents: The first they had bought of Ptolemy's Generals for 200 talents; the other had, for signal services, been given them by Antiochus and Seleucus. The Rhodians not only submitted to every thing, but decreed the Romans a present of a crown of gold of great value; which they sent to Rome by their Admiral Theodotus. This Minister had orders to solicit the Senate, that Rhodes might be admitted into an alliance with the Republic; a favour which in a hundred and forty years, that she had been in friendship with the Romans, she had never before asked, or even coveted. For it had been the steady policy of the Rhodians to keep themselves free from all such engagements as might hinder them from giving their assistance, whenever they pleased, to any King or State that wanted it. Rhodes therefore was much courted by all her neighbours; and drew advantage to herself both from their hopes and from their fears. A year or more passed before the Senate condescended to grant the Rhodians that alliance which necessity now urged them to request.

BUT, of all the worshippers of the Roman Senate, there was none so devout as Prusias King of Bithynia. He had long been in this devotion. Whenever any ambassadors came to him from the Republic, he used to go out to meet them with his head shaved, and wearing a cap, habit, and sandals, like those which the slaves at Rome put on when they were emancipated. In this dress, saluting the ambassadors, You see, said he, one of your freed men, ready to obey all your commands, and to conform himself to all your customs. And now when he came to congratulate the Romans on the success of their arms, stooping down, with both hands on the ground, at the entrance of the Senate-house, he kissed the threshold of the door, and began his address to the Fathers in these words, Hail, Senators, ye Gods, my Saviours—The rest of the speech was suitable to the beginning, and such as, Polybius says, he should be ashamed to repeat; who adds, that the Senate were the more gracious to the King for the meanness of his behaviour. They granted him every thing he asked: A renewal of the league between him and Rome: Leave to discharge a vow he had made to sacrifice ten oxen to Jupiter in the capitol, and one to Fortune at Præneste, in thank-

V. R. 586.
B. Chr.
160.
285 C. n.

Polyb. 1.
Legat. 99. &
104.

Polyb. 1.
Legat. 93.
See p. 441.

Polyb. 2p.
Liv. B. 45.
c. 44.
Polyb. Legat.
97.

* The Rhodians appointed their Admiral to negotiate this affair at Rome, he alone being legally qualified to act in it without a decree of the people; and such decree they chose not to have, because it would make the ignominy the greater, in case the alliance were refused. Polyb. Legat. 93. Liv. B. 45. c. 25.

Y. R. 686.
B.C. 185.
185 Conf.

giving for the Roman victory: And a certain territory which, as the King pretended, the Romans had conquered from Antiochus, and which, they not having since given it to any body, the Gallo-Greeks had seized. But this last grant was made conditionally, that, upon examination, they should find, what the King had said, to be true. The Senate also promised to continue their care of his son, who had been educated at Rome. And when the Bitbynian was to set out on his return home, they appointed Scipio to attend him, pay his charges on the road, and never leave him till he had seen him safe on board his ship at Brundisium, from whence twenty gallies were to convoy him to a fleet, of which the Fathers had made him a present.

Polib. Lib.
6. 97.

ABOUT the time that Prusias left Italy, the Senate received notice that King Eumenes was coming. As they had an immoveable hatred to the Pergamenian, and yet were unwilling to publish it, this advice embarrassed them. Should they give him an opportunity of speaking in defence of his conduct, they must return him an answer: To give him a favourable answer would be, not only contrary to their inclination, but to good policy; and openly to proclaim their hatred to him would derogate from their reputation of prudence and discernment, they having treated this unfaithful Prince as one of their best friends and allies. To avoid both these inconveniencies, they passed a decree, forbidding all Kings to come to Rome. And when they heard that Eumenes was landed at Brundisium, they sent a Quæstor to notify to him this decree, and enquire whether he had any thing to ask of the Senate. If he had not, the Quæstor was to desire him to leave Italy as soon as possible. The King said he had nothing to ask; and, without entering into farther conversation with the Roman, returned to his ships, and sailed home.

C H A P. XXIII.

Complaints brought to the Senate from Asia against King Eumenes. He is insulted by a Roman ambassador.

On the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Senate commission some of their body to go into Syria, and do mischief there.

Octavius, the chief of the commission, is assassinated.

Demetrius, the nephew of Antiochus Epiphanes, escapes from Rome into Syria, and makes himself King.

The Senate determine a dispute between two competitors for the kingdom of Cappadocia.

LIVY's history of Rome, from the time that King Prusias made his visit to the Senate, is lost; a loss not richly supplied by Plutarch, Appian, the tribe of Abridgers, and the collectors of Fragments; nor nor consequently by the elegant and ingenious patchwork of Freinshemius. Of the year 587. (if this be not the date of the decree that stopped Eumenes's journey) the most important events, recorded, are these: That the Consuls C. Sulpicius Gallus and M. Claudius Marcellus obtained some advantage in the endless war against the Gauls and Ligurians^a; and that a kite caught a weasel behind the statue of Jupiter in the capitol, and dropt it among the Conscript Fathers, assembled in that temple: A dreadful omen, which it was thought necessary to avert by expiations.

IN the succeeding Consulship of T. Manlius Torquatus and Cn. Octavius Nepes, ambassadors came to Rome from Prusias, complaining of some irruptions which Eumenes had made into the kingdom of Bitynia; and accusing him of having entered into a league with Antiochus against the Romans. His neighbours also, the Galatians, sent complaints of his encroachments. This people the Senate supported underhand, without declaring openly against the Pergamenian. For though Tiberius Gracchus, deceived by the artful behaviour of the Kings of Syria and Pergamus, to whom he had been appointed ambassador, made a favourable report of their dispositions; yet the Senate continued to suspect them of some mischievous machinations. Eumenes dispatched his two brothers, Attalus and Athenæus, to apologize for every thing in his conduct which had given umbrage to the Romans. The Fathers received those ambassadors graciously, and dismissed them with honours and presents. Nevertheless they sent new commissioners into Asia, C. Sulpicius and M. Sergius, to examine things to the bottom, and learn the real intentions of Eumenes and Antiochus.

Sulpicius, being a vain man, would needs make a figure by insulting Eumenes; in whose dominions he no sooner arrived, than he ordered proclamations to be made in the principal towns, inviting all, who had any cause of complaint against the King, to repair to Sardis. There the ambassador erected his tribunal of inquisition; and during ten days, gave full scope to the Pergamenians to say whatever they thought fit against their sovereign. However, for any thing that appears to the contrary, all this bustle came to nothing.

IN the following year, when Tib. Sempronius Gracchus and M. Juventius Thalna were Consuls, died Antiochus Epiphanes, King of Syria; and was succeeded in the throne by his son Antiochus Eupator, a minor, only nine years old, and under the guardianship of Lysias.

This Lysias had commanded the Syrian troops against the Jews, and having been defeated several times by Judas Maccabæus, had made peace with them, granting them the free exercise of their religion and laws. Nevertheless Judas, to secure the continuance of this peace, aptriumphi, triumphs for taking a castle. In Brut. c. 73.

^a The Capitoline Marbles give the Consuls a triumph. Cicero speaks with great contempt of the triumphs granted for victories in Liguria, calling them Casellani

* A. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Cassius Longinus, Consuls.

Y. R. 587.
Bef. Chr.
165.
286 Conf.

Liv. Epit.
B. 45.
Jul. Obseq.
c. 71.
Y. R. 588.
Bef. Chr.
164.
287 Conf.

Liv. Epit.
B. 46.
Polyb. Legat. 104.
Id. Leg. 105.

Id. Leg. 106.

Y. R. 589.
Bef. Chr.
163.
288 Conf.

Polyb. Excerpt. L. 31.

Y. R. 590.
Bef. Chr.
162.
289 Conf.

Liv. Epit.
B. 46.
2 Maccab.
c. xi.

Y. R. 597.
Bef. Chr.
102.
239 Cons.

Polyb. Legal. 107.

plied himself to Manlius and Memmius, two Roman deputies then going to Antioch, and received a favourable answer from them.

When the news of Epiphanes's death came to Rome, Demetrius (the son of Seleucus, the late King's elder brother) who had been 12 years a hostage there, asked permission of the Senate to return home; that he might take possession of the kingdom. The Fathers refused his request; thinking it more for their interest to have a child upon the Syrian throne. They dispatched Cn. Octavius^b and two others to assume the administration of the government. And to these they gave instructions to burn all the decked ships, disable the elephants, and, in a word, weaken as much as possible the forces of the kingdom.

New Consuls were chosen at Rome, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica and C. Marcius Figulus. But these Magistrates, upon the discovery of some defect in the ceremonies of their inauguration, abdicated; and P. Cornelius Lentulus and Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus took their place.

Y. R. 591.
Bef. Chr.
161.
290 Cons.

Polyb. Legal. 108.

App. in
Syr. F. 117.

Octavius, in his journey, passed through Cappadocia, where King Ariarathes offered him an army, to escort him into Syria, and to keep the people of that country in awe while he performed his commission. But he, confiding in the majesty of the Roman name, disdained all other protection. At Laodicea, he began to put the orders of the Senate in execution; burning the ships and disabling the elephants. His pretence was the treaty, made with Antiochus the Great, in which it had been stipulated, that the Syrians should not have above a certain number of ships of war, nor tame any elephants. This despotic manner of proceeding highly exasperated the people; and one Leptines, supposed to be hired by Lyfias, assassinated Octavius in the Gymnasium. Lyfias sent ambassadors to Rome to assure the Senate, that the fact had not been committed by the King's authority. The Fathers returned no answer.

Cic. Phil.
9. c. 2.
Polyb. Legal. 114.

These events encouraged Demetrius to think of addressing the Senate once more for permission to go into Syria. He sent for his friend Polybius, then at Rome, to consult with him upon this matter. Polybius advised him "to avoid striking his foot twice against the same stone; "to place his hope in himself; and to dare something worthy of a "King;" hinting, "That the present state of things afforded him "sufficient opportunities." The Prince understood his friend's meaning, but said nothing. Opening himself afterwards to an intimate acquaintance named Apollonius, (a simple man, who considered only the justice of the case, and the absurdity of retaining Demetrius as a pledge of his competitor's fidelity) he was by him counselled to make a second application to the Senate. He did so, and met with a second refusal; the same reasons subsisting which had been the ground of the first. About this time came from Syria one Diodorus, who had formerly been employed in the education of the young Prince. Demetrius, from the accounts which this man brought of the state of things in that country, concluded, that there wanted little more than his appearance there, to get him the possession of the throne. He resolved therefore to attempt an escape from Italy; the very thing which Polybius had hinted to him, and to which he was now instigated by Diodorus. Before the Prince took any measures for the execution of his purpose, he asked the advice and assistance of Polybius; who, not caring to act in the affair himself, engaged his friend Menitbyllus (embassador at Rome from Ptolemy Philometor) to provide a ship and every thing necessary for the design. Demetrius having left the city, under the pretence of a hunting match, embarked at Ostia in a Carthaginian vessel bound for Tyre. The Senate had no information of his flight till four or five days after he had set sail, when it was too late to think of stopping him. But they deputed Tib. Gracchus and two more to follow him into Syria, and watch his motions.

^b He had been Consul some years before, and was the first of his family who obtained that dignity. Cic. Phil. 9. 4.

Y. R. 501.
Bef. Chr.
161.
290 Conf.

Demetrius landed in Lycia, from whence he wrote a respectful letter to the Conscrip't Fathers, importing, that he had no design against his uncle's son Antiochus Eupator, but against Lysias, and to revenge the death of Ostavius. From Lycia he sailed to Tripolis in Syria, where he gave out that he was sent by the Roman Senate to take possession of the kingdom. This occasioned a general desertion from Eupator, who with his tutor Lysias being seized by the soldiers, in order to be delivered up to Demetrius, he refused to see them, and commanded both to be put to death.

Y. R. 592.*
Bef. Chr.
160.
291 Conf.

Zonar. B.
9. c. 25.

1 Macc. c. 7.
Justin. B.
34. c. 3.

After this, the new King delivered the Babylonians from the tyranny of Timarchus and Heraclides. These brothers had been great favourites of Antiochus Epiphanes, who had made the first Governor, and the other treasurer of that province. Demetrius put Timarchus to death, and drove Heraclides into banishment, for which actions the people of Babylon gave him the surname of Soter [i. e. Saviour] which he ever after retained.

App. in
Syr. p. 118.

Notwithstanding all this success, being sensible that the favour of the Roman Senate was necessary to his firm establishment on the throne, he made application to Tib. Gracchus, then in Cappadocia, by his means to get himself recognized King by the Romans. Gracchus promised him his good offices; and Demetrius, to smooth the way for his advocate, sent an embassy to Rome with a rich present of a crown of gold. At the same time he delivered up to the vengeance of the Roman people, not only Leptines the murderer of Ostavius, but a certain Grammarian nam-

Polyb. Le.
pat. 120.

* M. Valerius Messala and C. Fannius Strabo, Consuls. The Fannian law, so called from Fannius, the proposer of it, was passed this year, enacting, That no man's daily expences for his own eating and drinking should exceed ten asses, i. e. seven-pence three farthings. The senate also passed a decree for banishing from Rome the philosophers and rhetoricians, as a mischievous, pestilent set of men.

Y. R. 592.
Bef. Chr.
132.
291 Cons.

Y. R. 593.
Bef. Chr.
131.
292 Cons.

ed Iſocrates, who, in an oration to the multitude, had juſtified and commended the act. Leptines had begged of Demetrius not to proceed to any extremities againſt the Laodiceans, on account of the aſſaſſination, but to ſend him to Rome, where (he ſaid) he would convince the Senate that what he had done was with the good pleaſure of the Gods. As this man went chearfully and of his own accord, and, during the whole voyage, continued ſurprizingly gay, he was brought from Syria to Rome without fetters. At his arrival, he frankly owned the fact to every body that aſked him about it, always adding, that he was ſure, the Senate would do him no hurt. His confidence aroſe from the mean opinion he had of himſelf and his orator : ſacrifices too inſignificant, in his judgment, to be accepted by the Romans in ſatisfaction for the offence. But the Grammarian (with whom Polybius is extremely angry, for his meddling with politics) fully apprized of his own importance, ran ſtark mad with fear. Leptines judged rightly : The Senate would not, for two ſuch victims, preclude themſelves from calling the Syrians to account, when it ſhould be thought convenient. However, they did not reject the King's gold : In return they ſent him this answer, " That he might depend upon their favour, provided he took care to be as ſubmiſſive to their orders, as he had formerly been."

Y. R. 593.
Bef. Chr.
130.
293 Cons.

1 Macc. c. 3.
B. 36. c. 3.

1 Macc. c. 5.

THE year following (L. Anicius Gallus, and M. Cornelius Cetbegus being Conſuls) was concluded a treaty between the Romans and the Jews, in the time of Judas Maccabeus, who had ſent an embaſſy to Rome to aſk protection againſt Demetrius. Juſtin tells us, that the Jews were the firſt of the Oriental nations that received liberty by gift from the Romans; who, he adds, were very liberal of what was not their own; for the Jews, according to him, had revolted from the Syrians. The Senate wrote to Demetrius in theſe terms, as we find them in the firſt book of the Maccabees : Wherefore haſt thou made thy yoke heavy upon our friends and confederates the Jews? If therefore they complain any more againſt thee we will do them juſtice, and fight with thee by ſea and by land^d.

We have hardly any thing for the years of Rome 594 * and 595 †, but the names of the Conſuls.

Y. R. 596.
Bef. Chr.
128.
295 Cons.

Juſtin, B.
35. c. 1.
App. in
Syn. p. 118.

IN the year 596 (the Conſulſhip of Sex. Julius Caſar and L. Aurelius Oreſtes, Ariarathes King of Cappadocia came to Rome for protection. Demetrius, partly to revenge himſelf on this Prince for reſuſing to marry his ſiſter, and partly to earn a hundred talents, had driven him from his

^d Æmilius Paulus died this year. Father Catrou obſerves, that this Roman ſeems to have wanted nothing but the knowledge of the true religion (the religion of the Jews) and the graces, by God, annexed to it, to render his virtues meritorious : That, in this reſpect, Judas Maccabeus, who died about the ſame time, had greatly the advantage of him. Gratia efficit per ſe would doubtleſs have made Æmilius a Saint; but I queſtion whether any Grace, that required the ſimultaneous operation, would have been effectual.

* Cn. Cornelius Delabella and M. Fulvius Nobilior, Conſuls.

† M. Æmilius Lepidus and C. Popilius Lenas, Conſuls.

throne,

throne, and placed upon it Holophernes, a supposititious son of the late Cappadocian King. Ariarathes pleaded his own cause before the Senate; and some ambassadors from Holophernes defended that of their master. These asserted that Holophernes was the elder brother of Ariarathes, by the same father and mother; though the mother, out of partiality to her younger son, had persuaded her husband into a belief, that the elder was neither his son nor hers. It seems, this mother (who was a daughter of Antiochus the Great) thinking herself barren, because she had been several years married without having children, had imposed upon the King her husband two sons, of whom this Holophernes was one. She afterwards bore a son, the Ariarathes now in question, and then repented of the cheat she had put upon the King, and discovered it to him. The supposititious sons were sent away, that they might be no obstacle to the succession of Ariarathes to the throne.

Y. R. 596.
Bef. Chr.
156.
295 Conf.

Polyb. Legat. 126.
Diod. Sicul. ap. Phot.

The Senate, having heard both parties, ordered Cappadocia to be shared between the two competitors, following, in this, one of the steady maxims of the Roman policy, which was, to divide the strength of kingdoms.

App. in Syr. 118.

C H A P. XXIV.

Cato is sent into Africa to terminate a dispute between the Carthaginians and the King of Numidia. Cato's report at his return.

War against the Dalmatians.

An embassy to the Senate from the Athenians.

King Prusias grows mutinous.

The Roman armies pass the Alps for the first time.

New quarrels between the Ptolemys of Egypt.

Demetrius vanquished and slain by his competitor Alexander Balas, an impostor countenanced by the Romans.

MASINISSA had laid claim to a country, which Appian calls Tisca, belonging to the Carthaginians; and these made their complaints at Rome of this new encroachment. The Fathers, though always resolved to favour the Numidian in his quarrels with Carthage, yet, to preserve an appearance of justice, and probably to get exact information of the strength and condition of the city, dispatched Cato, with other deputies, into Africa, to take cognizance of the matter in dispute. On their arrival, Masinissa declared himself very willing to submit the contest to their arbitration: for he thought the Romans his sure friends: But the Carthaginians refused; alledging, That the treaty concluded with Scipio Africanus, did not want amending; and that nothing more was requisite

App. in Punic. p. 37.

Y. R. 595.
Bef. Chr.
155.
295 Cons.

Plut. 16.
C. Cato.

quiste than that each party should strictly observe the articles of that convention. Cato, on his return to Rome, reported, that Carthage was grown excessively rich and populous; and he warmly exhorted the Senate to destroy a city and Republic, which while they subsisted, Rome could never be safe. Having brought from Africa some very large figs, he shewed them to the Conscrip Fathers, in one of the lappets of his gown: The country, said he, where this fine fruit grows, is but a three days voyage from Rome. We are told, that from this time he never spoke in the Senate, upon any subject, without concluding with these words, I am also of opinion that Carthage should be destroyed. Scipio Nasica, a man of great weight and authority among the Fathers, steadily and strenuously opposed him in this particular. He always ended his speeches (according to Plutarch) with these words, I am also of opinion that Carthage should not be destroyed. It is probable, says the same Historian, that Nasica seeing the people's pride and insolence grown, by their victories, to such a height, that they could hardly be restrained by the Senate, within any bounds; and knowing their power to be such, that they could force the Republic into whatever measures their caprice dictated, he was for preserving Carthage as a curb to check their audaciousness: For he thought that the Carthaginians were too weak to subdue the Romans, but yet too strong to be despised by them. Cato on the other hand judged, that for a people debauched by prosperity, nothing was more to be feared than a rival State, always powerful, and now, from its misfortunes, grown wise and circumspect. He held it necessary to remove all dangers that could be apprehended from without, when the Republic had, within, so many distempers threatening her destruction^a.

Y. R. 597.
Bef. Chr.
155.
296 Cons.

App. in Illyr.
Polyb.
Leg. 125.
Liv. Epit.
B. 47.

IN the Consulship of C. Marcius Figulus and L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus, the Republic commenced a war against the Dalmatians, who had made incursions into Illyricum, and rudely treated some Roman ambassadors that had been sent to them the last year. This ill treatment, Polybius tells us, was only the pretence for the war: That the Senate being desirous to give the soldiers some exercise, and having neglected, ever since the times of Demetrius Pbarius, that part of Illyricum now invaded, it was from these motives they ordered the expedition against the Dalmatians. Marcius conducted the war with various success^b; but the

^a This year upon examination was found in the treasury 16,810 pondo of gold, which reckoned in the decuple proportion, is 455,971 l. 5 s. Of silver 22,070 pondo, 59,864 l. 17 s. 6 d. And of coined money sexagies bis & 85,200 H. S. 50,741 l. 10 s. 2½ d. which in all comes to 566,577 l. 12 s. 8½ d. Arbuthn. p. 191. ex Plin. L. 33. c. 3.

^b According to Polybius, were passed, this year, the Ælian and Fufian laws, which Cicero calls the walls and bulwarks of peace and tranquillity. The first forbad acting any thing with the people while the augurs and proper magistrates were observing the heavens, and taking the auspices. The Fufian law made it unlawful to act any thing with the people on the days called fasti; the next year P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica finished it by subduing the invaders. His Collegue in the Consulship, C. Claudius Marcellus, gained over the Ligurians a victory, which procured him the honour of a triumph.

THE ATHENIANS, this year, sent an embassy to Rome, begging to be discharged from a fine of 500 talents, which the Sicyonians had condemned them to pay for having ravaged the lands of the Orepians. These had, in the first instance, made complaint to the Romans; and the Senate had referred the consideration of the matter to the Sicyonians. Carneades, an Academic Philosopher, Diogenes, a Stoic, and Critolaus, a Peripatetic, all three famous for eloquence, each for a different kind, were the ambassadors from Athens. Cicero says of Carneades, that he never advanced any thing which he did not prove; nor ever opposed an argument which he did not overthrow. Multitudes of the Roman youth flocking about these Athenians to hear their discourses, this greatly disturbed the spirit of Cato, who, according to Plutarch, was an implacable enemy to philosophy, and used to call Socrates a babbler. Cato advised the Senate to give the ambassadors an answer in all haste, that they might return to their schools, there to tutor, as they pleased, the children of the Greeks; leaving the Roman children to attend to the laws and the magistrates, their only masters, before the arrival of these eloquent Philosophers. The Senate complied with his humour, and dismissed the ambassadors, having first reduced the fine, imposed on the Athenians, to a hundred talents.

PRUSIAS, that religious worshipper of the Conscrip Fathers, had, by this time, lost much of his devotional regard for those his Gods. On the death of Eumenes, the Bitbynian had, without leave, invaded the kingdom of Pergamus, of which Attalus was regent; his nephew and pupil, Attalus the son of Eumenes, being a minor. Rome sent ambassador after ambassador to Prusias, commanding him to cease his hostilities, but all in vain. She at length sent ten ambassadors together to him, but neither did these succeed. However, when he found that the Senate would in earnest commence a war against him, and engage all her allies in the East to do the same, this terrified him into an absolute submission. He was condemned to make good all the damages he had done; to give Attalus twenty ships of war; and to pay him five hundred talents in twenty years.

IN the Consulship of Q. Opimius and L. Posthumius Albinus, the Roman armies for the first time passed the Alps. It was to make war against the Oxybii and the Deciatae, people originally of Liguria, but at this time inhabiting the country along the sea coast, in the neighbourhood of Nicea * and Antipolis. They had attacked those towns, which fasti; that is, on such days as the courts were open, and the Prætors sat to hear causes. These two laws P. Clodius got repealed in his tribuneship, in the year 695.

Y. R. 598.
B. C. 189.
227 C.

Plut. Ar. of Cato.
A. G. 11.
L. 1. 1. 14.

De Orat.
L. 1. 1. 12.

Plutarch, in Achaic. c. xi.

Polybius.
Legat. 128.

Id. Legat.
129.

Id. Legat.
133.
Id. Legat.
135.

Id. Legat.
136.

Y. R. 599.
B. C. Chr.
153.
298 Conf.

Polyb. Le-
gat. 131.
* Nice and Antibes.

Y. R. 555.
E. C. 133.
133.
E. C. 133.

Polyb. L.
E. 133.

See P. 443.

Liv. Epit.
B. 45.

Polyb. L.
E. 133.

Is. Leg. 115.

Is. Leg. 132.

belonging to the people of Messina [Marjines] these sent a complaint of it to the Senate. An embassy from Rome to the invaders having no success, Opimius led an army against them, and subdued them. He gave the greater part of the conquered country to the Massilienses; to whom also he obliged the vanquished to send hostages.

While Opimius was carrying on this war, Ptolemy Pbyseon came to Rome. The Senate had been often pestered with the quarrels of the two Ptolemys of Egypt. After the accommodation between them, confirmed, in the year 555, by Popilius the Roman ambassador, Pbyseon (a monster of wickedness) had driven his elder brother Philometor from the throne. The latter coming to Rome for protection, the Romans restored him to the possession of all the dominions of Egypt, except Cyrenaita, which they adjudged to Pbyseon; who not content with this division came afterwards to Rome to request that the island of Cyprus might be added to his share. The Senate, thinking it for the interest of the Republic to make a more equal, and less equitable division of the kingdom, granted the island to the petitioner, and appointed some Commissioners to put him in possession of it. Philometor refused to acquiesce in this decree; and the people of Cyrene, hating Pbyseon for his cruelty, took arms against him, and defeated him in battle. His brother was thought to have incited the Cyrenians to this rebellion. An attempt being afterwards made to assassinate Pbyseon, who received several wounds, he now came to Rome, and accused his brother of having hired the assassins. As Philometor had the reputation of great virtue and benignity, it was very unlikely he should give the least countenance to such a fact; yet the Senate were so prepossessed by what Pbyseon had said, [or rather so much offended with Philometor for not having obeyed their decree in relation to Cyprus] that they would not listen to any thing his ambassadors had to offer in his defence; but ordered them instantly to leave Rome. The Fathers sent five Commissioners with Pbyseon to put him in possession of Cyprus; and wrote to their Greek and Asiatic allies, giving them leave to assist the Egyptian. Pbyseon, having by this means got together an army, landed in Cyprus, where being attacked and vanquished by Philometor, he took refuge in Lapithus, a city of that island. Thither the conqueror followed him, and there took him prisoner. Philometor used his victory with great moderation: so far from taking away his brother's life, he restored to him his dominions, added some other territories to them in lieu of Cyprus, and promised him his daughter in marriage. Thus ended the war between the

* Polybius says of him that he was a Prince of great clemency and good nature; that he never put any of his nobles to death, nor so much as one citizen of Alexandria; and though his brother had often provoked him, he as often pardoned him, and even treated him with great generosity. Excerpt. de Virt. & Vit. in fin.

two brothers ; at least we hear no more of it. The Romans seem not to have interposed to hinder the accommodation.

ABOUT this time the Tribunes of the people at Rome did an act of justice which gained them great honour. L. Cotta, one of their college, refused to pay his debts ; believing himself safe in an office which made his person inviolable. But the rest of the Tribunes, thinking it shameful that the majesty of the people should be made a screen for private perfidy, threatened to take the cause of his creditors into their hands, if he did not pay them, or give security.

EVER since the year 531 it had been customary for the Consuls to enter upon their office on the Ides of March (the 15th) ; but this year the necessity of sending a Consul without delay into Spain, which was in great commotion, made the Romans hold their assembly for the elections some months before the usual time. Q. Fulvius Nobilior and T. Annius Luscus entered on the Consulship the first of January ; which from hence forward was always the day for the two chief Magistrates to take possession of the fasces. The events of the war in Spain will be hereafter mentioned.

In this year Attalus, the son of Eumenes, the late King of Pergamus, came to Rome, to recommend himself to the favour of the Senate, and was kindly received and treated with honour.

Also Demetrius Soter sent his son Demetrius to Rome ; but the Senate considering him only as a boy, and not making those preparations for his reception which he thought suitable to his dignity, he in disgust returned home. It has been mentioned that Demetrius banished Heraclides, the treasurer of Babylon, for his oppression of the people. This exile, to be revenged, set up, against the King, a man of obscure birth named Balas, pretending that he was the son of Antiochus Epiphanes. The Kings of Egypt, Pergamus and Cappadocia, out of hatred to Demetrius, supported the impostor ; and Laodice, the daughter of Epiphanes, joined in the fraud. Heraclides was now at Rome : He had brought with him Balas (who took the name of Alexander) and also Laodice to give a better colour to the matter. He presented them both to the Conscrip Fathers, whose assistance he implored to place the young Prince on the throne of Syria. The Senate readily passed a decree in his favour.

And, in the following Consulship of M. Claudius Marcellus and L. Valerius Flaccus, Alexander Balas appeared in Syria with a formidable army, consisting chiefly of the troops which the Kings of Egypt, Pergamus and Cappadocia had furnished him with, at the solicitation of the Romans. He was also joined by Jonathan Maccabæus with the forces of Judea. In a pitched battle the army of Demetrius being routed, he lost both his kingdom and his life.

Val. Max.
L. 6. c. 5.
§. 4.

Y. R. 600.
Bef. Chr.
152.
299 Conf.

Liv. Epit.
B. 4.
Polyb. Legat. 149.

Liv. Epit.
B. 52.
App. in
Syr. p. 131.
Justin. B.
35. c. 34.

Y. R. 601.
Bef. Chr.
151.
300 Conf.

1 Mac.
10. J.
Ant. q.
23. c. 5.

C H A P. XXV.

*The Carthaginians are reduced very low in a war with Masinissa.
Rome resolves to seize the opportunity of their distress, to crush them entirely.*

App. in
Pun. 7. 35.

Y. R. 602.†
Bel. Car.
140.
301 Cons.

Y. R. 603.⁹
Bel. Chr.
141.
302 Cons.

THERE seems to have been a party at Carthage who were for yielding any thing to Masinissa rather than come to an open rupture with him. Forty of these the people banished, and bound themselves by oath never to recal them. The exiles repaired to Masinissa, who sent two of his sons, Gulussa and Micipsa, to solicit their restoration. Against these embassadors the Carthaginians shut their gates; and Gulussa in his return was attacked by surprize, and some of his followers slain^a. Hereupon Masinissa came at the head of a great army, and besieged a town called Orcitopa, belonging to the Carthaginians, who sent against him, under Asdrubal, an army of 25,000 foot and 400 horse. Two of the King's Generals with 6000 horse went over to Asdrubal, who encouraged by this accession of strength, drew near to the enemy, and in several skirmishes had the advantage. The King pretending fear, retired before the Carthaginians, and by degrees drew them to a place where the ground favoured him. A general battle ensued. The Numidians had the advantage, but not a decisive victory. Scipio Æmilianus, who had been sent by the Consul Lucullus from Spain to ask some elephants of Masinissa, was, from the top of a hill, a spectator of the action. He often declared afterwards, that, of all the battles he had seen (and he had seen many) none had ever given him so exquisite a delight: for it was the only time, when without any danger to himself, he had beheld a hundred thousand men engaged in fight. He added, that such a fight had never been enjoyed by any one before him, except Jupiter and Neptune in the Trojan war.

App. in
Pun. 7. 40.

Appian relates, that Scipio, at the desire of the Carthaginians, took upon him the office of a mediator between them and Masinissa; that they offered to yield the territory in dispute; to pay 200 talents

^a The epitomizer of Lucan, (B. 49.) reckoning up the causes of the Romans declaring war against the Carthaginians, mentions their not admitting Gulussa into their town, but says nothing of their design to assassinate him.

† L. Lucius Lucullus and A. Postumius Albinus, Consuls.

⁹ T. Quintus Flaminius and M. Atilius Pullus, Consuls.

This year the senate, at the motion of Scipio Nasica, ordered a theatre for plays (which, by the direction of the Censor, was building at the public expence) to be demolished, and forbade the use of seats or benches at the public shows in Rome and within a mile of it. Val. Max. B. 2. c. 4. §. 2.

down, and 800 more in a certain time; but that Masiniſſa demanding further, to have the deserters delivered up to him, this was refused. Scipio returned into Spain with his elephants, and Masiniſſa pursued the war. He invested the enemy in their camp upon a hill, where they could receive neither provisions nor reinforcements. At this juncture arrived embassadors from Rome. Their pretended business was to make peace between the contending parties; but they had private orders to encourage Masiniſſa to pursue the war, if they found he had the advantage; otherwise, to put an end to it. Accordingly when they saw how matters went, they suffered the King to push his enemies to the utmost extremity. The Carthaginians held out, till great numbers of them perished by famine and pestilence. Compelled by necessity they at last yielded to all the conditions of peace imposed by the Numidian. They consented to give up the deserters, restore the exiles, notwithstanding their oath to the contrary, and pay 5000 talents in fifty years. Masiniſſa also made them pass under the yoke unarmed, and in their tunics only. It is said that Gubſa, to be revenged for the ill treatment he had formerly met with from the Carthaginians, detached after the multitude a body of Numidian horse, who fell upon them when they had neither arms to defend themselves, nor strength to fly: of the whole number very few escaped to Carthage.

AND NOW the Romans, taking advantage of the prodigious loss the Carthaginians had sustained, prepared in all haste for war, yet without declaring their design. Carthage suspecting it, and that the pretence for it would be her having taken arms against Masiniſſa, the ally of Rome, proclaimed, by a public herald, Asdrubal, and the other authors of the war, guilty of treason against the State. They also sent embassadors to Rome, who accused Masiniſſa and their own Generals, laying upon them the whole blame of the hostilities. Why then, said one of the Senate to the embassadors, were you not more early in your sentence against the authors of the war? To this being at a loss for an answer, they asked, Upon what terms Carthage, if judged faulty, might be forgiven: The Fathers replied, She must satisfy the Romans. On the return of these Ministers home, the Carthaginians sent a new embassy to desire a clear and full declaration of the means by which the Romans might be satisfied. All the answer that could be obtained was, That the Carthaginians knew the means very well: an answer which, when reported, threw the city into great perplexity and consternation. Their terror was much increased by the sudden defection of Utica, the most considerable place in their dependence, next to their capital. The people of Utica had sent deputies to make an absolute surrendry of themselves, their city, and their territory to the people of Rome. This event furnishing the Romans with a convenient port for landing their forces, and a place of arms within eight miles of Carthage, they deferred no longer a declaration of war

V. R. 603.
P.C. Chr.
119.
322 Conf.

Y. R. 673.
Ecl. Chr.
129.
3-2 Conf.

Y. R. 672.
Ecl. Chr.
129.

war in form. The reasons assigned for it were, that Carthage, contrary to her covenants with Rome, had fitted out a fleet, had gone beyond her limits to attack the King of Numidia, a friend and ally of the Roman people, and lastly, had refused to let Gulussa, the son of Masimissa, enter within her gates, though conducted by Roman ambassadors. But Pelleius Paternikus tells us, that the cause of this war was mere jealousy of the power of Carthage, and not any offence by her committed^a,

C H A P. XXVI.

Third PUNIC WAR.

FIRST and SECOND YEARS of the War.

The Carthaginians, after extraordinary submissions, vainly employed to divert the war, resolve to defend themselves; which they do with surprizing activity and courage.

Y. R. 624.
Ecl. Chr.
125.
303 Conf.

App. in
Pun. c. p. 42.
Polyb.
L. 2. 142.

THE conduct of the war in Africa was assigned to the new Consuls L. Marcus Censorinus and M. Manilius, who had strict orders, not to put an end to it, but with the destruction^b of the city of Carthage. Censorinus commanded the fleet, and Manilius the army. The fleet was considerable, and had on board 80,000 foot, and about 4000 horse. Setting sail they arrived at Lylibæum in Sicily, and there stopped. Carthage did not yet know what had been resolved at Rome; but, upon the obscure answer brought from thence by her last ambassadors, had sent others with full powers to do whatever they should judge necessary; and even, if circumstances required it, to declare, that the Carthaginians surrendered themselves, and all that was theirs, to the Romans at discretion. They had never, in their former wars, entertained a thought of humbling themselves to this degree of submission. And they were sensible that even this would now appear the less meritorious, as the people of Utica had prevented them, by a more early example of the like deduction.

^a This year, according to Pigbius (V. 2. p. 442,) a law was enacted, that no man should be twice Consul. Cato spoke in favour of the law. It was constantly observed till the days of Marius, except in the case of Scipio Emilianus.

^b Florus, after telling us, that Cato always voted for destroying Carthage, and Nasica for preserving it, gravely adds, That the Senate chose the middle way, which was, to remove the town out of it's place. B. 2. c. 15.

The

The ambassadors finding, on their arrival at Rome, not only that war had been declared, but that the army was actually gone for Sicily, judged that they had no time to deliberate: Being therefore admitted to audience, they made the absolute surrendry, according to their instructions. It was answered; That because they had taken the right resolution, the Senate granted them their liberty, laws, territories, and all the effects belonging either to the public or to private persons, on condition that in thirty days, they sent three hundred hostages, of their noblest youth, to the Consuls at Lilybaeum; and further performed what the Consuls should command. The ambassadors felt an extreme joy at hearing what the Senate granted; but this joy was instantly damped by the latter proviso. They returned to Carthage, and reported the answer and orders of the Roman Senate. The silence of the Conscrip Fathers, with respect to the towns belonging to the Carthaginians, gave them extreme disquiet. However it was necessary to obey, nor had they any hope to mollify their enemies but by the readiness of this obedience. Without delay therefore they sent hostages to Lilybaeum. Whereupon it was signified to the deputies who had brought them, that the Consuls would let Carthage know their further pleasure when they came to Utica. Thither they sailed with all their forces.

It is easy to judge of the consternation of the Carthaginians, when, after the submissions they had made, they learnt the arrival of so terrible an army in their neighbourhood. They in all haste deputed some persons to expostulate with the Consuls. "What have we done," said these ambassadors, "to provoke you to this sudden invasion of our country with so mighty an army? Have we not faithfully paid you the tribute? Have we built any ships of war? Have we tamed any elephants? If you are displeased with the defensive war we have made against Masiniſſa, consider how patiently we endured his encroachments, till he resolved to set no bounds to his avarice and cruelty? But supposing it a fault to have defended our territories against the Namidian, have we not since made an absolute surrendry of ourselves and our country to the Roman people? Have we not with readiness given the hostages you demanded? And does not the decree of your Senate expressly promise, that on condition of our delivering those hostages, Carthage shall remain free, governed by her own laws, and retaining her present possessions?" Censorinus answered, "You have forgot one part of the Senate's decree, that part which requires your obedience to the orders of the Consuls. And we told you in Sicily that we would signify to you these orders when we came to Utica. You have done very well with regard to the hostages; but if you sincerely desire peace, what occasion have you for arms? Bring to us all your arms; as well those of private persons as those belonging to the public." The deputies begged, he would consider what must become.

V. R. 604.
Bef. Chr.
148.
303 Conf.

Diod. Sic.
ap. Fulv.
Utin.

Polyb. Le-
gat. 142.

App. p. 44.

V. B. 122
E. C. 122
123.
124.

become of Carthage, if he entirely did so. Hannibal, especially at a time when Hannibal, in revenge for having been condemned to death, had formed an army against her of 20,000 men. Censorinus replied, that the Senate and people of Rome would provide against that danger.

The Carthaginians without fraud delivered up all their arms, 200,000 suits of armour, an infinite number of spears and javelins, and 2000 Catapults, engines for throwing darts and stones. The long train of carriages which brought these to the Roman Camp, was followed by the most venerable of the Carthaginian Priests and Senators, in the hope, that this appearance would excite the compassion of the Romans. When their deputies were come before the tribunal of the Consuls, Censorinus rose up, and with a formal gravity said, "I cannot but praise, Carthaginians, the ready obedience you have shewn in sending us the hostages we required; and in now giving up your arms. Many words are useless when necessity urges. You will have fortitude to bear what the Senate further commands. Yield up your city to us. Transplant yourselves to whatever part of your territory you like best, provided it be ten miles from the sea. For we are determined to demolish Carthage."

At the sound of these words the Carthaginians all broke out into lamentable cries; they became even frantic with grief, rage, and despair; they threw themselves on the ground, beating the earth with their foreheads, and tearing their clothes, and even their flesh: they invoked the Gods, avengers of violated faith, and, in the bitterest terms, reproached and reviled the Romans. The Consuls calmly waited till the storm of passion was over, knowing, says Appian, that mighty calamities at first create, in those who are struck with them, a boldness, which necessity in a short time subdues. And thus it happened to the Carthaginians: When they had, in the manner above described, discharged their first fury and indignation, they lay silent and motionless, as if they had been dead. After a while, coming to themselves, and to a more perfect feeling of their distress, they, instead of angry words, fell to wailings and humble entreaties. Hanno, surnamed Gilla, endeavoured in a long speech to move the compassion of the Consuls, and, in conclusion, earnestly begged, that they would, at least, allow the Carthaginians time to make application to the Senate of Rome. The Consuls, inflexible, would neither recede from their sentence, nor consent to suspend the execution of it. Be gone, said they to the supplicants, Hitherto you are ambassadors. The Lictors were making them withdraw, when they, foreseeing the tumult that would be raised at Carthage by the answer they were to carry thither, begged leave, once more to speak. This granted, they said: "We are sensible of the necessity of obeying. You will not suffer us to send ambassadors to Rome: nor will our people suffer us to return to you; we shall be torn to pieces before we have fully delivered our message. We beg therefore, not
" for

“ for our own sakes, who are prepared for the worst that can happen,
 “ but for the sake of the people of Carthage, you would send your fleet “ thither; that our fellow citizens, while they hear your commands “ from us, seeing you ready to execute them yourselves, may be in“ duced, if possible, to submit to their calamity. Hard indeed is that “ necessity which thus forces us to call for your fleet against our “ country.” Cæserinus so far complied with this request as to go with twenty ships, and hover upon the coast near Carthage. Some of the deputies, in their journey towards the city, stole aside, and disappeared; the rest in silence held on their way. The people, in crowds upon the walls, were looking impatiently for their return: Many ran out to meet them, and, perceiving an excessive sadness in their countenances, eagerly enquired the cause. Nobody gave any answer. Much difficulty had the deputies, when they came to the city, to get through the press that choked up the gate, and all the way to the Senate-house.
 Here being at length arrived, and having entered the assembly, one of them reported the Consuls command. The universal cry, which it instantly raised within doors, was answered by a louder and more doleful noise from the multitude without, though they knew not yet the certainty of the evil they apprehended. The Speaker continuing his discourse to inform the Senate of the arguments that had been employed to move compassion, the Senators, through an earnest desire to know the event, became once more silent and attentive; and their stillness caused the like abroad. But, when it was understood, that the Consuls, inexorably cruel, refused even to respite the execution of their sentence, till an embassy could go to Rome, and return, the assembly again burst out in cries and lamentations; which the multitude hearing, and no longer doubting of the intolerable calamity, furiously broke into the Senate-house, reviling and insulting all those who had counselled their giving hostages, and delivering up their arms. The whole city became a scene of the most desperate grief, and the wildest rage; and the desolation and frantic wailings of the mothers, whose sons had been torn from them for hostages, and who ran raving about the streets, as-faulting those whom they accused of robbing them of their children, did not a little heighten the circumstances of the distress, the uproar and the confusion.

However, amidst this multitude of distracted people, there were some who, less transported with passion, had the presence of mind to shut and secure the gates of the city, and to gather upon the ramparts great heaps of stones, which might serve instead of other weapons.
 The same day, the Senate decreed war; proclaimed liberty, by a public crier, to the slaves; enrolled them in the militia; sent to Asdrubal whom they had condemned, and who, with an army of 20,000 men, was not far off, praying him to forget the injury

App. in
 Pun. p. 54.

Y. R. 624.
B.C. 147.
147.
147 C. 147.

Scyth. B.
17. 1. 1. 1.

For. B. 1.
1. 15.

App. P. 55.

they had been forced to do him, and employ his troops for the defence of his country, in this her extreme danger; and lastly appointed another Asdrubal, a grandson of Masiniſſa (by one of his daughters) to command in Carthage. These measures taken, they ordered a new deputation to the Consuls, to ask a truce of thirty days, that they might have time to send ambassadors to Rome; which being denied, it was resolved unanimously, that they would preserve their city, or die defending it. Instantly the temples and other spacious buildings were converted into work-houses, where men and women, old and young, employed themselves by day and by night, in fabricating arms. That no time might be lost, whilst some eat or slept, others took their places; and the work never ceased. They every day made 140 bucklers, 300 swords, 500 javelins and lances, and 1000 darts for the Catapulta. Of these machines they formed as many as they could; and, because there was a scarcity of materials to make cords for them, the women cut off their hair to supply that want.

In the mean time the Consuls, from a persuasion that an unarmed multitude would not think of sustaining a siege, or, if they did, that the town would easily be taken, made no haste to march thither. Finding at length how matters went, they advanced to the place. Their chief care was to secure provisions, which they could get only from Utica, Leptis, Adrumetum, and two other towns: Asdrubal held the rest of Africa, and plentifully supplied Carthage. Masiniſſa did not offer the Consuls any assistance. He thought himself ill used by the Romans, in that, after he had brought Carthage so low, they came to take advantage of his victory, without so much as imparting to him their design. When therefore, to try him, they sent to ask his aid, he answered, he would give it when he saw it was wanted. Shortly after he sent an offer of his aid; but then the Consuls answered, that, when they wanted it, they would ask it.

CARTHAGE, which is said to have been twenty-three miles in circuit, and to have contained 700,000 souls, was situated within a large gulph or bay, on a Peninsula forty-five miles in compass, and joined to the continent by an isthmus, or neck of land, three miles broad. The city seems to have been divided into three principal parts, Cotbon (sometimes called the Port) Megara and Byrja. The last, two miles in compass, was the citadel; it stood on the isthmus, and on that very spot of ground which Dido purchased of the Africans. On the South side, towards the continent, the city was defended by three walls, each thirty cubits high, and strengthened with towers rising two stories above the height of the walls. Along and between these walls were barracks^a for 20,000 foot, 4000 elephants, to have been in the walls, which seems improbable, as it must have ruined the strength of the fortification.

^a Appian makes these barracks, including not only the lodgings for the troops, but the stables and granaries for the horses and

horses, horse, and 300 elephants. Whether the harbour of Carthage was on the East or the West of the Peninsula, is uncertain. Appian places it on the West: but there are passages in Polybius from which one should naturally conclude that it was on the East; and so Cellarius believes. We find it divided into two ports, having both but one and the same entrance from the sea; and this entrance only seventy foot broad, so that it could be shut up with iron chains. The inner port was for the ships of war, and in the midst of it stood an island, natural or artificial, where was the arsenal; and where the admiral resided. The outer port belonged to the merchants.

It will not be attempted here to give a satisfactory account of the operations of the siege of Carthage, or to explain all that Appian says of it: A plan of the place is wanting; nor is it easy to form one from that author's description. What we find clear and distinct is, in substance, to the following effect. That the Consuls attempted to scale the walls in two places, believing they had need of nothing more than ladders to become masters of the town: that, to their astonishment, they found the besieged well armed and resolute; and that being twice repulsed they applied themselves to make the preparations for a regular siege, which would not soon be finished: that afterwards Censorinus made a breach in the wall, but notwithstanding all his efforts to enter the place, was driven back with considerable loss, and would have sustained a greater, if Scipio Æmilianus, then a legionary Tribune, had not covered his retreat: that the Carthaginians made fire-ships of some old rotten barks, and, the wind blowing favourably, let them drive upon the Roman fleet, which was thereby almost totally consumed: That Censorinus, after this disaster, returned to Rome to preside at the elections. We read also that his colleague Manilius continued the war with no better success, and would have lost the greater part of his army in a rash enterprize, against Asdrubal in the field, had it not been for the bravery and conduct of Æmilianus, who with 300 horse sustained the charge of all Asdrubal's forces, and covered the legions, while they passed a river in their retreat before the enemy. By these and many other glorious actions, during this unfortunate campaign, Æmilianus established himself in so high a reputation of courage and ability, that Cato, a great niggard of praise, is said to have applied to him a verse of Homer in the Odyssey, where the Poet, comparing Tiresias with the other Ghosts in the Elysian field, says, He alone has understanding, the rest are but shades.

Y. R. 624.
Ber. Cont.
123.
303 C. 91.

App. in
Pun. 7.
& seq.

Plut. life of Cato.

Ἐοὶς πέπνυται; τοὶ δὲ σχοιῖ ἀϊόουσι.

Hom. Odys. L. 10.

To whom Persephone, entire and whole,
Gave to retain th' unseparated soul:
The rest are forms of empty æther made,
Impassive semblance, and a fleeting shade.

Odyssey, B. 10. l. 584.

Y. R. 605.
Bell. Chr.
147.
304 Cons.

App. in
Pub. p. 65.

App. in
Pub. p. 65.
Bell. Chr.
147.
304 Cons.

App. in
Pub. p. 65.
Bell. Chr.
147.
304 Cons.

At Rome were chosen to the Consulship Sp. Postumius Albinus Magnus and L. Cæpurnius Piso Cælonius. The conduct of the war in Africa fell to the latter. While Manius in quality of Proconsul continued to act there, Himilco Phœneas, General of Masaniassa's cavalry, came over to the Romans, out of pure esteem (as it is said) for Scipio Æmilianus. The African brought with him 2200 horse, very opportunely, when the Proconsul, having led his army into a dangerous situation, was greatly at a loss how to make a retreat.

A LITTLE before this died Masaniassa; the best, and most fortunate King, (says Polybius) of his time: fortunate in a healthy and vigorous constitution, inasmuch that no labours of war were too great for his strength; and, though ninety years old at his death, he left a son but four years of age. fortunate in his friendship with the Romans, which procured him an extensive dominion: fortunate in the concord which reigned among his children, and prevented all intestine commotions and seditions. His great merit (not to speak of his courage and activity) was his introducing husbandry into Numidia, and shewing his subjects that the soil which they thought barren, was capable of bringing forth all kinds of fruits, and in as great plenty as any other country. Thus useful and beneficent to his own people, he was a very bad neighbour, as the reader must have observed.

We are told that, on his death bed, Masaniassa sent for Scipio Æmilianus to consult with him about disposing of his dominions; that he expired before Scipio arrived, but had commanded his sons to acquiesce in whatever division the Roman should make of the kingdom: That Scipio, having, pursuant to the intention of the deceased, provided handsomely for the bastard children, decreed that each of the three legitimate sons should bear the title of King; that Micipsa, being the eldest and of a pacific temper, should reside in the palace of Cirtba, and be treasurer; that the second, Gulussa, a military man, should be Generalissimo; and that Manastabal, the youngest, who had been accustomed to hear causes, should be Lord Chief Justice: and thus each King had the two other Kings for his Ministers^a.

The

^a There is a passage in Sallust which seems to contradict the whole of this story. His words are these: Imperii utique ejus [Masaniassa] finis idem fuit. Dein Micipsa filius regnum solus obtinuit. Manastabal & Gulussa fratres ejus morbo absumpti. Bell. Jugurth. c. 5. which words are in the new translation of that historian rendered thus: "When death put an end to his [Masaniassa] reign, his son Micipsa succeeded him: at that time his only son, as his other two, Manastabal and Gulussa, had been carried off by distempers." Perhaps the word Dein should be rendered, Some time after; and then the meaning of the passage will be this: "Some time after the death of Masaniassa, Micipsa reigned alone; his brothers [and partners in the government] Manastabal and Gulussa, having been carried off by distempers."

That Micipsa was not the only son of Masaniassa that survived him, we have the authority.

The Consul Calpurnius, and Mancinus (who commanded a new fleet) came into Africa in the beginning of the spring, but performed nothing to their honour. They did not so much as attempt to take Carthage, or even to molest Libyal, but applied themselves to reduce Clypea and Hippogreta on the African coast, attacking them, both by sea and land, without success. After which they retired with the army and fleet to Utica, and spent the winter there.

In the mean time the Carthaginians, gathering new courage from the spiritless behaviour of their enemies, began to look abroad for allies. They not only sent into Numidia, and to the free states of Mauritania, but even into Macedon. About a year before, one Andriscus, a man of the dregs of the people, had given himself out to be the son of Perses, assumed the name of Philip, and, being assisted by the Thracians, had, partly by force of arms, and partly by persuasion, engaged the Macedonians to recognize him for their King. Not content with this, he invaded Thessaly. Scipio Nasica, with the assistance of the Achaans, and other Greek allies, drove him from that country: but the Prætor Jurventius Thalna, who succeeded Nasica, and brought an army with him from Italy, lost the greater part of his troops, and his own life, in a rash enterprize to force his way through some narrow passes into Macedon: after which Andriscus easily recovered that part of Thessaly he had been forced by Nasica to abandon. The Carthaginians thinking that this Usurper was grown powerful enough to make an useful diversion, sent ambassadors to encourage him to a vigorous prosecution of the war, promising to supply him both with money and ships. The historians have not told us what answer Andriscus returned to the Carthaginians. Whatever it were, it proved of no service either to him or them. For Q. Cæcilius Metellus, who succeeded Thalna in the command of the Roman forces, defeated the usurper in two pitched battles; the first in Macedon, the second in Thrace, where one of the petty Kings, to whom he fled for refuge, delivered him up to the Romans. This impostor was no sooner crushed, than another started up, who called himself Alexander; and he likewise pretended to be a son of Perses. Metellus easily drove him out of the country into Dardania.

thority of Polybius, the epitome of Liv, Appian and Zonaras. And it is very unlikely that Sallust would contradict a fact related by Polybius, in which the latter could not be deceived. Now Polybius, who was with Scipio at the siege of Carthage, speaks of Gulussa, King of the Numidians, as present at the same siege in the third year of the war. Gulussa's title of King implies that Masinissa was dead; and Appian relates his death as happening two years before. Besides, Polybius expressly says that Masinissa left five sons, of which one was but four years old; and that, three days after the King's death, Scipio arrived at Cirta, where he settled all things with great prudence; for which good office on his part there would have been no occasion, if the kingdom had fallen intirely to one only son and heir.

Y. R. 605.
Bel. Cha.
167.
304 Cons.

App. in Punic. p.
66. & seq.

Liv. Epit.
B. 49.

Zonar. T. 2.
Liv. Epit.
B. 50.

Zonar.
Flor. B. 2.
c. 14.
Zonar. T.
2.

C H A P. XXVII.

T H I R D and F O U R T H Y E A R S of the War.

The Consul Scipio Æmilianus restores discipline in the army before Carthage. He binds any provisions from coming to the besieged. Carthage taken and demolished.

Y. R. 505.
Bel. Car.
147.
304 Cons.

App. in
Pun. p. 66.
& 63.

* In the year 604.
Pict. life of Cato.

Liv. Epit.
B. 50.

App. in
Pun. p. 63.
& 62.

SCIPIO Æmilianus had, in the beginning of the second year of the war, been sent with Phameas, from Africa, by the Proconsul Manilius. The Senate conferred great honours and rewards on Phameas; and promised him yet greater at the end of the war, if he continued faithfully to assist the Republic. As for * Scipio, every body, both at Rome and in the army, extolled his virtue and abilities. Whatever had succeeded was ascribed to his bravery and skill, and all miscarriages and disasters were imputed to the not having followed his advice. Cato, who died some * months before this, is reported to have prophesied on his death bed, that Scipio was the man who would terminate the war by the destruction of Carthage; and the people universally were full of this impression: so that at the election of Magistrates for the year 600, though he only stood for the Ædileship, and was not of the legal age for the higher offices, yet they promoted him to the Consulship, notwithstanding the opposition of the Fathers. The people also assigned him Africa, without having any regard to the remonstrances of his colleague C. Livius Drusus, who strenuously pleaded the custom of having the Provinces determined by lot. The same decree gave Scipio power to temp. l. 31.

Polyb. Ex-
ap. Valer.

* P. Cornilius Scipio Æmilianus, the son of L. Æmilius Paulus, and adopted by the son of Scipio Africanus, made his first campaign, when about seventeen years of age, under his father Æmilius, in Macedon. After the return of the army to Rome, the chief men of Athens being ordered into custody in several towns of Ionia, Æmilius and his brother Fabius (so called because adopted into the Fabius family), obtained leave for Polybius, one of the Athenians, to stay at Rome; and from that time, they lived in great familiarity and friendship with him. He tells us, that Scipio one day thus spoke to him, when they were alone; "What is the reason, Polybius,

"that in conversation you always address
"your discourse to my brother, without "taking any notice of me? I am afraid
"you have the same opinion of me that
"the citizens have, who think me slow
"and indolent, and averse from Roman
"manners, for that I don't apply myself "to pleading causes. They say, that "the family from which I am descended "requires another sort of a representative
"than I am. And this gives me great "uneasiness." Polybius was astonished at this discourse from so young a man (for he was but in his eighteenth year) and begged of him, by all the Gods, not to entertain any such suspicions. "I am far (said he)
"from

to raise as many volunteers as he pleased, and to demand succours, in the name of the Republic, of the Kings and nations her allies.

He arrived with his levies at Utica, and very opportunely, as it is said; for Mancinus with 3500 Romans must have unavoidably perished, if they had not been speedily succoured. These troops, while Calpurnius the Consul was absent on some inland expedition, had, in an attempt upon

Y. R. 606.
Bef. Chr.
146.
305 Con^t

“ from despising or neglecting you. If I address myself to Polybius, and seem to consider him chiefly in what I say, it is only because he is the elder, and because I am persuaded you have the same sentiments and dispose with him. And as it is extremely commendable in you to think laziness a crime in a man descended from so illustrious a family, I gladly promise you all the assistance in my power to make you, both by your sentiments and actions, worthy of the glory of your ancestors. As to the studies in which your brother and you are now employed, you will never want masters for them, since such sort of men are daily flocking hither from Greece. But, with regard to what you have most at heart, perhaps you will not find a more fit companion and assistant than myself.” At these words Scipio taking Polybius by the hand and pressing it affectionately, “ I wish (said he) I might see the day when, neglecting all other things, you would come and live with me, and make me your principal care. Then should I think myself not unworthy of my family and my ancestors.” Polybius, though pleased and affected with the dispositions of the young man, was yet full of anxiety, when he considered the dignity and splendor of that family. Scipio, after this, never quitted him, but preferring his conversation to that of all others, there grew up between them a friendship, like that between a father and a son.

IT was evident, says Polybius, that by the conquest of Macedon the Romans were become masters of the world. Their unbounded power therefore, and the Macedonian wealth, which had been brought to Rome, introduced among them licentiousness and all kinds of luxury. Amidst the general corruption of the Roman youth, who ran headlong into the debauched manners of the Greeks, Scipio's first care was the study of modesty and sobriety. He had been five years famous for these virtues, when the death of Emilia * (the wife of the great Scipio) gave him an opportunity of acquiring the reputation of generosity. He being her heir, gave her jewels, chariot, gold and silver vases she used at sacrifices, her slaves, and all her equipage, to his own mother, Papiria, who, having been divorced by her husband Emilius Paullus, lived in narrow circumstances. She had not of a long time been seen at the public assemblies; but soon after this, appearing at a solemn sacrifice, in her chariot, and with a great train of slaves, her equipage drew the attention of the women; who, knowing it to be the same which had been Emilia's, lifted up their hands to heaven, and prayed for all kinds of prosperity to Scipio, the charming man who had made his mother so fine; and being naturally great praters (says Polybius) and vehement in every thing they set about, they spread his reputation far and wide. The historian adds, that this generosity was the more admired at Rome, because, in that city, nobody ever gives away any thing that belongs to him.

The daughters of the great Scipio, being married to Scipio Nasica and Tiberius Gracchus, had each 40 * talents for her portion. Half this money their mother had paid in her life-time, the other half she had left to be discharged by her heir. She had also, it would seem, bequeathed to each of her daughters a legacy of moveable goods to the value of 5 † talents. By the Roman law, this last money was due in ten months after the death of the testator; but the heir had three years time allowed him for

Diod. Sicul.-
Excerpt. ex.
l. 26. ap.
Valef.
* Sister to Emilius Paullus.

upon the city, lodged themselves on a rock when they could not retire, and where they had no provisions. Scipio hastened to their relief, and brought them off.

And now his first business was to restore discipline in the army, which had been much neglected by his predecessor. The Roman soldiers were become gangs of robbers. Without order or leave of their commanders they made incursions upon the country, plundered the farms, and sold the booty at low prices to merchants, who flocked to the camp to make cheap purchases. Quarrels often arose about sharing the spoil, and in the scuffles many were slain. The Consul in a short time reformed these abuses, and then applied himself wholly to the siege.

The

payment of the portions; a third part every year. At the end of ten months, Gracchus and Natua enquiring of Scipio's broker, whether he had any money for them, he answered, that he had orders to pay each of them 50 talents. At first they imagined the banker mistaken; but he persisted, that he had received such orders. They then supposed, that Scipio had given them, through ignorance of the laws. And in this they had reason, says Plinius; for, at Rome, nobody pays a single talent till the very day it is due; much less 50 talents two years before the time; so careful is every one of his money, and so diligent to make advantage of it. Gracchus and Natua therefore going to Scipio, and understanding from him, that he had actually given directions for the present payment of the whole sum, they, as from a friendly concern for his interest, informed him, that the laws allowed him the use of the money for a long time to come. Scipio answered, "I know that very well; and with strangers I act according to law, but with relations and friends, more friendly and generously." His brothers hearing this, returned silently home, astonished (though they were of the chief men in the city) at Scipio's greatness of soul, and condemning their own excessive attention to make money.

Two years after this, Æmilius Paullus dying, left all his effects to his sons Fabius and Scipio. The latter, to make his brother as rich as himself, relinquished to him the whole of the inheritance, which amounted to above 60 talents. And when his mother died, he gave all her effects to his sisters, though by law they had no title to any of them. Thus did Scipio, says Polybius, for the sum of 60 talents (for so much of his own money he gave away) acquire the character of generosity; not on account of the greatness of the sum, but of the time and manner of giving it.

Many apothegms of Scipio Æmilianus are recorded, of which the much greater part seem not worth repeating. But Cicero (in Ferr. 2. c. 11.) relates an excellent answer, which that general, when going to Africa, gave to an old acquaintance of his, who was out of humour for being refused by him a considerable post in the army. "Be not surprized, said Scipio, that you do not obtain this of me: I myself have been long soliciting a man, who, I think, would have a tender regard for my reputation, to accept the employment you want; and I cannot yet prevail with him."

^b According to the epitome of Livy (B. 51.) Mancinus not only took, but kept a part of Carthage, which seems to have been Megara.

^c The Jesuits in their Roman History have exhibited a map of the place; but if they had given us a picture of the moon, as it appears through a telescope, it would have agreed as well with Appian's description of Carthage, and its port; or even with their own description of them. Mr. Rollet has not, I think, furnished more light than the Jesuits, to make us understand what passed at this siege. In his account we had the place was now commanded by that Asdrubal, who, the preceding year, had been General in the field. He had got rid of the other Asdrubal by accusing him of treachery. They had killed him in the Senate house.

Scipio having made himself master of the isthmus, he there pitched his camp, and built a wall before it, twelve foot high, and reaching quite cross the isthmus from sea to sea; so that the besieged could get no provisions from the continent that way. As, nevertheless, they still received provisions from the continent, by means of the port, he, to cut off their supplies this way, caused a huge mole to be raised in the water, near the mouth of the Port; a work of infinite labour. Hereupon the Carthaginians, animated by necessity, dug a new passage out into the sea, and not only so, but built fifty galleys, with which they gave battle to the enemy's fleet. The engagement lasted the whole day, with what success is not very clear. Winter soon after put an end to the operations of the siege. Æmilianus however did not continue unactive. He destroyed an army, Appian tells us, of 84,000 men, commanded by one Diogenes: after which all Africa submitted to the Romans, and Carthage could get no more provisions.

In this distress Asdrubal asked and obtained an interview with King Gulussa, who, since the death of his father Masiniſſa, had with some forces joined the Roman army. The Carthaginian desired the King to be surety to the Consul for him, that he would submit to every thing, provided the miserable city might be spared. Gulussa answered, "You talk childishly, Asdrubal. Can you now expect, when almost reduced to extremity, what was refused you, even before your town was invested?" He replied, "The Carthaginian affairs are not desperate; we have allies abroad, and an army in the field (for he did not yet know of the defeat of that army) but, above all, I confide in the assistance of the immortal Gods, who undoubtedly will not be regardless of the injuries we have suffered contrary to the faith of treaties, but will afford us various means of preserving ourselves. Admonish the Roman General therefore, that, in piety to the Gods, and in consideration of the variableness of fortune, he would spare the city. And assure him, that if we cannot obtain this, we are, to a man, determined

P. L. N. E. - cop. de Vat. & Vat.

Megara, to be the city, properly so called, and the habitation of the inhabitants, yet when Scipio has broke down the gates of one part of Megara, and entered it; and when those of the Carthaginians who had been appointed to defend that quarter, are retired into the citadel, imagining the whole city to be taken, he is no nearer being master of Megara, than he was before. [And indeed by Appian's account Scipio abandons the quarter he had broke into.] We find him presently after encamped without the city, and looking into it from a high wooden tower, which he has erected on the wall before his camp. The next year, Scipio attacks the port called Cothen, and the citadel at the same time; yet, according to Mr. Rollin, the citadel was not surprised by Megara, which, for any thing hitherto related, Scipio is not master of; and he does not get to the citadel, till seven days after Cothen is taken. Our author has, I grant, the authority of Appian for most of the particulars: But what does the reader learn from such an account?

Y. R. 606.
Esf. Chr.
126.
306 Cons.

"to die rather than surrender." Polybius adds, that upon Gulussa's report of what the Carthaginian had said, Scipio smiled^c, both at the conditions demanded by Asdrubal, after treating his Roman prisoners with the greatest cruelty (for he is said to have put them to death by torture) and at his confidence in the Gods, after such a violation of all laws human and divine. Nevertheless, as Gulussa represented to the General how much it concerned him to put an end to the war, lest a successor coming from Rome, should rob him of that glory, Scipio commissioned the King to return to Asdrubal, with an offer of life and liberty to him, and any ten families of his friends whom he should name, together with ten talents and six slaves for himself. The Carthaginian, having heard the message, replied, The day will never come when the sun shall see Carthage destroyed and Asdrubal alive.

Y. R. 607.
Esf. Chr.
127.
306 Cons.
App. P. 79.

Early the next spring (in the Consulship of C. Cornelius Lentulus, and L. Mummius) Scipio renewed his attacks upon Carthage, on the side of Cothon (or the port) and made himself master of the wall. Thence with a large body of soldiers he forced his way into the great square of the city, where he continued all the following night. From this square three streets led up to the citadel, the ascent pretty steep. As the tops of the houses, which lined these streets, were covered with men, who stood ready to shower darts and stones upon the Romans, it was necessary, before these advanced, to^d clear the houses of the enemy. Having broke into those that were nearest, and got upon the roofs, a desperate fight began there, while another more bloody was carried on in the streets below. When the Roman soldiers, with dreadful slaughter, had, both above and below, driven the Carthaginians before them, quite to the citadel, they, by the General's orders, set fire to all the houses of the three streets. Then followed such a scene of misery as is not to be expressed. Wounded men, old women and children, who had hid ^c It would seem that Polybius might well enough have omitted this circumstance of his hero's smiling at Asdrubal's confidence in the Gods; when the hero himself was engaged in an enterprize as impious as ever General was charged with, and in breach of public faith and the law of nations. If the Historian had put something plausible into the mouth of Scipio, in answer to that part of Asdrubal's discourse which accused the Romans of injustice and perfidy, it would have been more pertinent. And as to Asdrubal's cruelty (supposing the story to be true) Scipio, as we shall see hereafter, acted in Spain a cruelty towards 400 young men, his prisoners, which was much less excusable, the difference of circumstances considered.

Many things are said by Polybius and Appian to make Asdrubal appear both odious and ridiculous: But their character of him does not very well suit with this part of his conduct, where he refuses no submissions, provided the city may be spared, and, without that condition, will listen to no preliminaries, how advantageous soever to himself and his particular friends. And if he were really such a monster as he is represented, and had so cruelly butchered the Roman prisoners, it seems not much for the honour of Scipio, that, through fear of a successor, he should consent to spare that monster and his favourites, and them only, of all the miserable multitude of Carthaginians.

^d They might have cleared the houses of the enemy by setting fire to them, but perhaps they were willing to plunder them first.

them.

themselves in holes and secret corners of the houses came tumbling, from the upper stories, upon the pavement below, whither they threw themselves to avoid the flames. The air rang with their shrieks and lamentations. The bodies of these miserable wretches, the living as well as the dead, were with hooks dragged away together, into ditches and pits, that they might not choak up the streets, by which the Romans were to pass and repass. In this bloody toil, and in removing the rubbish of the houses so as to form an area, where the army might be drawn up, were spent six days and six nights; the soldiers, employed in the work, being relieved from time to time by fresh men. Scipio was the only person who took no sleep, nor hardly any refreshment. Fatigued at length with moving from place to place to give orders, he sat down on a high ground, whence he might see the tragedy to its conclusion. Once, it seems, the tears came into his eyes, and he repeated two lines of Homer^c, where Hector foretells the destruction of Troy. Carthage, that once mighty city, in flames, brought to his mind, not only the fall of Troy, but of those wide extended empires of the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians; and, from the instability of human things, he feared that Rome would one day undergo a fate like to that which now overwhelmed Carthage. It was thus that he explained himself to Polybius, who was then near him. On the seventh day, and before the rubbish was quite removed, some persons from the citadel in the garb of suppliants, appeared before the Roman General, offering, on the part of the besieged, to surrender themselves, if he would but spare their lives. He granted their petition; only the Roman deserters were excepted. Hereupon there came forth^f 50,000 persons, whom Scipio immediately sent away under a good guard, and afterwards sold for slaves. The deserters, to the number of 900, despairing of mercy, retired with Asdrubal into the temple of Æsculapius; which standing on a rock, they might have defended it for a considerable time, if they had not been pressed by famine. The Carthaginian General came away privately, and bearing an olive branch, surrendered himself to the Pro-Consul. Scipio having made Asdrubal sit down at his feet, shewed him to the deserters, who, when they had reviled and cursed him, [nobody knows why] set fire^g to the edifice; chusing rather to perish that way than to meet the vengeance of the Conqueror.

Carthage

^c Ἔσσειται ἡμᾶς ὅταν περὶ ὀλώλην Ἰλίου ἴσῃ, καὶ Πριάμῳ, καὶ λαῷ ἰὺ μέλινῳ Πριάμειο.

Yet come it will, the day decreed by fates;
(How my heart trembles while my tongue relates!)

The day when thou, Imperial Troy, must bend,

And see thy warriors fall, thy glories end.

Iliad, Book 6. l. 570.

^f According to Orosius (B. 4. c. 23.) there came out first, in a body, 25,000 miserably looking women, and then 30,000 worse looking men.

^g While the fire was kindling, the wife of Asdrubal, having decked herself in the best manner she could, is said to have appeared, with her two children, on the top of the temple; whence calling out to Scipio, she begged him to punish her husband,

Y. B. 600.
L. 31.
C. 1. 1.

Carthage thus taken, Scipio gave the plunder to the soldiers, excepting the gold, the silver, and the offerings found in the temples. After this, and when he had distributed the rewards of valour among his men, he sent advice to the Senate that he had finished the war in Africa, desiring further instructions. The Fathers named ten Commissioners with a commission with Scipio, were to regulate every thing relating to the conquered country. They brought orders to him to demolish what yet remained of Carthage; and they decreed that nobody for the future should dwell there, adding dire imprecations on whoever should disobey; and especially on those who should rebuild Byrsa or *Megara*¹. They further decreed, that all the towns which had taken part with the enemy, should be razed, and their territories given to the allies of Rome: that Utica in particular should have all the lands as far as Carthage on the one side, and Hippo on the other: And that the whole country, which had been under the domination of the African Republic, should be reduced to the form of a Prætorian province. After Scipio had seen these regulations executed; and to the honour of the Gods, had celebrated games, wherein his soldiers were amused with seeing all the deserters that had fallen into his hands, torn in pieces by wild beasts, he returned to Rome, had a splendid triumph, and took the surname of Africanus.

L. 31.
C. 1. 1.

“THE elder Scipio, says *Velleius Paterculus*¹, had opened a way to the power of the Romans, the younger opened a way to their luxury. For, when the fear of Carthage, that rival of Rome for empire, was totally removed, the Romans did not gradually depart from virtue, but ran precipitately into vice.”

P. 1. 1. 1.
C. 1. 1.
L. 31. 1.

Polybius gives an earlier date to this precipitate hurrying of the Romans into luxury and debauchery; the conquest of Macedon. And Cato makes use of the corruption of Roman manners as his argument for the expe-band, according to his desert, that traitor to his God, his country, and his family. Then directing her speech to Matala, “Thou wicked pernicious wretch, the most cowardly of men: This fire will quickly consume me and my children: But thou, ruler of mighty Carthage, what a triumph shalt thou adorn! And what punishment wilt thou not suffer from him at whose feet thou art now sitting!” This said, she cut the throats of her children, threw them into the flames, and herself after them. App. in P. 1. 1. 1.

This story seems to carry an internal proof of its being a fable, the charge of treachery on Matala being manifestly absurd; unless, by treachery, he meant his not killing himself when he could no longer make any defence.

¹ Notwithstanding these imprecations we shall find, that about 24 years after, C. Gracchus undertook to raise a town upon the ruins of Carthage. The work indeed was not perfected. But the emperor Augustus, or, according to some, Julius Cæsar, built a City near the place where Carthage had stood.

¹ Potentia Romanorum prior Scipio viam aperuerat, luxuria posterior aperuit. Quippe remoto Carthaginis metu, sublataque imperii amula, non gradu, sed præcipiti cursu à virtute defectum, ad vitia transiit. Vell. Pat. c. 1. 1.

diency

diency of destroying Carthage. Nay, before the war against Antiochus the Great, Cato speaks of covetousness and luxury * as reigning vices at Rome. But, whatever was the true date of the introduction of luxury among the Romans, certain it is, that, from the time of the elder Scipio's conquest, they ran precipitately into shameful dishonesty, perfidiousness and cruelty: I speak of their Senate, their Generals and their Embassadors.

Y. R. 607.
Bef. Chr.
145.
306 Conf.

* See p. 328.

If the reader recalls to mind their faithless treatment of King Philip, the Boeotians, and the Spartan Nabis; Flaminius's errand to Prusias; the knavery and hypocrisy of Marcus in his transactions with Perses; the perfidy and cruelty of Æmilius Paullus; the tyranny exercised over the Acheans and other Greeks, by the Senate, after pretending to set Greece at liberty; their cruel usage of the Rhodians, for only desiring to mediate a peace between Rome and Macedon; their anger against Attalus, because he would not ask of them a part of his brother's dominions; the series of their injustices to the African Republic, on occasion of her disputes with Masiniſſa; and lastly, their fraudulent methods the more easily to effect that iniquitous and inhuman resolution of utterly destroying Carthage: If the reader, I say, recalls to mind these facts, he will think, that what (Livy tells us) was the ^k sentiment of the oldest Senators concerning the artifices of Marcus, would have been equally just with regard to the public proceedings in general^l; and that in the whole conduct of the Romans, from their victory at Zama to the end of the third Punic war, there was scarce any thing worthy of ancient Rome.

^k Veteres & moris antiqui memores [Senatores] negabant se in ea Legatione [Marcii] Romanas agnoscere artes. Liv. L. 42. c. 47.

^l The reader will presently see, that the Romans had, for some time past, behaved themselves as infamously in Spain, as in Greece and Africa.

THE Roman History.

SIXTH BOOK.

From the End of the THIRD PUNIC WAR, in the Year of Rome 607, when Carthage was destroyed, and the ROMAN POWER became irresistible, to the Death of the Younger GRACCHUS, in 632, the true Date of the Destruction of ROMAN LIBERTY.

CHAP. I.

*The imprudent behaviour of the Achæans.
The destruction of Corinth.
Greece is made a Roman province.*

Y. R. 607.
Esf. Chr.
145.
306 C. ant.

THE ROMANS, in the pursuits of their boundless ambition, made no distinction between ancient friends and ancient enemies, states from which they had received the most important services, and those by which they had suffered the most terrible losses and calamities. In that very year when they totally destroyed the city and republic of Carthage, they, with the like deliberate cruelty, subverted the commonwealth of Achaia, and delivered up Corinth, its capital, a prey to the flames.

Pausan. A-chaic. c.
22. & seq.

What gave occasion to this final overthrow of the liberties of Greece, was a new quarrel between the Lacedemonians and the rest of the Achaean confederacy about rights and privileges. Both parties made application to the Senate of Rome, who, having heard the pretensions of both, commissioned Aurelius Orestes, with some other Senators, to go into Peloponnesus, and there terminate the dispute by a peremptory sentence. The *Achaean*s, nevertheless, impatient of all delay in humbling their adversaries, had immediate recourse to arms; and, regardless of the admonitions of Metellus, Pro-consul in Macedon, who pressed them earnestly to forbear war, and to wait the coming of the Roman commissioners, began hostilities against the Lacedemonians, and vanquished them in battle. Damocritus was at that time Prætor of Achaia and General of the forces. His successor Diceus, paying more deference to the repeated remonstrances of the Pro-consul, granted the Lacedemonians a truce; and during this truce the commissioners from the Senate arrived at Corinth. Having there convened the Diet of Achaia, they declared, That it was the will of the Senate and people of Rome, that Lacedæmon, Corinth, Argos, Heracleum near mount Oeta, and Orchomenus in Arcadia, not having been anciently of the Achaean body, should now be dismembered from it, and become independent. Polybius says^a, that the Romans did not intend actually to dismember the Achaean State; that their design was only to alarm the *Achaean*s, and curb the high spirit that then appeared among them. Be that as it will, the multitude were so provoked, that they not only assaulted all the Lacedaemonians they met with in the streets, but tore out of the houses of the ambassadors those who had taken refuge there. Orestes and his colleagues, at their return to Rome, reported, in the strongest terms, the insult they had suffered. Nevertheless the Fathers thought it advisable to try another embassy before they came to extremities with the *Achaean*s. Sextus Julius, a man of prudence and temper, was ordered, with two more, into Peloponnesus. They repaired to Aegium, where the Diet of Achaia assembled. Julius spoke with great moderation, and palliated the insult upon the Roman ambassadors more than the *Achaean*s themselves would have done; that they might see it was easy to satisfy the Senate, if, for the future, nothing injurious were offered to the Romans or the Lacedaemonians. The sober part of the assembly heard Julius's discourse with pleasure; but the multitude being under the influence of Dicaeus and Critolaus, the latter of whom was now Prætor, imagined that this courtesy and condescension of the ambassadors proceeded from their fears; the Roman arms not having prospered of late, in Africa, nor in Spain. However, the *Achaean*s answered, that they would send deputies to the Senate to apologize for what had happened to the Roman Commissioners; and proposed, that a congress should be held at Tegea, where the disputes between them and the Lacedaemonians might be accommodated in an amicable manner. To that town the Romans repaired, accompanied by deputies from Lacedæmon. But, on the part of the *Achaean*s, only Critolaus came. He had contrived that the rest of those who had been summoned, should not appear; and now, in the conference, he pretended, that he could conclude nothing without the consent of his nation, but promised to report, what passed, to the next general Diet. This was not to be held till six months after. Julius seeing through the artifice of the Prætor, and highly offended with his arrogance and disingenuous conduct, dismissed the Lacedaemonians, and returned to Rome.

Y. R. 607.
Bef. Chr.
145.
306 Conf.

Polyb. Legat. 143.

Legat. 144.

^a May it not be reasonably questioned, whether what Polybius writes of these times deserves an equal credit with the other parts of his history. He was an intimate friend and companion of Scipio Æmilianus, and caressed, honoured, distinguished from all his countrymen, by Mummius, the destroyer of Corinth, and by the ten Commissioners, who, with that General, were appointed to settle Achaia in the form of a Roman province. With this historian therefore Mummius was a person of great humanity, notwithstanding his proceedings at Corinth: And so Æmilius Paullus, and his son Scipio were both gentle and tender-hearted, in spite of all the proofs they give by their actions, of a contrary temper.

After

V. R. Sc.
B. C. 145.
96 Cons.

After his departure, Critolaus, during the whole winter, went about from city to city, convening the people, under colour of imparting to them what had passed in the conference at Texea, but, in reality, to excite in them a hatred to the Romans. To conciliate to himself the affections of the populace, he engaged the Magistrates to suspend all prosecutions for debt, till the war with the Lacedæmonians should be terminated. By this means the unthinking multitude were drawn away to be entirely at his devotion.

Metellus was still in Macedon, at the head of the army, with which he had vanquished the two impostors, Andriscus and Alexander. Receiving advice of the commotions in Peloponnesus, he dispatched thither four Romans, men of distinction, to endeavour a pacification. They arrived at Corinth when the Diet was actually assembled there. After the example of Julius, they spoke with temper and moderation, earnestly exhorting the Acheans not to suffer their quarrels with the Lacedæmonians to alienate their minds from the Romans. The Acheans, says Polybius, were at this time out of their senses, and especially the Corinthians. The latter treated the Roman deputies with derision; and with clamor and tumult drove them out of the assembly. Critolaus took advantage of the present disposition of the multitude to declaim against those of the magistrates who did not enter into his views; and he used great freedoms in speaking of the Romans; "whom he was content to have for allies, but would never own for Lords of Achaia. If you are men, said he to the people, you will never want friends and allies; if you are but half men, you will never want masters." And he insinuated to them, "that his present measures had not been undertaken rashly, but in concert with Kings and Republics." By such discourses he engaged the assembly to decree a renewal of the war against the Lacedæmonians; a war, says Polybius, indirectly declared against Rome.

Polib. in Achaic.
C. 14.

Liv. Epit.
B. 52.

Polib. in Achaic.
C. 15.

If Critolaus and the Acheans were mad, they found other States as mad as themselves. The Thebans, in resentment for some fines imposed upon them by Metellus; and the Chalcidians, from what passion is not known, lost their reason so far as to imagine that they, in conjunction with the Acheans, should be able to withstand the Roman power.

Metellus, hearing that L. Mummius the Consul was coming from Italy with an army against the Acheans, and being ambitious of quieting them himself, sent a new deputation to them, with a promise that the Roman people should pardon their past faults, if they would consent to the dismembering, from their body, Lacedæmon and the other cities before-mentioned. To add weight to his message, he advanced with his forces by the way of Theffaly. The Acheans not listening to his overture, he continued his march, and came up with their army near Scarpæa in Locris, where where he routed it with great slaughter, and made a thousand prisoners. What became of Critolans is uncertain; some say he poisoned himself, others that he was drowned in a marsh. Diens took the command, inlisted the slaves (whom he set free) and drained Acbaia and Ar-cadia of their men to recruit his army. Metellus marched to Thebes in Baotia, and found it almost deserted. He forbade his soldiers to rifle the temples or the houses, or to do violence to any of the inhabitants, whom they should find either in the city or the fields. Only Pitbyas, the chief Magistrate, and author of the defection, being taken, was put to death. From Thebes Metellus proceeded to Corinth, where Diens had shut himself up. The Roman, still earnestly desirous to finish the war before Mummius could arrive, employed three of the principal men of the Acbean State, to persuade their countrymen to an acceptance of the peace offered them. The inhabitants of Corinth would have complied; but Diens and his faction were the masters; and these cast the deputies into prison. Yet, for the bribe of a talent, they were soon after released by Diens himself.

When Metellus had fought, says Florus, Mummius came to the victory. On his arrival at the isthmus he sent Metellus and his army back into Macedon. The besieged soon after made a sally upon an advanced guard of the Consul's troops, killed many of them, and pursued the rest to their camp. Diens, flushed with this success, came out of the town, and offered the Consul battle. It was fought just at the entrance of the isthmus. The Acbean horse were broken at the first onset and ran away; their foot, though much inferior in number to the enemy, behaved themselves resolutely, till being attacked in flank by a body of chosen troops, they were thrown into confusion, and could no longer make resistance. Had Diens retired into Corinth, a place of great strength, he might probably have obtained some tolerable conditions from Mummius, who would be in haste to finish the war: but the Acbean, instead of turning his thoughts to the preservation of the town, or its inhabitants, fled straight to Megalopolis, his native city, where he set fire to his house, killed his wife (that she might not fall into the enemies hands) and put an end to his own life by poison.

The Consul, when the next day he advanced to Corinth, found the gates open. All who had fled thither from the battle, and most of the citizens, had quitted the place in the night. Of those who had staid there, he put the men to the sword, and sold the women and children; and having plundered the city of its statues, paintings and most valuable effects, he set fire to it^b, and reduced the whole to ashes. The walls were afterwards demolished, and the lands of the Corinthians given to

^b Florus and others pretend that the famous Corinthian brass was formed at this conflagration, by the mixture of gold, silver and copper, which being melted ran together into one mass.

Y. R. 607.
Ref. Chr.
145.
306 Conf.

B. 2. c. 16.
Pausan. in Achaic.
c. 16.

Y. R. 607.
Ref. Chr.
145.
306 Conf.

Liv. Epit.
L. 32.
De Offic.
L. 1.
Liv. Epit.
L. 32.
Pausan.
loc. cit.

Plin. Hist. Nat.
Philopem.
lib. 2.

Plin. Hist. Nat.
lib. 2.
V. 1. & 2.

the Sicyonians; such was the decree of the Senate. The pretence for this severity was the insult offered to the Roman ambassadors: the true reasons, according to Cicero, the strength and situation of the place, which might one day encourage the *Achaean*s to rebel. Mummius afterwards got into his power those of the Corinthians who had fled out of the city, and sold them all for slaves.

Thebes (which Metellus had spared) and Chalcis, were both razed to the ground by the Consul, who also disarmed the inhabitants and demolished the walls of the other towns, that had taken part with the *Achaean*s in this war. All this he performed before the arrival of ten Commissioners, whom the Senate had appointed to settle, in concert with him, the affairs of Achaia. These Commissioners abolished, in all the cities of Greece, the popular government, and placed over them Magistrates chosen from among the richest of the citizens. They likewise suppressed all national assemblies; but these were restored, not many years after. Greece became now a Roman Province, under the name of the Province of Achaia, whither Rome sent a Prætor annually to govern it.

Polybius the historian came at this time into Peloponnesus, opportunely to defend the memory of his Father's friend, Philopemen. Some base foolish fellow, to make his court to Mummius and the ten Commissioners, had moved to have all the honours, formerly done to Philopemen, in the several cities of Greece, abolished. He accused the deceased of having shewed himself, in all his actions, an enemy to the Romans. Polybius, on the other hand, represented, that Philopemen, though he had indeed sometimes opposed the measures of the Romans, had proceeded only in the way of remonstrance and dissuasion: That when the war was breaking out between them and Antiochus, and before the Roman armies came into Greece, he had advised and engaged his countrymen to declare against the Syrians and his allies the Ætolians. In a word, Polybius made so good a defence, that Mummius and the Commissioners would not suffer the honours of Philopemen to be in any degree abrogated. Polybius further requested and obtained, that some statues of Achæus, Aratus, and Philopemen, already carried out of Peloponnesus in Acarnania, might be brought back: by which he so greatly pleased and obliged his countrymen, that on this account they erected a marble statue to him; and the Commissioners, as a mark of their esteem, offered him whatever he should choose of the effects of Darius, before they were exposed to sale. The Greek not only declined the offer, but exhorted all his friends to follow his example.

The Commissioners being sensible of the abilities and noble spirit of the man, gave him in charge, at their departure for Italy, to make a progress through the several cities of Greece, judge controversies

* It is thought that Macedon, in this year, took the form of a Prætorian province.
Ref. Fest.

among

among the inhabitants, and make them acquainted with the new constitution and laws. He happily executed this commission, put an end to all private contests among his countrymen, and brought them to acquiesce in the established form of government. In gratitude for these services they, in many places, erected statues to him, on the base of one of which was an inscription to this effect. That Greece would not have erred, if, from the beginning, she had followed the Counsels of Polybius; and when, through error, she came to need assistance, she found it in him.

Polybius (as quoted by *Strabo) tells us that he saw some Roman soldiers playing at dice upon a picture of Bacchus, by Aristides; a picture esteemed one of the finest in the world. King Attalus afterwards bought it at the price of 600,000 + sesterces, at the sale of the plunder of Corinth; which when Mummius understood, he was beyond measure astonished, and concluded that the picture had some magical virtue. He would not therefore let the King have it, but carried it to Rome, and placed it in the temple of Ceres. If we may believe Velleius Paterculus, Mummius was so little of a virtuoso, that he covenanted with the masters of the ships, whom he hired to convey from Corinth to Italy a great number of exquisite pieces of painting and statuary, that, if they lost any of them, they should furnish others in their stead.

The conqueror raised no fortune to himself out of the spoils of the country he had conquered. At his death, he did not leave enough to portion his daughter. The Senate gave her a portion. After his triumph, the chief ornaments of which were the pictures and statues he had brought from Corinth, he employed them to embellish Rome and the neighbouring cities. Yet, that he made use of none of them to adorn his own house, as one historian says, and Cicero seems to say, cannot well be reconciled with what Strabo tells us of Mummius's being cheated of some of them by Lucullus. This man, being about to dedicate a temple of his own building, borrowed a certain number of the pictures to hang up in it during the ceremony, promising to return them as soon as it should be over. After the dedication, he told Mummius that he might fetch away his pictures if he pleased; intimating probably, at the same time, that he would be guilty of sacrilege if he did. He bore the loss with patience; for which he was much applauded.

Mummius took the surname of Asiaticus; as Metellus, who, about this time, triumphed for his conquest in Macedon, took that of Macedonicus. In the triumph of the latter was led in chains the impostor Andrius.

Y. R. 607.
Bef. Chr.
145.
306 Conf.

Pausan. in Arcad. c.
37.

* B. 8. p.
381.

Plin. B.
35. c. 4.
† 48431.
152. Arbuthnot.

L. 2.

Cic. de Offic. L. 2.
c. 22.
Plin. B. 34.
c. 7.
Frontin.
Strateg. B.
4. c. 3. §.
15.
Auct. de
Vir.
Illustr. in Mum.
Strabo. B. 8.
p. 381.

C H A P. II.

A summary of what passed in Spain from the year 558 to the beginning of the Celtiberian war in the year 600.

A peace concluded with the Celtiberians.

The infamous conduct of some Roman Generals in Spain.

The commencement of the Viriatic war.

SPAIN was now the chief object of the Senate's attention. Nothing has been said of the transactions in that country, since the settling of tranquillity there, by Cato, in the year 558.

The year following, Scipio Nasica began to extend the Roman conquests in FURTHER SPAIN. He took about fifty towns, or rather castles. Next year the Lusitanians^a fell upon that Province, and pillaged it; but, in their return, Nasica stript them of their booty, near Ilipa, on the north of the Bætis. His successor, M. Fulvius Nobilior, defeated in battle the Vaccæi^b, Vettones and Celtiberians, at Toletum, on the north of the Tagus. The following campaign (year of Rome 561) Fulvius took several towns, and last of all Toletum. His successor L. Emilius Paulus, who afterwards conquered Perseus, conducted the war in Spain for three years with various success. The Romans seem to have extended their conquests but little farther, in this Province, till the year 573, when L. Postumius Albinus subdued the Lusitanians and Vaccæi, and triumphed over them. Yet these nations were far from being totally reduced, as we shall find hereafter.

IN THE HITHER PROVINCE, C. Flaminius Nepos, the Prætor for the year 560, took Lucia, a city of the Oretani, near neighbours to the Celtibe-

^a By the conquests of Scipio Africanus in Spain, during the second Punic war, the Romans became masters of almost all the country between the Pœnus, and the Iberus, and perhaps of a small territory beyond that river. This, for a considerable time, made the Hither Province. In the same war, they became possessed of the sea coast from the mouth of the Ilerus to Gades; but seem to have gone only a little way up into the country; for all the towns which Scipio reduced in those parts lay not far from the sea. This long tract got the name of the Further Province.

For several years after the Romans made no new acquisitions in Spain. All their battles there were fought against the nations already conquered, but often rebelling. To reduce these rebels were employed Lentulus and Acidivus, Sempronius Tuditanus and M. Helvius, Q. Minucius Thermus and Cato. Hist. p. 260. 323. 331.

^b The boundaries of Lusitania are mentioned, in p. 156. Note.

^c The Vaccæi were situated on the north of the Durius; the Vettones, between that river and the Tagus. Strabo relates, that certain of the Vettones, (after this nation was subdued) seeing some Roman Centurions walking to and fro, for air and exercise, imagined, that they were mad, and, in kindness, offered to conduct them to their tents.

rians. The latter ^d made war against the Romans in the year 566; and in 568, with the assistance of the Lusitanians, routed the joint forces of Crispinus and Calpurnius (the Prætors of both Provinces) in Carpetania, not far from Hippo and Toletum. All these places were near the head of the Tagus; on the banks of which river, the same Prætors afterwards obtained a victory over the enemy, quieted the Provinces, and triumphed over the Celtiberians and Lusitanians.

The Celtiberians, in the year 572, rebelled once more, and were defeated by Q. Fulvius Flaccus the Pro-prætor of Hisber Spain, who then took Contrebia, at the head of the Tagus; and the greatest part of Celtiberia submitted. Nevertheless the Prætor Tib. Sempronius Gracchus was sent against them next year. After taking Munda by surprize, he sat down before Certima. The inhabitants of this place sent a deputation to him, to tell him, that had they forces sufficient, they would fight him; and to desire, he would permit them to go and ask assistance of their countrymen, incamped not far off; adding, that if they were refused assistance, they would then consider what was best for them to do. Their demand astonished Gracchus; yet he consented. The Spaniards went straight to the Celtiberian camp, and soon after, with ten deputies from thence, returned to the Romans. It was in the heat of the day. They began with asking the General to order them some drink. Drink was given them. They called for more, and more they had; the soldiers being greatly diverted with the simplicity of these Spaniards. When the deputies had quenched their thirst, the eldest of them thus addressed himself to the Prætor. We are sent by our nation to know what it is you depend upon, that you bring war into this country. I depend upon a good army, said Gracchus, which, if you please, you shall see; and instantly he ordered his troops to arm, and pass in review before the deputies ^e. This sight deterred them from assisting the people of Certima; and the town surrendered to the Prætor.

After this he marched against the Celtiberians that were in the field. These, though they had refused to fight for their neighbours, stood upon their own defence. Gracchus, by parties which he detached to skirmish with the enemy, drew them towards his camp; whence his Legions, ready for action, sallied out on a sudden, and entirely routed them. He then took Alce their capital; after which Ergavia

^d Celtiberia, according to Strabo (B. 3. p. 162.) was bounded on the north by the Berones; on the west by the Vaccæi, Pitænes, Carpetani, &c. on the south by the Oretani and the nations on the Sacro; and on the east by the mountains called Idubeda, which stretch along the south side of the Iberus from the Cantabri to the Mediterranean Sea. In this country rose the Durius, the Tagus and the Anas.

^e From all this it appears that the Romans had never been in this part of Celtiberia before.

and 103 other towns¹ surrendered to him in a few days. Before he left the Province he made a treaty with the Celtiberians. The substance of it will be presently mentioned.

From this time we find nothing of moment done in Spain till the Lusitanian war, of which that with Virgatus was a continuation. In the year 599 the Prætor of the Further Province, L. Calpurnius Piso, was defeated by the Lusitanians, whom Appian calls (αυτρονομοι) a people governed by their own laws. Next year *L. Mummius, who succeeded Calpurnius, was vanquished in battle by the Lusitanians: yet he afterwards fought prosperously against them in several engagements.

IN THE SAME Year (600 of Rome) began the Celtiberian, sometimes called the Numantine war. The occasion of it was this. The people of Segeda, a city of the Belli, a nation of Celtiberia, were going to enlarge their town, bring new inhabitants into it, and build a wall round it. To put a stop to this work, the Senate of Rome signified to the Segedenses that it was contrary to the treaty concluded with Gracchus; and ordered them at the same time to send auxiliary soldiers to the Roman armies in Spain, and pay the tribute stipulated by the above-mentioned treaty. They replied, that Gracchus had indeed forbid them to build new towns, but that no mention had been made of repairing or enlarging old towns, and that, as for the quota of soldiers and the tribute, the Senate had formerly remitted both. This was true: but Appian tells us, that the Romans always reserved to themselves a power of resuming such grants. It would seem that the Segedenses were like to be powerfully supported, or that the Romans were in great haste to make a conquest of this country; for they ordered that the Consuls elect should enter upon their office, not the 15th of March as usual, but the first of * January: and one of them, Q. Fulvius Nobilior, received directions to go immediately into the Hither Province. Upon his arrival there, the Segedenses, not having finished their wall, took refuge amongst the Asturi, a people of Celtiberia, whose capital was Numantia† at the head of the Durius.

Under the command of a General named Carus, a citizen of Segeda, an army was formed of 25,000 men, probably the united forces of the two nations. He laid an ambush for the Consul, fell upon him by surprise, slew six thousand of the Romans, and put the rest to flight. But pursuing the runaways too far, and in disorder, he was charged by the ¹ Polybius says, Gracchus took 300 towns. But Pasidanius blames the Greek historian for calling castles towns, in flattery to Gracchus. Strabo joins with Pasidanius, and finds fault with those authors who affirm that there are a 1000 towns in Spain; and he asserts that there are few towns, but many villages in that country. Strab. B. 3. p. 163.

† Plinius gives a different account of the cause of the Numantine war. "If (says he) we may speak the truth, there hardly ever was a war more unjust. The Numantines had received into their town the Segedenses, their relations and allies, who had escaped out of the hands of the Romans: No regard was had to the excuses and entreaties of the Numantines; and as the price of peace they were required to give up their arms." B. 2. c. 18.

*App. in
B. 6. p.
36.
• After-
v. 12. p.
1. 10. 11.*

*App. in
1. p.
879.*

• See p.
467.

*App. in
B. 6. p.
250.*

Roman horse that had been left to guard the baggage; and in this action he lost 6000 men with his own life. Night put an end to the conflict. The same night the Spaniards rendezvoused at Numantia, and created two new Generals, Ambo and Leuco. Fulvius came three days after, and encamped within three miles of the city. A second battle was fought, in which the Romans had the advantage in the beginning, by means of some elephants they had received from Masinissa (the Arvaci, according to Appian, having never seen any before ^b.) But the Consul bringing those elephants near the walls of Numantia^c, whither the enemy had fled, one of the beasts, wounded in the head by a great stone, turned in a rage upon the Roman troops; and the rest of the beasts following his example, the whole army was thrown into confusion. The Numantines took advantage of the accident, made a sally, and slew 4000 of their enemies. After this and some other disasters, Ocilis, a town where the Romans had their money and a magazine of provisions, revolted to the Celtiberians. Fulvius, quite discouraged, durst not separate his troops to put them into winter quarters. He kept them encamped in the field all the winter; which proved so severe, that many of his soldiers died of distempers caused by the extremity of the cold; and the army suffered much for want of provisions.

The Consul M. Claudius Marcellus, in the year of Rome 601, succeeded Fulvius in Hisber Spain, and brought with him 8000 foot, and 500 horse. He laid siege to Ocilis, the inhabitants of which obtained pardon on paying thirty talents, and giving hostages. The fame of the Consul's clemency engaged the Arvaci to sue for peace. They offered to submit to a moderate penalty, on condition the treaty they had made with Gracchus might be renewed. Marcellus, desirous of the honour of finishing the war, gave them leave to solicit the Senate upon the affair. At the same time some petty nations of Spain, enemies to the Arvaci, and in confederacy with Rome, sent deputies thither to oppose their demands. The allies were first heard. These pretended to be in fear of the Arvaci, prayed "that Rome would either keep a standing army " in Spain to protect her friends, or, that before she recalled her legions,
" the Arvaci might be so severely punished as to be deterred from all " future rebellion: For that, if neither of these were done, the Spaniards, " in friendship with the Republic, would be treated by the rest as traitors " to their country."

Polyb. Lib.
vi. 1426

When the Arvaci were admitted to audience, they spoke like men of spirit, sensible of their inability to contend with Rome. In mentioning the battles fought, they insinuated that the advantage had been on their side:

^b Appian must only mean that this generation had not seen elephants, or else we must suppose that the Carthaginians had never brought their armies into this country, for they seem always to have made use of elephants.

^c Florus says Numantia had no walls.

Nevertheless.

Nevertheless they offered to submit to a fine, provided it were something fixed and ascertained, and provided they might hereafter be upon the same foot as by the treaty of Gracchus. The Fathers gave one and the same answer to the deputies from both parties, which was only this, That Marcellus should let them know the Senate's pleasure. To him they sent private orders to prosecute the war with a vigour becoming Romans: But, as the Fathers doubted of his courage from the inclination he had shewn to peace, one of their first cares was to provide him a successor. Licinius Lucullus, who had entered upon the Consulship for the year 602, received orders to prepare for an expedition into Hisber Spain. When the levies came to be raised for this service, it was found that none of the Roman youth would give in their names to be enrolled^a: Nay, nobody would accept of the office either of Tribune or Lieutenant. The fear which Marcellus had betrayed, and the reports, spread by Fulvius and his soldiers (who had passed the winter in tents) of the hardships and losses they had suffered in the Celtiberian war, and of the invincible courage of the enemy, were the causes of this backwardness. Polybius reports that in this critical conjuncture, when the Senate and Consuls were at a loss what measures to take, Scipio Æmilianus^b, who had not yet acquired any military renown, extricated them out of their perplexity. In an harangue to the multitude, he told them, that though he was invited into Macedon, to discharge there an employment, that would be less dangerous and more profitable to himself, he was ready, at the pleasure of the Senate, to go either as Lieutenant or Tribune into Spain; whither he thought the exigencies of the Republic called all those who had any ambition of true glory. The generous zeal for his country, which Scipio expressed both by words and example, had the effects proposed: For he got much applause, and the Republic many soldiers for the war in Spain. They came in crowds to be enrolled.

Ann. 603. In the mean time, Marcellus, having advice that Lucullus was coming to succeed him, and being determined to leave him nothing to do, negotiated and concluded a peace with the Aræci and other Celtiberians, they giving hostages and 600 talents. Lucullus at his arrival found all quiet in the province; but coveting both glory and money for he had very little of either, he, without any provocation, and without orders from the Senate, invaded the country of the Vaccæi, a people bordering upon the Aræci. Crossing the Tagus he laid siege to Peuca, one of their towns. The inhabitants, after some sallies and skirmishes, sent out the most venerable of their citizens to ask upon what conditions they might

^a According to Livy's Epitome (B. 47.) both the Consul and Tribune were sent to prison by the Tribunes of the people, for refusing to exempt from the service some of their friends.

^b Scipio Pæniculus reports, Scipio was about 17 at the battle of Pydna, which happened in 585, he must have been at this time about 33 years of age.

purchase

purchase his friendship. He answered; "by giving hostages, paying 100 talents, and sending their cavalry to serve in his army." To all this they consented. Lucullus then desired them to admit a garrison into the town. This also they agreed to, and received 2000 soldiers; who when they had possessed themselves of the walls, let in the rest of the army. Presently he gave the signal to put all the inhabitants to the sword, and plunder the town: Of 20,000 very few escaped, and these by making a shift to get over the walls. After this glorious and gainful exploit, he marched to Intercetia, where 20,000 foot and 2000 horse had assembled to defend it. Finding the place so well guarded, he would have made a treaty with the Intercetians; but they reproached him with his perfidy at Cauca, and would not trust him. He therefore besieged the town in form, and, after some time, made a breach in the wall. However, when he attempted to enter the place he was repulsed, and the Intercetians repaired the breach. Famine distressing both parties, they came to an accommodation. The besieged agreed to supply the Consul with 6000 coats for his soldiers, and some cattle, and to give 50 hostages. As for gold and silver (the thirst after which had been the cause of this war) he could have none: This people were poor, and, if we may believe Appian, gold and silver were not in esteem among them. But now the question was, What security the besieged should have for the performance of covenants on Lucullus's part: And it seems, that though they would not take his word, they confided in Scipio's, who promised that they should not be treated with fraud or treachery. How Scipio came to have so much credit with them does not appear; for we find nothing recorded of him, for which he could be distinguished by them, but that he had killed one of the stoutest of their countrymen in single combat.

From Intercetia Lucullus marched to Palantia, a town famous for the bravery of its inhabitants, and whither many people from the neighbouring countries had retired. Some of his officers therefore advised the Consul to pass by this place; but he, having been told that it was rich, would needs try what could be done. The Palantines quickly drove him from before their town, and pursued him in his retreat as far as to the river Durius: Whence, without much glory, (whatever money he may have got) he stole away into Turdetania, and there wintered.

IN FURTHER SPAIN the Prætor M. Atilius Serranus had succeeded Mummius, who went to Rome to demand a triumph. Atilius made a successful expedition in Lusitania; but, upon his going into winter quarters, there was almost a general insurrection of the several nations of that country. They attacked some cities in alliance with Rome. The Prætor Ser. Sulpicius Galba, who in 602 succeeded Atilius, hastened to the relief of the Roman allies ; but was entirely routed by the enemy, and lost 7000 men. Having fled with the horse to a city called Carmelis, he there gathered about him what remained of his broken forces, and, when he had raised 20,000 men among the allies, bravely marched into winter quarters.

App. in
Iber. p.
237.

In the mean time the Lusitanians invaded that part of the Roman province which lay between them and Turdetania, where Lucullus wintered. Hearing that they were in the neighbourhood, he sent out against them his best troops, which falling upon them by surprize, slew 4000. And when the enemy made a second irruption, he cut off 1500 of them, near Gades, and took many prisoners: After which he entered Lusitania and ravaged it. Galba, encouraged by the success of Lucullus, now came forth again, and plundered the country on his side. The Lusitanians of that quarter sent to him, offering to submit, upon conditions. He received their deputies kindly, and said, “ he knew, that poverty and the barrenness of their country had “ compelled them to have recourse to rapine for a subsistence ; that he “ pitied their condition ; and that if they would keep in friendship with “ Rome, he would assign them a better country than their own : but “ then he must divide them into cantons, because he had not lands, ly“ ing together, sufficient for all.” The Lusitanians, believing what he said, came to him, in great numbers, on a day he had appointed. He divided them into three companies, ordering each to repair to a different place, and there wait his further directions. When these companies were got to such a distance from each other as was sufficient for his purpose, he led his troops to the nearest, and having prevailed with the Spaniards to give up their arms (for which he told them they had no further use, he let loose upon them his soldiers, who put them to the sword. In like manner he massacred the second and third companies, before they could have notice of what had happened to their fellows. The number of the slain some authors make to be 30,000, others only 9000. A few escaped ; among whom was Viriatius, who became, soon after, general of the Lusitanians. Galba, surpassing Lucullus in avarice, gave but little of the booty, acquired in his expedition, to the soldiers or his friends ; the rest he converted to his own use. Though he were one of the richest men in Rome, yet he never scrupled to lie or to perjure himself, if any thing was to be got by it. And, what rendered him a compleat pest to society, he was, with all these vices, a great orator : Insomuch, that though prosecuted at Rome for the massacre above related, and though Cato was his accuser, yet by his eloquence he obtained absolution by almost all the suffrages of the people.

Liv. Epit.
B. 49.

App. in
Iber. p. 259.

In the year 604 (when the third Punic war began) the Prætor C. Vetilius came from Rome into Spain, with a new army, and took the place place of Galba. The Lusitanians had assembled about 10,000 men, and were ravaging Turdetania. Vetilius fell upon them when dispersed about the country, slew many, and drove the rest into a place whence they could not easily retreat, and where if they staid they must perish with hunger. In this distress they sent deputies to Vetilius, offering to become faithful subjects to Rome, if he would only grant them lands, where they might settle, and which would be sufficient to subsist them. The Prætor readily consented; and a treaty was upon the point of being concluded, when Virgatus admonished his countrymen to put no trust in Roman faith. “Remember (said he) the perfidiousness of Lucullus and Galba. If you will but follow my directions, I engage to bring you safe out of this place.” Hope reviving in their breasts, they instantly chose him General. Virgatus drew up his troops as if he meant to give battle. Then, having selected a thousand of his best horse to remain with him, he commanded the rest of his forces upon a signal given to disperse themselves, and, by different ways, fly to the city of Tribola, and there wait for him. Every thing being ready for the execution of his stratagem, he mounted his horse, for that was to be the signal, and the soldiers all at once broke their ranks and fled. Vetilius, surprized and disconcerted, and not daring to order his men to the pursuit, lest Virgatus should fall upon them in the rear, bent all his forces against him, who seemed to offer battle. The Lusitanian, by keeping his cavalry in continual motion, one while retreating, and then making a feint as if he would fight, eluded all the efforts of the enemy. When he judged that his men were got safe to the place of rendezvous, he followed them in the night, by ways unknown to the Romans. The success of this stratagem acquired him great reputation, and not only established his authority, but augmented his strength; numbers flocking from all quarters to serve under his command.

According to Livy, Virgatus from a shepherd became a hunter, and from a hunter a robber, living by his sword, a method of life which enured him to dangers and fatigues. But when he is said to have been a robber, perhaps nothing more ought to be understood by it, than that he helped to rob the Romans of what they had got by rapine in his country: Or perhaps that he and his companions made war after the manner of robbers, falling upon their enemies by surprize, and disappearing immediately after the action. For Appian calls a regular army of 10,000 Lusitanians, 10,000 robbers: But with such robbers we shall find that the Senate and people of Rome did not disdain to conclude a treaty of friendship and alliance.

Vetilius having advice, that the enemy were rendezvoused at Tribola, resolved to march thither. The Lusitanian had laid an ambush in the way; so that the Romans found themselves on a sudden attacked in front

Liv. Epit.
B. 57.

App. in
lib. 1.
290.

and rear. Of 10,000 men scarce 6000 escaped to Carpessus; the rest were slain or taken prisoners. Vetilius himself fell alive into the enemies hands; but the Spaniard who took him, seeing him old and unwieldy, and thinking he would not sell for much, slew him. The Quæstor, now General of the Roman army, keeping his own troops within the walls of Carpessus, sent into the field 5000 men of his Spanish allies. Virriatus cut them all off, not a man escaping: After which the Quæstor not daring to stir abroad, continued quiet in the town, and waited for assistance from Rome.

C. Plautius Hypsæus succeeded Vetilius (in the year 605.) He brought with him 10,000 foot and 1300 horse. On the arrival of this new army, Virriatus, who was pillaging the country about Carpessus, pretended fear; and made a feigned flight. Plautius detached 4000 men to pursue him. The Spaniard, suddenly facing about, fell upon them, and put the greater part to the sword. Eager to repair his honour, the Prætor followed Virriatus over the Tagus, and fought a pitched battle with him, but was so entirely routed, and with such destruction of his men, that, not daring longer to keep the field, he went, says Appian, into winter quarters in the middle of summer.

The Lusitanian had the like success the two following years (606 and 607) against the Prætor C. Unimarus and his successor Nigidius Figulus.

FIG. B. 2.
C. 1. 1.
A. 1. 1.
V. 1. 1.
L. 1. 1.

Plautius, at his return to Rome, being accused of having suffered these losses through his ill conduct, was banished by a decree of the people. Dis. Sic. Excerpt. L. 25. c. 1. & 2.

According to one author, the victories of Virriatus had so intimidated the Romans, that a thousand of them were vanquished by three hundred Lusitanians. It is added, that, after this victory, a foot soldier, who had pursued the enemy too far, was encompassed by a body of their cavalry; that with his lance he killed the horse of one of the Romans, and with a stroke of his sword cut off the rider's head. After which he walked away at his leisure, and with an air of contempt; the Romans remaining in astonishment, and not daring to approach him. Cl. d. c. 1. Orig. B. 5. c. 4

C H A P. III.

Events of the war in Lusitania.

A new regulation at Rome concerning the PRÆTORS.

War renewed against the Celtiberians.

Appius Claudius triumphs at his own expence.

Scipio and Mummius chosen Censors.

Metellus Macedonicus conducts the war in Celtiberia with success.

The Roman army defeated by Viriatus.

A new impostor quelled in Macedon.

THE LUSITANIAN war being grown a very serious affair, and the Republic, by the destruction of Carthage and Corinth, being now at leisure effectually to provide for the support of her authority in Spain, she resolved to send thither a new army, under the command of a Consul.

Q. Fabius Æmilianus (brother of the younger Scipio) was, with L. Hostilius Mancinus, raised to the Consulship for the year 608. Mancinus had, two years since, in quality of Prætor, commanded the Roman fleet before Carthage; and, after his return home, having made a plan of the city and its fortifications, had explained to the multitude the operations of the siege, as carried on by Scipio: A condescension so agreeable to them, that for this merit chiefly they now honoured him with the Consular fasces^a.

Fabius, either by lot or by special appointment, had Further Spain for his province. He landed in Bætica (the present Andalusia) with 15,000 foot and 2000 horse. As his troops consisted wholly of raw men (it being thought reasonable that the soldiers who had served in Africa and Greece should have repose) he would not hazard a battle, till by exercise and discipline he had prepared them for it. Leaving this care for a while to his Lieutenant, he went by sea to Gades, there to perform his devotions to Hercules, from whom the Fabian family pretended to derive their lineage. At his return he found, that his army had been

^a At the election of Ædiles for this year, there happened an event which shews how much it imported the greatest men of Rome not to offend the meanest. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica (son of a President of the Senate, and grandson of the famous Nasica, who, for his eminent probity, had been judged the most worthy of all the Romans to receive the statue of the Goddess Cybele) was one of the candidates. Nasica, to pay the usual civility to one of the citizens, took him by the hand; and finding it extremely hard, and callous, pleasantly asked him whether he used to walk upon his hands: A jest which so much offended the rustic tribes, that they refused the candidate their votes. Val. Max. B. 7. c. 5. §. 2.

Y. R. 603;
Bef. Chr. .
144.
307 Conf.

Plin. B.
35. c. 4.

App. in
Iber. p. 2918.

vanquished by the enemy. Nor was he at all disposed to attempt revenge, by a general battle; to which Viriatius frequently challenged him. The Roman, nevertheless, from time to time detached small parties to skirmish, that his soldiers might thereby become acquainted with the enemy, and gradually lose all dread of them.

T. R. 442.
B. 6. C. 1.
143.
3:3 C. 1.

THE CHOICE made, at Rome, of supreme magistrates, for the new year, seems a strong proof of the degeneracy of the people from the virtue of their forefathers. They placed at the head of the Republic Sulpicius Galba, the cruel, perfidious, rapacious, eloquent miser, spoken of above; and they joined with him a very suitable colleague, L. Aurelius Cotta, that Tribune of the commons, who would have taken advantage of the privilege of his office to cheat his creditors.

Val. Max.
B. 6. C. 4.
4. 2.

These Consuls had a warm struggle in the Senate for the province of Further Spain. Scipio's opinion being asked, I think, said he, that neither of them ought to be sent thither, because the one has nothing, and the other nothing can satisfy. These few words had such effect that both Candidates were disappointed of their pretensions: The consequence of which was, what Scipio perhaps had chiefly in view, the continuance of his brother in the command of the army.

It is thought to have been about this time, that the Republic made a considerable change with regard to the functions of the Prætors. Hitherto criminal causes had been tried either by the people or by judges specially commissioned for the occasion: The Prætor Urbanus and the Prætor Peregrinus had cognizance of all civil causes. It was now decreed, that the other four Prætors, instead of going, immediately after their election, to govern the provinces, should reside at Rome the whole year of their Prætorship, have separate tribunals, and try criminal causes; which were exceedingly multiplied at Rome, since her conquests in Greece, Asia and Africa: The people however still retaining their right of judging in the last resort, and of appointing, when they thought proper, judges extraordinary. The six Prætors, after spending the year in the functions above-mentioned, repaired to their respective provinces abroad with the title of Pro-prætors.

App. loc.
C. 1.

FABIUS, having well disciplined his men, during the winter, led them into the field in the spring, and (if flattery did not invent the tale) vanquished Viriatius in battle, and took some towns: After which he put his troops into winter quarters at Corduba.

App. p. 292.

Appian briefly reports, "that Viriatius, after his defeat by Fabius, " [which doubtless never happened] thinking himself no longer secure, " drew off from the Roman alliance the Arvaci, Belli, and Titibi;" nations of Celtiberia, who are supposed to have continued quiet since the peace with Marcellus. No other author mentions this peace with Marcellus, or the defection of these allies at the solicitation of Viriatius. Nor do we find in Appian, that their defection occasioned any diversion or of the Roman troops employed against the Lusitanian, or that he received any assistance from those nations, or that he wanted any to enable him to beat the Romans. Thus much seems certain, that the Consul Q. Cecilius Metellus Macedonicus (Colleague of Ap. Claudius Pulcher) had, in the year 610, commission to make war upon the Celtiberians. The particulars of his exploits during his Consulship are not related by the historians; we only know in general that he made a fortunate campaign.

Y. R. 610.
Bef. Chr.
142.
309 Cons.

In the Further Province Virietus gained a victory over Quintilius the successor of Fabius, and forced him into winter quarters in the middle of autumn.

Liv. Epit.
App. p. 237.

THE Consul Appius Claudius had, for his province, Cisalpine Gaul: where, because there was nothing to do, he contrived to kindle a war with the Salassi^b, that he might have the honour of a triumph. In his first engagement with them they defeated him, and killed 5000 of his men: In a second, he gained the victory, and slew 5000 of the Salassi. This slaughter of 5000 enemies gave him a legal title to a triumph; yet, on account of the loss of so many Romans as were cut off when he was vanquished, the Senate refused him the honour he aspired to; and they forbade the Quæstor to furnish the usual money for the expence of the show. A triumph nevertheless he resolved to have, though at his own charge. During the procession, a certain Tribune of the people came fully determined to pull him out of the chariot. Appius had a daughter, who, being a vestal, was a personage no less sacred than the Tribune. She perceiving his intended affront to her father, nimbly threw herself between them. The Tribune, out of respect to the holiness of her character, desisted from his purpose; and the victorious vestal, mounting the chariot, rode, with her father, in triumph to the capitol.

Strab. l. 4.
p. 205.
P. Orosc. B.
5. c. 4.

Val. Max.
B. 5. c. 4.
§. 6.
Cicer. pro
Cæl. c. 14.

Sueton. in Tiber. c. 2.

THE same Appius Claudius, the next year, when Q. Fabius Servilianus and L. Cecilius Metellus Calvus (brother of Metellus Macedonicus) had the Consular Falces, stood candidate for the Censorship, in competition with Scipio Africanus and Mummius Achaicus. Appius came to the field of Mars conducted by a numerous body of the chief men of Rome; Scipio (who is censured by Plutarch for paying his court to the populace, contrary to the example of his father Æmilius) was attended by a multitude of freedmen and plebeians of the meanest condition. His competitor, seeing him enter the assembly in such company, cried out, "O Manes of Æmilius Paullus! If in the shades below you know any thing of what passes here, how grieved must you be, that your son is thus presented as a candidate for the Censorship, by the crier Æmilius, and by Licinius, ringleader of the mob!" Nevertheless Scipio's cabal carried the election in his favour. The people joined with him, in the same office, Mummius, an easy indolent man, of whom Scipio afterwards,

Y. R. 611.
Bef. Chr.
141.
310 Cons.

Plut. life of Æmil.

^b A people inhabiting the country now called the valley of Aoste.

V. P. 631.
S. C. 141.
S. C. 142.
Val. Max.
B. 4. c. 1. §. 10.

V. P. 631.
S. C. 141.
S. C. 142.
Val. Max.
B. 4. c. 1. §. 10.

F. 1.

V. P. 631.
S. C. 141.
S. C. 142.
Val. Max.
B. 4. c. 1. §. 10.

Plut. in Apothegm.

in a speech to the people, complained, as having obstructed his designs of reformation. He told them, "that he should have discharged his office in a manner worthy of the majesty of the Republic, if they had either given him a Collegue, or given him no Collegue."

THE Consul Servilianus had the conduct of the war in Further Spain against Virriatus: His colleague staid in Italy. Metellus Macedonicus continued at the head of the army in Ulterior Spain, in quality of Proconsul. While he was besieging Contrebia, a town of the Celtiberians, he commanded five cohorts, who had been driven from their post by the enemy, to return thither immediately; giving public orders at the same time to the rest of the army, to put to the sword every man of the detachment that, turning his back to the Spaniards, should fly to the camp for safety. The soldiers of the five cohorts, thinking themselves going to certain death, made each of them one of those verbal wills, which the Romans called Testaments in procinctu, a term taken from their manner of girding round their waists the lappets of their coats when they were going to fight. Thus, with the courage or despair, they advanced against the enemy, and recovered the post.

Metellus, so rigid in discipline, gave a remarkable instance of humanity at the siege of Nertobriga. A breach was like to be made in the wall, when the besieged, to be revenged of Rhetegenes, one of their principal citizens, who had deserted to the Romans, exposed his young children to the strokes of the rams. The father desired Metellus to continue the battering; but the Proconsul, in pure compassion to him, quitted a certain conquest, and raised the siege. He lost nothing by this action: On the fame of his humanity, several cities of Celtiberia had recourse to it, and submitted.

IN the mean time Servilianus with 16,000 foot and 1600 horse, from Italy, and 300 horse and 10 elephants sent him by Micipsa King of Numidia, was engaged in the war against Virriatus. This mighty army the Spaniard, with only 6000 men, overthrew in the plain

* It is reported that C. Licinius Sacerdos, a Roman knight, presenting himself to the Censors, Scipio said aloud, "I know that Licinius is guilty of perjury; and if any one will accuse him, I offer myself to be a witness." No accuser appearing, Scipio would not degrade the knight, lest it should be said, that the Censor had been accuser, witness and judge*. He changed the prayer used at the lustration after the Census. Instead of an address to the Gods to augment the prosperity and extend the dominion of Rome, he prayed, that they would continue to her her present happiness. And this became afterwards the common form used by the Censors†. The number of citizens polled at this Census was 428,342‡.

§ It may be proper to inform the reader that Appian (from whom alone we have any account of these campaigns) seldom gives Virriatus a victory, without first making the Romans rout him; but then the latter never fails to face about on a sudden, and vanquish the pursuers. Perhaps Virriatus's feigned flights were mistaken for real ones.

* Plut. in Apothegm.

† Val. Max. B. 4. c. 1. §. 10.

‡ Mar. Capitol. Liv. Epit. l. 54.

field. He pursued them to their camp, and would have taken it, if night coming on had not favoured the Romans. After this he so harrassed and distressed them that they were forced to retire to Ituca, a town in Bætica: But, in a short time, scarcity of provisions constrained Viriatius to return into Lusitania.

Y. R. 612.
Bef. Chr.
141.
310 Cons.

During the present Consulship, a third impostor appeared in Macedon, who called himself Philip, and pretended to be a son of Perfes. He got together a body of 17,000 men, and with this army advanced to assault the Roman camp, where, in the absence of the Prætor, Licinius Nerva, the Quæstor L. Tremellius commanded*. A battle ensued, in which the Romans gained a victory so entire, that it put an end to the war.

Liv. Epit.
B. 53.
Eutrop. B.
4.

CHAP. IV.

The acts of the Consul Q. Pompeius against the Numantines and their allies. The Proconsul Servilianus concludes a peace with Viriatius, which is confirmed by the Senate, but is soon after infamously broken by the Romans. The death of Viriatius, and its consequences.

AT Rome, the Comitia raised to the Consulship C. Servilius Cæpio and Q. Pompeius. The latter, who was the first of his family that arrived at this dignity, procured his advancement by a trick, which, at the election, he put upon Scipio Æmilianus and his friend Lælius, surnamed Sapiens [the Wise] one of the candidates: For at their desire he undertook to solicit votes for Lælius, and while they, trusting to his industry, used little pains themselves, he engaged the people's voices for his own promotion.

Y. R. 612.
Bef. Chr.
140.
311 Cons.
Plut. in Apothegm.

Pompeius was appointed to succeed Metellus in the province of Hither Spain. This Proconsul, who had till now conducted himself so worthily, is said by one writer, who deals much in strange stories^b, to have acted

Val. Max.
B. 9. c. 3.
§. 7.

* The Quæstor, says Varro (de re Rustic. L. 2. c. 4.) got the surname of Scrofa, [Sow] from his telling the soldiers, in a speech, that he would scatter the enemy as a sow scatters her pigs. Macrobius finds another origin of this surname. Some of Tremellius's slaves having found a stray sow, killed it and brought it home. The owner, a neighbour, came to demand it. Tremellius, who had learnt the fact from his steward, put the sow under his wife's bed-clothes, and made his wife lye down upon them. When his neighbour, to whom he had given leave to make a search, came in that room, Tremellius, pointing to the bed, swore he had no sow in the house but what was in that bed. Macrobius. Saturn. L. 1. c. 6.

^b The learned and ingenious writer of the Life of Cicero remarks, that it seems to be the view of Valerius Maximus, in the collection of his stories, to give us rather what is strange, than true; and to dress up facts as it were into fables, for the sake of drawing a moral from them. Dr. Midd. Life of Cic. Vol. I. p. 517.

Y. R. 612.
Bef. Chr.
140.
311 Conf.

1- Ther 6
237.

De. S. c.
Ex. 7. L.
24.
P. 1. B.
1. 13.

App. 17.
1. 7.
208.

De. S. c.
Ex. 7. L.
24.
P. 1. B.
1. 13.

on this occasion, through passion and pique, the part of a madman. To disable his successor, who was his particular enemy, from carrying on the war with advantage, he dismissed all those of the soldiers who claimed a discharge from the service, granted leave of absence to all who asked it, and fixed no time for their return. He also withdrew the guards of his magazines, that they might be plundered; forbade any food to be given to the elephants, and caused the bows and arrows of the Cretan auxiliaries to be broken, and thrown into the river. Appian says nothing of all this, but reports that Metellus delivered up to Pompeius a well-disciplined army of 30,000 foot and 2000 horse.

Numantia and Termantia were the principal cities that remained unsubdued in Celtiberia. The inhabitants of these places sent deputies to the Consul to treat of peace. He demanded that they should clothe 9000 of his soldiers, furnish him with 3000 ox hides, and 800 horses, give 300 hostages, and deliver up to him their cities, and their arms. At this last demand, the deputies, in each other's faces, read the indignation which so shocking a proposal excited. Turning to the Consul, "Is it thus (said they) that you treat brave men? They never quit their arms but with their lives." Their report of the Consul's demands, to their respective cities, filled every breast with resentment and rage. Even the women declared, that they would never own for their husbands, men who should be so base and cowardly as to suffer themselves to be stript of their arms^b.

Pompeius led his army successively to the siege of these two places, but quitted both enterprises with loss and dishonour. He had better fortune in his attempt upon Matia, a small town garrisoned by Numantines. The inhabitants, upon the Consul's approach, slew the garrison, and surrendered the place. He then marched into the country of the Sedetani, and vanquished a gang of robbers, as they are called. The prisoners he sold for slaves, little to the profit of the purchasers; for some of these slaves killed themselves, some killed those that had bought them, and others, in their passage to Italy, contrived to bore holes in the ships, and sink them.

The Consul seems to have finished this campaign with the taking of Lana. Numantia had sent 400 men to the assistance of the inhabitants. These nevertheless offered to surrender their town, upon condition their lives might be spared. Pompeius would hearken to no proposals unless the Numantines were delivered up to him. This the Lancians at first refused, but being afterwards reduced to great extremities, they signified to the Consul their consent to his demand. On discovering the secret,

^b An obscure fragment of Diod. Siculus, which does not mention the name of any commander, or afford any circumstance for fixing the time, is the foundation of this story. The passage, as given by Fabius Ursinus, and transcribed by Freinsheim, contains much absurdity; but it seems to mean something like what is told in the text.

the Numantines, to prevent the townsmen, fell upon them in the night, and made a great slaughter. During the confusion hereby occasioned, Pompeius, who had notice of it, scaled the walls, and put all the Lancians to the sword; but spared the Numantines, now reduced to 200 men, and set them at liberty. Diodorus supposes that the Consul acted thus, partly out of compassion for men so unworthily treated by those they had come to defend, and partly from a view to conciliate to him the good will of the people of Numantia.

V. R. 612.
Bef. Chr.
140.
311 Conf.

In Further Spain, Fabius Servilianus, who had been continued in the command, as Proconsul, made some expeditions, in which he shewed himself extremely treacherous and cruel; and then led his army to besiege Erisane. Before he had finished his lines, Viriatius got into the town in the night, whence, next morning, sallying out, he briskly attacked the Romans, and drove them to seek refuge in a place full of rocks and precipices, out of which they could no way escape. The Lusitanian, whose chief object both in good and bad fortune, was the welfare of his country, thought this a favourable opportunity to procure for her a peace upon reasonable conditions. By a treaty now concluded with the Consul, and afterwards confirmed at Rome, it was agreed, That Viriatius should be held the friend and ally of the Roman people, and that the Lusitanians should retain the lands they then actually possessed.

P. O. 613.
5.
App. p.
293.

A Y E A R that brought so much dishonour to the Roman name was followed by another that made it yet more infamous. The Consular Fasces having passed into the hands of C. Lælius Sapiens and Q. Servilius Cæpio, the latter went into Further Spain. Highly dissatisfied with the peace his predecessor had concluded with the Lusitanians, he made repeated applications to the Senate for leave to break it. The Conscrip. Fathers allowed him to do clandestinely whatever mischief he could to Viriatius, their new friend and ally. But Cæpio, not satisfied with this permission, and still pressing his first request, they at length passed a decree for an open declaration of war against the Lusitanian. Thus authorised, the Consul marched his forces towards Arfa, the residence of Viriatius, who not being in a condition to defend the place, abandoned it, and retired towards Carpetania. Cæpio pursued him, and came up with him near the confines of that country: But though the Spaniards were much too weak to fight, their able commander saved them by a stratagem like that which he had formerly practised against Vetilius.

Liv. E. 12.
B. 54.
Auct. de
Vir. Illust.
in Viriat.
Diod. Sic.
in Eclog.
L. 32.

V. R. 613.
Bef. Chr.
139.
312 Conf.

App. p.
294.

* In this Consulship Hostilius Tubulus was prosecuted by one of the Tribunes named Sævola, for having in his Prætorship taken bribes to give unjust judgments. The people referred the matter to the Senate, and the Senate to the Consul Cn. Servilius

Cæpio. Tubulus, finding that he should be condemned, went into banishment; and being commanded home, he poisoned himself, to avoid dying by the hand of an executioner. C. de finib. L. 2. c. 16. Afton. Padian. in Orat. pro. Scaur.

T. R. 613.
Bef. Chr.
119.
312 C. n.

Livy. Epit.
B. 2.
Vol. Pat.
B. 2.
Flor. B. 2.
C. 17.

Diod. ap.
Valef.
App. in Ibid. p. 297.
Dio. Caff.
fragm.

As Viriatas had made no preparation for a war, which, till he was attacked, he had no reason to apprehend, he deputed three of his friends to negotiate an accommodation with Cepio^a. These men the Roman engaged, by large bribes and many promises, to undertake the murder of their General. Viriatas frequently slept in his armour, that in all exigencies he might be ready for action; and his friends had access to him at all hours of the night. The three traitors, entering his tent when he was in his first sleep, cut his throat, the only part of his body then unarmed. Having perpetrated their villany without noise, no alarm was taken, and they stole away to the Roman camp to ask the promised reward. Cepio answered, "They should continue to hold what they already possessed, but for any further recompence, he must refer them to the Senate."

Thus fell Viriatas, whose life and death will be an eternal reproach to the memory of the Romans of that age. One would imagine, from what is said of him by Diodorus, Appian, Dio Cassius, and other writers, that all the virtues which were called Roman had forsaken Rome, to pass into the breast of that one Spaniard. They speak of him as free from every vice; nor is there any virtue or talent, ascribed to the best of the Roman Generals, which Viriatas is not said to have possessed in the highest degree: Veracity, justice, prudence, moderation, humanity, contempt of riches and shew, strict temperance, patience of the severest hardships and fatigues, intrepid courage, and consummate skill in the art of war. Though a man of low birth, and raised to command by fol-

^a Frinsbemi has cooked up a strange story (which Father Catron and M. Rollin have adopted) of a negotiation previous to the deputation mentioned in the text; and the brave Viriatas is made, through excess of fear for himself, to sacrifice his wife's father, his best friends, and the chief men of his allies, to the Consul, on his demanding this sacrifice as a condition of peace. Viriatas himself murders one half of the victims, and delivers up the other to Cepio, who causes their right hands to be cut off, and then requires the Spanish General and his troops to give up their arms: But this demand they will not comply with; and the treaty breaks off.

The only foundation for this story, which Frinsbemi has adorned with set speeches, is a very few lines, a fragment of Dio Cassius, according to which the transaction passed, not in the time of Cepio, but of Popilius, who did not come into Spain till the year after the death of Viriatas. And had there not been this objection, the story is entirely void of probability. So perfidious, so cowardly, so cruel an action must naturally have lessened the love and esteem which Viriatas's followers had for him: Yet we find that he sleeps securely in the midst of them, and, when he has been basely murdered by hired assassins, the army mourn his death as of a common parent to them all.

There is another fragment of Dio Cassius, containing matter no less extraordinary, concerning Cepio and his cavalry: That, in anger, he sent them to cut wood on a hill, where Viriatas being encamped, they must be exposed to the utmost danger: That they performed his orders; but, at their return, would, in revenge, have burnt him with the wood they had brought, if he had not hid himself.

^c Eutropius (L. 4.) makes Cepio answer that the Romans never approved of soldiers killing their Generals.

diers, his equals and companions, he kept them in exact discipline without losing their affection. No mutiny or sedition ever happened in his army. His ruin seems to have been brought upon him by the honesty of his own heart; which would not permit him to suspect that the Senate of Rome could be as void of all honour as Galba, and some of the other Generals they had sent into Spain.

The Lusitanians having performed the most magnificent obsequies they could to their deceased General, whose death they lamented as if he had been their common father, chose one Tantalus in his room: But this man not having the talents of his predecessor, was soon obliged to yield up himself and his army to the Consul, who stript them of their arms. They seem however to have capitulated on the terms of being transplanted from their own country to some other, where they were to have lands assigned them for a settlement.

Y. R. 613.
Bef. Chr.
139.
312 Conf.

Diod. Sic.
Excerpt. L.
34. ap.
Valef.
App. p.
296.

C H A P. V.

The Romans are shamefully vanquished in Spain; they make shameful treaties of peace; and they more shamefully break those treaties.
The Tabellarian laws passed at several times.
A people of Illyricum subdued.

IN HITHER SPAIN the war still continued, where Pompeius, now Proconsul, had again laid siege to Numantia. The Numantines made frequent sallies, and always with success; so that the Roman army became greatly diminished. But Pompeius, having received from Italy a reinforcement that was brought him by some Senators commissioned to be his council, resolved to continue the siege during the winter, in order to recover his reputation. Of this hope he was disappointed; for not only he suffered a great loss of men by cold and distempers, but the Numantines continued to have the ascendant, and beat him in every conflict. So many misfortunes compelled him at length to raise the siege and go into quarters for what remained of the winter. Fearing to be called to account at Rome for his conduct, he thought it advisable to clap up a peace with the enemy upon the best terms he could; and he contrived to engage the Numantines to make the first overtures. It was privately agreed that they should in public surrender at discretion, this being necessary to save the Proconsul's honour; but that he should insist on nothing more than their delivering up their prisoners with the Roman deserters, giving hostages, and paying thirty talents, part down, and the rest in a short time. A peace was concluded on these these terms in presence of his council and the chief officers of his army.

App. p.
298.

WHEN the Numantines brought to Pompeius the second payment, according to the stipulation, M. Popillius Lænas (Colleague of Cr. Calpurnius Piso in the Consulship) was come to take upon him the command of the army. The Proconsul, who had made peace lest he should be called to account for his conduct in the war, was now afraid of being called to account for the peace. He therefore confidently denied that he had made a peace, notwithstanding the many witnesses of dignity and weight that had been present at the treaty. Popillius referred the Numantines to the Senate of Rome, there to dispute the matter with the Proconsul; and in the mean time led his army into the territory of the Lusæ, a people in the neighbourhood of Numantia, against whom he performed nothing.

The Senate having heard the cause between Pompeius and the Numantines, decreed that the war should be carried on against the latter. It seems however that it was referred to the people whether Pompeius should be given up to the enemy, and that by his solicitations and entreaties he obtained pardon.

THIS year a Tribune of the people, named Gabinus, got a law passed for balloting in the election of Magistrates: Hitherto, in the Comitia, the people had given their suffrages by pronouncing aloud the name of the person for whom they voted. Gabinus pretended that the people would be more free from undue influence, if it were not known for

* C. Memmius Gallus obtained a law this year, forbidding any criminal action to be commenced against those who were actually employed on public affairs, in the provinces (Val. Max. B. 3. c. 7. §. 9. Cic. in Vat. c. 14.) It is thought that this law also directed, That every informer, convicted of calumny, should be marked in the forehead with the letter K, the first letter of the word Kalumniator, according to the way of spelling in those times; and that whoever received this mark should never be admitted as a witness. (Cic. pro Rosc. Amerin. c. 19, 20.) The Emperor Trajan ordered, that the punishment of calumny should be according to the lex talionis; that is to say, the same which the accused was to have suffered had the false accuser made good his charge. Plin. Panegy.

The same year T. Manlius Torquatus gave an instance of the severity and rigid justice for which his family was remarkable. His son D. Junius Silanus Manlianus (adopted into a branch of the Junian family, whose surname was Silanus) had, when Prætor of Macedon, been guilty of great oppression in his province, and the Macedonians had complained of him at Rome. Torquatus desired the Senate would appoint him judge in the affair; which being granted, he heard the cause and examined it with great attention for two days; the third he pronounced the following sentence. "Since it has been proved, that Silanus my son has [unjustly] taken money from the allies, I judge him unworthy of my family, or to serve the Republic, and forbid him ever to appear in my sight." This sentence so affected the criminal that the next night he strangled himself; at which his father shewed no manner of concern, nor would be present at his funeral. Val. Max. B. 5. c. 8. §. 3. Cic. de fin. b. L. 1. c. 7. Liv. Epit. B. 54.

whom whom each man gave his voice. His law therefore enacted, that for the future, every citizen should put into a box, prepared for that purpose, a tablet, on which was written the name of the candidate he favoured.

[Two years after, L. Cassius, another Tribune, introduced the same method of voting, in trials before the people, and perhaps in trials by the judges ^b.

In the year 622 Papirius Carbo extended the use of tablets to the case of making or repealing laws.

And Cælius in 646, to judgments on accusations of treason, which had been excepted in Cassius's law ^c.]

IN the next election of Magistrates P. Scipio Nasica and D. Junius Brutus obtained the Consulship. Italy fell by lot to the former, Further Spain to the latter: Popilius was continued in the hither province in quality of Proconsul.

While the Consuls were making the levies, one C. Matienus being tryed before the Tribunes of the people for having left the army in Spain without a discharge, and being found guilty, was severely whipped in sight of the recruits, and then, as a creature of less value than the vilest of slaves, was sold for about seven farthings ^{*}. According to Frontinus, several other deserters underwent the like punishment.

These Tribunes, so zealous for the preservation of military discipline, arrogated to themselves a power of exempting ten citizens, such as they should chuse, from serving in the war. This the Consuls strenuously opposed; upon which the Tribunes threw them both into prison. Nasica however lost nothing of his weight and authority, for having been thus insulted. Some time after, there being a scarcity of corn at Rome, one of the Tribunes, in an assembly of the people, called upon the Consuls to move the Senate, that commissioners might be sent into the provinces to buy corn. When Nasica began to speak against the proposal, he was interrupted, but not daunted, by the clamours of the multitude. Romans, said he, I pray you, be silent; I know better than you what is expedient for the Republic. The people instantly became still and attentive.

THE Consul Brutus made great progress this year in quieting Lusitania. For the remains of Viriatus's army he built a town, and called it Valentia, which some authors suppose to be the present capital of the province that bears that name.

^b It is said that Antius Brisus, one of the Tribunes, opposed for some time the passing of this law, but that Scipio Æmilianus at length prevailed with him to cease his opposition. Cic. in Brut. c. 25.

^c Cicero, in an oration before the people ^a, calls the tablets the silent assentors of liberty; and in another, spoken the year before he stood for the Consulship [†], a source of most realisable liberty: But in other parts of his writings he condemns this method of voting and all the authors of it. Cic. de Anait. c. 12. de Leg. L. 3. c. 16. Orat. pro Sext. c. 48.

^a 2 Agon. c. 2.

†

† Pro Cernel.

Popilius,

Y. R. 615.
Bis. Chr.
137.
314 Conf.

Liv. Epit.
B. 55.

^{*} A sesterce?
P. 4. c. 1.
§. 10.
Liv. Epit.
B. 55.

Cic. de
Legit. L.
3. c. 9.
Val. Max.
R. 5. c. 7.
§. 2.

Stratag. B.
3. c. 27.
† 9.

Lic. Epit.
B. 55.

Y. R. 616.
Bel. Chr.
136.
315 Cons.

Phil. Oros.
de prodig.
c. 83.

App. in Lib.
p. 300.

Val. Ant.
2. A.
Gell. L. 7.
c. 9.

Val. Pat.
B. 2.
• Iter. 6.
317.
† Lic.
Epit. B.
35. &
Auct. de
Vir. illust.

Popilius, following his instructions, renewed the war against the Numantines; who (according to Frontinus) not only beat him but outwitted him. By seeming to desert the defence of their walls they drew him to attempt an escalade. His soldiers had planted their ladders, and many of them were mounting, before he suspected any stratagem on the part of the besieged. But no enemy yet appearing he began now to be afraid, and founded a retreat. In that moment the Numantines made a sally, and routed his whole army. He seems to have been disabled from fighting any more during the campaign.

C. HOSTILIUS MANCINUS (raised to the Consulship with M. Aemilius Lepidus) came the next year to complete the disgrace of the Romans before Numantia. His misfortunes had been foretold; for not only a foal came into the world with five legs, but the chickens, consulted at the Consuls inauguration, instead of falling greedily to their meat, flew away into a wood, and were never seen more.

At his arrival in Spain he found the Roman legions extremely disheartened by their ill success; and he himself being worsted in every action great or small, he thought it advisable to retire to a place of safety at some distance from the town. While he was stealing off in the night^d, the Numantines, getting notice of it, sallied out, fell upon his army in the rear, slew 10,000 of them, and shut up the rest (it does not appear how or where) in such a manner as they had no hope to escape. Mancinus therefore sent a herald with an overture for an accommodation. As peace with Rome, and independence, were all the Numantines aimed at, they did not refuse to treat; but required that Tib. Gracchus, then Quæstor in the Roman army, and whose father had formerly made a peace with them and maintained it inviolate, should be sent to them. The particular articles of the treaty are not mentioned, but it was concluded upon equal terms, and confirmed by the oaths of the Consul, the Quæstor, and the other principal officers.

This wonderful success of the Numantines against enemies so superior in number, (for they were 30,000 strong) would hardly gain credit, if all the writers who give any account of this war did not agree in the fact. We are told that the forces of the Numantines never exceeded 10,000 men; *Appian says 8000; Florus and Orosius 4000: Two other authors affirm that in the action just related they were but 4000.†

^d One Author gives us the following account how the besieged came to discover that the Romans were retreating. The Numantines, it seems, used to celebrate their marriages at certain stated times, one of which happened to be the day before that night when the Romans decamped. A young woman of great beauty was courted by two men, and her father agreed to bestow her upon him of the two rivals who should first bring the right hand of a Roman. The lovers, being abroad upon this enterprize, perceived that the besiegers had left their camp, and gave notice of it in the town. Auct. de Vir. Illust. in Mancin.

The

The Numantines had taken the Roman camp, and, among the spoil, Gracchus's book of accompts. As it imported him greatly to recover it, he went to Numantia with two or three of his friends in that view. The Spaniards received and entertained him with much civility, and not only returned him his book, but offered him any part of the spoil he should desire. He accepted of nothing but a box of incense, which he employed in the public sacrifices.

Plut. in Grac.

ON the first news of the defeat of the Roman army, the Conscript Fathers determined to recal Mancinus, and send his colleague Æmilius in his stead. Mancinus arrived at Rome accompanied by deputies from Numantia; and when P. Furius Philus and Sex. Atilius Serranus had entered upon the Consulship, the affair was brought before the Senate. The Numantine deputies insisted upon the treaty so solemnly concluded, and so much to the advantage of the Romans.

App. in
Iber. p. 300.

V. R. 617.
Bef. Chr.
135.
316 Conf.

Mancinus, in excuse of his many defeats, pleaded, that Pompeius had left him an army so dispirited and cowardly, that not a man of them had the courage to look a Numantine in the face. He added, that it was no wonder the Romans had been so unsuccessful in a war, which they had decreed contrary to all justice; and that by the peace concluded with the enemy, he had saved the lives of 20,000 citizens who could not otherwise have escaped.

Flor. B. 2.
c. 18.
App. in Iber. p. 302.

Plut. in Grac.

The Conscript Fathers were too proud to acquiesce in a treaty, by which they thought the Republic dishonoured. And having a precedent of an infamous proceeding of the Senate in the case of the treaty made at the Caudine Forks *, they determined [more majorum] not to abide by the peace, but to give up Mancinus by way of satisfaction to the Numantines. It is not clear whether Tib. Gracchus, and the other officers, who had sworn to the treaty, were involved in the same sentence. Be that as it will, the people, when the matter came before them, pardoned, out of regard to Gracchus, all but Mancinus, who voluntarily offered himself to be the victim; not that he thought this devotion would be a reparation to the Numantines for the infringement of the peace (for he seems to have been an honest man) but because it was all he could do to convince them, he had meant honourably in that transaction.

* See Vol.
I. p. 516.
App. loc.
cit. Oro.
L. 5. c. 4.
Plut. in Grac.
Vell. Pat.
B. 2. Cic.
de Offic.
L. 3. c. 37.
Liv. Epit.
55.
Auct. de
Vir. illust.
Cic. de
Orat. L.
1. c. 40.

BRUTUS, whom we left in the year 615 settling the remains of Viriatius's army in Valentia, proceeded to reduce the rest of the Lusitanians, who in flying parties made war after the manner of the modern Miquelets of Catalonia. When they had surprized and plundered a village, or defeated a Roman detachment, they retired hastily amongst the rocks and mountains to divide the spoil. The Proconsul judged that the best way to quell them was to march into the countries, where they were born, and where they had left their wives and children; to defend whom, he doubted not they would return thither. They did as he expected; and he met with some difficulty in subduing them; the women universally

App. in
Iber. p. 299.

V. R. 617.
Bel. Car.
175.
216 Conf.

L. 1. Epit.
B. 55.

Ort. B. 5.
C. 5.
Strab. B. 3.
P. 142.
Vell. Pat.
L. 2.
App. p. 300.

becoming soldiers to assist the men. In the end, all the Lusitanians on the south side of the Durius submitted. He then passed that river, and ravaged the country as far as the Lezbe, or River of Oblivion. This stream bearing the same name with one of the rivers which the poets placed in their map of Hell, the soldiers, through superstition, refused to pass it; till the General, snatching a standard from the bearer, led the way, and removed their apprehensions. He afterwards crossed the Minus and marched against the Bracari, a people on the banks of the Alges, now Rio di Braga in the north part of Portugal. Here also he found the women in arms as well as the men, and of so desperate a courage as to chuse rather to die in battle than run away, or be slaves: And if by chance any of them were taken captive, they killed themselves and their children. He however reduced this fierce nation, and penetrating into the country of the Gallaeci subdued it quite to the ocean on the west; for which he got the surname of Gallaecus or Callaicus.

ÆMILIUS was come into Hither Spain to succeed Mancinus in the command of the forces. Not knowing what turn the affair of Numantia would take, he did not assail that city. Yet, that he might be doing something, he resolved upon an expedition against the Vaccæi, neighbours of the Numantines. His pretext for the war was, that this people had given assistance to the enemy. The better to succeed in his enterprize, he engaged the Proconsul Brutus (whose daughter he had married) to join him. They entered the territory of the Vaccæi and ravaged it. While they were besieging Palantia, the capital, two Senators arrived from Rome with a decree of the Senate forbidding Æmilius to make war upon the Vaccæi. The Consul answered; "that the Senate were ignorant of the true situation of things; they did not know that Brutus with his forces had joined him, nor that the Vaccæi had aided the Numantines with men, money and provisions." He added, "That, the war being actually begun, should he quit the enterprize, it would be imputed to fear, and make the Roman arms contemptible in Spain, and perhaps occasion a general revolt." For all these wise reasons he continued the siege; but the Palantines, by the resolution with which they defended themselves, made him, in some time, weary of his undertaking; and at length famine constrained the two Generals to decamp.

They went off, in the last watch of the night, in such hurry and confusion, that it was rather a flight than a retreat. The Palantines perceived it, and sallying out to the pursuit, made havock of them all the next day. One author says, the Romans lost 6000 men; and another makes the slaughter as great as that which Mancinus's army suffered by the Numantines.

It is not clear whether Brutus's conquest of Gallaecia was before or after this unfortunate expedition with his son-in-law against the Palantines. But he did not return to Rome (where he had a triumph) till some years after this.

Not

Ort. B. 5.
C. 6.
L. 1. Epit.
B. 56.

Not long after, the Consul Furius arrived to take the place of Æmilius, who was recalled to Rome, where the people laid a fine upon him for his misconduct.

Furius had brought with him Mancinus, whom he was to deliver up to the Numantines. The Pater Patratus or Chief Herald led him naked to the waist, and with his hands tied behind his back, to the gates of Numantia; but the Numantines would not receive him: They said, “that the manifest breach of faith by the Romans could not be expiated by the blood of one man: That the Senate must either abide by the treaty, or deliver up all the troops that had escaped under the shelter of it.” The Romans on the other hand would not suffer Mancinus to return to the camp; so that this man, who not long before had appeared there at the head of a great army, and in all the pomp of the consular dignity, remained a whole day, in the condition that has been described, abandoned by his countrymen, rejected by the enemy, and a melancholy spectacle to both. At night the Consul, thinking that the decree of the Senate and people with regard to Mancinus had been sufficiently executed, and having consulted the chickens, received him into the camp.

At his return to Rome, he made no scruple to take his place in the Senate; but P. Rutilius, a Tribune of the people, ordered that he should leave the assembly, alledging that he was no Roman citizen; that, according to tradition, whoever had been sold by his father or the people, or delivered up to an enemy by a Pater Patratus, had no claim to a postliminium, that is to say, was incapable of being reinstated in the rights he before enjoyed. The matter being brought before the people, they decided in favour of Mancinus; because, without acceptance, there could be neither donation nor dedition; and Mancinus had not been accepted by the Numantines.

IT is recorded as a merit in Furius, that he chose, for his lieutenants, Q. Metellus and Pompeius, who were his personal enemies. He would shew that he was not afraid to have his enemies for witnesses of all he did; which happened to be nothing. His successor Calpurnius Piso, who was raised to the Consulship with Ser. Fulvius Flaccus, did no more. Fulvius subdued the Ardeans, a people of Illyricum *. One victory finished the war; and the vanquished, a seafaring people, were transplanted into an inland country.

* Pighius (in An. U. C. 619) thinks that Illyricum was this year reduced to the form of a Prætorian province.

Y. R. 617.
Bef. Chr.
135.
316 Conf.

App. in Pict. p. 302.
Cic. de
Orat. I. 2.
c. 40.
Vell. Pit.
L. 2. Plut.
in Crec.
P. Orol. B.
5. c. 5.

Auct. de
Vir. Illust.
in Man.
Cic. de
Orat. L. 2.
c. 40.
Orat. pro
Cæcin. c. 34.
Cic. Topica
c. 8.

Y. R. 618.
Bef. Chr.
134.
317 Conf.

App. in Illyr.
Strab. B.
7. p. 315.

C H A P. VI.

Scipio Æmilianus is sent into Spain against the Numantines.

His care to discipline his soldiers during a whole year : After which, with an army of 60,000 men, he, in six months time, reduces a handful of Numantines to the utmost distress ; and, in conclusion, makes himself master of the ground on which their city had stood.

Val. Max.
B. 3. c. 15.
§. 4.

Liv. Epit.
B. 56.
Y. R. 619.
Eut. Chr.
153.
318 Cons.

App. in
B. 2. p. 303.

AT the next election of magistrates, Scipio Africanus presented to the assembly his nephew Fabius, as a candidate for the Quæstorship. Though Scipio asked no office for himself, yet the people, weary of the Numantine war, and thinking him the best qualified of all men to bring it to a happy issue, elected him Consul, dispensing in his favour with the law, which forbade any man to be twice raised to that dignity. And he had Hither Spain assigned him for his province, without drawing lots with his colleague C. Furcius Flaccus. But the Senate having other wars upon their hands at this time, particularly that with the slaves in Sicily, of which notice shall be taken hereafter, and thinking that the army in Spain wanted an able General more than recruits, would not grant him any new levies of Roman citizens. They suffered him however, from other cities, and from Kings in alliance with the Republic, to get what auxiliaries he could. He raised in all about 4000 men, of which 500 were his clients and dependents, whom being formed into one troop, he called the squadron of his friends. He also by letter requested of Micipsa, King of Numidia, to send him a reinforcement into Spain.

Jul. Obseq.
c. 86.

Val. Max.
B. 2. c. 7.
§. 1.
Liv. Epit.
B. 57.
App. p.
303.

Frontin.
Strateg. 3.
4. c. 1.

These measures taken, Scipio (notwithstanding any thing that a certain ox had said to dissuade him, and though somebody had seen the sun in the night) embarked without delay for his province. At his arrival he found the legions ruined by sloth, discord and luxury. His first work therefore was to restore discipline in all its rigour. He drove from the camp a whole crowd of merchants, sutlers, and useless servants ; and, together with them, 2000 disorderly women. He also cleared the camp of a great number of carts and beasts of burthen, employed by the Legionaries to carry their persons, or at least those loads which the Roman soldiers had themselves been wont to carry. No utensils of the kitchen, except spits and boiling pots ; no beds, but such as were stuffed with leaves or straw, were allowed to be used. When the General had thus banished intemperance and luxury, he inured his men to fatigue, by frequent and painful marches in bad weather, fording rivers, digging trenches, and then filling them up again ; in a word, by all the labours that soldiers undergo in a difficult and perilous war.

But

But though in a few months he brought his army under tolerable discipline, he would not venture yet to lead them to the formidable Numantia. He passed by the town at a good distance, and entered the territory of the Vaccæi, who sold provisions to the Numantines. While he was ravaging the country, a party of his horse, detached to cover the foragers, had like to have perished in an ambush laid by the troops of Palantia. His vigilance and activity rescued the party out of this danger. After which being informed that the enemy, to cut off his retreat, waited for him upon the banks of a river, he would not attempt to return the way he came, but made a long march about, in which his men suffered extremely by the excessive heats, and for want of water. To compleat the work of hardening his soldiers for the toils and dangers of war, he resolved to pass the winter in tents; and pitched his camp in the neighbourhood of Numantia. It was at this time he received a reinforcement of archers, slingers and elephants, which Micipsa sent him from Numidia, under the conduct of his nephew Jugurtha, a young warrior, of whom there will be frequent occasion to speak in the course of this history.

THE people at Rome transferred the Consular Fasces to P. Mucius Scævola and L. Calpurnius Piso, but continued Scipio in the command of the army in Hisber Spain, with the title of Proconsul. His view from the beginning was to starve the Numantines, not to fight with them. When therefore his foragers had been attacked by surprize, and he with timely succours had repulsed the assailants, he would not pursue them, thinking it a sufficient advantage, that his troops had seen, what, Florus says, no man had expected ever to see, a Numantine turn his back to a Roman. According to Plutarch, the Numantines being reproached, at their return to the city, by the old men, for having quitted the field to an enemy they had so often vanquished, answered, that the Romans were indeed the same sheep, but had got a new shepherd.

Scipio having received large supplies of men from the Spanish cities in alliance with Rome, and his army now consisting of 60,000 men, he invested Numantia. The enemy frequently offered battle; and the Roman always laughed at the challenge: For he thought it would be acting a very foolish part, should he fight with desperate men, whom he was sure to conquer by starving them.

Numantia was about three miles in compass, and stood on the side of a hill, at the foot of which ran the Durius. The Roman General drew a trench six miles in circuit*, quite round the town, except where the river interrupted the work. And he took such effectual methods, with chains and beams, to hinder the besieged from having any communication abroad, by means of the river, that neither by boats, nor swimmers,

* By consequence this trench must be about half a mile from the town.

App. p.
302.

V. R. 623.
Bef. Chr.
132.
319 Cons.

App. p.
306.

Flor. B. 2.
c. 18.
Oros. B. 5.
c. 6.
Plut. in Apotheg.
App. p.
306.

Y. B. 6. 1.
P. 1. 1.
S. 1. 1.

swimmers, nor divers, could they get relief or intelligence. Behind his first ditch he drew a second at no great distance, and behind this he built a wall eight feet thick and ten feet high, without reckoning the parapet. On this wall, throughout the whole extent of it, were raised towers, distant ten feet one from another. Appian observes, that Scipio was the first General that ever drew a circumvallation round a town, the inhabitants of which did not decline a battle in the field. The beleagued frequently sallied out, to hinder the carrying on the works, and to force the lines after they were finished. But Scipio had established such excellent order, for giving notice to the whole army, by signals, whenever the enemy made a movement on any side, that all their efforts proved ineffectual. Appian relates a strange tale of one Rhetogenes, a brave Numantine, who, in a dark night, with five friends, as many servants, and six horses, by the help of some portable bridges, got over the Roman lines; having slain the guards posted at those places where he made his passage. The difficulty surmounted, Rhetogenes and his friends sent home their servants, and, separating, went to several towns of the Arvaci, to implore succour. Few would so much as hear these ambassadors; none would give them any assistance: So great was the dread of the Roman power. Only at Lutia, a city about thirty-seven miles from Numantia, the younger sort, having more spirit and generosity than discretion, urged their fellow citizens to aid the Numantines. The old men, who did not approve the design, gave Scipio private intelligence of what was in agitation. With a body of light armed troops he immediately hastened thither, appeared before the place at sun-rise, and demanded that the most considerable of the young men should be delivered up to him. It was at first answered, that they had made their escape; but he threatening to pillage the town if he were not obeyed, they gave up to him 400 of their youth, whose right hands he caused to be cut off, and then returned to his camp.

App. in
lib. 7. p.
359.

The Numantines, (when the siege had lasted six months) pressed by famine, sent five ambassadors to the Proconsul, to ask him whether, in case they surrendered, he would treat them with humanity. The chief of the embassy extolled the bravery and noble spirit of his countrymen. He added, “that the Numantines, though unfortunate, were guilty of no fault in fighting for their wives, their children, and the liberty of their country.—It is therefore but what justice requires from you, Scipio, who are a man of singular bravery, that you should spare the brave. We are ready to surrender, if you will grant us such conditions as are fit for men to submit to: If you will not; Give us at least an opportunity of fighting, that we may die like men.” Scipio answered, that they must yield up their arms, their city, and themselves^b. The Numantines, tho’ they

Flor. B. 2.
c. 18.
Oros. B. 5.
c. 6.

^b According to Appian, the Numantines were provoked to such madness of rage by Scipio’s answer, that they fell upon the ambassadors at their return, and slew them for being they suffered the extremest miseries that are ever suffered in a town besieged, yet would not surrender at discretion. In despair of preserving, by capitulation, both life and liberty, they warmed themselves with a sort of beer called Celia, sallied out at two gates, and made a furious assault upon the enemies lines. After an obstinate fight (in which many of them perished) finding it impossible to force the Roman entrenchments, they retired to their town in good order. Scipio offered them leave to bury their dead; a favour which they rejected. In conclusion, they burnt all their arms and effects, set fire to their houses, and, all dying by famine, by the sword, by poison, or by fire, left the victor, says Florus, nothing of Numantia to triumph over but the name^c.

The Proconsul however had the walls, and, according to Appian, many of the houses yet to destroy; all which he levelled with the ground; without being authorized, says the same author, by a decree of the Roman people, as he had been for the demolition of Carthage: “Whether “ he believed it for the good of the Republic; or was actuated by “ rage and revenge; or rather, as many think, that he sought to raise “ to himself a great name^d upon the foundation of mighty mischiefs “ done.”

Scipio having divided the territory of Numantia among the neighbouring Spaniards, and punished some cities which had befriended her during the war, returned to Rome, where he was honoured with a triumph, and the surname of NUMANTINUS: A most glorious appellation! * A name which imported, that the bearer of it had, with the help of 60,000 soldiers, cooped up and starved 4000 brave men, for only refusing to be SLAVES; and that he had performed this exploit, in execrable violation of a peace, which those generous Spaniards had purchased with the grant of Life and LIBERTY to 20,000 Romans^e.

being the bearers of ill tidings: A very unlikely tale, and not consistent with the character of the Numantines.

^c Appian reports, that in the extremity of the famine the besieged fed upon the bodies of those that died; and afterwards that the stronger murdered the weaker, to eat them. He adds, that after many of the Numantines had been thus destroyed, and many had killed themselves, the remainder surrendered at discretion; of whom Scipio reserved fifty to grace his triumph, and sold the rest for slaves. A story not much to the honour of the victor. But the Epitome of Livy, (B. 59.) and Frontinus (Stratag. B. 4. c. 5. §. 23.) seem to agree with the account given in the text, from Florus and Orosius.

^d Appian's words are Τὴν δόξαν ἡγήμεθα.

διόνυμος ἐπὶ τοῖς μεγάλοις γέγεσθαι κακῶς. Some think that διόνυμος signifies double named, and that the Historian alluded to Scipio's two surnames of Africanus and Numantinus. But H. Stephens contends that the word should be rendered famous; as in another passage of Appian, where he says, that Gracchus [who had acquired no surname from any military exploit] became διόνυμος, famous both in Spain and in Rome.

* Pigbius thinks that Scipio never assumed this ridiculous Nom de Guerre.

^e Mr. Rollin, in his Panegyric on Scipio, says, “that in him was an assemblage “ of all the virtues which make a soldier,
“ a statesman, and an honest man. And “ what is peculiar to him, History has not “ taken notice of any one stain upon his “ excellent life; History praises him with-

I.

“ out

Y. R. 620.
Bef. Chr.
132.
319 Conf.

Flor. l. v.
cit.
Oros. l. v.
cit.

App. in Iber. l. 312.

See p. 513.

Vol. ix. p.
74

C H A P. VII.

*Tiberius Gracchus revives the Agrarian law of Licinius Stolo.
The violent proceedings of the Senate and the rich on this occasion.*

Y. R. 620.
Bel. Car.
132.
379 Con. C.

WHILST Scipio was employed in the reduction of Numantia, there happened at Rome, a COMMOTION that terribly shook the state, and introduced arms and bloodshed into the Assemblies of the People; the prelude to successive tragedies, of which the final catastrophe was the UTTER RUIN OF ROMAN LIBERTY.

An event so memorable, as this COMMOTION, demands some previous account of the family and character of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, whose warm and vigorous efforts, to save his country, unhappily proved the occasion of those violences, that hastened its destruction.

The Sempronian family, though Plebeian, had raised itself to be among those of the greatest distinction in the commonwealth. The father of Tiberius, twice Consul, had obtained two triumphs, and was afterwards honoured with the Censorship. He married Cornelia, the daughter of the first Africanus, a woman of excellent understanding, renowned virtue, and great spirit. Of twelve children which he left at his decease, nine died in infancy, or in early youth. The three, that remained, were a daughter, (married to the second Africanus) and two sons, Tiberius and Caius, the latter nine years younger than his brother. Tiberius acquired the reputation of virtue so early, that for his merit chiefly he was chosen into the college of Augurs, as soon as he had put

Plut. in
Gracch.

“ out an exception to any of his actions ;
“ there is no part of his whole conduct
“ that needs an apology.”

This excellent writer and most worthy man seems to form his ideas of Scipio by the fine things said of him by Cicero ; in whom, nevertheless, he observes * the spirit of party to reign with such absolute sway, as to make him speak of une action inexcusable (the inhuman murder of Tiberius Gracchus by Nasica) as an exploit that filled the world with its glory.

But as to Scipio's unexceptionable conduct, Mr. Rollin seems to have overlooked a passage in Plutarch, where the historian, speaking of the affair of Marcus, tells us,
“ that Scipio, who, of all the Romans, had,
“ at that time, the greatest authority and “ sway, was blamed for not making use of “ his influence to save the Consul, and get

“ the treaty with the Numantines confirmed.”

Doubtless, this Hero had then in view the glory he afterwards acquired, of utterly destroying, contrary to public faith, and the obligation of benefits to the Republic, that handful of brave men, who, by their virtue, dishonoured the Romans. And I cannot imagine what Christian Divines mean, by exhibiting as patterns of consummate [Pagan] virtue, men proud of being the instruments of the basest and most cruel iniquities. And if what Mr. Rollin says (in the † preface to his Roman History) be true, “ that the finest actions of the Romans were “ done from the sole motive of vain glory,” I do not conceive that those finest actions deserve even the smallest portion of praise.

* V. l. ix. p. 51, 52.

† P. 85, 86.

on the manly gown¹. He made his first campaigns, with distinguished courage, under his brother-in-law Scipio, in Africa. After his return home, he applied himself to the study of Eloquence; in which he attained to so great perfection, as to surpass all the orators that Rome had, to his time, produced. “He was a man (says² Paterculus) of “the finest parts, the greatest innocence of life, the purest intentions; in “a word, adorned with all the virtues of which human nature, improv- “ed by industry, is capable.” And *Cicero*³ confesses, “That Tiberius “Gracchus came nothing short of the virtue of his father, or of his “grandfather Africanus, but in this, that he forsook the party of the “Senate.”

Y. R. 625.
Pef. Car.
132.
319 Conf.

We have already seen the share he had in the treaty, which Mancinus concluded with the Numantines; who granted, for the sake of Tiberius, more favourable conditions than they had at first intended. According to Cicero,¹ and *Paterculus*², who follows him, the severity of the Senate, on occasion of that treaty, not only grieved, but terrified Tiberius Gracchus, and was the cause of his alienation from the Nobles. Some say, that his designs were suggested to him by Dio- phanes, a Rhetorician of Mitylene, and Bleisus, an Italian Philosopher. Some ascribe them to a desire of rising, in the esteem of the people, above one Sp. Posthumius, an eloquent speaker, and in great credit. Others, again, to Tiberius's mother Cornelia, who, fond of glory, and willing to excite ambition in her son, reproached him, that she was usually called, at Rome, The mother-in-law of Scipio, and not The mother of the Gracchi. But Caius, in some memoirs of his, quoted by Plutarch, wrote, that his brother was himself the author of his project, and that he conceived it before his expedition against the Numantines.

See p. 512.

Plut. in Gracch.

¹ Plutarch records, as striking proofs of the great esteem Tiberius was in at Rome, the offer, which at an Augural feast, Appius Claudius, then President of the Senate, (and who had been Consul and Censor) made him of his daughter in marriage; and the answer which Appius received from his wife, when he acquainted her, at his return home, with what he had done. As soon as he entered his house, he called out “Antistia, I have promised our daughter Claudia in marriage.” Why in such haste (said the mother greatly astonished) have you promised her to Tiberius Gracchus?

² Vita innocentissimus, ingenio florentissimus, proposito sanctissimus, tantis denique adornatus virtutibus, quantis perfecta, & naturâ & industriâ, mortalis conditio recipit.—Vell. Pat. l. 2.

³ Ti. Gracchus convellit statum civitatis: qua gravitate vir! qua eloquentia!

qua dignitate! nihil ut a patris, avique Africanæ præstabili insignique virtute, præterquam quod a senatu desciverat, deflexisset. Or. de Harusp. resp. c. 19.

¹ Ad quem [tribunatum] ex invidia fœderis Numantini bonis iratus [Tiberius] accesserat (Cicer. Brut. c. 27.) Nam Tiberio Graccho, invidia Numantini fœderis, cui feriendo, Quæstor C. Mancini Consul cum esset, interfuerat; & in eo fœdere improbando senatus severitas dolori, & timori fuit: istaque res illum fortem & clarum virum, a gravitate patrum desciscere coegit. Id. de Harusp. resp. c. 20.

² Immanem dedicio Mancini civitatis movit dissensionem: quippe T. Gracchus, —quo Quæstore & auctore id fœdus ictum erat, nunc graviter ferens aliquid a se factum infirmari, nunc similis vel judicii vel pœræ metuens discrimen, tribunus plebis creatus—descivit a bonis—Vell. Pat. l. 2.

1. 5. 6. 7.
2. 1. 2. 3.
3. 4. 5. 6.

For, crossing Hetruria, in his way to Spain, he observed, that there were no other husbandmen or labourers in the country, than slaves and foreigners. And (according to Plutarch) the people, by writings affixed to the porticos, walls, and tombs, daily exhorted Tiberius to procure the restitution of the public lands to the injured poor.

Ann. 6.
F. 1. 2. 3.
L. 1. 2. 3.
333.

From the earliest times of Rome, it had been the custom of the Romans, when they subdued any of the nations in Italy, to deprive them of a part of their territory. A portion of these lands was sold, and the rest given to the poorer citizens; on condition, says Appian, of their paying annually a tenth of the corn and a fifth of the fruits of trees, besides a certain number of great and small cattle. In process of time, the rich, by various means, got possession of the lands destined for the subsistence of the poor. This gave occasion to the law obtained by Licinius Stolo, about the year of Rome 356, forbidding any Roman citizen to hold more than 500 acres of land, or to have, upon his estate, more than 100 great and 500 small cattle; and requiring that a certain number of freemen, natives of the country, should be employed to cultivate the farms: Which law confirmed by oath, subjected the transgressors of it to a fine, besides the forfeiture of all their lands beyond the proportion allowed. But notwithstanding these precautions, the Licinian law (observed for some time to the great benefit of the public) fell at length under a total neglect. The rich and the mighty contrived to possess themselves of the lands of their poor neighbours. At first they held these acquisitions under borrowed names; afterwards, openly, in their own. To cultivate the farms, they employed foreign slaves; so that Italy was in danger of losing its inhabitants of free condition, (who had no encouragement to marry, no means to educate children) and of being overrun with slaves and barbarians, that had neither affection for the Republic, nor interest in her preservation.

P. 1. 2. 3. 4.
Græch. A.
Cicer. A.
Cic. Quæst.
L. 4. 5.

Tiberius Gracchus, now a Tribune of the people, undertook to remedy these disorders. He communicated his project to some of the most virtuous and respectable men in Rome, and had their approbation. Among these were his father-in-law Appius Claudius, who, according to Plutarch, surpassed all the Romans of his time in prudence; Crassus, the Pontifex Maximus; and the Consul Mucius Scaevola, esteemed a wise man and an able Civilian. The same Historian reports, that, to soften the matter, Tiberius proposed, not only to remit the fines hitherto incurred by the transgressors of the Licinian law, but also, out of the public money, to pay to the present possessors the price of the lands that were to be taken from them^m.

^l Plutarch tells us, that Laelius, the friend of Scipio, made some efforts [in his tribuneship] to cure the evils occasioned by the breach of the Licinian law; but dropt the design, fearing the prosecution of it would raise a sedition.

^m Appian says nothing of this compensation; nor does Plutarch take notice of an article mentioned by Appian: That each [emancipated] son of a family might hold 250 acres of land, though the father possessed 500.

Never,

Never, says Plutarch, was proposed a law more mild and gentle, against iniquity and oppression: yet the rich made a mighty clamour about the hardship of being stript of their houses, their lands, their inheritances, the burial-places of their ancestors; the unspeakable confusion such innovations would produce, the estates in question [acquired by robbery] being settled upon the wives and children of the possessors. And, to raise an odium against Gracchus, they gave out, that ambition, not a view to the common good, had put him upon this project; and exclaimed against him in all places, as a disturber of the public peace. The poor, on the other hand, complained of the extreme indigence to which they were reduced, and of their inability to bring up children: They enumerated the many battles where they had fought in defence of the Republic; notwithstanding which, “they were allowed no share “ of the public lands: nay the usurpers, to cultivate them, chose “ rather to employ foreigners and slaves, than citizens of Rome.” Gracchus’s view was not to make poor men rich, but to strengthen the Republic, by an increase of useful members, upon which he thought the safety and welfare of Italy depended. The insurrection and war of the slaves in Sicily, who were not yet quelled, furnished him with sufficient argument for expatiating on the danger of filling Italy with slaves.

On the day when the tribes met to determine concerning the law, the Tribune, maintaining his cause, which was in itself just and noble, with an eloquence that would have set off a bad one, appeared to his adversaries terrible and irresistible. He asked the rich, whether they preferred a slave to a citizen; a man unqualified to serve in war to a soldier; an alien to a member of the Republic; and which, they thought, would be more zealous for its interest? Then, as to the misery of the poor; “The wild beasts of Italy have caves and dens to shelter them; “ but the people, who expose their lives for the defence of Italy, are “ allowed nothing but the light and air: They wander up and down “ with their wives and children, without house and without habitation. Our Generals mock the soldiers; when, in battle, they exhort “ them to fight for their sepulchres and their household Gods; for, “ amongst all that great number of Romans, there is not one who has “ either a domestic altar, or a sepulchre of his ancestors. They fight “ and die, solely to maintain the riches and luxury of others; and are “ stiled the Lords of the Universe, while they have not a single foot of “ ground in their possession.”

To discourses of this tenour, delivered with great spirit and a warmth unfeigned, and heard by the people with uncommon emotion, his adversaries durst not attempt to answer. Nor was it necessary; for they had, with much solicitation, engaged M. Octavius Cæcina, one of the Tribunes, a grave and modest man, and, hitherto, the friend of Tiberius, to oppose his measures. So that, when, by order of the latter,

Y. R. 612.
Bef. Chr.
132.
319 Cons.

App. de
B. II. Civ.
B. I. p.
355.

Plut. in Gracch.

App. p.
356.

Plut. in Gracch.

Y. R. 622.
E. R. C. 132.
314 C. 132.

L. 1. 132.
B. 132.

Plut. in Gracch.

the law was going to be read to the people for their acceptance, Octavius stood up and forbade the reading it. Tiberius made no farther effort to carry the law in question, but in the place of it proposed another, more severe against the rich; for it expressed, that whoever held above 500 acres of the public lands should be deprived of the overplus; and it contained no clause of compensation.

Before the day appointed for taking the suffrages of the tribes with regard to this new law, Octavius and Tiberius had many sharp disputes in the assemblies of the people, each maintaining his opinion with much warmth and vehemence, yet not a word escaping from either, which could give the other offence.

Tiberius published an edict, suspending all magistrates from the exercise of their functions, till the law should be either passed or rejected by the people; and subjecting to large fines those who should disobey his edict. And that the Quæstors might not have access to the public money, he shut up the temple of Saturn, where it was kept, and put his own seal upon the door. The faction of the rich appeared in public, in their dirtiest clothes, and with dejected countenances, to move compassion; in secret, they laid snares for Tiberius, and hired people to murder him; which he being apprised of, carried a dagger under his robe, but so that every body might see it, and thereby know that he apprehended an assassination.

OF the ten Tribunes, Octavius alone took part with the insolent and oppressive nobles, to obstruct the reformation of their abuses of power.

^a Plutarch imputes this moderation, and politeness of the disputants to a happiness of nature, and a good education: Yet immediately adds, that "Tiberius, knowing how nearly the law affected his colleague, as possessing a great deal of land, offered out of his own private fortune (which was not very great) to compensate him, (if he would desist from his opposition) for what he should lose by the execution of the law." An offer, which, one would naturally think, could have no place in an intercourse between two men so polite, and so careful to avoid saying anything offensive.

The same historian tells us, that when the people met to give their suffrages with regard to the law, it was found that the rich had conveyed away the urns; which caused a great confusion and tumult, threatening dangerous consequences. Whereupon two men of Consular dignity, throwing themselves at the feet of the Tribune, begged of him, with tears in their eyes, to desist from his undertaking. Tiberius, well aware of what mischiefs might happen from the present disorder, and having a great respect for these two persons, asked them, what they would have him do. They answered, that they were not qualified to give advice in an affair of such importance; and pressed him to consult with the Senate; to which he readily agreed. But when he found that the Fathers came to no determination, because of the ascendant which the rich had in that assembly, he formed the resolution of deposing Octavius from his office.

If Plutarch here means the urns that held the tablets for voting, he must be mistaken; for the people did not vote by tablets in enacting or abrogating laws, till the tribuneship of Papirius Carbo (Cic. de Legib. l. 3. c. 16.) which was not till two years after this time. And what temptation could there be to convey away the urns, if Octavius was ready to interpose?

Plutarch is the only author who mentions this affair of the urns.

Tiberius, in presence of an assembly of the commons, earnestly entreated him to concur with their desires, and to grant, as a favour to the Roman people, what they had so much right to demand; and which, if obtained, would be but a small recompence for the fatigues they underwent, and the dangers to which they exposed themselves for the safety of the Republic. Finding the dissentient Tribune immoveably fixed in his resolution, he then loudly declared, that he saw no way of putting an end to the important dispute between them, but by deposing the one or the other from the Tribuneship. He added, Do you, Octavius, first gather the votes of the people with regard to me: If it be agreeable to them, I am ready to resign my office, and become a private man. Octavius rejecting the expedient, the other replied, If you persist in your opposition, I will certainly move the Comitia to depose you. I give you till to-morrow to consider of what part you will act.

Y. R. 620.
Esf. Chr.
132.
319 Conf.

Accordingly, the Tribes being assembled the next day, Tiberius mounted the Rostra; and, having once more, in vain, exhorted his colleague to a compliance with the people's desire, put the question to them, Whether Octavius should be removed from the office of Tribune? Of the five and thirty tribes, when seventeen had given their voices against him, Tiberius, who would fain have avoided these extremities, interrupted the voting: He embraced him, he conjured him, in the most pressing terms, not to expose himself, by his obstinacy, to so great a dishonour, nor to bring upon him the reproach of having degraded his colleague and his friend. Octavius is said to have been so far moved, that tears came into his eyes, and he continued for some time silent; but casting a look towards the rich, there present, and, probably, thinking he should be despised if he failed them, he at length answered Tiberius, That he might proceed, and do as he pleased.

The deposed Tribune was instantly compelled to leave the Rostra; the angry multitude insulted him, and, perhaps, would have gone greater lengths if the Grandees (whose victim he had made himself) and even Tiberius had not protected him, and favoured his retreat.

No obstacle now remaining, the law passed: And it being resolved that Triumvirs, or three Commissioners, should be constituted for the execution of it, the people named, to that employment, Tiberius himself, his father-in-law, Appius Claudius, and Caius Gracchus, who at this time was in Spain, serving under Scipio in the Numantine war. These Triumvirs were to examine and judge what lands belonged to the Public, as well as to make the intended distribution of them. Into the place of Octavius the people chose one Mummius, a client of Tiberius.

Liv. Ep'le
1. 58.

* This example, given by T. Gracchus, was afterwards imitated by the Tribune A. Gabinus, when his Colleague L. Trebellius opposed the passing a decree for committing to Pompey the conduct of the piratic war, with exorbitant powers, unknown to the laws. Gabinus moved to have Trebellius deposed from his office; and 17 of the 35 Tribes had already voted against him, when he withdrew his opposition.

The

The Senate, highly exasperated by these successes of the Tribune, put upon him all the efforts in their power. They refused him, as Tribune, a tunica: a favour usually granted to those who executed much lighter commissions for the public. And (at the instigation of Scipio Nasica) they would allow him, for his expences, no more than nine denarii a day.

Attalus Philometus, King of Pergamus, a madman, dying at this time, left the Roman people heir of all his goods*. Tiberius laid hold of this occasion to propose a law, importing, that the King's treasure should be divided among the poorest of the citizens to enable them to stock their new farms. As to the cities and territories of Pergamus, the Tribune declared, that to dispose of them did not belong to the Senate; but was the prerogative of the people.

This was a mortifying stroke to the Conscrip Fathers. One of them, named Pompeius, rising up in the assembly, said, he was Tiberius's neighbour, and knew, for certain, that the Deputy from Pergamus had brought Attalus's diadem and purple robe, and privately given them to the Tribune, as to a man who would soon be King in Rome. Q. Metellus reproached Tiberius with suffering himself to be lighted home, by poor citizens, when he supped abroad; whereas his father used modestly to have the torches put out, on such occasions, that it might not be known he kept ill hours. These were idle discourses. Of all the actions of Tiberius, that which had given his enemies the greatest advantage against him, and is said to have displeased many of his own party, was his deposing Ostacius†. The Tribune therefore thought it proper to vindicate this part of his conduct in a set speech to the people.

The chief heads of his justification were these: “A Tribune is indeed a sacred and inviolable magistrate, because he is consecrated to the protection of the people and the support of their interest. But if, forgetting the design of his institution, he injures the people, instead of protecting them; if he weakens their power, and hinders them from giving their suffrages, he then forfeits the honours and privileges conferred upon him; because he acts contrary to the end for which he received them. Must a Tribune be suffered to demolish the Capitol and burn our arsenals? And yet if he did these things, he would still be a Tribune; whereas he ceases to be such, when he destroys and overturns the power of the people.—The regal dignity, comprehending the authority of all other magistrates, was made sacred by the most august ceremonies of religion; nevertheless, the Roman people, to punish the lust and violence of a single man, not only ex-

* By virtue of this heirship the Romans seized the kingdom of Pergamus, as a part of Attalus's goods. Mitridates of Pontus, in a letter to Artabanus, King of the Parthians, calls the will an impious and forged will. Sallust. Fragm. l. 4.

† Cicero imputes the ruin of Tiberius to this alone. Cic. de Leg. l. 3. c. 10.

“ pelled the King, but suppressed that sovereign power, under which “ Rome was founded. What is more sacred and venerable in Rome, “ than the Vestals? Yet if any Vestal transgress, she is buried alive, “ without mercy; because, by her impiety, she loses the sacred cha“ racter which she acquired by being dedicated to the Gods. In like “ manner, a Tribune, when he sins against the people, forfeits that in“ violable character with which he was vested solely on their account. If “ the majority of the Tribes have a power to create a Tribune, it surely “ can never be a question, whether all the Tribes have a power to depose “ him.—And, that a Tribune may lose his sacred character, even be“ fore the expiration of his year, is evident from the example of those,
 “ who, at their own request, have been permitted to divest themselves “ of it.”

Y. R. 620.
 Ref. Chr.
 132.
 319 Conf.

The friends of Tiberius judging, from the menaces and cabals of the great, that his life would be in danger, as soon as he should become a private man, put him upon the project of getting himself continued in the tribuneship for another year. To dispose the people to favour his pretensions, he gave them a prospect of several new laws, much to their advantage. One was for diminishing the number of years the soldiers were obliged to serve. Another established the right of appeal to the people from the judgments of all the magistrates. By a third he proposed that the judges in civil causes should be one half Knights and not all Senators, as hitherto. Velleius Paterculus adds, that Gracchus promised the freedom of Rome to all the Italians.*

Pl. t. in Gracch.

Appian relates, that on the day of election, when the two first Tribes had given their votes for Tiberius, the partizans of the rich made a mighty uproar, crying out, it was against law for the same person to be Tribune two years together. These clamours so terrified Rubrius Varro, who presided in the Comitia, that he would have resigned his place to Mummius (the successor of Octavius;) but the other Tribunes opposed it, alledging that since Varro had resigned, it ought to be determined by lot, who should be President in his room. The contention growing high, and Tiberius finding his party the weaker, put off the election to the next day†.

De Bell.
 Civ. l. 1.
 p. 358.

Early in the morning, when he was about to repair to the Capitol, he is reported to have had some unlucky omens, which made him doubt whether he should go or not: But several messengers coming to him from his friends, who pressed him to hasten to the assembly, where,

* According to Dio Cass. ap. Vales. p. 622. Tiberius proposed to get his father-in-law, Appius Claudius, chosen to the Consulship, and his brother, Caius Gracchus, to the Tribuneship.

† Plutarch makes no mention of this contest among the Tribunes for the Presidentship, but says that Tiberius and his party, finding themselves the weaker, because all the people were not present, [it being harvest-time] began to quarrel with the other Tribunes, in order to gain time; and that Tiberius at length adjourned the assembly.

they

V. R. 660
 P. 100
 C. 100
 P. 100
 C. 100

they assured him, he would have the majority, he went without further hesitation. The people, the moment they saw him, broke out into shouts of joy and applause. Soon after he had got to his place, a Senator, his friend, passing with much difficulty through the croud, gave him notice, That the great and rich of the Senate (then assembled in a temple hard by) had used all their efforts to draw the Consul into their party; that, not succeeding, they had resolved, without his assistance, to murder the Tribune; and that, for this purpose, they had drawn together a great number of their friends and slaves, all armed. Tiberius having communicated this advice to those that were nearest him, they girded up their gowns, and prepared to defend him in the best manner they could. They had no arms, but what they could hastily provide themselves with, by breaking the long staves of Apparitors or Serjeants into short truncheons. Those of the multitude who were at a distance, astonished at this motion, called out to know the reason of it. Tiberius, not being able to speak loud enough to be heard, touched his head with his hand, in order to make them conceive that his life was in danger. Instantly some of his enemies ran to the Senate, and reported, that the Tribune openly demanded a Crown; in proof of which, they alledged, that he had put his hand to his head. On these important tidings, Scipio Nasica, who possessed much of the public lands, and was extremely unwilling to part with them, addressing himself to the Consul, Mucius Scaevola, urged him to give immediate assistance to the state, and destroy the tyrant. Scaevola answered with great calmness, that he would not be the first author of a tumult, nor would he put any citizen to death, before legal condemnation. Hereupon Nasica, flaming with wrath, turned to the Senators, and said, Since the chief Magistrate betrays and abandons the Republic, let those, who have any regard for the laws, follow me. At the same time he gathered up his robe, and with the Senate at his heels, together with that multitude of clients and slaves, who, armed with clubs, had held themselves ready for action, ran furious to the Capitol. Few among the people had the boldness to withstand the venerable rage of the Conscrip Fathers; who, snatching up the feet and other pieces of benches, broken by the croud in their hasty flight, and dealing blows to the right and left, pushed on towards Tiberius. Those of his friends who had ranged themselves before him being partly slain, and the rest scattered, he himself fled; and, when somebody laid hold of his gown, left it in his hand, and continued to run; but, in his hurry, he stumpled, and fell upon others who had fallen before him. As he was recovering himself, P. Saturcius, one of his colleagues, gave him a mighty blow on the head with the foot of a bench; and a second blow, which, probably, dispatched him, he received from a man named L. Rufus, who afterwards gloried in the action. Above 300 of Tiberius's friends and adherents died with him in this tumult; mult; and, what is observable, not one of them was killed with a sword, but all with stones or clubs. The murderers threw the dead bodies into the Tiber. *Caius Gracchus, according to Plutarch, earnestly begged permission to bury his brother, but was refused: And the Historian gives this as a proof, that the nobles acted more from rage and personal hatred to Tiberius, than from any of their pretended motives. Nor was the fury of the faction yet assuaged: They made search after his friends: Those of them whom they could not apprehend they banished, and those who fell into their hands to put they death, without so much as the form of a legal process.

V. R. 623.
B. f. Chr.
132.
319 Cont.

All the public dissensions, which had hitherto arisen in Rome since the birth of the Republic, had been terminated by mutual concessions, and without effusion of blood; the people respecting the Senate, and the Senate fearing the people: But, upon this last occasion, the Conscrip Fathers took the fatal resolution of having recourse to arms and slaughter; and, to end the dispute, assassinated, before the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, a magistrate, whose person, by the laws, was sacred and inviolable.

When the people were recovered from their fright, the Senate, having cause to dread their anger, quietly suffered a new Commissioner, for the execution of the Agrarian law, to be elected in the room of Tiberius; and the choice to fall on P. Crassius, who had given his daughter in marriage to Caius Gracchus: A temporizing of the Fathers, not sufficient to appease the indignation of the multitude for the cruel violence done to their protector. Scipio Nasica, principal author of the late massacre, was the chief object of their resentment. The poorer citizens, whenever they met him in the publick streets, reproached him with murder and sacrilege, and threatened to bring him to a trial. Fearing therefore for his life, the Senate commissioned him to go into Asia, on pretended business, the disguise of a real banishment. And there, after a short time, oppressed with vexation and despair, he died.

CONCERNING the merits of this famous cause, various are the opinions of those who have written on the subject.

APPIAN, after relating the tragical death of Tiberius Gracchus, concludes with words to this effect. Thus Gracchus—pursuing with too much violence the best designs for his Country's good, was, while a Tribune, slain in the Capitol.

PLUTARCH approves of Tiberius's Agrarian law, but condemns, as illegal and unjust, his deposing Octavius, in order to get the law enacted.

According to CICERO, and his worshippers, both ancient and modern, Tiberius's CAUSE was unjust: He was a seditious man, and the criminal author of that tumult in which he lost his life.

* As Caius Gracchus is said to have been with the army in Spain, when he was elected one of the Triumvirs for dividing the public lands, we must suppose that he was sent home upon that occasion.

Y. B. 160.
A. C. 1.
1600.

I presume not to think myself a competent judge of the matter: but, as I have not yet been able to perceive any solid foundation for charging Tiberius with sedition, I shall here offer, under leave of the Reader, what occurs to me, as of council for the accused.

1601.
1602.
1603.
1604.
1605.

It is beyond dispute, that the nobles had, contrary to law, possessed themselves of the lands in question. The author of certain Political * Discourses, lately published, though he takes part against Tiberius, does, in the fullest and strongest terms, confess the injustice done to the people.

“ The provocation given by the nobles was indeed very great, and their “ oppressions shocking; as They were, in the face and defiance of all law “ and compassion, possessed of all that portion of the conquered lands, “ which was appointed for the subsistence of the poor plebeians, who “ had earned them with their swords. The usurpers were rioting in “ overgrown wealth, pomp, and luxury; whilst the poor Romans, who “ daily exposed their lives for the safety and aggrandizing of these their “ oppressors, by being deprived of their property, wanted bread.”

This author seems to have overlooked one article, in which the provocation given by the nobles was no less shocking than in those he has mentioned. Not content with robbing the people of their lands, they would not suffer them to earn their bread by their labour, in cultivating those lands. To make the most of their immense estates, the rich had peopled Italy with foreign slaves, men useless in war, and, by their numbers, dangerous in peace. So that the poor natives having no encouragement to marry, because no means to educate children, there must, in a few years, be such a diminution of the people, as would make it difficult to find Italian soldiers for the armies. Add to this the temptation, which a people, so oppressed and insulted, were brought under, to sell both their own and their country's liberty. Is it any wonder, that men, thus robbed and beggared by the nobles, should sell the nobles as soon as they could get money for them? In the second epistle (supposed to be from Sallust) to Cæsar, concerning the regulation of the Commonwealth, the writer ascribes the venality of the people to the wrongs they suffered.—“ Men of the low“ est rank, whether occupying their farms at home, or serving in the wars, “ were amply satisfied themselves, and gave ample satisfaction to their “ country, so long as they possessed what was sufficient to subsist them.
“ But when, being thrust out of possession of their lands by a gradual usurpation, “ they, through indigence and idleness [having nothing to do] could no longer “ have any fixed abodes, then they began to covet the wealth of other men,
“ and to put their own liberty and the Commonwealth to sale.”

BUT

“ Sed, ubi in paucitate expulsi agris, “ inertia atque inopia incertas domos habere “ integre cœpere alienas opes petere, li-“ bertatem suam cum republica vendem “ habere.” I insert these words of the original, because the ingenious translator, of the fragments of Sallust has, as I conceive, entirely perverted, through inattention, the meaning of the author in this passage. His translation runs thus:

“ But when once they degenerated from “ these courses; when, stripped of their in“ heritances

BUT though it be granted that the people had been illegally dispossessed of their lands, was it just, and, if just, expedient, to reclaim them at this time?

Y. R. 622.
Bef. Chr.
132.
310 Cont.

I know not whether prescription would, by any legislature, be allowed as a good plea for detaining a possession unquestionably usurped. Appian speaks of prescription and long possession in Licinius Stolo's time; yet this objection did not hinder the execution of his Agrarian law. Nor does it appear, that the nobles of Rome had any ground to offer the plea of prescription, when Tiberius Gracchus was Tribune. From a passage in the elder Cato's * speech to the Senate, in behalf of the Rhedians, one may fairly conclude, that the LICINIAN LAW, concerning estates, was at that time observed; or, at least, not grossly violated with impunity. "We all wish, says Cato, to have more than 500 acres of land: Yet we are not punished for wishing." And this was but 34 years before Tiberius's tribuneship. So that when Cicero speaks of 'possession for ages past, he seems to have no more foundation of truth, than when he calls Nasica, and his band of assassins, the Republic". The nobles had not the wealth to purchase, nor the power, by means of wealth, to usurp those large tracts of country, which they peopled with slaves; till, by the late conquests of Macedon and the Carthaginian dominions, there came a flow of riches to Rome. And agreeable to this is what Sallust says (in his history of the Jugurthine war) of the late birth of that distinction of the people and Senate into opposite factions. He makes it commence from the destruction of Carthage [about 12 years before Tiberius's tribuneship] and adds, that the faction of the nobles prevailing, "The commonalty were oppressed with penury and with serving in the armies, where all the plunder of the foe was purloined by the Generals, and a few grandees. Nay the parents and little children of these very soldiers were, at the same time, driven out of their rightful settlements, if they chanced but to border upon any man of sway." And this being the case, the expediency of applying, without delay, the proper remedy to an evil so dreadful, and that was every day increasing and taking deeper root, can require no words to evince it.

* 1. C. 1.
B. 1. c. 3.

Transl. of
S. H. M.
Gould,
p. 199.

I conclude therefore, both as to the right of the people's claim, and as to the reasonableness of it at this time, "That there could be nothing more just, nothing more equitable, or more conducing to mutual peace amongst fellow-citizens, and to the equality so necessary in a free state, where the overgrown riches, and consequently power of one, or a few, tend directly to the enthralling of all, than the ascertaining the

Pol. Disc.
p. 80.

"heritances through birth and poverty, they had no longer any fixed abode, &c."

autem habuit, amittit? Cic. de C. Lic. l. 2. c. 22.

* Quam autem habet aequitatem, ut agrum multi anni, aut etiam seculis ante possessum, qui nullum habent, habeat, qui Ab ipsa republica est interfectus [Tiberius Gracchus.] Cic. in Brut. c. 27.

Y. B. 122.
P. 122.
122.
122.

“Agrarian Law, and restoring the unjust lands to the injured and necessitous proprietors.”

It will not, I suppose, be questioned, whether it belonged to Tiberius, a Tribune of the people, a defender of their rights, to attempt the cure of a disorder directly tending to the ruin of public liberty.

But did he proceed in a legal and justifiable method of curing the dangerous disease? Yes; it was by acts of the legislative authority that he sought to restore the passed laws to their former force, and cut up among oppression by the state. He employed no force, no bribes. There were not then in use; and, if he had employed bribes, the author of the Discourses assures us, that “what sounds like corruption may not be corruption; and it is not so much the act, as the characters of men that constitute it.” The same, I suppose, might be said of force: What sounds like force may not be force, &c. But they are both out of the present question.

See Pol.
P. 122.
122.
122.

The deposing of Octavius was an act of that authority, upon which there can be no * controul. Cicero justifies the like design, in a case, where the whole Senate were against the project, for the sake of which a Tribune was going to be deposed, at the motion of one of his colleagues; I mean, the project of vesting Pompey with an unnecessary, and most enormous power, for conducting a war against the pirates *.

I can-

* That Cicero's authority, with regard to party-questions, ought to be of no weight with us (unless where he makes concessions to the advantage of the opposite party) is abundantly manifest from many passages in his writings; but never does he expose his partiality more, than on some occasions, when he mentions the Gracchi.

In his oration for Milo, he speaks of Tiberius's deposing his Colleague Octavius, as a seditious act, so dangerous to the State, that the persons who slew him for it, acquired thereby an incredible deal of glory. Non Sp. Maelum, &c. non T. Gracchum, qui Collegæ Magistratum per seditionem abrogavit: quorum interfectores implerunt orbem terrarum nominis sui gloria. Pro Mil. c. 27.

The Laws which Tiberius (a person of undisputed integrity at that time) proposed, being, by their nature, salutary Remedies for the Evils of the State; remedies against which there was no plausible objection, but the indisposition of the patient to make use of them, the Tribune had unquestionably the appearance, at least, of aiming at a very great public good, in deposing his Colleague. Yet, according to Cicero, he was deservedly slain for that act, and his murderers were heroes of the first class.

The unprecedented commission, desired for Pompey, had a manifest tendency to destroy all the remains of liberty and equality in the Republic: Yet, (according to the same Cicero) Gabinus (whom he sometimes inveighs against as one of the most consummate knaves of his time) was a brave and excellent Patriot, when, to carry that point, he undertook to depose his only dissentient Colleague, Trebellius, and (as the Orator expresses it) would not suffer the opposition of a single man to prevail against the will and voice of THE WHOLE STATE. And it is worthy to be observed that this WHOLE STATE does not include the SENATE; for the SENATE were against the Gabinian Law; and Trebellius had promised them, that he would die rather than suffer it to pass.—Vir fortis Aulus Gabinius, in re optima fecit omnia; neque, cum salutem populo Romano, atque omnibus gentibus finem diuturnæ captivitatis, turpitudinis et servitutis afferret, passus est plus unius Collegæ sui, quam universæ civitatis,

Chap. VII. The ROMAN HISTORY.

I cannot therefore but wonder at the following passages in the Discourses above quoted:

“ I dread

Vol. ix. p. 27.
De Leg. 3. 10.
319 Conf.

entatis, vocem valere et voluntatem. Cic. pro Corneli. l.

Asinius's note upon this passage is as follows.

Manifestum est de ea lege C. rorum nunc dicere, quâ Cn. Pompeius bellam ad eum piratas datum est. L. autem Trebellius Tribunus Plebis quem non nominat: quo perseverante intercedere (nam Senatui promiserat, moriturum se ante quam illa lex periretur) intro vocare videtur Gabinus cepit, ut Trebellius Magistratum abrogaret, sicut quendam Tib. Gracchus Tribunus M. Octavius Collegæ suo Magistratum abrogavit. Et aliquandiu Trebellius eâ re non preteritus aderat, peritabatque in intercessione, quod omnia magis, quam perseveraturum esse Gabinum, arbitrabatur. Sed postquam X. et VII. tribus rogationem acceperunt, et una mens esset Populi, qui supererat, ut iussum conficeret, remisit intercessionem Trebellius; atque ita legem Gabinus de piratis persequendis pertulit.

After this instance of Cicero's Plowden-justice, 'tis pleasant to observe the seriousness with which M. Rollin, on the present occasion, produces a sentence of Cicero, as if it was oracular.

“ All that Tiberius had done hitherto “ (says M. Rollin) had at least the appearance of justice. But by an unprecedented, unheard of enterprise, to depose a Magistrate, whose person was sacred and inviolable, and this merely because he had made use of a privilege annexed to his office, was an action which immediately shocks the mind of every man. It is very obvious that Tiberius, thereby, entirely exalted the authority of the Tribuneship, and deprived the Commonwealth of a resource infinitely useful in times of trouble and division. For, as Cicero observes, What College is so desperately mad, that, of ten persons who compose it, not one is in his right senses? [Quod enim est tam desperatum Collegium. in quo nemo e decem sana mente sit?] Now the opposition of a single Tribune was sufficient to frustrate the evil intentions of the other nine. This Right of Opposition therefore was the “ Safeguard of the Republic, and Tiberius, by annihilating it, gave a mortal wound to the State.”

It would be affronting the Reader to expose, by a long comment, the weakness of what is here said. But it should be observed,

1. That Octavius cannot properly be said to have been deposed, merely for making use of a privilege annexed to his office, but for traiterously abusing that privilege. It is obvious to every one, that there is no Magistrate, who may not use the privileges annexed to his office, as to make it necessary to depose him.

2. That by the words, exalting the authority of the Tribuneship, our reverend author cannot mean exalting the authority of the College of Tribunes; for that was rather strengthened and augmented by the act of deposing Octavius. Nor can our author, by the words annihilating the Right of Opposition, mean any thing more, than that the People, at the motion of Tiberius, made a solemn declaration (enforced by an example) against the indestructibility of a Tribune's right to hold his office a whole year. For that the right of a Tribune, (while a Tribune) to oppose and obstruct his Collegues measures, still remained, and was occasionally used with effect, we have not only the example, above-mentioned, of Trebellius, but a notable instance in the affair of Jugurtha, when the Tribune Ælius had the matchless impudence to make himself a screen to the corrupt nobles, who had sold the troops and the honour of their country to the African King. Ælius made use of the privilege annexed to his office to hinder the King from declaring the persons, with whom he had trafficked; though the whole assembly of the People expressed their earnest desires of a discovery. And by this instance we see in what sense we are to understand Cicero, when he speaks of a single Tribune's Right of Opposition to the measures of his Collegues united, as useful to the Republic. It was very useful to the Aristocratical Faction: For it would not often happen, that the College of Tribunes should be so universally honest, that not one of

See the Note in p. 525.

Vol. ix. l. 27.

De Leg. 3. 10.

Y. R. 620.
B. C. 121.
3rd Cons.

P. 79.

P. 12.

" I dread all such reformati-
" ons as are only to be effected by the ar" bitrary will and unaccountable humour of one man, by a power too " not delegated, but taken. I would rather see many abuses subsist, " than a Cromwell, a Pis, a Cæsar, or (if you will) a Gracchus,
" assuming lawless power to redress them.

" Is it not more eligible to suffer certain diseases in the body politic, even " certain great diseases, than to attempt to remove them by an expedient,
" much more likely to destroy than to reform it; or which, if it reform
" one abuse, yet tends to introduce the most horrible of all evils and " abuses, even tyranny and servitude? Now what is it that introduces " this greatest of all corruptions and calamities, but the power of one " man to do what he pleases? And was not Tiberius Gracchus that " man?"

P. 12.
1st A. 10.
C. 11.

I answer, No; he was not that man. He had not the power to do all the good he pleased; and it does not appear that he had the power to do any public evil whatsoever. If he assumed the supreme power in effect; if he was King for some months, as Cicero pretends, yet it is plain, from the history of his tribuneship, that he had no subjects to fight for him, and his supreme power was not a coercive one.

P. 12.
1st A. 10.
C. 11.

Doubtless it required great authority to effect so great good as Tiberius had in view: " Because the evil was far spread; all the great men
" in the Commonwealth were engaged in pride and interest to support
" it, and to oppose every remedy: since what removed That, must " reduce Them; and terribly shorten their property, their figure and " authority."

Yet Tiberius, to cure this far spread evil, assumed no lawless power.
Except the legal power annexed to his office of Tribune, he had no power but what his eminent virtue, and manifest zeal for the public good, acquired him over the minds of the people. This indeed was great.

the ten could be corrupted. Now the opposition of a single Tribune was sufficient to frustrate the Good Intentions of the other Nine.

See p. 120.

It may not be improper, while I am justifying the conduct of Tiberius, to take notice of the clamour raised by the nobles, when he stood for a second Tribuneship.
Had Tiberius been re-elected to that office, it would have been just and constitutional, though it be granted that a law was subsisting against such re-election. The Romans, without repealing their laws, frequently dispensed with them in the election of magistrates. They had done it before, within a few years, in favour of Sci- pius the younger. They had a natural and reasonable right so to do; and the Senate themselves approved of such dispensing with the laws, when they thought it for the good of the State, or when it would serve any purpose of their own ambition.

When, in the year of Rome 397, the Comi- tia, through the influence of the Senate, were choosing two Patricians to the Consul-ship, in violation of the Lex law, which required, that there should be always one plebeian Consul; and when the Tribune, for that reason, opposed the proceeding, the Interrex, who presided in the assembly, answered, That, by a law of the twelve Tables, whatever the people accused last, was law; and the votes of the people were their decree. Ut quodcumque populum populus jussisset, id jus ratumque esset, jussu populi et suffragia esse.
Lex. B. 7. c. 17. The Tribunes acquiesceded, and the two Patricians were declared Consuls.

But,

But, surely, no power can be more lawful, more salutary to a State, or less to be dreaded. "A virtuous man can never endanger liberty nor hurt society.—Morality, with sense, is the only true standard of popularity, and the only just recommendation to it."

Now, that Tiberius was a virtuous man, and had morality with sense, we have the testimony of the warmest advocates for the Aristocratical faction. Both Cicero and Paterculus extol the talents and virtue of this Tribune; nor has either the one or the other of those writers any thing to object to him, but that he fell off from the honest party, he fell off from the Senate [descivit a bonis, descivit a senatu:] That is, he quitted the faction of the oppressors of their country, men determined to proceed in a course that was contrary to all law and compassion, and directly tended to enslave Rome.

And it seems, it was through want of wisdom that Tiberius persisted in the thought of humbling this imperious, oppressive faction. "Lælius, (says the writer of the Political Discourses) that accomplished Roman, the celebrated friend of the great Scipio Africanus, as virtuous and public-spirited a man as either of the Gracchi, and, I think, more wise, was sensibly touched with the same grievances, which so much piqued Them, and, whilst he was a Tribune of the people, conceived a design to cure them; but gave it over upon a view of its extreme difficulty and peril. Had he seen any prospect of succeeding, by methods that were not desperate and threatening to the Commonwealth, it is likely he would have pursued his intention. Surely the temptation was great to an honest and humane mind, to make the

* To what has been already mentioned (p. 521.) in proof of the high esteem, in which Tiberius was held, for sound judgment and integrity of heart, may be added the story concerning his intimate friend, Blossius of Cuma, as related by Plutarch.

After the death of the Tribune, Blossius, who had been one of his agents, was seized, carried before the Consuls and examined. He readily confessed that he had done whatever Tiberius had directed him to do.—But (says Nasica) what if he had ordered you to set fire to the Capitol? Blossius answered; Tiberius was not capable of giving me such an order. All present persisting to press him with the same question, he at length boldly said; If Tiberius had commanded me to set fire to the Capitol, I should have thought it my duty to obey him; being firmly persuaded, that he would not have given me that command but for the good of the People.

Cicero, in his discourse de Amicitia, makes Lælius relate the same story, with some difference of circumstances, representing Blos- sius, not as judicially examined by the Consuls, but as privately interrogated by Lælius, whose protection he was come to ask. Lælius, upon the mention of Blossius's answer (Paruissim) cries out, Quid accicked anjaur! [Videtur quam nefaria vox.] Yet if Blossius had expressed the like implicit confidence in the wisdom and virtue of Scipio Æmilianus, it is possible, that Cicero would not have inferred any thing from it to the disadvantage of Blossius, and would have inferred much to the advantage of Scipio.

2 When Cicero [de Harusp. Resp. c. 20.] imputes Tiberius's forsaking the honest party to his resentment against the Senate, for their breaking the Numantine league, which had been negotiated by him; it seems just as candid and pertinent, as it would have been in Catiline, to impute the Consul's zeal, against him and his machinations, to personal hatred; because the conspirator had been Cicero's competitor for the consulship.

Y. B. 1. c.
Ecl. Chr.
1. 2.
319 Conf.

P. 11.

Cic. de Harusp.
Resp. c. 19.
Vid. Pat.
l. 2.

Pol. Dis.
p. 80.

" rich

“ rich and wanton restore the bread, which they had robbed from the “ poor and innocent, to cut up daring oppression by the roots, to restore “ the banished laws to their former force, and to establish a just and equal “ administration in a free Commonwealth. But he would not attempt “ what he foresaw no man could accomplish without making himself “ master of all the rest; and particular acts of injustice, perhaps, seemed “ to him more tolerable than the tyranny, that is, the power, of one over “ all. The Gracchi actually assumed and exercised that power, which,
 “ had not they been destroyed, would, in all likelihood, have destroyed
 “ the Republic.”

Liberty and the Republic are cant-words, where the bulk of a people have neither property, nor the privilege of living by their labour. Did our laws allow of any slavery in this island; and should the landed gentlemen, the proprietors of large estates, in order to make the most of them, take them out of the hands of their tenants, and import Negroes to cultivate the farms; so that the British husbandmen and labourers, far from having any encouragement to marry, had no means to subsist: Would an universal practice of this sort be called particular acts of injustice? And could no public-spirited, popular man attempt a cure of this evil, without being seditious, because the evil was far spread, and he knew, that the great and the rich were engaged in pride and interest to support it, and to oppose every remedy? And the case in question was much stronger than what is here put; the lands, which the poor Romans were not suffered to cultivate, being of right their own, and detained from them by daring usurpers and oppressors.

But, according to the writer of the Political Discourses, the future evils to be apprehended from the cure of the present, were greater than the present; because this cure no man could accomplish, without making himself master of all the rest: And so Laelius would not attempt it, because he would by no means be master of all the rest; the present evils, perhaps, seeming to him more tolerable, than his having power over all. I can hardly believe that Laelius was diverted, by this consideration, from attempting, when Tribune, to succour and set free, by wholesome laws, the distressed and enslaved plebeians. Is it not much more probable, that fear for his own safety, his fear of the resentment of the rich oppressors, got the better of his patriot inclinations? And perhaps his connexion with that same Scipio Africanus, who was so much a party-man, and had so little virtue, as to approve of his cousin's introducing armed slaves into an assembly of the legislature and murdering a Tribune, had no small influence in determining the conduct of the public-spirited man, more wily than either of the Gracchi.

I might here ask, how came Laelius to foresee so clearly, that the cure of the present evil no man could accomplish, without making himself master of all the rest? According to Plutarch, the men of the highest highest reputation at Rome, for virtue and sound judgment, did not foresee this terrible consequence. Among these were *Mucius Scævola*¹, an eminent Civilian, and then Consul; Appius Claudius, President of the Senate; and Crassus [soon after] Pontifex Maximus. We do not find, that Licinius Stolo (a man not so virtuous as Tiberius Gracchus, not so pure in his motives, nor so justifiable in his proceedings) either aimed at the tyranny, or was thought to aim at it; though his adversaries might, perhaps, in passion throw out words of that import. He achieved his enterprize, and to the advantage of the public. His laws produced that union at home, which made the Romans so successful in their wars abroad; an union, that was never totally broke, till, by the gradual, but at length outrageous violation of his Agrarian law, oppression became intolerable.

Y. R. 610.
Bef. Chr.
1, 2.
319 Cons.

To the question, put by our author, “What is it that introduces this “greatest of all corruptions and calamities [tyranny and servitude] but
“the power of one man to do what he pleases?” I answer, (in his own manner) The power of a few to do what they please. The rich nobles had usurped this power. And Gracchus’s attempt, therefore, was to overturn a power which, if not overturned, would introduce the greatest of all corruptions and calamities, tyranny and servitude. “In a free “state—the overgrown riches, and consequently power of one, or a “few, tend directly to the enthralling of all;”—and “there could “therefore be nothing more just, nothing more equitable, or more con“ducing to mutual peace among fellow citizens, and to the equality so “necessary in a free state—than the ascertaining the Agrarian law, and “restoring the usurped lands to the injured and necessitous proprietors.

Pol. Disc.
p. 80.

BUT, though “the professions of the Gracchi were plausible; and “the open and daring abuses of the nobility furnished them with fair “pretences,—Who knows their intentions?”

Pol. Disc.
p. 79.

We commonly judge of men’s intentions by their known characters, their past conduct, the nature of their new undertakings, and the means they employ to accomplish them. Now, in all these respects, Tiberius, as we have seen, stands in the fairest light. I am not speaking of Caius. If the latter, from an eager desire to revenge the murder of a brother, was carried to some excesses, this affects not the present question. Tiberius, TO SAVE THE STATE, did some things that were out of the ordinary methods, but nothing unjustifiable, or unconstitutional. And to say, that, by procuring such benefits to the people as he proposed, he would have acquired that tyranny over them, from which the benefits themselves were a natural preservative, would not be very logical. His purpose was not gal condemnation, yet] after Tiberius was killed, defended, as a just action, a private man’s taking arms for that end. But are we to believe every thing, that Cicero relates of party-matters?

¹ Cicero (in Orat. pro Planc. c. 36.) would persuade us, that Scævola changed his opinion, and that he [who did not think, that his office of Consul authorised him to put any citizen to death, before le-

Y. R. 612
Z. 1. 1. 1.
389 C. 1. 1.

to enrich legionary soldiers under his command and at his devotion; but to rescue the poor Romans from misery and oppression, raise them above all temptation to sell what yet remained of their liberty, and re-instate them in the possession of what they had lost of it. In a word, the reformations he undertook were in their own nature (as our author speaks) conducing to that equality so necessary in a free state.

I could wish, that a writer, who makes this concession, had told us, how that equality, so necessary in a free state, could have been preserved, or rather restored, in Rome, without such reformation as Tiberius had in view; and, if such reformations were needful for restoring such necessary equality, by what other means they could have been brought about, than by the efforts and influence of one or a few such men as Tiberius Gracchus (many such were never to be found living, at the same time, in any one nation of the world :) Or whether we must adhere to this maxim, That it is more eligible, to have far spread evils, abuses directly tending to enslave a people, subsist, than to incur the danger of slavery, by suffering one, or a few, virtuous, public-spirited men to live, if they happen to be possessed of so much authority as is necessary to accomplish the cure of those evils and abuses.

It is asserted in the Discourses (as we have seen) that “the Gracchi” “assumed that power, which, if they had not been destroyed, would “in all likelihood have destroyed the Republic.” I have already observed, that there appears no proof of Tiberius’s assuming any power: nor can I see that the power, he had, would, in all likelihood, have destroyed the Republic, if he himself had not been destroyed. But this, I imagine, every body must see, that the power assumed, by the Senate, to destroy Tiberius, did, in all certainty, destroy the Commonwealth.

And thus much the learned writer of the Life of Cicero has found himself obliged to allow. For though he treats both the Gracchi as seditious, yet he imputes the destruction of Roman liberty, not to their sedition, but to the measures taken by the Senate to suppress it.

D. 354.
P. 1. 1.
1. 1. 1.
1. 1. 1.
1. 1. 1.

“It must seem strange to observe, how those two illustrious brothers, who, of all men, were the dearest to the Roman people, yet “upon the first resort to arms [by the nobles,] were severally deserted “by the multitude, in the very height of their authority, and suffered “to be cruelly massacred in the face of the whole city: Which shews, “what little stress is to be laid on the assistance of the populace, when “the dispute comes to blows; and that sedition, though it may often “shake, yet will never destroy a free State, while it continues unarmed “and unsupported by a military force. But this vigorous conduct of the “Senate, though it seemed necessary” to the present quiet of the city, yet soon

* Not more necessary, I presume, to the present quiet of the city, than were, afterwards, Marius’s massacres and Sulla’s proscriptions, to the like quiet.

“after

“ after proved fatal to it ; as it taught all the ambitious, by a most sensible “ experiment, that there was no way of supporting an usurped authority, “ but by force : So that from this time, as we shall find in the following “ story, all those who aspired to extraordinary powers, and a domi“ nion in the Republic, seldom troubled themselves with what the Senate “ or people were voting at Rome, but came attended by armies to en“ force their pretensions, which were always decided by the longest sword.
 “ The popularity of the Gracchi was founded on the real affections “ of the people, gained by many extraordinary privileges and substantial “ benefits conferred upon them : But when force was found necessary
 “ to controul the authority of the Senate, and to support that interest, “ which was falsely called popular, instead of courting the multitude by “ real services and beneficial laws, it was found a much shorter way, to “ corrupt them by money ; a method wholly unknown in the times of the “ Gracchi ; by which the men of power had always a number of mer“ cenaries at their devotion, ready to fill the forum at any warning, who “ by clamour and violence carried all before them in the public assem“ blies, and came prepared to ratify whatever was proposed to them : this “ kept up the form of a legal proceeding ; while by the terror of arms, “ and a superior force, the great could easily support, and carry into “ execution, whatever votes they had once procured in their favour by “ faction and BRIBERY.”

Y. R. 629.
 Bef. Chr.
 319.
 319 Conf.

To this I shall only add, that it seems hard to conceive, how that BRIBERY, so fatal in its consequences, could possibly have been prevented, but by such regulations, as Tiberius Gracchus proposed : Regulations, which had they taken place, the ambitious would not have had the power they afterwards possessed, of corrupting ; nor the people, through indigence, have been tempted to barter their liberty for gold.
Tiberius doubtless foresaw, that the Commonwealth must perish, unless some effectual measures were taken to crush the monstrous heads of that oligarchy which already began to shew itself, and which, if not destroyed, would infallibly produce another monster, more hideous, if possible, Mo-narchic Despotism. The generous Tribune hazarded and lost his life in the pursuit of so glorious an enterprize ; and, if his character, his views, his conduct be impartially considered, I cannot imagine, but he must appear the most accomplished Patriot that ever Rome produced.

C H A P. VIII.

A brief relation of the servile war in Sicily.

After some years the slaves are quelled.

Aristonicus, having seated himself in the throne of Pergamus, is dispossessed by the Romans.

THE Consular Fasces were transferred to P. Popillius Lænas and
P. Rupilius. Rome had now no war abroad to sustain, but Z z z z

Y. R. 627.
 Bef. Chr.
 311.
 320 Conf.

against

Y. R. 621.
Bef. Chr.
131.
320 Conf.

Diod. Sicul.
in E-log.
B. 34.
F. 102, B.
3. c. 13.

against the revolted slaves in Sicily; a war which had already lasted some years, and was kindled upon the following occasion. The best estates in that country were in the hands of some rich men of the natives, and of the Roman knights (those opulent publicans) who, finding their account more in employing slaves, than husbandmen of free condition, to cultivate the farms, had transported such multitudes of slaves thither, that the island swarmed with them. The ill treatment these wretches suffered from their masters, who scarce allowed them necessary food or raiment, put them upon seeking, by rapine, what was needful for the support of life. They frequently went out in gangs, plundered villages, and exercised all kinds of violence. The several Prætors, successively sent from Rome into the island, had, out of fear of the masters to whom the slaves belonged, neglected doing any thing effectual to remedy these disorders: For the Roman knights were a powerful body, whom it was dangerous to disoblige. Impunity naturally increased the mischief; the slaves grew daily more licentious; and their going out in bands, to rob, gave them an opportunity of forming plots to deliver themselves from the yoke of servitude.

It happened that one Antigenes, a Sicilian, had a Syrian slave, named Eunus, a man of spirit, and who had a particular talent for imposing on the multitude. He pretended to have, by dreams and sensible apparitions, intercourse with the Gods. By breathing flames out of his mouth, and a variety of other juggling tricks, he got at length into such vogue as to pass for an oracle. Whole crouds came to him, to be told their fortunes. As to himself, he constantly published that his destiny was to be a King. His master, diverted with this whim, used frequently, when at table, to question him concerning his future royalty, and the manner in which he would treat each of the guests then present. According to his different answers, some insulted him, others sent him meat from the table, craving his future protection, when he should be upon his throne. The jest proved serious in the event, as we shall presently see, and Eunus did not forget the different treatment he had met with from his master's guests.

Among those who repaired to this prophet for advice, there came at length the slaves of one Damophilus of Enna, a man of a brutal character, and who had a wife no less inhuman. Cruelly treated by both, the slaves had formed a plot to murder both. However, before they proceeded to action, they thought it adviseable to ask the oracle of the country, Whether the Gods would prosper them in an enterprize they were meditating? Eunus answered, That whatever were their project, it was agreeable to the Gods, and would infallibly succeed, provided they did not defer the execution. The slaves, thereupon, to the number of 400, armed with forks and scythes, and other rustic weapons, assembled themselves in all haste, put Eunus at their head, and straight marched to Enna; where, being joined by the slaves of the town, they massacred massacred the inhabitants, without regard to age or sex, and plundered the houses. As for Damophilus, Eunus, to try him in form, erected, in the public theatre, a court of judicature, where he himself presided. Some of those slaves, whom the prisoner had treated barbarously, made themselves the accusers; and the multitude was judge. Damophilus pleaded earnestly for himself, and moved many to compassion; but Hermias and Zeuxis, two slaves, more spirited with revenge, and more audacious than the rest, approaching the accused, one of them, without farther ceremony, ran him through with a sword, and the other cut off his head with an ax. And now Eunus was elected king, not for his valour or skill in martial affairs, but on account of his pretended inspirations. He began his reign by putting to death all the prisoners, except such as could make arms, and those of his master's acquaintance who had used him civilly. He also gave up Damophilus's wife, Megallis, into the hands of her women slaves, who, when they had whipped and otherways tormented her as much as they pleased, threw her head-long down a precipice: But as for her daughter, who had always disapproved the barbarity of her parents, and shewed great compassion to the slaves, they treated her with all imaginable respect and tenderness, and conveyed her safely to Catana, where they delivered her into the care of some of her relations. Eunus with his own hands slew Pytho and Antigenes, the two masters he had successively served. After which, putting the regal circle on his head, and assuming the other ornaments of sovereignty, he took the name of Antiochus, and called his followers Syrians. His next affair was to establish a form of government among his subjects. He chose out some of the ablest men to be his council, and gave the command of his troops to an Achaean, an old soldier, who by his bravery and experience was qualified to command a better army. In three days, his followers increasing to more than 6000 men, he commenced his military expeditions. It was in the year of Rome 615, that this tumult began, Didius being then Prætor of Sicily. In 616, Manilius, who succeeded him, was defeated by the rebels, and his camp plundered. The like misfortune happened to P. Cornelius Lentulus in 617; and in 618, when Calpurnius Piso was Prætor, Eunus had still the advantage over the Romans. Three Prætors, thus vanquished successively by the slaves, struck a terror throughout the whole island. Eunus's army grew daily more numerous. Cleon, a Cilician slave, had taken it into his head to imitate him; and, having got together 5000 slaves, had pillaged Agrigentum, and the territory about it. It was hoped at first, that these two leaders would be competitors for dominion, and destroy one another; but, contrary to all men's expectations, they joined forces, and Cleon served as General under Eunus.

The Roman affairs were in this bad situation, when the Prætor Plautius Hypsæus, in the year 619, came into Sicily, to restore them. Far from succeeding, he suffered a total defeat by the rebels; whose army, after

Y. R. 621.
Bef. Chr.
131.
320 Conf.

Flor. B. 34
c. 9.

Died.
Sicul.
Eclog. B.
34.

Y. R. 619.
B. 1. c. 1.
310 C. 1.

after this victory, augmented to near 200,000 men, they ravaged the whole country, and took many cities.

O. 1. 3.
C. 1.

Y. R. 620.
B. 1. c. 1.
311 C. 1.

The example of the slaves in Sicily infected those in Italy and Greece, and occasioned insurrections there. These, however, were easily quelled. To reduce King Antiochus and his Syrians, the Senate, in the year 619, thought it expedient to send a Consular army, under the command of Julius, the colleague of Scipio. What fortune Fulcius had the Historians have not told us. His successor, Calpurnius Piso, one of the Consuls for the year 620, having first restored discipline, that was much relaxed among the troops, overthrew the slaves before Messana, to which they had laid siege: Eight thousand of them perished in the action, and the prisoners were all crucified. Notwithstanding this victory, the war continued, till Rupilius, one of the Consuls of the present year 621, had the command of the Roman forces. After his arrival in the island, he successively laid siege to Taurromenium and Enna, the strongest places in the possession of the slaves. Both were betrayed into his hands. Twenty thousand of the rebels are said to have been cut off. Ennus, with 500 of his guards, escaped from Enna, and took refuge in a steep rocky place. Being there invested by the Romans, and having no hope to escape, the 500 slew one another, to avoid a more painful death. King Ennus hid himself in a cave, whence he was quickly dragged out, together with his cook, his baker, the man that used to rub him when he bathed, and a buffoon, whose business had been to divert him at his meals. Rupilius sent him in chains to Murgentia; where, consumed with vermin, he miserably ended his days in prison.

Y. R. 622.
B. 1. c. 1.
312 C. 1.

Y. R. 623.
B. 1. c. 1.

Y. R. 624.
B. 1. c. 1.

THIS rebellion was no sooner suppressed, than the Republic entered upon a new war in Asia, to make good her claim to the country of Pergamus; a claim founded, as we have before observed, on the testament of Attalus Philometer. Arifonicus, a bastard brother of Attalus, assisted by the Tbracians from the other side of the Bosphorus, as likewise by a strong party of the Pergamenians, had got possession of the throne; and, to dispossess him, it was thought, at Rome, that no less than a Consular army would be requisite. But now a warm dispute arose between the Consuls, P. Licinius Crassus and L. Valerius Flaccus, for the honour of commanding in this expedition. Crassus, in virtue of his authority as Pontifex Maximus, subjected his colleague, who was Flamen, or priest of Mars, to a fine, in case he left his priestly functions. On the other hand, Valerius pretended, that a Supreme Pontif was, by his office, incapable of commanding an army out of Italy: And indeed there had been hitherto no example of it. The decision of the affair devolved at length upon the people; and then a third party appeared in favour of Scipio Africanus, lately arrived from Spain. Crassus carried his point. Scipio had for him the votes of only two tribes; and these were, perhaps, more than he had reason to expect, considering he was was now but a private man, and the people, in general, not well affected to him: For it was publicly known, that, when at Numantia he received the news of Tiberius's death, he repeated a line out of Homer to this effect:

Y. R. 622.
B. f. Chr.
110.
321 Conf.

Plato in Graco.

So perish all who imitate his crimes ^b.

He soon confirmed the multitude in their dislike to him. C. Papirius Carbo, a bold man and a great orator, but of no character for virtue, was at this time in the tribuneship, and warmly espoused the cause of the people against the nobles. One day, in a public assembly, he called to Scipio, and asked him, What he thought of the death of Tiberius? meaning probably, by this question, to draw an answer from him that would hurt his credit, either with the Senate or the people. Scipio, without hesitation, declared, that, in his opinion, Tiberius was justly slain. And, when the multitude let him know their displeasure by a loud cry, he boldly returned, "Cease your noise: Do you think, by your clamour, to frighten me, who am used, unterrified, to hear the shouts of embattled enemies?"

Cic. pro
Milon. c.
3. & de Orat. L.
2. c. 25.
Vell. Pat.
B. 2.
Val. Max.
B. 6. c. 2.
§. 3.
* See p.
511.

THE law, formerly mentioned *, enacting, that the people should vote by tablets, in making and repealing laws, was now obtained by this Carbo. He offered another, importing, that the same person might be re-elected to the tribuneship, as often as the people pleased. The party of the nobles, in opposing this, employed their whole credit; and the eloquence of Scipio and his friend Laelius, thus assisted, prevailed against that of C. Gracchus and Carbo.

This year the Comitia, for the first time, chose both the Censors out of the plebeian order: They were Q. Cæcilius Metellus Macedonicus and Q. Pompeius. That the Roman people might increase and multiply, Metellus published a Censoral edict, recommending marriage; and on that subject, made a speech, of which A. Gellius has preserved two fragments, but ascribes them to Metellus Numidicus.

Liv. Epit.
L. 59.
A. Gell. L.
2. c. 6.

"If, Romans, the race of men could be preserved without wives, we should all spare ourselves the trouble of them: but since nature has so ordered it, that there is no living comfortably with them, nor living at all without them, we ought to have more regard to the welfare and perpetuity of the Republic, than to the ease of a life that is of so short duration."

Speaking of the corruption of manners, "The immortal Gods are powerful; but we have no right to expect, they should be more indulgent to us than are our parents. Now, if we persist in evil courses, our parents disinherit us. What then have we to hope from the Gods, if we do not put an end to our extravagancies? Those

^b Ὁ δὲ ἀπελόγετο ἐν ἄλλῳ ἔτι; τοιαῦτα γὰρ ἐξέζη. Odyss. L. 1. l. 47.

"only."

Y. R. 622.
Bef. Chr.
123.
321 Cons.

P. Oros. B.
5. c. 12.
Justin. B.
36. c. 4.
Festus.
Strabo. B.
4. c. 5. §.
16.
Val. Max.
B. 3. c. 2.
§. 12.
Flor. B. 2.
c. 20.
Y. R. 623.
Bef. Chr.
123.
322 Cons.

Val. Max.
B. 3. c. 4.
§. 1.
Justin. B.
36. c. 4.
Oros. B. 3.
c. 12.

Plin. H. N.
Nat. B. 7.
c. 44.

Varro. ap.
A. Gell.
L. 14. c.
2.

• Dr. Mead.
Life of Cic.
v. p. 57.
— 74.

“ only, who are not enemies to themselves, have a title to their favour.
“ It is the part of the Gods to reward virtue, not to give it.”

WE left the Consul Craſſus juſt appointed to conduct an expedition into the East. He entered the territories of Pergamus at the head of a powerful army, ſtrengthened by auxiliaries from Mithridates King of Pontus (father of the famous King of that name) and from the Kings of Cappadocia, Bithynia, and Paphlagonia. According to Juſtin, the Roman General was more intent on plundering the country, than gaining a victory. Towards the end of the year, being on a march, he was attacked by the enemy, his whole army routed, and he himſelf taken priſoner: Yet he avoided the diſgrace of ſlavery, being killed by a Thracian ſoldier, whom he purpoſely provoked by thruſting a rod into his eye^b.

In the appointment of Conſuls for the new year, the choice fell upon C. Claudius Pulcher and M. Perperna; the latter (if we may believe Valerius Maximus) not a Roman citizen at the time of his election. Perperna being commiſſioned to proſecute the war againſt the King of Pergamus, vanquiſhed him in the field, and afterwards took him priſoner in Stratonice, where he had ſhut himſelf up. The Conſul put the treaſures of Attalus, together with Ariſtonicus, on board the fleet, to be conveyed to Rome; but, dying ſoon after in Aſia, left to his ſucceſſor the honour of leading the captive in triumph.

ATINIUS LABEO, one of the Tribunes of this year, to revenge himſelf on the Cenſor Metellus Macedonicus, who (according to Pliny) had expelled him the Senate, made a moſt outrageous attempt upon his life. As the Cenſor was returning home from the Campus Martius at noon-day, the ſtreets of Rome empty of people, the Tribune cauſed him to be ſeized, and was dragging him away, to throw him headlong from the Tarpeian rock, when another of the Tribunes, at the requeſt of Metellus's ſons, came and reſcued him. Atinius nevertheless conſecrated to Ceres the eſtate of Metellus, and thereby reduced him to live upon the bounty of others.

The ſame Atinius got a law paſſed, that the Tribunes of the people ſhould be Senators, which they were not before this time, though they had a right of convening the Senate^c. M. Aquili-

^a Strabo reports that Craſſus was ſlain in battle.

^c Nam et tribunes plebis ſenatus habendi jus erat, quamquam SENATORS non eſſent, ante Atinium Plebeſcitum.

What is meant here by the word SENATORS I cannot pretend to ſay. According to the learned writer of the History of the life of Cicero^d, it ſhould mean complete Senators, like thoſe that were enrolled in the Cenſorial liſt. For he ſuppoſes, that the Quaſtorſhip was the firſt ſtep in the legal aſcent and gradation of public honours, and the office of Tribune or Ædile the next, and that the Quaſtorſhip gave an immediate right to the Senate, and, after the expiration of the office, an actual admission into it during life. He adds: “ And though, ſtrictly ſpeaking, none were held to be complete Senators till they were enrolled at the next Luſtrum, in the liſt of the Cenſors, yet that was only a matter of form, and what could not be denied to them, unleſs for the charge “ and

M. Aquilius, raised to the Consulship with C. Sempronius Tuditanus, finished the reduction of Pergamus, by the basest methods. He poisoned the springs from which the towns that held out against him were supplied with water. Yet the Romans not only continued him in the government of Pergamus three years after the expiration of his Consulship, but suffered him, when he came home, to triumph for his exploits.

Before his return, the Senate nominated ten commissioners, of whom Aquilius was chief, to reduce the kingdom into the form of a province; and, by way of recompence for the services of Ariarathes, King of Cappadocia, who lost his life in the war, bestowed on his children, Lycaonia and Cilicia: and Appian says, that Aquilius sold the Greater Phrygia to Mithridates for a sum of money, but that the Senate afterwards annulled the bargain. Be that as it will, it was not long before the Republic claimed, as her own, Ionis, Eolis, Caria, Lydia, Doris, Lycaonia, Pisidia, and the two Phrygia's; and the whole, including Perga-

V. R. 624.
Bel. Chr.
128.
323 Conf.

Justin. B.
37. c. 3.
App. de Bell. Mithr.
lib. 1. p. 177.

“ and notoriety of some crime, for which “ every other Senator was equally liable to “ be degraded. These Quæstors, therefore, “ chosen annually by the people, were
“ the regular and ordinary supply of the va“ cancies of the Senate, which consisted at “ this time of about five hundred: by “ which excellent institution, the way to “ the highest order in the State was laid “ open to the virtue and industry of every “ private citizen; and the dignity of this “ sovereign council maintained by a suc“ cession of members, whose distinguished “ merit had first recommended them to “ the notice and favour of their country“ men.”

The learned writer, in support of what is here said, gives, in the margin, the following passages from Cicero: Quæstura primus gradus honoris—[in Verr. Act 1. 4.] Populum Romanum, cujus honoribus in amplissimo concilio, et in altissimo gradu dignitatis, atque in hac omnium terrarum arce collocati sumus. [Post red. ad Sen. 1.] Ita magistratus annuos creaverunt, ut concilium senatus reip. proponerent sempiternum; deligerentur autem in id concilium ab universo populo, aditusque in illum summum ordinem omnium civium industriæ ac virtuti pateret, Pro Sext. 65.

That from Sylla's dictatorship to the time of Cicero's Quæstorship (a short period of six or seven years) the Quæstors were the regular and ordinary supply of the vacancies of the Senate (though, perhaps, it cannot be proved) may well enough be imagined; because the Quæstors, chosen annually, were then twenty in number. But it plainly appears from the words immediately preceding those which are quoted from Cic. pro Sext. that the passage refers to the times before Sylla, and even to the earliest times of the Republic. Majores nostri, cum regum potestatem non tulissent, ita magistratus annuos creaverunt, &c. Now the number of Quæstors, annually chosen, was, to the year of Rome 333, only two; from that time to 488, but four; and thence to Sylla's dictatorship, (in 672.) did not exceed eight; which last and largest number, if sufficient to supply the vacancies of a Senate consisting of 300 members, (many of whom serving in the wars, some must be supposed to perish in battle) yet certainly could not be sufficient to furnish annually ten new Tribunes and four new Ædiles. Of these fourteen magistrates, who are all supposed, by the learned historian, to have places in the Senate, six must every year, taking one year with another, obtain their magistracies, and rise to the Senate, without passing through the office of Quæstor.

That in all the ages of the Republic the magistrates, chosen annually, were the ordinary supply of the vacancies in the Senate, seems highly probable from the passages quoted by the learned historian, and from many other. See Cic. pro Rab. c. 7. & pro Cluent. c. 56.

mas, was called the Province of Asia. From this conquest arose that perpetual commerce of Rome with the Asiatics; and hence that excess of luxury, and that refinement in vice, which completed the corruption of Roman manners.

C H A P. IX.

The measures taken by the Senate to hinder the execution of the Agrarian law. The death of Scipio Africanus.

Caius Gracchus executes the office of Quæstor with applause. He is raised to the Tribuneship. He procures several laws in favour of the people.

The Romans possess themselves of Majorca and Minorca; and subdue a Nation of the Transalpine Gauls.

T. R. 624.
Bef. Chr.
123
324 Cons.

OF the three Commissioners, for resuming and dividing the public lands, P. Crassus and Appius Claudius were now dead. In the place of these, the people elected Papirius Carbo and Fulvius Flaccus, men of no probity, and of very turbulent dispositions. Appian tells us, that when the Triumvirs attempted to put in execution the Agrarian law, numberless disputes arose concerning the boundaries of estates, and the titles of the possessors; that many of the Italians, finding themselves aggrieved by the judgments given in these causes, had recourse to Scipio Africanus, and begged his protection; and that Scipio, though he durst not act any thing directly against the law of Tiberius, yet engaged the Senate to take from the Triumvirs, as biassed and partial judges, the cognizance of those disputes. The Fathers assigned it to the Consul Sempronius Tuditanus: But he, perceiving how difficult a province he should have to manage, left the city very soon, pretending that his presence was necessary in Iapidia, a canton of Illyricum, whither he had been before commissioned to go, on account of a rebellion in that country.

By his absence all those law-suits remained undecided; and consequently the functions of the Triumvirs were suspended: A disappointment to the people, which exceedingly provoked them against Scipio, the author of it. They reproached him, that, though contrary to the laws, they had twice raised him to the Consulship, he was not ashamed of appearing among their greatest enemies.

Cic. de
Senn.
Scipion.

Id. de
Amic. c. 3.

It is thought, and with good reason, that Scipio aspired to the Dictatorship, and that the Conscript Fathers intended to raise him to that supreme dignity, in order to settle the State; [in other words, to crush, by the weight of an absolute and uncontrollable power, all those men, good and bad, who espoused the cause of the injured people, against their oppressors.] He was, at this time, so great a favourite with the Senate, that one day day the whole body of them, followed by a croud of Latins and other Italians, conducted him home from the Senate-house.

Y. R. 624.
Bef. Chr.
123.
323 Conf.

Next morning he was found dead in his bed, “without any appearance of a wound, says Appian: Whether it were that Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, in concert with her daughter Sempronia, the wife of Scipio, (who, because she was barren and not handsome, did not love her, and who was not beloved by her) had poisoned him, lest he should get the Agrarian law repealed: Or whether it were, as some think, that he killed himself, because he found, he could not accomplish what he had undertaken. There are others (adds the same Historian) who say, that his slaves, being put to the torture, confessed, That certain persons unknown, who were admitted into the house by a back door, had strangled him; and that, as for themselves, they had not dared to discover this murder, because they knew that the People, hating Scipio, rejoiced at his death.”

Cicero, in one part of his writings, introduces the orator Crassus accusing Carbo of being an accomplice in the murder: And, in another part, represents Lælius as at a loss to say what death Scipio died.

De Orat.
B. 2. c. 40.
De Amic.
c. 3.

Plutarch tells us, “That it was thought there appeared, on the dead body, some marks of blows and violence: That most people openly accused Fulvius, Scipio’s declared enemy, and who, the day before, had, from the Rostra, broke out into bitter railings against him: That there was some suspicion even of Caius Gracchus: And that the People, for fear he should be found guilty, would not suffer any enquiry into the matter.”

“No inquisition was made (says Velleius Paterculus) concerning the death of so great a man; and he, by whose exploits Rome had raised her head above all the world, was carried to his funeral with his head covered^d. Whether HE DIED A NATURAL DEATH, AS MANY AU-

L. 2. c. 4i

“ THORS

^d The writer of the Lives of Illustrious Men will have it, that Scipio’s head was covered, to hinder the livid spots in his face from being seen. But if, as we learn from Cicero (pro Muren. c. 36.) and Valerius Maximus, (L. 7. c. 5. §. 1.) Fabius and Tubero, the nephews of Scipio, had the care of his funeral, is it hard to account for their causing his head to be covered, unless it were a trick, to hinder people from seeing that there were no marks of violence upon it, and consequently no ground for the calumnies industriously propagated.

From the variety of reports about the violence done to Scipio, and about the authors of it, it seems most probable, that prejudice and party-spirit invented the whole, and that he truly died a natural death; which, according to Velleius Paterculus, was the opinion of many authors.

The writer of the Political Discourses, prefixed to the new translation of Sallust, tells us, (p. 14.) that “Caius Gracchus—observed a scandalous neutrality and silence upon an enquiry into the death of Scipio, his brother-in-law.” But, surely Caius was the last man, from whom it could be reasonably expected, that he should give himself much trouble to discover, whether Scipio was poisoned or hanged; a man who had publicly declared his approbation of the murder of his brother-in-law, Caius’s own brother, Tiberius. And, as to Caius’s clearing himself from suspicion, he would have sinned against the dignity of his own character, had he supposed, that any body could

“THOSE HAVE DELIVERED, or by treachery, as some have reported,
 “ [i.e. ut puer, seu constanti infideli, ut aliqui prodidere me- “ moræ, mortem obiit, &c.] certain it is, that the glory of his life was “ never surpassed but by that of his grandfather, the first Africanus. The “ second finished his days in the 56th year of his age.”

He was doubtless a man of letters, wit, and politeness; a fine gentleman; not only free from avarice, but noble and generous in money-could sincerely believe him capable of assassinating a man in his sleep.

I cannot but observe here, how easily M. Rollin (prejudiced against the popular cause and its patrons) not only gives up Cains Gracchus, and his sister Sempronia, as concerned in the assassination of her husband, Scipio, but involves likewise Cornelia in the guilt.

“It is not to be doubted (says M. Rollin) but this murder was committed by the faction of the Gracchi; and it is hard not to believe, that Cains had a hand in it, seeing all those with whom he had the closest connection were suspected. Plutarch says expressly, that Fulcius was suspected. Pompey thought, that Carbo was certainly guilty. Sempronia, sister of the Gracchi and wife of Scipio, is charged [i. e. reported to have been suspected] “in the Epitome of Livy and by Orosius; and Appian makes her mother Cornelia an accomplice with her in the murder.” [i. e. Appian speaks of such a rumour, but at the same time tells us, that some were of opinion, that Scipio killed himself.]

“From the testimonies of these different authors it results, that Sempronia, readily concurring to the suggestions of Cornelia and the Triumvirs, either poisoned her husband, or brought into the House, night, a dagger, who strangled him.”

It will appear the more extraordinary that M. Rollin should by such testimonies be persuaded, beyond all doubt, of the guilt of Cornelia, if we turn to what he says of her, in other parts of his Roman history. [Plutarch is his voucher.]

“Cornelia, after the death of her husband, (who left her 12 children) applied herself to the care of her family with a wisdom and prudence that acquired her great esteem. Plutarch tells us, that Ptolemy king of Egypt (it must have been Ptolemy Ptolemy) would have shared his crown with her, and sent to ask her in marriage; but she refused him. Certainly he would have been a husband very unworthy of so accomplished a person.”

She had all her children, except one daughter, Sempronia, whom she married to Scipio Africanus; and two sons, Tiberius and Cains, whom she educated with so much care, that tho’ they were generally known to be young men of excellent natural parts and dispositions, yet it was thought, that they owed still more to education than to nature.

“The body of Cains—was carried to Milvum, whither Cornelia had retired after the death of Tiberius. She there passed the remainder of her days, in a country house, without changing any thing in her manner of living. Her extraordinary merit drew constantly a good deal of company about her, men of letters, and men of the first rank in the commonwealth. She charmed all her visitors when she related the particulars of her father’s life, and described his manner of living. But they were filled with admiration, when, without shedding a tear, or shewing any sign of grief, she gave the history of all that her sons had done and suffered, as if she had been speaking of persons indifferent to her. When she mentioned the Sanctuaries where they had been slain, she used to say, They were Tombs worthy of the Gracchi. This firmness of soul seemed so extraordinary to some, that they imagined her understanding impaired by years, and the weight of her adversities. Senseless judges! (says Plutarch) ignorant, how much an excellent natural temper, and a good education, can exalt the soul above fortune, and enable it to triumph over sorrow.”

This accomplished lady, this excellent mother, so admirably skilled in the art of educating children, this elevated soul, so universally esteemed and revered to the end of her life, is the person of whom Mr. Rollin entertains no doubt, That she prompted and persuaded her daughter either to poison her husband, or to introduce assassins, by night, into the house, to strangle him.

affairs;

affairs; and, though his exploits in war are not very striking, a brave and able Commander. As for Cicero's extravagant praises of him, they may well be considered as the language of one party zealot extolling another of the same party. There needs no better proof of Cicero's being determined, at any rate, to make him a hero of the first class, than his representing the war with the Numantines, as a contest whether Rome should exist or not; and his comparing Scipio's victory over them with Marius's victory over the Cimbri.*

SEMPRONIUS the Consul was defeated in his first battle with the Iapudians; but, in a second, he obtained so complete a victory, as to be rewarded with a triumph.

THE YEAR 625, (Cn. Octavius and T. Annius Luscus Consuls) proved a year of tranquillity, both at home and abroad; nor was the following Consulate of L. Cassius Longinus and L. Cornelius Cinna remarkable for any thing but the complaisance of the Romans for a people in their alliance. The Senate had ordered Phocæa, a city of Asia, to be rased; because the inhabitants had given assistance to Aristonicus. These, in their distress, had recourse to the mediation of the Massilienses†, who came originally from Phocæa, and still preserved the language, and the form of government their ancestors brought from thence: And as the Massilienses had signalised their invariable attachment to Rome in doubtful times, as well as in those of her greatest prosperity, they had credit enough with the Senate, to get the sentence against the Phocæans reversed.

The next year, when the Consular Fasces were transferred to M. Æmilius Lepidus and L. Aurelius Orestes, Caius Gracchus was chosen Quæstor‡, and appointed to serve under Aurelius, who had commission to pass with an army into Sardinia, on account of a rebellion in that island.

Caius, whilst a candidate for the Quæstorship, dreamt one night, that his brother Tiberius appeared to him, and said, You may linger, Caius, and recoil, as much as you please; but you must die the same death with mine; there is no avoiding it§. Cicero firmly believes that Caius's dream was a revelation of what was to happen to him; and Plutarch urges the same dream, as a proof that he entered into public life, rather by fatality than choice.

* Sic cum Celtiberis, cum Cimbris bellum, ut cum inimicis gerebatur, uter esset, non uter imperaret. Cic. de Off. 1. 12. See Orat. pro Manil. c. 20. & pro Muren. c. 28.

† The people of Marseilles.

‡ Plutarch reports, that Caius, soon after the death of his brother, began to absent himself from the assemblies of the People, and to live a private life, as a man entirely discouraged from meddling with public affairs. This retreat however (if it can at all be reconciled with his commission of Triumvir) did not last long. For the very next year (as we have seen) he was busy in assisting Cicero to get his law passed concerning the re-election of Tribunes. And, that in a public pleading he defended a friend of his, named Vettius, with an eloquence that astonished and transported the People, we have the authority of the same historian. And, as we shall presently find that Caius, in the year before his first Tribuneship, and when he was but 29 years of age, had made 12 campaigns, it is evident he could not have spent a great deal of time in retirement.

§ Quam vellet cunctaretur, tamen eodem sibi leto, quo ipse interisset, esse perendum—quo somnio quid invenire potest certius?

Liv. Epit.
B. 59.

Y. R. 625.
Ref. Chr.
127.
324 Conf.

Y. R. 626.
Ref. Chr.
128.
325 Conf.

Justin. B.
37. c. 1.

Y. R. 629.
Ref. Chr.
125.
326 Conf.

Liv. Epit.
B. 60.

Divin. L. 1.
c. 26.

V. R. 629.
B. 60.
Vell. Pat.
L. 2.
Jul. Oel.
c. 90.
Chr. de Invert. L. 2.
c. 34.

The Quæstor, after his arrival in Sardinia, not only signalized his bravery on all occasions, but greatly distinguished himself by his simplicity of manners, temperance, justice, humanity, diligence in the execution of his office, observance of discipline, affection and respect for his General.

It happened to be a hard winter, and very unhealthy. Aurelius wanting clothes for his troops, and having demanded of several cities in the island, to supply him, these by deputies dispatched to the Senate, begged to be discharged from that burthenome imposition. The Fathers complied, and ordered the General to find some other way to clothe his army. While he was at a loss what course to take, for relieving the soldiers, who suffered extremely, the Quæstor, of his own motion, made a progress through Sardinia, and prevailed with the cities voluntarily to furnish the Romans with what they wanted.

The news of this great service, by Caius performed, and which could not fail to gain him the affections of the People at Rome, caused much uneasiness to the Senate. About the same time arrived from Micipsa, King of Numidia, certain ambassadors, who signified to the Fathers, that the King, out of his particular regard for Caius Gracchus, was sending to the Roman General in Sardinia, a considerable supply of corn: a declaration which so provoked their anger, that after many opprobrious words, they drove the ambassadors out of the assembly.

V. R. 629.
B. 60.
Vell. Pat.
L. 2.
Jul. Oel.
c. 90.
Chr. de Invert. L. 2.
c. 34.

The Senate received a new mortification, when, at the next election of Consuls, one of their most inveterate enemies was raised to that dignity. With M. Plautius Hypsæus the Comitia joined M. Fulvius Flaccus, the associate of Gracchus and Carbo in the commission for resumming and dividing the usurped lands. Fulvius proposed two laws to the Comitia; the first, That the right of Roman citizenship should be granted to the Italian allies: The second, That, if a dispute arose with regard to any man's claim, in consequence of the first law, the claimant should have the right of appeal to the people. Some of the Senators admonished the Consul, others entreated him, to desist from a project that would put the subjects of Rome upon an equality with her citizens. He did not deign to give them any answer. However, he dropt the affair for the sake of going upon an expedition to assist the people of Marseilles against the Saluvii^b, who had ravaged their territory.

Lib. Ept.
B. 60.
Vell. Pat.
L. 2.
Jul. Oel.
c. 90.
Chr. de Invert. L. 2.
c. 34.

About this time was discovered a plot, formed by the people of Fregeille (a town not far from the Liris) to throw off the yoke of the Republic. Numitorius Pullus, one of the chiefs of the conspiracy, betrayed his associates. And when L. Opimius, the Prætor, came from Rome with an army to besiege the place, the same Numitorius contrived to have it delivered into his hands. Opimius rased it to the ground; and this severity is said to have deterred many other Italian towns from breaking out into rebellion, to which, provoked by their disappointment in relation to the freedom of Rome, they were now strongly inclined¹.

^b Sometimes called Salvii; a people near Aix in Provence.

In the beginning of the Consulship of C. Cassius Longinus and C. Sextius Calvinus, the Senate recalled the army of Aurelius from Sardinia, and sent new levies thither, to be commanded by the same General. The reason for continuing Aurelius in the island, was to detain Caius Gracchus there, who, they imagined, would not leave him: But Caius no sooner perceived the design, than he embarked for Italy. When, contrary to the public expectation, he appeared at Rome, he was blamed not only by his enemies, but by the people themselves, who thought it very strange that a Quæstor should return home before his General. Being cited to answer before the Censors, for this misdemeanour, he, in his defence, represented, that, though not obliged to serve more than ten campaigns, he had served twelve; and that he had staid in the province above two years, though, by law, a Quæstor might come home at the end of one year. His plea was allowed.

Aulus Gellius has given us some parts of an oration, which Caius made to an assembly of the People, soon after his return from Sardinia.——

“ In the discharge of my office, I have always pursued what, I thought, your interest required, not any views of my own ambition. I gave no splendid entertainments, nor was I served by handsome boys. Your children were as sober and decent at my table, as when in the presence of their officers in the camp. If any prostitute has entered my house, or any man’s slave been enticed by me, let me be esteemed the most profligate and most contemptible of mankind.——I have been above two years in the province, yet no man can say with truth, that I ever received even the smallest present from him, or that he was at any expence on my account. When I returned to Rome, my purse, which I had carried out full, I brought back empty; whereas others having carried, into the province, vessels, full of wine, have brought them back full of money.”

The enemies of Caius, not succeeding in their first attempt to hurt his credit, made a second, by a charge against him of having excited the Italians to revolt, and particularly those of Fregellæ, whom Opimius had so severely punished. The accused easily cleared himself from this imputation; and his character remaining without a blemish, he was chosen Tribune for the next year, (the Consulship of Q. Cecilius Metellus and upon the beach, where corrupting, they caused an infection in the air, all the way from Cyrenaica to Utica, and far up into the inland countries. The plague is said to have carried off 800,000 persons in the kingdom of Numidia alone, besides 200,000 upon the sea-coast; and in the Prætorian army, appointed to guard Africa, there perished 30,000 Roman soldiers.

¹ It is reported *, that this year a violent east wind brought such a cloud of locusts, that the coast of Africa was quite covered with them. They devoured all sorts of grain to the very roots, and did not spare the hardest barks of trees; and when a south wind afterwards blew them into the sea, they did much more mischief dead than when they were living. The waves drove them

Y. R. 628.
Bef. Chr.
124.
327 Conf.

De fin. l. 5.
c. 22.
Or. in Pison. c. 29.
& Acon. in loc.
Y. R. 629.
Bef. Chr.

123.
328 Conf.

Plut. in Gracch.

Aul. Gell.
B. 15. c.
12.

Plut. in Gracch.

* Jul. Obf.
c. 60.
Liv. Epit.
L. 60.
P. Orob. l.
5. c. 21.

Y. R. 460.
E. 1. 1. 1.
C. 1. 1. 1.

Y. R. 460.
E. 1. 1. 1.

Y. R. 460.
E. 1. 1. 1.

Y. R. 460.
E. 1. 1. 1.
C. 1. 1. 1.
C. 1. 1. 1.

Tiberius Flavius. His mother Cornelia is said to have employed all the arts of persuasion, as well as the most earnest intreaties, but in vain, to divert him from courting an office that had proved so fatal to his brother. The great and the rich had formed a powerful combination to dis-appoint him. But on the other hand, the People to favour his election, had, from all parts of Italy, flocked in such numbers to the city, that the Forum could not contain the multitude; so that many of them, getting upon the tops of the houses, had from thence given him their suffrages.

Caius Gracchus, bred to letters from his childhood, had, with solid and finishing parts, unwearied application: his diction was copious, his expression full of dignity, his thoughts just, and the whole composition of his discourse grave and elevated. He is said to have been the first of the Roman orators that, in speaking, moved about in the Rostra, and used vehemence of action: and such care he took with regard to the modulation of his voice in his public harangues, as to have always behind him a musician, who, when he raised it too high, or sunk it too low, brought it, by means of a flagelet, to the proper pitch.

The murder of Tiberius—his body dragged from the Capitol through the streets and thrown into the Tiber,—his friends condemned to death by the nobles, without trial, or form of justice,—his own forlorn and distressful condition;—on these topics the eloquence of Caius had a peculiar force to move his hearers.—Ab wretch! whither turn myself? Where hide me?—The CAPITOL a refuge? There bleeds Tiberius a BROTHER,—Fly HOME then? disconsolate to behold a MOTHER, greatly miserable and despairing. [Quo me miser conferam? Quo vertam?—In CAPITOLIUM-ne? At FRATRIS sanguine redundat?—An DOMUM? MATREM-ne ut miseram, lamentantemque videam et abiectam?] Cicero tells us, that when Caius uttered these words, such a power there was in his look, his action, the tone of his voice, that it drew tears even from his enemies^k.

Y. R. 460.
E. 1. 1. 1.

Y. R. 460.
E. 1. 1. 1.

Y. R. 460.
E. 1. 1. 1.
C. 1. 1. 1.
C. 1. 1. 1.

Soon after his entering upon the tribuneship, he published two edicts. The first declared, that a magistrate deposed by the People, should be for ever incapable of any office in the state. This was levelled against Octavius, deposed at the motion of Tiberius; but Plutarch informs us, that Caius, at the request of his mother Cornelia, to whom Octavius was related, consented to the revocation of this edict. The other, which passed into a law, ordained, that no Roman citizen should be capitally tried, without an express order from the People^l.

Caius's next step was to get the Agrarian law of Tiberius enforced: But he added a clause to it, charging the lands to be divided, with a ^k Quæ sic ab illo acta esse constabat, oculis, voce, gestu, inimici ut lacrimas tenere non possent. De Orat. L. 3. c. 56.

^l According to Plutarch, the law was to this effect, That any magistrate, who banished a Roman citizen without a previous trial, should be brought into judgment before the people: He adds, that this law was designed chiefly against Popillius, who, when Prætor, had banished the friends of Tiberius, without observing the usual forms of justice; and that Popillius, not daring to stand a prosecution, left Italy.

certain annual tribute, payable into the treasury. After which he proposed and carried several other laws in favour of the commons.

Y. B. c. 10
B. 1. c. 10
132.
576 C. 10.

One to forbid the enlisting any Roman citizen for the war, before the age of seventeen.

Another for cloathing the soldiers at the public expence, without retrenching any thing of their pay on that account.

A third, that in creating magistrates, the order, in which the Centuries should vote, should be determined by lot, and not by their Censur, as formerly.

De Rep.
Ord. 1. p. 2.
in 1. 1. p.
S. 1. 1.

A fourth for a monthly distribution of corn to the People, at the expence of the treasury; as some authors say. Others write, that this fourth law was for lowering the price of corn: Be that as it will, the Tribune got the revenues of Attalus's late kingdom appropriated for supplying the corn; and, to hold it, built storehouses, which were afterwards called the granaries of Sempronius.

App. de Bell.
Civ. l. 1. p.
p. 363.
C. 3. in
Ver. c. 10.
Fl. 1. 3. 15.
Fest.

A fifth, for making high-ways: a work to which he applied himself with the greatest pleasure and diligence; carrying on these roads in a straight line, levelling the ground, and building bridges, where water-courses or other hollows made it necessary; erecting mile stones; and on both sides of the road placing other stones, for the convenience of travellers in mounting their horses; for stirrups were not then in use.

Plut. in
Grac. 11.

Caius in person directed the execution of these enterprizes, and had many other affairs upon his hands; yet was not oppressed or embarrassed with their weight or number. In his various intercourse with ambassadors, officers, soldiers, men of letters, architects, and workmen, he constantly preserved his gravity, dignity, and politeness, suiting himself to the rank and characters of the persons with whom he conversed; insomuch that even his enemies could not help admiring his superior talents.

WHILE the Tribune was thus busied in useful works of peace, the Consul Metellus conducted a war in the islands called Baleares^p. The inhabitants, says Strabo, were, generally speaking, of a peaceable disposition; but some of them having associated themselves with pirates, the Romans made this a pretext for invading and subduing the whole nation. It was effected without great difficulty, their chief offensive weapon being a sling. In the use of this, they are said to have been expert beyond any people in the world; being accustomed, when children, to earn their breakfast by their dexterity. The mother, for a mark, set up a piece of bread; and the hungry boy, placed at a certain distance, was obliged, with a stone from his sling, to hit the mark, before he was allowed to eat it.

Strabo, B.
3. p. 167.

Flor. B.
3. c. 8.
Diod. Sic.
B. 5. c. 11.

Metellus built some towns in the conquered islands; and having transf-ⁿ Cicero, though he approves of moderate largesses to the People, condemns this of Caius, as excessive, draining the treasury, and encouraging the poor in idleness. De Offic. l. 2. c. 21. et pro Scat. c. 48.

^o Hence the expressions in Latin authors, tertio, quarto ab urbe lapide, to signify three, four miles from the town.

^p Majorca and Minorca.

Y. R. 630.
B. C. 122.
330 Cons.

App. loc.
B. C. 122.
330 Cons.

planted thither 3000 Romans from the Spanish colonies, returned to Rome had a triumph, and took the surname of Equestris.

In the mean time Sextius Calpurnius, one of the Consuls of the last year, and now Proconsul, carried on the war, which his predecessor Fulvius had begun against the Salerni, commanded in the field by their King Tarentinus. Sextius obtained a complete victory, and totally subdued the nation: After which he built a town in a place that abounded with excellent waters, both hot and cold; and, from his own name, called it Agus Sextus, now Aix [in Provincia.] And here he established the first Roman colony that ever passed into Transalpine Gaul.

CHAP. X.

Caius Gracchus is elected a second time to the Tribuneship.

The policy management of the Senate to ruin his credit with the People.

His party destroyed. His death.

App. loc.
B. C. 122.
330 Cons.

A DECREE having been lately made by the Comitia, That if a Tribune have wanted time to complete any useful undertaking, particular regard should be had to him at the next elections, Caius Gracchus, without any solicitation on his part, was rechosen to that office. Some few days before the meeting of the Centuries to name new Consuls, he told the People, in a speech from the Rostra, that he had one favour to ask of them, which, if he obtained it, he should look upon as a full recompence for all his services; nevertheless, that he should not complain, if it were refused. As he did not mention the thing desired, many persons imagined at first, that he intended to ask the Consulship, with permission to hold it, together with his office of Tribune. But, upon the day of election, he came into the assembly, leading by the hand C. Fannius Strabo, whom he recommended to the citizens for their votes. His view was to defeat the pretensions of L. Opimius the destroyer of Frugillæ one of the candidates, a man of great sway in the Senate, and whom Plutarch calls an oligarchic man. The people readily granted the request of their favourite Tribune, and raised Fannius to the Consular dignity with C. Domitius Ahenobarbus.

Y. R. 631.
B. C. 121.
330 Cons.

It fell by lot to Domitius to continue the war beyond the Alps, and to his Colleague to administer affairs at home.

App. loc.
B. C. 121.
330 Cons.

Caius, in his second Tribuneship, passed a law, that took from the Senate the right of judicature, which they had exercised from the foundation of Rome, and transferred it to the knights^p. “ This act [how “ sensibly soever it affected the Senate] was equitable; for as the Senators “ possessed all the magistracies and governments of the Empire, so they “ were the men, whose oppressions were the most severely felt, and “ most frequently complained of; yet, while the judgment of all causes “ continued in their hands, it was their common practice to favour and “ absolve one another in their turns, to the general scandal and injury, ^p The epitome of Livy, (B. 60.) places this act in the first Tribuneship of Caius.

“ both

“ both of the subjects and allies ; of which some late and notorious instances had given a plausible pretext for Gracchus’s law ;” particularly, Aurelius Cotta, Salinator, and M. Aquillius had been convicted of extortion, by most clear and undeniable proofs, yet had escaped punishment, thro’ the corruption of their judges, corruption so manifest, that the Senate, says Appian, were ashamed to make any opposition to the charge.

Y. R. 637.
Bef. Chr.
121.
337 Conf.

Plutarch tells us that Caius, when he proposed this new law, instead of turning his face to the Senate, as had hitherto been the custom of those who spoke from the Rostra, turned his face towards the People ; and that he always continued this practice, meaning thereby to express the People’s superior authority to that of the Senate. The same Historian adds, that the Comitia referred to Caius the choice of the knights that were to be judges.

Plut. in Gracch.

The Tribune, to shew that what he acted in favour of the People did not proceed from passion, or any design to ruin the just authority of the Senate, procured a law, That this assembly should every year, before the election of Consuls and Prætors, determine which of the provinces should be consular, and which prætorian ; and that, with regard to the consular provinces, even the Tribunes should not have the right of intercession, or opposition. This law, though violated on certain occasions, by some turbulent Tribunes, continued to the times of the monarchy.

Cic. de
Prov. Consular. c. 2.
& 7. & pro
Dom. c. 13.
Flor. B. 3.
c. 13.
Sallust.
Bell. Ju-gurrh.
Plut. in Gracch.
V. Pat. L.
2. Plut.
loc. cit.

Caius passed a decree for planting colonies at Capua and Tarentum : And, if we may credit some writers, he actually obtained the right of Roman citizenship for the Latins and the other Italian allies[†].

The Senate, dreading lest his power should become irresistible, had recourse to a very extraordinary method, to gain from him the affections of the People. It was by loading them with such favours as should make those they had received, or yet expected from Caius, appear inconsiderable. In this view they applied themselves to M. Livius Drusus, one of the Tribunes, a man of good parts, natural and acquired, a great orator, and very rich ; and by their sollicitations engaged him to combine with them against his colleague. Drusus, prostituting his office to serve their ends, promulgated laws, in which his aim was not the good of the People, but only the supplanting Caius in their esteem ; and † This custom was first introduced in the year 608, by C. Licinius Crassus, when endeavouring, in his Tribuneship, to transfer from the pontifical college to the People, the right of choosing priests. Cic. de Amic. c. 25. Var. de re Rulic. L. 1. c. 2.

Appian writes, That Caius invited the Latins to petition for the right of Roman citizenship, and proposed, contrary to ancient custom, to give the right of suffrage to the other allies, designing to make use of their assistance, to get enacted the laws which he had in view. The Senate, greatly alarmed at this project, passed a decree, That the Consuls should by edict forbid all who had not the right of voting to be at Rome, or within five miles of it, till the Comitia should have determined with regard to the laws in question. They also persuaded Lucius Drusus, the colleague of Caius, to oppose the passing of the law, without assigning a reason for his opposition, and gave the same right to any Tribune, that would interpose. And to secure the passage, 12 colonies were granted, which had been formerly agreed to by the tribunes ; they also dissolved Gracchus’s laws ; and, upon the, threatened of the favour of the People, went into Asia, to confer with Fulvius Flaccus, to form a colony, &c.

Y. R. 637.
Bell. Civ.
123.
330 C. 25.

the Senate supported with their authority all the proposals of their creature. They had railed against Caius as a flatterer of the populace, for planting two colonies, tho' he had chosen out very worthy citizens for that purpose; but they aided Drusus in procuring a decree for planting twelve new colonies, each of 3000 Romans. When Caius distributed lands to the poor, he charged on those lands a certain yearly rent payable into the treasury, yet the Senate accused him of basely courting the people, for private views; but they approved of Drusus's remitting those rents to the possessors of the lands. They likewise assisted him to get a law passed, That no Roman General should cause any soldier of the Latin nations to be beaten with rods. The Tribune, on his part, never failed to declare publicly, that he made all his proposals by the advice of the Senate, ever solicitous for the good of the People: whose hatred to the nobles he, by this artful management, almost totally extinguished; and he himself rose to a high degree of favour. In one respect his conduct was more popular than that of Caius Gracchus; for Drusus constantly avoided meddling with the public money, and committed to others the charge of effecting of all that he ordained; whereas Caius took upon himself the execution of the most and the greatest of his projects.

Plut. in Gracch.
App. de
Bell. Civ.
L. 1. p.
324.

Rutius, one of the Tribunes, having passed a law for rebuilding Carthage, and settling there a colony of 6000 Romans, and it falling by lot to Caius to go at the head of this commission, he soon after embarked for Africa. The Senate did not dislike an enterprize which carried away from Rome the man they most hated, and, with him, a great number of Plebeians, the most troublesome to them in the Comitia: And Drusus laid hold of this opportunity to ingratiate himself farther with the multitude.

When Caius had spent about two months in raising, on the ruins of Carthage, a new city, which he called Junonia, he returned to Rome, on advice that his presence was necessary there, both to support his own credit, and to disappoint the views of Opimius, who now again stood candidate for the Consulship. Plutarch relates, that the Tribune, to make his court to the populace, took a house near the Forum, in a quarter inhabited by the meanest of the citizens, and that he then proposed the rest of his laws; but the Historian does not tell us what these laws imported. A vast crowd of people flocked from the country to Rome, to give their votes. The Consul Fannius, though raised to his office by the interest of Caius, had long since been gained over by the nobles; and now, in consequence of a decree of the Senate, he published a very extraordinary edict, forbidding any man of the allies to appear in the city, or (according to Appian) within five miles of it, while the proposed laws were under deliberation. Caius, on the other hand, by edict, encouraged the allies to remain in Rome, promising them his assistance against the Consul: Yet when, of these, he saw one, who had been his host, seized upon by Fannius's lictors, he quietly suffered it; either, says Plutarch, because he was unwilling to discover the weakness of his party, then on the decline ; or as he himself asserted, that he might not furnish his enemies with what they had hitherto sought in vain, a pretence for having recourse to arms. It is probable, that the intended laws were dropt, no further mention being made of them.

Y. R. 631.
Bef. Chr.
121.
330 Cons.

In the next comitia for chusing Tribunes, Caius, a third time, stood candidate, and some say he had a majority for him ; but his colleagues, whose business it was to count the votes, being displeased with him, made a false return. Be that as it will, he now missed his aim : And this disappointment was soon followed by the promotion of his enemy, L. Opimius (with Q. Fabius Maximus) to the Consulship ; who, according to expectation, presently exerted the whole power of his office to procure the repeal of Caius's law, and to get his proceedings at Carthage condemned. Caius, though in a disposition to be passive, yet, at the instigation of Fulvius the Triumvir, assembled his friends, in order to defeat the Consul's measures.

Y. R. 632.
Bef. Chr.
120.
331 Cons.

On the day fixed for proposing to the Comitia the abrogation of the laws in question, both parties, early in the morning, repaired to the Capitol. While the Consul was performing the customary sacrifice, Q. Antyllus, one of his lictors, carrying away the entrails of the victim, said to the friends of Caius and Fulvius, Make way there, ye worthless citizens, for honest men ; and, as some add, he, at the same time, used an action, with his hand, indecent and contemptuous ; in resentment of which they instantly fell upon him, and slew him with the pins of their table books.

The people in general were much disturbed at the rash and criminal act, and nobody more than Caius, who reproached his followers with having madly given their enemies a pretext for violence. Opimius, on the other hand, excited his party to take immediate revenge, imagining, he had now a favourable opportunity to destroy Caius ; but a great rain obliged the multitude to separate.

Next day, while the Fathers, assembled by order of the Consul, were sitting, some of his creatures, having laid the dead body of Antyllus naked on a bier, carried it through the Forum to the Senate-house, making loud lamentations as they went along. Opimius pretended ignorance and surprize ; and, with all the Senators, went out to see what the matter was. The body being set down in the midst of them, they began to mourn and wail, as for some public and terrible calamity : A low, wretched farce, that could not but excite a hatred and detestation of the actors. They had, with premeditated malice, murdered, even in the Capitol, and when Tribune, that excellent citizen Tiberius Gracchus, and had thrown his dead body into the river ; yet, when the corpse of a hireling lictor (who, if he had not merited his fate, had, at least, brought it upon himself by his imprudence) was exposed in the Forum, the Roman Senate, those venerable Fathers, stood round the bier, lamenting

* Florus (B. 3. c. 15.) says, Minacius, a tribune, was going to abrogate the laws of Gracchus. According to Appian, the comitia assembled to determine only with regard to the affair of the colony at Carthage.

It was pretended that Caius ought to have desisted from the undertaking, on account of some prodigies, said to have happened, while he was laying the foundation of the city.

peace. The boy, with tears and a blooming modesty, executed his commission. Many of those who were with Opimius would have listened to an accommodation, but he answered, "That it was not by messengers Fulvius and his followers could make satisfaction to the Senate; that they must surrender themselves at mercy, as criminals convicted; and then, if they pleased, they might deprecate punishment." And he forbade the young herald to come any more, unless to signify the submission of those that sent him. On the report of this answer, Caius, as some say, would have gone in person to treat with the Senate, and endeavour to bring them to temper; but all his party disapproving this design, Fulvius sent his son with a second message to Opimius. The Consul in anger ordered the youth to be seized and detained prisoner. And now, impatient to come to blows, he instantly marched away towards the Aventine hill with a good body of infantry and some Cretan archers. Being arrived there, he proclaimed pardon to all who should desert Caius and Fulvius; and to whoever should bring him the heads of those two men, he promised the weight of them in gold. The greater part of their followers are said to have abandoned them immediately, and the rest to have been, presently after, put to flight by the Cretans. Fulvius took refuge in an old bagnio, whence he was dragged out and slain, together with his elder son. Caius made no attempt towards a defence; but, in much grief for what passed, retired to the temple of Diana; where he would have killed himself, if he had not been hindered by Pomponius and Licinius, two of his most faithful friends, who took his dagger from him, and persuaded him to fly. Coming to the bridge Sublucius, they exhorted him to make the best of his way, while they defended the entrance of the bridge; in which undertaking they fought so resolutely, that, till they were both slain, not one of the pursuers could pass. Many of the people called out to Caius to make his escape; but no man, of all that multitude he had so much obliged, would furnish him with a horse, though he often asked for one as he passed along. He at length sought shelter in a certain wood consecrated to the Furies, where, perceiving the enemy approach to kill him, he chose to fall by the hand of a faithful slave; who, after he had done his master this last service, dispatched himself.

Caius's head was brought to the Consul by one Septimuleius, who had taken out the brain, and filled the cavity with lead, that he might receive the greater weight of gold*. The cheat passed; and he had the promised reward; but the bearers of Fulvius's head, being mean people, could get nothing for it. The dead bodies of all the slain (to the number of 3000, according

Y. R. 622.
Ecl. Chr.
120.
371 Conf.

Val. Max.
L. 6. c. 2.
6. 3.
Plut. loc.
cit.

* The head was found to weigh 17 pound 8 ounces. Septimuleius, for some time after, desiring Sævola, Pro-consul of Africa, to take him with him into that province, and give him an employment, Sævola answered, "May surely, friend, you have lost your senses; you don't consult your own interest, but stay here. There is such a multitude of slaves and

"tizens in Rome, that, take my word for it, you cannot fail to make a huge estate in a few years." Cic. de Orat. L. 2. c. 67.

* Orosius (B. 5. c. 12.) says, there were only 250 slain on the Aventine hill, but that Opimius put to death, without trial, above 3000 persons, most of them innocent.

We

N. P. 612.
B. 10. 11.
112.
113. C.

condemned to Plautius were, by the Consul's order, thrown into the Tiber. He confiscated their estates, forbade their wives to wear mourning for them, deprived Cassius' widow of her dowry, and ordered the younger son of Valerius to be strangled in prison: And, after all these violences and bloody executions, he had the impudence to build a temple to Concord; thus glorying in his cruelty, and making the murder of so many citizens a matter of triumph.

The people in a short time resumed courage enough to erect statues to the Gracchi, and consecrate the places where they had been slain; and many worshipped there daily, as in the temples of the Gods: But the popular cause never recovered of the wound it received, by the murder of those two illustrious Patriots; there remained little more than the form of the ancient constitution. The Tribunes themselves, for private advantage, combined with the nobles to injure and oppress the commons. The Agroian law was gradually abrogated: First, leave was granted to every man, contrary to the tenor of it, to part with his share of the lands; which gave the rich an opportunity of making cheap purchases and even of seizing the properties of the defenceless plebeians without buying, which they commonly did. To these possessions a certain Tribune confirmed their titles, on condition of their paying an annual quit-rent, to be divided among the poorer citizens: This, says African, though some relief to the indigent, made no provision against the danger of depopulating the country of its free inhabitants. And, not long after, another Tribune remitted that quit-rent; so that the lower sort had nothing left: And, after the Gracchi, there never arose a Tribune, or any other magistrate, honest and generous enough to espouse the true interest of the people. Some indeed, to promote their selfish views, not only held up the buckler, but wielded the sword of what they styled, the people's cause, proceeding to the most outrageous acts of violence and cruelty; till at length Sylla, having seized the Dictatorship, changed the very form of the Republic, almost annihilated the tribunitian power, and reduced the government to an Aristocracy. The civil contests henceforward were between the Senate, tenacious of the sovereign rule, and a few grandees, who sought to wrest it out of their hands; or between one grandee and another for the superiority, each supported by an army at his devotion: Contests, which, after much effusion of blood, had their final issue in the subjection of Rome to an absolute and confirmed Monarchy.

We read of none slain on the side of Optimus, nor of any wounded, except P. Lentulus, a senator, mentioned by Cicero, 8 Phil. c. 4. and 4. in Cat. c. 6. and by Dio Cass. apud Tal.

* This Optimus (who is one of Cicero's prime worthies) was afterwards condemned to banishment for taking bribes to betray his country.

His name, infamous for many reasons, was famous only on one account, the super-excellent wines, of all sorts, that were produced in the year of his Consulship. It appears from a passage in Velleius Paterculus *, that in his time (150 years after Optimus's magistracy) a notion prevailed, that some of the Optimian wine still remained: but he treats this as a fable, and seems to think, it was owing to the custom of calling all good wine Optimian wine ever since that remarkable vintage.

Pliny (L. 14. c. 4.) speaks, as if in his time (almost 200 years after Optimus) some of that extraordinary wine was still in being.

THE

THE CAPITOLINE MARBLES;
O. R.,
CONSULAR CALENDARS:

An ancient Monument accidentally discovered at ROME in the year 1545.
during the Pontificate of PAUL III.

| KINGS OF ROME. | | KINGS OF ROME. | |
|----------------|---|----------------|---|
| Year. | | Year. | |
| 1. | ROMULUS.
He triumphs for vanquishing the Cæninenses, Crustumini, and Antemnates. | 186. | He triumphs over the Hetrurians a second time. |
| 5. | He makes himself a trophy of the spoils he took from King Acon, whom he killed with his own hand. | 200. | He establishes the Census, and Lustrum, of which there were four in his reign. |
| 16. | He triumphs over the Camerini. | 220. | TARQUIN the Proud. |
| 17. | He triumphs over the Veientes, and Fidenates. | 227. | He triumphs over the Volsci. |
| 38. | INTERREGNUM. | 228. | He triumphs over the Sabines. |
| 40. | NUMA POMPILIUS. | 243. | He is dethroned, and driven from Rome. |
| 83. | TULLUS HOSTILIUS. | | CONSULS. |
| 87. | He triumphs over the Albans. | 244. Y. of R. | |
| 91. | He triumphs over the Sabines. | 1. Consulship. | L. JUNIUS BRUTUS. |
| 114. | ANCUS MARCIUS. | | L. TARQUINIUS COLLATINUS. |
| 115. | He triumphs over the Veientes. | | PUBLIUS VALERIUS POPLICOLA, is substituted in the room of L. Tarquinius, who abdicates. |
| 120. | He triumphs over the Sabines. | | SPURIUS LUCRETIVS TRICIPITINUS fills Brutus's place, who was killed before his office expired. |
| 139. | TARQUIN the First. | | HORATIUS PULVILLUS is chosen in the room of Spurius, who died in his office. |
| 150. | He triumphs over the Latines. | | |
| 160. | He triumphs over the Hetrurians. | | |
| 171. | He triumphs over the Sabines. | | |
| 176. | SERVIUS TULLIUS. | | |
| 182. | He triumphs over the Hetrurians. | | |

- Publius Valerius Poplicola triumphs over the Veientes and Tarquinientes.
- Quæstors. P. Veturius Geminus.
M. Minucius Augurinus.
245. Y. of R.
2. Consulship. P. VALERIUS POPLICOLA, a second time.
TITUS LUCRETIVS TRICIPITINUS.
The fifth Lustrum.
- Quæstors. Q. Clælius Siculus.
A. Sempronius Atratinus.
246. Y. of R.
3. Consulship. P. VALERIUS POPLICOLA, a third time.
M. HORATIUS PULVILLUS, a second time.
- Quæstors. T. Æbutius Elva.
A. Posthumus Albus Regillensis.
247. Y. of R.
4. Consulship. SPURIUS LARTIVS FLAVUS.
T. HERMINIVS AQUILINUS.
- Quæstors. M. Tullius Longus.
T. Virginus Tricostus.
248. Y. of R.
5. Consulship. M. VALERIUS.
P. POSTHUMIVS TUBERTUS.
Marcus Valerius, and Publius Posthumus triumph over the Sabines.
- Quæstors. T. Lartius Flavius.
Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus.
249. Y. of R.
6. Consulship. P. VALERIUS POPLICOLA, a fourth time.
T. LUCRETIVS TRICIPITINUS, a second time.
Valerius triumphs over the Sabines and Veientes.
- Quæstors. P. Servilius Priscus.
A. Virginus Tricostus Calimantanus.
250. Y. of R.
7. Consulship. P. POSTHUMIVS TUBERTUS, a second time.
AGRIPPA MENENIVS LANATUS, who triumphs over the Sabines.
- Posthumus receives only the Honours of an Ovation.
- Quæstors. T. Veturius Geminus.
Posthumus Cominius Auruncus.
251. Y. of R.
8. Consulship. OPITER VIRGINIVS TRICOSTUS.
SPURIUS CASSIVS VISCCELLINUS, who triumphs over the Sabines.
- Quæstors. Q. Servilius Priscus.
T. Geganius Macerinus.
252. Y. of R.
9. Consulship. POSTHUMUS COMINIUS AURUNCUS.
T. LARTIVS FLAVIVS.
- The sixth Lustrum.*
- Quæstors. P. Minucius Augurinus.
Q. Sulpitius Camerinus Cornutus.
253. Y. of R.
10. Consulship. SER. SULPITIVS CAMERINUS.
M. TULLIVS LONGUS, who dies in his Consulship.
- Quæstors. C. Julius Iulus.
M. Valerius Volusus.
254. Y. of R.
11. Consulship. P. VETURIVS GEMINUS.
T. ÆBUTIVS ELVA.
- Quæstors. P. Pinarius Rufus Mamercinus.
Sp. Nautius Rutilus.
255. Y. of R.
12. Consulship. T. LARTIVS FLAVUS, a second time.
Q. CLÆLIUS SICULUS.
T. LARTIVS FLAVUS.
- Dictator. G. of the Horse. Sp. Cassius Viscellinus.
- Quæstors. M. Claudius Crassinus Regillensis.
L. Geganius Macerinus.
256. Y. of R.
13. Consulship. A. SEMPRONIUS ATRATINUS.
M. MINUCIVS AUGURINUS.
- Quæstors. C. Aquilius Tuscus.
Virginus Tricostus Rutilus.
257. Y. of R.
14. Consulship. A. POSTHUMIVS ALBUS REGILLENIS.

TITUS VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS.
 Dictator. A. POSTHUMIUS ALBUS REGILLENSIS.
G. of the Horse. T. Æbutius Elva.
 A. Posthumius triumphs over the Latines.
 Quæstors. T. Sicinius Sabinus.
 Q. Fabius Vibulanus.
 258. Y. of R.
 15. Consulship. APPIUS CLAUDIUS SABINUS REGILLENSIS.
 P. SERVILIUS PRISCUS.
 Quæstors. Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis.
 L. Æmilius Mamercinus.
 259. Y. of R.
 16. Consulship. A. VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS CÆLIMONTANUS.
 T. VETURIUS GEMINUS CICURINUS.
 Dictator. MANIUS VALERIUS.
G. of the Horse. Q. Servilius Priscus.
 Manius Valerius triumphs over the Sabines.
 Quæstors. C. Minucius Augurinus.
 Sex. Furius Fusus.
 260. Y. of R.
 17. Consulship. SP. CASSIUS VISCELLINUS, a second time.
 POSTHUMUS COMINIUS AURUNCUS, a second time.
The seventh Lustrum.
 Tribunes of the People. L. Sicinnius Bellutus.
 L. Junius Brutus Bubulcus.
 Plebeian Ædiles. C. Mucius Cordus Scævola.
 Q. Mucius Cordus Scævola.
 Quæstors. P. Valerius Poplicola.
 M. Fabius Vibulanus.
 261. Y. of R.
 18. Consulship. T. GEGANIUS MACERINUS.
 P. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS.
 Tribunes of the People. Sp. Icilius Ruga.
 C. Licinius Calvus.
 Ædiles. L. Sicinnius Bellutus.
 L. Junius Brutus Bubulcus.
 Quæstors. C. Julius Iulus.
 Sp. Furius Fusus.
 262. Y. of R.
 19. Consulship. M. MINUCIUS AUGURI-

NUS, a second time.
 A. SEMPRONIUS ATRATINUS, a second time.
 Tribunes of the People. L. Sicinnius Bellutus.
 M. Decius Mus.
 Ædiles. Sp. Icilius Ruga.
 L. Junius Brutus.
 Quæstors. Cn. Manlius Cincinnatus.
 M. Horatius Pulvillus.
 263. Y. of R.
 20. Consulship. Q. SULPICIUS CAMERINUS.
 SP. LARTIUS FLAVUS, a second time.
 Tribunes of the People. P. Mænius.
 L. Albinus.
 Ædiles. C. Sicinnius Bellutus.
 P. Licinius Calvus.
 Quæstors. T. Virginius Tricostus Rutilus.
 C. Servilius Structus Abala.
 264. Y. of R.
 21. Consulship. C. JULIUS IULUS.
 P. PINARIUS RUFUS MAMERCINUS.
 Tribunes of the People. C. Sicinnius Bellutus.
 L. Icilius Ruga.
 Ædiles. C. Icilius Ruga.
 C. Junius Bubulcus.
 Quæstors. C. Cornelius Lentulus.
 C. Horatius Pulvillus Esquilinus.
 265. Y. of R.
 22. Consulship. SP. NAUTIUS RUTILUS.
 SEX. FURIUS FUSUS.
 Tribunes of the People. M. Pletorius.
 P. Licinius Calvus.
 Ædiles. L. Sicinnius Bellutus.
 C. Licinius Calvus.
 Quæstors. T. Menenius Lanatus.
 A. Virginius Tricostus Rutilus.
 266. Y. of R.
 23. Consulship. C. AQUILIUS TUSCUS.
 T. SICINIUS SABINUS, who triumphs over the Volsci.
 Aquilius defeats the Hernici, and has only the honour of an Ovation.
 Tribunes of the People. L. Albinus.
 P. Licinius Calvus.
 Ædiles. L. Icilius Ruga.
 C. Icilius Ruga.
 Quæstors. Sp. Servilius Structus.
 Q. Sextius Capitolinus.

267. Y. of R.

24. Consulship. SP. CASSIUS VISCELLI-
NUS, a third time.PROCULUS VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS RUTILUS.Sp. Cassius triumphs over the Volsci and Hernici.Tribunes of thePeople.Ædiles.Quæstors.

C. Rabuleius.

M. Silius.

C. Junius Bubulcus.

M. Plautius.

C. Numerius Rutilus.

L. Furius Medullinus Fufus.

268. Y. of R.

25. Consulship. Q. FABIUS VIBULANUS.
SER. CORNELIUS MALU-
GINENSIS COSSUS.Tribunes of thePeople.Ædiles.Quæstors.

P. Mucius Sævola.

M. Tarquinius Laurentinus.

C. Licinius Calvus.

C. Rabuleius.

K. Fabius Vibulanus.

L. Valerius Potitus.

269. Y. of R.

26. Consulship. L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCI-
NUS.

K. FABIUS VIBULANUS.

Tribunes of thePeople.Ædiles.Quæstors.

M. Titinius.

C. Sicinnius Bellutus.

L. Albinus.

M. Silius.

A. Manlius Vulso.

Verginius Julius Iulus.

270. Y. of R.

27. Consulship. M. FABIUS VIBULANUS.
L. VALERIUS POPLICOLA
POTITUS.Tribunes of thePeople.Ædiles.Quæstors.

C. Manius.

P. Licinius Calvus.

C. Licinius Calvus.

M. Tarquinius Laurentinus.

P. Furius Fufus.

App. Claudius Salustus Regillensis.

271. Y. of R.

28. Consulship. C. JULIUS IULUS.
Q. FABIUS VIBULANUS, a second time.Tribunes of thePeople.Ædiles.Quæstors.

L. Albinus.

P. Tarquinius Laurentinus.

C. Rabuleius.

C. Manius.

L. Pinarius Rufus Mamercinus.

T. Æmilius Mamercinus.

272. Y. of R.

29. Consulship. K. FABIUS VIBULANUS, a second time.

SP. FURIUS FUSUS.

Tribunes of thePeople.Ædiles.Quæstors.

Sp. Icilius Ruga.

L. Genucius Aventinensis.

M. Titinius.

P. Decius Mus.

A. Virginius Tricostus Calimentarius.

Q. Servilius Priscus.

273. Y. of R.

30. Consulship. CN. MANLIUS CINCIN-NATUS.M. FABIUS VIBULANUS, a second time.Tribunes of thePeople.Ædiles.Quæstors.

Ti. Pontificius.

C. Rabuleius.

L. Albinus.

P. Tarquinius Laurentinus.

T. Numicius Priscus.

M. Valerius Arintinus.

274. Y. of R.

31. Consulship. K. FABIUS VIBULANUS, a third time.T. VIRGINIUS TRICOS-TUS RUTILUS.Tribunes of thePeople.Ædiles.Quæstors.

C. Junius Bubulcus.

C. Icilius Ruga.

Sp. Icilius Ruga.

M. Decius Mus.

M. Minucius Augurinus.

P. Minucius Augurinus.

275. Y. of R.

32. Consulship. L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCI-
NUS, a second time.CAIUS SERVILIUS STRU-CTUS AHALA, who did not finish the year, but abdicated, or died before it ended.C. CORNELIUS was put in his room.Tribunes of thePeople.Ædiles.Quæstors.Pro-Consuls.

P. Decius Mus.

M. Flavuleius.

T. Pontificius.

L. Genucius Aventinensis.

L. Valerius Arintinus.

M. Tullius Longus.

K. Fabius Vibulanus.

Sp. Furius Fufus.

276. Y.

276. Y. of R.

33. Consulship. C. HORATIUS PULVILLUS.

T. MENENIUS LANATUS.

Tribunes of the People. C. Rabuleius.

Ædiles. L. Fluvakius.

M. Fianvulus.

C. Acilius Roga.

Quæstors. T. Titus us Alia.

Sp. Posthumius Albus Regillensis.

Pro-Consul. K. Fabius Vibulanus.

277. Y. of R.

34. Consulship. A. VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS RUTILUS.

P. SERVILIUS STRUCTUS.

Tribunes of the People. T. Genucius Aventinensis.

Ædiles. Q. Confidius.

M. Decius Mus.

P. Mucius Scævola.

Quæstors. S. Furius Medullinus Fufus.

M. Papirius Mugillanus.

278. Y. of R.

35. Consulship. P. VALERIUS POPLICOLA. C. NAUTIUS RUTILUS.

Valerius triumphs over the Veientes and Sabines.

Tribunes of the People. L. Cædicus.

Ædiles. T. Statius.

T. Flaccilius.

Q. Mucius Scævola.

Quæstors. C. Fossius Flaccinator.

Sex. Papirius.

279. Y. of R.

36. Consulship. L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS FUSUS.

A. MANLIUS VULSO.

The eighth Lustrum.

Manlius vanquishes the Veientes, and receives the honours of an Ovation.

Tribunes of the People. K. Atinius Longus.

Ædiles. Q. Mucius Scævola.

T. Porcificus.

Q. Confidius.

Quæstors. A. Posthumius Albus Regillensis.

L. Atratius Elva.

280. Y. of R.

37. Consulship. L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS, a third time.

VOPISCUS JULIUS IUS.

Tribunes of the People. Cn. Genucius.

Ædiles. C. Icilius Roga.

T. Genucius Aventinensis.

L. Cædicus.

Quæstors. P. Servilius Priscus.

L. Lucretius Tricipitinus.

281. Y. of R.

38. Consulship. L. PINARIUS RUFUS MAMERCINUS.

C. FURIUS FUSUS.

Tribunes of the People. V. Iero Publius Philo.

Ædiles. C. Lætorius.

Q. Confidius.

T. Statius.

Quæstors. T. Iulius Genucius-Ciccrinus.

P. Velutius Amatinus Cæcus.

282. Y. of R.

39. Consulship. AP. CLAUDIUS SABINUS REGILLENSIS.

T. QUINCTIUS BARBATUS CAPITOLINUS.

Tribunes of the People. Volero Publius Philo.

Ædiles. C. Lætorius.

P. Mucius Scævola.

K. Atinius Longus.

Quæstors. Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus.

C. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis.

283. Y. of R.

40. Consulship. L. VALERIUS POPLICOLA POTITUS, a second time.

T. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS.

Tribunes of the People. C. Sicinnius Bellutus.

L. Nuntorius.

M. Duilius.

L. Mæcilius.

S. Icilius Roga.

Ædiles. L. Cædicus.

T. Statius.

Quæstors. L. Minutius Cincinnetus.

L. Cornelius Cæcilius.

284. Y. of R.

41. Consulship. A. VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS CÆLIAMONTANUS.

T. NUMICIUS PRISCUS.

Tribunes of the People. Cn. Apronius.

P. Mucius Scævola.

K. Atinius Longus.

M. Decius.

C. Marcius.

Ædiles. Volero Publius Philo.

C. Lætorius.

Quæstors.

Quæstors. L. Minucius Augurinus.
C. Horatius Pulvillus.

285. Y. of R.

42. Consulship. T. QUINCTIUS BARBAT-TUS CAPITOLINUS, a
second time.

Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS.

T. Quinctius triumphs over the Volsci, and Antiates.

Tribunes of the C. Pontificius,
People. C. Confidius.

L. Romuleius.

L. Titinius.

M. Genucius Aventinensis.

Ædiles. C. Sicinnius Bellutus.

M. Duilius.

Quæstors. Q. Minucius Augurinus.

Sp. Virginius Tricostus Calimen-tanus.

286. Y. of R.

43. Consulship. TI. ÆMILIUS MAMERCI-
NUS, a second time.

Q. FABIVS VIBULANUS.

Tribunes of the C. Duilius,
People. C. Mævius.

T. Staius.

M. Decius.

L. Cædicius.

Ædiles. L. Næviterius.

Sp. Icilius Ruga.

Quæstors. T. Pomilius Rocus Vaticanus.

C. Veturius Cicurinus.

287. Y. of R.

44. Consulship. SP. POSTHUMIUS ALBUS
REGILLENSIS.

Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS, a
second time.

Tribunes of the Volero Publilius Philo.
People. M. Pompilius.

M. Manilius.

C. Sicinnius Bellutus.

P. Silius.

Ædiles. L. Mæcilius.

Cn. Apronius.

Quæstors. A. Æternus Fontinalis.

Sex. Quintilius.

288. Y. of R.

45. Consulship. Q. FABIVS VIBULANUS, a
second time.

T. QUINCTIUS BARBA-TUS CAPITOLINUS, a third time.

The ninth Lustrum.

Tribunes of the Q. Decius Mus.
People. M. Metilius.

P. Lætorius.

M. Pontificius.

M. Confidius.

Ædiles. C. Pontificius.

L. Titinius.

Quæstors. Sp. Tarpeius Montanus Capitolinus.
P. Horatius Tergeminus.

289. Y. of R.

46. Consulship. A. POSTHUMIUS ALBUS
REGILLENSIS.
SP. FURIUS MEDULLINUS
FUSUS.

Tribunes of the L. Domitius Ænobarbus.
People. L. Cædicius.

L. Mænius.

Cn. Genucius Aventinensis.

M. Cædicius.

Ædiles. M. Pompilius.

C. Duilius.

Quæstors. P. Scyllius Capitolinus.

T. Mercenius Lanatus.

Pro-Consul. T. Quinctius Barbatus Ca-pitolinus.

290. Y. of R.

47. Consulship. P. SERVILIUS PRISCUS.
L. ÆBUTIVS ELVA. Both die before the year of their Consulship ends.

Tribunes of the C. Licinius.
People. C. Volscius.

C. Junius Brutus Bubulcus.

M. Sellius.

P. Publilius Philo.

Ædiles. M. Metilius.

M. Pontificius.

Quæstors. Ap. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis.

Sp. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.

291. Y. of R.

48. Consulship. L. LUCRETIVS TRICIPI-TINUS, who triumphs over the Volsci, and Æqui.

T. VETURIUS GEMINUS
CICURINUS, who receives the honours of an Ovation.

Tribunes of the Sex. Titius.
People. C. Terentius Arsa.

M. Decius Mus.

C. Fescennius.
M. Confidius.
Ædiles. L. Mænius.
Cn. Genucius Aventinensis.
Quæstors. T. Genucius Augurinus.
M. Cornelius Maluginensis.
292. Y. of R.
49. Consulship. P. VOLUMNIUS AMINTI-NUS GALLUS.
SER. Sulpicius CAMERI-
NUS.
Tribunes of the A. Virginus.
People. M. Volscius Fictor.
C. Numitorius.
L. Mæcilius.
L. Sicinius Bellutus.
Ædiles. C. Terentius Arsa.
M. Sellius.
Quæstors. T. Antonius Merenda.
M. Sergius.
293. Y. of R.
50. Consulship. M. VALERIUS POPLICO-
LA, a second time.
C. CLAUDIUS SABINUS
REGILLENIS.
Valerius dies in his office.
L. QUINCTIUS CINCIN-
NATUS succeeds him.
Tribunes of the A. Virginus.
People. M. Volscius Fictor.
C. Numitorius.
L. Sicinius Bellutus.
L. Mæcilius.
Ædiles. Sex. Titius.
M. Decius Mus.
Quæstors. M. Horatius Barbatus.
Lar. Herminius Aquilinus.
294. Y. of R.
51. Consulship. Q. FABIVS VIBULANUS, a third time.
L. CORNELIUS MALUGI-NENSIS COSSUS.
The former triumphs over the Æqui and Volsci; the latter over the Volsci and Antiates.
The tenth Lustrum.
Tribunes of the A. Virginus.
People. M. Volscius Fictor.
C. Numitorius.
L. Mæcilius.
Ædiles. M. Confidius.

C. Fescennius.
Quæstors. A. Cornelius Maluginensis Cossus.
C. Servilius Struētus Abala.
295. Y. of R.
52. Consulship. C. NAUTIUS RUTILUS, a
second time.
L. MINUCIUS AUGURI-NUS, who is forced to abdicate.
Dictator. L. QUINCTIUS CIN-CINNATUS.
G. of the Horse. L. Tarquitiu Flaccus.
Quinctius triumphs over the Æqui.
Tribunes of the A. Virginus.
People. M. Volscius.
C. Numitorius.
L. Sicinius Bellutus.
L. Mæcilius.
Ædiles. C. Volscius.
P. Publilius Philo.
Quæstors. M. Valerius Maximus.
T. Quinctius Barbatus Capitoli-
nus.
296. Y. of R.
53. Consulship. C. HORATIUS PULVIL-
LUS.
Q. MINUCIUS AUGURI-
NUS.
Tribunes of the A. Virginus.
People. M. Volscius.
C. Numitorius.
L. Mæcilius.
L. Sicinius Bellutus.
Ædiles. Sex. Titius.
C. Junius Brutus Bubulcus.
Quæstors. M. Fabius Vibulanus.
M. Geganius Macerinus.
297. Y. of R.
54. Consulship. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS.
SP. VIRGINIUS TRICOS-
TUS CÆLIMONTANUS.
Secular Games.
Tribunes of the L. Icilius Ruga.
People. L. Alhenius.
K. Duilius.
Q. Pæteliu Libo Visolus.
M. Oppius.
Sex. Manilius.

C. Fulcinius.
 L. Roscius.
 Sp. Antius.
 P. Licinius.
 Ædiles. M. Claudius Cicero.
M. Marcius Rutilius.
 Quæstors. C. Julius Iulus.
Furius Fagus.
 298. Y. of R.
 55. Consulship. T. ROMILIUS ROCUS VATICANUS.
 C. VETURIUS SICURINUS.
 Tribunes of the People. L. Icius Ruga.
 L. Alfenus.
 Q. Pætelius.
 P. Licinius.
 Sp. Antius.
 M. Oppius.
 L. Roscius.
 K. Duilius.
 C. Fulcinius.
 Sex. Manilius.
 Ædiles. M. Silius.
C. Pempilius.
 Quæstors. M. Genucius Augurinus.
A. Sempronius Atratinus.
 299. Y. of R.
 56. Consulship. SP. TARPEIUS MONTANUS CAPITOLINUS.
 A. ÆTERNIUS FONTINALIS.
 Tribunes of the People. L. Sicinius Dentatus.
 C. Claudius Cicero.
 Sp. Oppius Cornicen.
 Sex. Titius.
 T. Albinus.
 M. Titinius.
 L. Mamilius Vitulus.
 M. Marcius Rutilus.
 M. Claudius Cicero.
 M. Tarquinius Laurentinus.
 Ædiles. L. Iulius.
A. Virginius.
 Quæstors. L. Iulius Pætillus Petrus.
C. Curtius Pilius.
 300. Y. of R.
 57. Consulship. SEX. QUINTILIUS, who dies in his Consulship.
 P. HORATIUS TERGIMINUS.

Tribunes of the People. L. Apronius.
 C. Memmius.
 C. Marcius.
 C. Manius.
 P. Furius.
 Q. Romuleius.
 M. Silius.
 L. Volumnius Flamma.
 M. Terentius Arsa.
 N. Oracilius.
 Ædiles. L. Iulius Ruga.
Q. Pætillus L'eo Visolus.
 Quæstors. L. Atilius Longus.
L. Papirius Mugillanus.
 301. Y. of R.
 58. Consulship. P. SESTIUS CAPITOLINUS.
 T. MENENIUS LANATUS.
 Tribunes of the People. Sex. Titius.
 C. Fulcinius.
 L. Fulcinius.
 P. Tarquinius Laurentinus.
 T. Genucius Aventinensis.
 M. Oppius.
 M. Juventius.
 C. Pompilius.
 C. Sextius.
 C. Rabuleius.
 Ædiles. K. Duilius.
Sp. Oppius Cornicen.
 Quæstors. L. Sempronius Atratinus.
M. Rabuleius.
 302. Y. of R.
 59. Consulship. AP. CLAUDIUS CRASSINUS.
 T. GENUCIUS AUGURINUS.
 They abdicated the Consulship to make way for the Decemviri.
 303. Y. of R.
 1. Decemvirate. AP. CLAUDIUS CRASSINUS.
 T. GENUCIUS AUGURINUS.
 SP. VETURIUS CRASSUS CICURINUS.
 C. JULIUS IULUS.
 A. MANLIUS VULSO.
 SP. POSTHUMIUS ALBUS REGILLENsis.
 SP. SESTIUS CAPITOLINUS.
 SER. SULPITIUS CAMERINUS.
 T. Ro-

T. ROMILIUS ROCUS VATI-CANUS.

P. HORATIUS TERCEMINUS.

303. Y. of R.

2. Decemvirate. APPIUS CLAUDIUS CRASSINUS,
a second time.

Q. FABIUS VIBULANUS.

M. CORNELIUS MALUGINEN-
SIS.

T. ANTONIUS MERENDA.

M. SERGIUS.

Q. PÆTELIUS LIBO VISOLUS.

L. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS.

M' RABULEIUS.

K. DUILIUS.

SP. OPPIUS CORNICEN.

304. Y. of R.

3. Decemvirate. APPIUS CLAUDIUS CRASSINUS, a third time, with the same Collegues as in the second Decemvirate. Being forced to give place to new Consuls, they abdicated.

304. Y. of R.

60. Consulship. L. VALERIUS POPLICOLA POTITUS. He triumphs over the Æqui.

M. HORATIUS BARBA-
TUS. He triumphs over the Sabines.

Tribunes of the L. Virginus.
People. L. Icilius Ruga.

P. Numitorius.

M. Duilius.

C. Sicinius Bellutus.

M. Titinius.

C. Apronius.

C. Oppius.

M. Pomponius.

P. Villius.

Ædiles. C. Claudius Cicero.

M. Titinius.

Quæstors. Agrippa Menenius Lenatus.

L. Julius Iulus.

305. Y. of R.

61. Consulship. LAR. HERMINIUS AQUI-
LINUS.

T. VIRGINIUS TRICOS-
TUS CÆLIMONTANUS.

Tribunes of the Sp. Tarpeius Montanus Capito-People, accord- linus.

ing to Livy. A. Æternius Fontinalis.

VOL. II.

L. Trebonius Asper.

Q. Confidius.

L. Allenius.

M' Marcius.

C. Fulcinus.

M. Claudius Cicero.

C. Claudius Cicero.

L. Albinus.

Ædiles.

L. Volumnius Flamina.

P. Tarquinius Laurentinus.

Quæstors.

C. Sergius.

M. Papirius Crassus.

306. Y. of R.

62. Consulship. M. GEGANIUS MACERI-
NUS.

C. JULIUS IULUS.

Tribunes of the P. Villius.
People. C. Oppius.

Sp. Antius.

C. Pompidius.

C. Antius.

L. Villius.

Sex. Manilius.

M. Silius.

C. Virginus.

M. Icilius Ruga.

Ædiles.

M. Titinius.

M. Pomponius.

Quæstors.

M. Corneli s Maluginensis.

C. Nautius Rutilus.

307. Y. of R.

63. Consulship. T. QUINCTIUS BARBA-TUS CAPITOLINUS, a
fourth time.

AGRIPPA FURIUS FUSUS.

Tribunes of the L. Allenius.
People. P. Numitorius.

L. Trebonius Asper.

L. Fulcinus.

M' Alienius.

M' Marcius.

M. Pomponius.

L. Roscius.

M. Claudius Cicero.

P. Scaptius.

Ædiles.

C. Sicinius Bellutus.

C. Apronius.

Quæstors.

L. Valerius Potitus.

Mam. Æmilius Mamercinus.

308. Y. of R.

64. Consulship. M. GENUCIUS AUGURI-
NUS.

4 D

C. CUR-

| | | | |
|--------------------------------|--|--------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| | C. CURTIUS PHILO. | | C. Oppius. |
| Tribunes of the People. | C. Canuleius. | | C. Antius. |
| | C. Furius. | | Cn. Genucius. |
| | C. Claudius Cicero. | | P. Villius. |
| | L. Furius. | | L. Villius. |
| | L. Oppius. | | Sp. Antius. |
| | Ti. Pontificius. | | L. Apronius. |
| | M. Titinius. | | C. Latorius. |
| | C. Virginius. | Ædiles. | C. Canuleius. |
| | Cn. Apuleius Pansa. | | N. Sextius Sextinus. |
| | T. Latinus. | Quæstors. | L. Papirius Crassus. |
| Ædiles. | P. Villius. | | L. Virginius Tricoftus. |
| | C. Oppius. | | |
| Quæstors. | C. Fossus Flaccinator. | 311. Y. of R. | |
| | Posthumius Æbutius Eiva. | 67. Consulship. | M. FABIVS VIBULANUS. |
| 309. Y. of R. | | | POSTHUMIVS ÆBUTIVS |
| 1. Military | A. SEMPRONIUS ATRATINUS. | | ELVA CORNICEN. |
| Tribuneship. | L. ATILIUS LONGUS. | Tribunes of the People. | C. Petillius. |
| | T. CLOELIVS SICVLVS. They | | C. Claudius Cicero. |
| | all three abdicated. | | C. Sicinius Bellutus. |
| 309. Y. of R. | | | L. Trebonius Asper. |
| 65. Consulship. | L. PAPIRIUS MUGILLANUS. | | L. Oppius. |
| | L. SEMPRONIUS ATRATINUS. | | Q. Decius Mus. |
| Tribunes of the People. | N. Sextius Sextinus. | | Q. Roscius. |
| | Sp. Icilius Ruga. | | M. Titinius. |
| | Pub. Numitorius. | | M. Allienius. |
| | M. Pomponius. | | Q. Terentius. |
| | C. Apronius. | Ædiles. | C. Furius. |
| | L. Cædicius. | | L. Furius. |
| | C. Sicinius Bellutus. | Quæstors. | L. Sergius Fidenas. |
| | Sex. Manilius. | | Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus. |
| | C. Pompilius. | 312. Y. of R. | |
| | Q. Mælius. | 68. Consulship. | C. FURIUS PACILUS FUSUS. |
| Ædiles. | L. Trebonius Asper. | | M. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS. |
| | M. Icilius Ruga. | Tribunes of the People. | C. Petillius. |
| Quæstors. | L. Sergius. | | L. Villius. |
| | Mam. Æmilius Mamercinus. | | N. Sextius Sextinus. |
| 310. Y. of R. | | | M. Duilius. |
| 66. Consulship. | M. GEGANIUS MAMERCINUS, a second time. | | C. Volumnius Flamma. |
| | T. QUINCTIVS BARBATUS CAPITOLINUS, a fifth time. | | K. Atinius Longus. |
| | M. Geganius triumphs over the Volsci. | | C. Furius. |
| First Censors. | M. Papirius Mugillanus. | | P. Virginius. |
| | L. Sempronius Atratinus. | | L. Sicinius Bellutus. |
| | | | L. Romuleius. |
| | | Ædiles. | L. Cædicius. |
| | | | C. Latorius. |
| | | Quæstors. | L. Cornelius Maluginensis. |
| | | | C. Servilius Struettus Ahala. |
| | | 313. Y. of R. | |
| | | 69. Consulship. | PROCVLVS GEGANIUS |
| | | | MACERINVS. |
| | | | L. MENENIVS LANATVS. |
| Tribunes of the People. | C. Virginius. | Tribunes of the People. | L. Marcus. |
| | L. Marcus. | | C. Apronius. |

C. Canuleius.
P. Mucius Scævola.
Voler. Publilius.
L. Titinius.
Cn. Apronius.
L. Petillius.
Q. Mucius Scævola.
Sp. Icilius Ruga.
Ædiles. Cn. Genucius.
Q. Decius Mus.
Quæstors. M. Posthumius Albus Regillensis.
T. Geganus Macerinus.

314. Y. of R.
70. Consulship. T. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLINUS, a sixth time.
AGRIPPA MENENIUS LANATUS.
Dictator. L. QUINCTIUS CINCINNATUS, a second time.
G. of the Horse. C. Servilius Structus Ahala.
Tribunes of the People. Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.
Sex. Titinius.
C. Sicinnius Bellutus.
L. Cædicius.
C. Plætorius.
C. Confidius.
Q. Roscius.
L. Numitorius.
L. Mæcilius.

Ædiles. C. Peillius.
K. Atinius Longus.
Quæstors. P. Horatius Tergeminus.
C. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis.

315. Y. of R.
2. Military MAM. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS.
Tribuneship. L. QUINCTIUS CINCINNATUS.
L. JULIUS IULUS.
Tribunes of the People. N. Sextius Sextinus.
M. Pompilius.
P. Decius Mus.
C. Racilius.
L. Canuleius.
C. Volumnius Flamma.
M. Genucius Aventinensis.
C. Duilius.
T. Stadius.
C. Pontificius.

Ædiles. Voler. Publilius Philo.
L. Remulcius.
Quæstors. M. Fossius Flaccinator.
L. Pinarius Rufus Mamercinus.

316. Y. of R.
71. Consulship. M. GEGANIUS MACERINUS, a third time.
L. SERGIUS FIDENAS.
Dictator. M. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS. He triumphs over the Veientes, Falisci, and Fidenates.
G. of the Horse. L. Quinctius Cincinnatus.
Tribunes of the People. C. Canuleius.
K. Atinius.
M. Antius.
M. Trebonius.
M. Albinus.
Sex. Titinius.
M. Mæcilius.
L. Stadius.
A. Allienius.
C. Ælius Pætus.

Ædiles. Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
P. Mucius Scævola.
Quæstors. Sp. Posthumius Regillensis.
L. Furius Medullinus.

317. Y. of R.
72. Consulship. M. CORNELIUS MALUGINENSIS.
L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.
Tribunes of the People. Sp. Mælius.
C. Furius.
C. Volumnius Flamma.
L. Manilius.
L. Sextius.
M. Furius.
L. Cædicius.
M. Manilius.
C. Apronius.
C. Mænius.

Ædiles. C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.
Sex. Titinius.
Quæstors. T. Quinctius Pennus Cincinnatus.
A. Posthumius Tubertus.

318. Y. of R.
73. Consulship. C. JULIUS IULUS, a second time.

L. VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS.

Dictator. Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS FIDENAS.

G. of the Horse. Posthumius Æbutius Elva Cornicen.

C. Praetors. C. Furius Pacilus Fufus.
M. Geganius Macerinus.
The twelfth Lustrum.

Tribunes of the People. C. Canuleius.
C. Confidius.
C. Platorius.
C. Titius.

M. Trebonius.
L. Canuleius.
M. Confidius.
C. Rutilius.
M. Fulcinius.
T. Statius.

Ædiles. P. Decius Mus.
C. Pontificius.

Quæstors. C. Junius Mento.
A. Æternus Fentinalis.

319. Y. of R.

74. Consulship. C. JULIUS IULUS, a third time.

L. VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS, a second time.

Dictator. MAM. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS.

G. of the Horse. A. Posthumius Tubertus.

Tribunes of the People. C. Furius.
M. Cædicius.
L. Mænius.
M. Pontificius.

C. Volscius.
L. Domitius Ænobarbus.
P. Silius.
C. Mænius.
M. Metilius.
L. Junius Brutus Bubulcus.

Ædiles. M. Atilius.
A. Allicinius.

Quæstors. T. Lælius Flavius.
Hylus Lucretius Tricipitinus.

320. Y. of R.

3. Military Tribuneship. M. FABIVS VIBULANUS.
M. FOSLIUS FLACCINATOR.
L. SERGIUS FIDENAS.

Tribunes of the People. L. Canuleius.
L. Cædicius.

C. Volumnius Flamma.
M. Sellius.

V. Volscius Fictor.

K. Atinius Longus.

L. Cædicius.

M. Silius.

L. Volscius.

C. Titius.

Ædiles.

Sp. Mælius.

M. Furius.

Quæstors.

N. Fabius Vibulanus.

T. Genucius Augurinus.

321. Y. of R.

4. Military Tribuneship.

L. PINARIUS RUFUS MAMERCINUS.

L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS.

SP. POSTHUMIUS ALBUS REGILLENSIS.

Tribunes of the People.

L. Junius Brutus Bubulcus.

L. Sicinius Bellutus.

L. Cæcilius Metellus.

M. Decius Mus.

L. Domitius Ænobarbus.

Sex. Titinius.

Cn. Sicinnius Bellutus.

P. Decius Mus.

L. Ælius Pætus.

M' Marcius.

Ædiles.

M. Trebonius.

T. Statius.

Quæstors.

P. Servilius Priscus.

M. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis.

322. Y. of R.

75. Consulship.

T. QUINCTIUS PENNUS CINCINNATUS.

C. JULIUS MENTO.

Dictator.

A. POSTHUMIUS TUBERTUS. He triumphs over the Æqui and Volsci.

G. of the Horse.

L. Julius Iulus.

Tribunes of the People.

A. Virginius.

T. Metilius.

M. Metilius.

C. Pontificius.

C. Cæcilius.

C. Pætilius.

M. Pontificius.

M. Furius.

C. Pætilius.

P. Plautius Proculus.

Ædiles.

L. Junius Brutus Bubulcus.

C. Vol-

Quæstors. C. Volscius.
Sex. Julius Iulus.
Q. Fabius Vibulanus.

323. Y. of R.
 76. Consulship. C. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.
L. JULIUS IULUS.

Tribunes of the People. Sex. Titinius.
M. Silius.
M. Silius.
L. Sicinius Bellutus.
P. Lætorius.
L. Volscius Fictor.
C. Volumnius Flamma.
C. Pompius.
L. Cæditius.
C. Terentius Arsa.

Ædiles. L. Volscius.
M. Silius.

Quæstors. A. Sempronius Atratinus.
L. Horatius Barbatus.

324. Y. of R.
 77. Consulship. L. SERGIUS FIDENAS, a second time.
HOSTUS LUCRETIUS TRICIPITINUS.

Tribunes of the People. C. Petelius.
C. Poetelius Libo.
Sp. Mælius.
L. Cæcilius Metellus.
M. Volscius Fictor.
C. Numitorius.
Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.
C. Lætorius.
Sp. Antius.
M. Trebonius.

Ædiles. M. Marcius.
L. Ælius Pætus.

Quæstors. Ap. Claudius Crassus Regillensis.
Sp. Nautius Rutilius.

325. Y. of R.
 78. Consulship. T. QUINCTIUS PENNUS CINCINNATUS, a second time.
A. CORNELIUS COSSUS.
 Some Authors place Cossus's triumph, and the Trophy he made of the Spoils of Tolumnius King of the Veientes, under this year.

Tribunes of the People. Cn. Sicinius Bellutus.
C. Cæcilius Metellus.
P. Publilius Philo, the Son of Publius.

P. Publilius Philo, the Son of Volero.
L. Virginius.
M. Furius.
M. Plætorius.
L. Publilius Philo Vulscus.
Q. Poetelius Libo Visolus.
L. Mamilius Vitulus.
P. Plautius Proculus.
T. Metilius.

Ædiles. C. Sempronius Atratinus.
L. Manlius Vulso Capitolinus.

326. Y. of R.
 79. Consulship. L. PAPIRIUS MUGILLANUS, a second time.
C. SERVILIUS STRUCTUS AHALA.

Tribunes of the People. C. Cæcilius Metellus.
Sex. Manilius.
A. Virginius.
C. Pompius.
L. Cædicius.
M. Manilius.
M. Silius.
L. Sicinius.
P. Lætorius.
P. Licinius.

Ædiles. C. Terentius Arsa.
M. Silius.

Quæstors. Q. Antonius Merenda.
L. Papirius Mugillanus.

327. Y. of R.
 5. Military Tribune. T. QUINCTIUS PENNUS CINCINNATUS.
C. FURIUS PACILUS.
M. POSTHUMIUS ALBUS REGILLENSIS.
A. CORNELIUS COSSUS.

Dictator. MAM. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS, a third time.
 He triumphs over the Veientes and Fidenates.

G. of the Horse. A. Cornelius Cossus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Cæcilius Metellus.
C. Lætorius.
Sp. Mælius Capitolinus, the son of Spurius.
L. Ælius Pætus.
L. Icilius Ruga.
L. Publilius Philo.

| | | | |
|-----------------------------|--|-----------------------------|---|
| | Spurius Mælius Capitolinus, the Son of Caius. | Ædiles. | Sex. Manilius.
M. Manilius. |
| | M. Oppius. | Quæstors. | P. Lucretius Tricipitinus.
C. Servilius Axilla. |
| | M. Claudius Cicero. | | |
| | K. Duilius. | 330. Y. of R. | |
| Ædiles. | C. Numitorius.
M. Velscius. | 80. Consulship. | C. SEMPRONIUS ATRA-
TINUS. |
| Quæstors. | L. Servilius Structus.
T. Quinctius Capitolinus. | | Q. FABIVS VIBULANUS. |
| 328. Y. of R. | | Tribunes of the People. | C. Junius Bubulcus.
Sp. Mælius.
L. Albinus.
L. Trebonius Asper.
C. Mælius.
M. Claudius Cicero.
M. Oppius.
M. Appuleius.
M. Plætorius.
P. Furius. |
| 6. Military
Tribuneship. | A. SEMPRONIUS ATRATI-
NUS.
L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, a
second time.
L. HORATIUS BARBATUS.
C. Fulcinius.
L. Virginius.
P. Publilius Philo, the son of Volero.
C. Popilius.
P. Numitorius.
Sex. Titius.
Q. Pæteliu8 Libo Visolus.
P. Publilius Philo, the son of Publius.
M. Plætorius.
M. Titinius. | Ædiles. | L. Icilius Ruga.
K. Duilius. |
| | | Quæstors. | M. Papirius Mugillanus.
Sp. Veturius Crassus. |
| Tribunes of the People. | | 331. Y. of R. | |
| | | 8. Military
Tribuneship. | L. MANLIUS VULSO CAPI-
TOLINUS.
Q. ANTONIUS MERENDA.
L. PAPIRIUS MUGILLANUS.
L. SERVILIUS STRUCTUS.
L. Hortensius.
Sex. Tempanius.
L. Antistius.
A. Sellius.
Sp. Icilius Ruga.
T. Roscius.
M. Terentius Arsa.
M. Silius.
L. Volumnius Flamma.
Q. Romuleius.
C. Popilius.
Q. Pæteliu8 Libo Visolus.
T. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.
Cn. Cornelius Cossus. |
| Ædiles. | Cn. Sicinius Bellutus.
L. Mamilius Vitulus. | | |
| Quæstors. | M. Manlius Vulso Capitolinus.
Sp. Nautius Rutilus. | Tribunes of the
People. | |
| 329. Y. of R. | | Ædiles. | |
| 7. Military
Tribuneship. | AP. CLAUDIUS CRASSUS RE-
GILLENSIS.
SP. NAUTIUS RUTILUS.
S. SERGIUS FIDENAS, a second time.
SEX. JULIUS IULUS.
L. Julius Iulus.
L. Papirius Crassus. | Quæstors. | |
| | | 332. Y. of R. | |
| Censors. | | 81. Consulship. | T. QUINCTIUS CAPITO-
LINUS BARBATUS.
N. FABIVS VIBULANUS.
He gains a victory over the Æqui, and is honoured with an Ovation. |
| | | Tribunes of the
People. | Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.
Sp. Oppius Cornicen. |
| | | | C. Tre- |
| | The thirteenth Lustrum. | | |
| Tribunes of the
People. | L. Virginius.
C. Pompilius.
Sp. Oppius Cornicen.
C. Claudius Cicero.
C. Numitorius.
L. Sicinius.
C. Pompilius.
Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.
L. Roscius.
L. Volumnius Flamma. | | |

C. Trebonius Asper.
 C. Rabuleius.
 N. Otacilius.
 L. Albinus.
 L. Roscius.
 L. Allienius.
 P. Silius.
 C. Claudius Cicero.
 C. Junius Bubulcus.
 L. Hortensius.
 C. Valerius Potitus Volusus.
 Cn. Cornelius Maluginensis Cofsus.

Ædiles.

Quæstors.

333. Y. of R.

9. Military Tribuneship.

T. QUINCTIUS PENNUS CIN-
 CINNATUS, a second time.
 M. MANLIUS VULSO CAPI-
 TOLINUS.
 L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS,
 a third time.
 A. SEMPRONIUS ATRATINUS,
 a second time.

Tribunes of the People.

M. Antistius.
 Sex. Pompilius.
 M. Canuleius.
 Sp. Mæcilius.
 C. Plautius Proculus.
 M. Appuleius.
 L. Sicinius Dentatus.
 Q. Petilius.
 L. Marcus.
 M. Pomponius.
 Sex. Tempanius.
 A. Sellius.

Ædiles.

Quæstors of Rome.

Military Quæ-
 stors.

334. Y. of R.

10. Military Tribuneship.

AGRIPPA MENENIUS LANA-
 TUS.
 SP. NAUTIUS RUTILUS.
 P. LUCRETIVS TRICIPITI-
 NUS.
 C. SERVILIUS AXILLA.
 C. Junius Bubulcus.
 L. Albinus.
 L. Allienius.
 C. Popilius.
 M. Pomponius.
 L. Hortensius.
 C. Appuleius.

Q. Confidius.
 C. Marcus.
 C. Oppius.
 L. Antistius.
 Sp. Icilius.

Ædiles.

Quæstors of Rome.

Military Quæ-
 stors.

335. Y. of R.

11. Military Tribuneship.

M. PAPIRIUS MUGILLANUS.
 C. SERVILIUS AXILLA, a second time.
 L. SERGIUS FIDENAS, a third time.
 Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS
 FIDENAS, a second time.
 C. Servilius Axilla.
 L. Papirius Mugillanus.
 Mam. Æmilius Mamerci-
 nus.

Dictator.

G. of the Horse.

Censors.

The fourteenth Lustrum.

Tribunes of the People.

Sp. Mæcilius.
 Sp. Metilius.
 A. Sellius.
 M. Canuleius.
 L. Villius.
 P. Silius.
 T. Pontificius.
 P. Villius.
 L. Sicinius.
 C. Pompilius.
 Sex. Pompilius.
 M. Antistius.
 M. Cornelius Cossus.
 P. Sulpicius Camerinus.
 C. Sergius Nepos.
 L. Virginius Tricostus.

Ædiles.

Quæstors of Rome.

Military Quæ-
 stors.

336. Y. of R.

12. Military Tribuneship.

P. LUCRETIVS TRICIPI-
 TINUS.
 L. SERVILIUS STRUCTUS.
 AGRIPPA MENENIUS LANATUS,
 all three a second time.
 SP. VETURIUS CRASSUS CICU-RINUS.
 Sp. Mæcilius.
 Sp. Metilius.
 C. Apronius.
 L. Antistius.

Tribunes of the People.

Censors. L. Sergius Fidenas.
Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas.

The fifteenth Lustrum.

Tribunes of the People. L. Icilius Ruga.
M. Antistius.
C. Canuleius.
Sex. Pompilius.
M. Canuleius.
L. Sextius.
C. Sellius.
Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
C. Sextius.
M. Duilius.

Ædiles. Sp. Tempanius.
Q. Petilius.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Claudius Crassus Regillensis.
M. Geganius Macerinus.

Military Quæstors. M' Valerius Maximus.
Q. Quinctius Cincinnatus.

342. Y. of R.

84. Consulship. M. PAPIRIUS MUGILLANUS.

Tribunes of the People. C. NAUTIUS RUTILUS.
L. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.
Q. Silius.

Ti. Pontificius.
K. Atinius Longus.
T. Voler. Publilius Philo.
Q. Terentius.
C. Duilius.
C. Plautius Proculus.
Trebius.

Ædiles. L. Petilius.
L. Cædicius.
L. Oppius.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Cornelius Maluginensis.
T. Veturius Geminus.

Military Quæstors. M. Sergius Fidenas.
L. Sergius Fidenas.

343. Y. of R.

85. Consulship. M' ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS.

C. VALERIUS POTITUS VOLUSUS. He defeats the Æqui, and receives the honours of an Ovation.

Tribunes of the People. M. Mænius.
Volero Publilius Philo.
M. Genucius Aventinensis.
Sex. Sextius Sextinus.

VOL. II.

L. Tempanius.
L. Mæcilius.
A. Tempanius.
C. Apronius.
Q. Publilius.
Cn. Sellius.

Ædiles.

L. Icilius Ruga.

Trebius. He, according to Pliny, B. 18. distributed Corn among the People gratis. They, in Gratitude, erected Statues to his Memory, on the Capitol, and the Hill Palatinus; and at his Funeral, his Corps were carried on the Shoulders of Citizens.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Furius Fusus.
A. Manlius Vulso.

Military Quæstors. M. Quintilius Varus.
M. Æbutius Elva.

344. Y. of R.

86. Consulship. CN. CORNELIUS COSSUS.
L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, a second time.

Tribunes of the People. Sp. Icilius Ruga.
L. Icilius Ruga.

C. Icilius Ruga.
C. Junius Brutus Bubulcus.
C. Volumnius Flamma.
Q. Decius Mus.
C. Licinius Calvus.
L. Villius.

Ædiles. M. Pompilius.
Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
Volero Publilius Philo.
M. Duilius.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Ælius Pætus.
Q. Silius.

Military Quæstors. P. Puppius.
K. Fabius Ambustus. The last of these four Quæstors was the only Patrician among them; the other three, were the first Plebeians, who enjoyed the Quæstorship.

345. Y. of R.

16. Military Tribuneship. C. JULIUS IULUS.
P. CORNELIUS COSSUS.
C. SERVILIUS AHALA.

Dictator. P. CORNELIUS RUTILUS COSSUS.

4 E

G. of

G. of the Horse. C. Servilius Ahala.
Tribunes of the People. M. Genucius Aventinensis.
 L. Icilius Ruge.

L. Sicinius Bellutus.

Trebius.

P. Decius Mus.

Sex. Titinius.

L. Manilius.

C. Sicinius Bellutus.

K. Atinius Longus.

L. Titinius.

Ædiles. M. Menius.

C. Duilius.

Quæstors of Rome. Appius Claudius Crassus.

L. Julius Iulus.

Military Quæstors. M. Pomponius.

Cn. Genucius Aventinensis.

346. Y. of R.

17. Military Tribuneship. C. VALERIUS POTITUS VOLUSUS.

C. SERVILIUS AHALA, a second time.

N. FABIVS VIBULANUS, a third time.

FURIUS MEDULLINUS.

Tribunes of the People. L. JUNIUS BUBULCUS BRUTUS.

Q. MUCIUS SÆVOLA.

P. MUCIUS SÆVOLA.

Volero Publilius Philo.

Q. Publilius Philo.

Sex. Sextius Sextinus.

M. Manilius.

L. Cædicius.

Q. Decius Mus.

C. Titinius.

Ædiles. Sp. Icilius Ruge.

Q. Silius.

Quæstors of Rome. L. Atinius Longus.

L. Publilius Philo Volsceus.

Military Quæstors. Q. Sulpicius Camerinus Cornutus.

Q. Servilius Proculus Fidenas.

347. Y. of R.

18. Military Tribuneship. P. CORNELIUS RUTILUS COS-SUS.

L. VALERIUS POTITUS, a second time.

CN. CORNELIUS CASSUS.

N. FABIVS AMBUSTUS.

Tribunes of the People. P. Ælius Pætus.

Volero Publilius Philo.

Cn. Genucius Aventinensis.

P. Puppius.

Trebius.

M. Pomponius.

K. Atinius.

M. Pompilius.

C. Junius Brutus Bubulcus.

C. Titius.

Ædiles. C. Icilius Ruge.

Q. Decius Mus.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Mælius Capitolinus.

P. Mænius.

Military Quæstors. L. Julius Iulus.

P. Licinius Calvus.

348. Y. of R.

19. Military Tribuneship. C. JULIUS IULUS, a second time.

M' ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS.

T. QUINCTIVS CAPITOLINUS.

L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, a second time.

Q. QUINCTIVS CINCIN-
 NATUS.

A. MANLIUS VULSO CAPITOLINUS.

Tribunes of the People. C. Duilius.

L. Titinius.

L. Publilius Philo Volsceus.

L. Cædicius.

C. Popilius.

M. Duilius.

L. Atinius Longus.

C. Ælius Pætus.

Cn. Puppius.

C. Volumnius Flamma.

Ædiles. L. Icilius Ruge.

M. Genucius Aventinensis.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Metilius.

P. Curatius Nepos.

Military Quæstors. Sp. Furius Medullinus.

L. Virginius Tricostus Calimontanus.

349. Y. of R.

20. Military Tribuneship. P. CORNELIUS MALUGINEN-SIS.

SP. NAUTIVS RUTILUS, a third time.

CN. CORNELIUS CASSUS, a second time.

C. VALERIUS POTITUS, a third time.

K. FABIVS AMBUSTUS.

M' SERGIUS FIDENAS.

Tribunes

Tribunes of the People. Sp. Icilius Ruga.
Volero Publilius Philo.
P. Licinius Calvus.
P. Mælius Capitolinus.
M. Manilius.
P. Mænius.
A. Trebius.
P. Silius.
C. Titinius.
C. Apronius.
P. Ælius Pætus.
Ædiles. Cn. Genucius Aventinensis.
Quæstors of Rome. C. Lucerius.
M. Sulpicius Peticus.
Military Quæstors. M. Popilius.
M. Genucius Aventinensis.
350. Y. of R.
21. Military Tribuneship. M' ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS, a second time.
M. FURIUS FUSUS.
AP. CLAUDIUS CRASSUS.
L. JULIUS IULUS.
M. QUINCTILIUS VARUS.
L. VALERIUS POTITUS, a third time.
Censors. M. Furius Camillus.
M. Posthumius Albinus Regillensis.

The sixteenth Lustrum.

Tribunes of the People. Q. Silius.
L. Publilius Philo Volscus.
M. Genucius Aventinensis.
C. Titius.
Cn. Apronius.
L. Icilius Ruga.
M. Pomponius.
M. Pompilius.
L. Titius.
M. Cædicius.
Ædiles. P. Pupius.
Cn. Pupius.
Quæstors of Rome. Sp. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.
Sp. Papirius Crassus.
Military Quæstors. M. Acutius.
M. Valerius Maximus.
351. Y. of R.
22. Military Tribuneship. C. SERVILIUS AHALA, a third time.
Q. SULPICIUS CAMERINUS CORNUTUS.
Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS FIDENAS.

A. MANLIUS VULSO CAPITOLINUS, a second time.
L. VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS CÆLIMONTANUS.
M' SERGIUS FIDENAS, a second time. The two last were forced to abdicate.
Tribunes of the People. L. Mænius.
M. Popilius.
Sp. Antius.
A. Trebius.
C. Mænius.
L. Atinius Longus.
C. Silius.
C. Icilius Ruga.
P. Mælius Capitolinus.
M. Antius.
Ædiles. C. Popilius.
L. Titinius.
Quæstors of Rome. L. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.
P. Cornelius Scipio.
Military Quæstors. A. Posthumius Regillensis.
C. Duilius.
352. Y. of R.
23. Military Tribuneship. L. VALERIUS POTITUS, a fourth time.
L. JULIUS IULUS.
M. FURIUS CAMILLUS.
M' ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS, a third time.
CN. CORNELIUS COSSUS, a second time.
K. FABIVS AMBUSTUS, a second time.
Tribunes of the People. C. Trebonius Asper.
C. Lucerius.
M. Acutius.
P. Curatius.
M. Genucius Aventinensis.
C. Fulcinius.
Cn. Minucius Augurinus.
M. Metilius.
L. Icilius Ruga.
Ædiles. P. Silius.
P. Licinius Calvus.
Quæstors of Rome. L. Lucretius Flavus.
Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus.
Military Quæstors. P. Cornelius Cossus.
P. Plautius Præculus.
353. Y. of R.
24. Military Tribuneship. P. LICINIUS CALVUS.
P. MÆLIUS CAPITOLINUS.
P. MÆNIUS.

SP. FURIUS MEDULLINUS.
 L. LITINIUS.
 L. PUBLILIUS PHILO VOLSCUS.

Tribunes of the People. P. Pupius.
 M. Pontificius.
 L. Volscius.
 C. Mæcilius.
 C. Numitorius.
 M. Genucius Aventinensis.
 C. Pontificius.
 M. Sellius.
 C. Antius.
 T. Staius.

Ædiles. L. Mænius.
 K. Atinius Longus.

Quæstors of Rome. T. Menenius Lanatus.
 T. Sicinius Dentatus.

Military Quæstors. Sp. Mælius.
 A. Virginus.

354. Y. of R.
 25. Military Tribuneship. C. DUILIUS.
 L. ATINIUS LONGUS.
 CN. GENUCIUS AVENTINENSIS.
 M. POMPONIUS.
 VOLERO PUBLILIUS.
 M. VETURIUS CRASSUS CICURINUS.

Tribunes of the People. M. Acutius.
 L. Lucerius.
 L. Staius.
 C. Racilius.
 M. Confidius.
 P. Licinius Calvus.
 C. Volscius.
 M. Mæcilius.
 M. Plætorius.
 L. Allienius.

Ædiles. C. Trebonius Asper.
 Sp. Antius.

Quæstors of Rome. C. Æmilius Mamercinus.
 Q. Pomponius.

Military Quæstors. L. Papirius Cursor.
 L. Valerius Poplicola.

355. Y. of R.
 26. Military Tribuneship. L. VALERIUS POTITUS, a fifth time.
 L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, a third time.
 M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS.
 M. FURIUS CAMILLUS, a second time.

Censors. Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS FIDENAS, a second time.
 Q. SULPICIUS CAMERINUS CORNUTUS, a second time.
 C. Valerius Potitus Volusus.
 M' Æmilius Mamercinus.

The seventeenth Lustrum.

Tribunes of the People. Q. Silius.
 P. Curatius.
 C. Pætilius.
 C. Plætorius.
 Q. Pæteliu Libo Visolus.
 P. Publilius Philo.
 M. Metilius.
 C. Pæteliu Libo Visolus.
 P. Plautius Proculus.
 M. Popilius.

Ædiles. L. Icilius Ruga.
 C. Lucerius.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Cornelius Maluginensis.
 M' Marcus.

Military Quæstors. M. Æmilius Mamercinus.
 L. Fulvius Corvus.

356. Y. of R.
 27. Military Tribuneship. L. JULIUS IULUS, a second time.
 L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, a fourth time.
 L. SERGIUS FIDENAS.
 A. POSTHUMIUS ALBIN. REGILLENsis.
 A. MANLIUS VULSO CAPITOLINUS, a third time.
 P. CORNELIUS MALUGINENSIS, a second time. Their Election was deemed irregular, and they were forced to abdicate.

Tribunes of the People. L. Mænius.
 T. Metilius.
 L. Volscius.
 M. Pontificius.
 P. Pupius.
 L. Lucerius.
 M. Volscius Fictor.
 M. Sellius.
 C. Plautius Proculus.
 M. Genucius.

Ædiles. M. Acutius.
 C. Numitorius.

Quæstors

Quæstors of Sp. Posthumius Albin. Regil-
Rome. lensis.

Q. Sulpicius Longus.

Military Quæ- L. Valerius Potitus. stors. M. Aulus Cerretanus.

357. Y. of R.

28. Military P. LICINIUS.

Tribuneship. L. ATINIUS LONGUS, a second time.

P. MÆLIUS CAPITOLINUS, a
second time.

L. TITINIUS, a second time.

P. MÆNIUS, a second time.

C. GENUCIUS AVENTINEN-SIS, a second time. He was killed in a battle with the Falisci and Capenates.

Dictator. M. FURIUS CAMILLUS.
He triumphs over the Veientes.

G. of the Horse. P. Cornelius Scipio.

Tribunes of the C. Trebonius Asper.
People. P. Lucerius.

M. Decius Mus.

Sp. Mælius.

M. Furius.

M. Acutius.

M. Minucius Augurinus.

C. Terentius Arsa.

P. Lætorius.

L. Virginius.

Ædiles. M. Confidius.

M. Plætorius.

Quæstors of K. Fabius Ambustus.
Rome. Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis.

Military Quæ- L. Cornelius Lentulus.
stors. Agrippa Furius Fusus.

358. Y. of R.

29. Military P. CORNELIUS COSSUS.

Tribuneship. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO.

M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS, a
second time.

K. FABIUS AMBUSTUS, a third time.

L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, a fifth time.

Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS FI-
DENAS, a second time.

Tribunes of the T. Sicinius Dentatus.
People. A. Virginius.

Q. Pomponius.

L. Icilius Ruga.

L. Fulvius Corvus.

C. Lætorius.

L. Cædicius.

C. Lucerius.

P. Pupius.

P. Curatius.

Ædiles.

C. Pætelius Libo Visolus.

Q. Pætelius Libo Visolus.

Quæstors of L. Marcius Rutilus.
Rome. C. Licinius Calvus.

Military Quæ- C. Fabius Ambustus. stors. M. Albinus.

359. Y. of R.

30. Military M. FURIUS CAMILLUS, a Tribuneship. third time.

L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, a sixth time.

C. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS.

SP. POSTHUMIUS ALBIN. RE-GILLENIS.

P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, a second time.

L. VALERIUS POPLICOLA.

Tribunes of the T. Sicinius Dentatus.
People. Q. Pomponius.

A. Virginius.

L. Icilius Ruga.

M. Genucius Aventinensis.

C. Pompilius.

L. Mamilius Vitulus.

Q. Silius.

L. Volumnius Flamma.

L. Cædicius.

Ædiles.

C. Trebonius Asper.

M. Minucius Augurinus.

Quæstors of L. Virginius Tricoftus.
Rome. C. Marcius Rutilus.

Military Quæ- P. Cornelius Cossus, the Son of stors. Aulus.

P. Cornelius Cossus, the Son of Publius.

360. Y. of R.

87. Consulship. L. LUCRETIUS FLAVUS.
SER. SULPICIUS CAMERI-
NUS.

Tribunes of the T. Sicinius Dentatus.
People. C. Lucerius.

P. Curatius.

L. Ælius Pætus.

Sex. Pompilius.

M. Titinius.

C. Acu-

C. Acutius.
C. Manius.
M. Silius.
Sex. Manlius.
Ædiles. T. Metilius.
M. Decius Mus.
Quæstors of L. Æmilius Mamercinus.
Rome. C. Sextilius.
Military Quæ- A. Manlius Capitolinus. stors. L. Posthumius Albin. Regillensis.
361. Y. of R.
88. Consulship. L. VALERIUS POTITUS.
M. MANLIUS CAPITOLI-
NUS. They both abdicate.
Censors. C. Julius.
L. Papirius Cursor. The former died in his office, and
M. Cornelius Maluginensis was chosen in his room.

The eighteenth Legion.

Tribunes of the Q. Silius.
People. L. Icilius Ruge.
C. Titius.
C. Curatius.
P. Furius.
K. Duilius.
C. Licinius Calvus.
M. Cædicius.
L. Virginius.
C. Lætorius.
Ædiles. P. Lætorius.
L. Fuscus Corvus.
Quæstors of L. Julius Iulus.
Rome. L. Aquilius Corvus.
Military Quæ- T. Quinctius Cincinnatus. stors. T. Manlius Capitolinus.
362. Y. of R.
31. Military L. LUCRETIVS FLAVUS.
Tribunship. SER. SULPITIUS CAMERI-
NUS.
M. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS.
L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, a seventh time.
AGRIPPA FURIUS FUSUS.
C. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS,
a second time.
Tribunes of the C. Trebonius Asper.
People. L. Hortensius.
C. Acutius.
Q. Romuleius.

M. Terentius.
L. Appuleius.
Sp. Oppius Cornicen.
Q. Manlius.
L. Rabuleius.
N. Otacilius.
Ædiles. T. Sicinius Dentatus.
L. Mamilius Vitulus.
Quæstors of L. Sicinius Dentatus.
Rome. L. Lucretius Tricipitinus.
Military Quæ- Ser. Sulpitius Rufus. stors. C. Sergius Fidenus.
363. Y. of R.
32. Military Q. FABIVS AMBUSTUS.
Tribunship. K. FABIVS AMBUSTUS.
C. FABIVS AMBUSTUS.
Q. SULPICIUS LONGUS.
Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS FIDE-
NAS, a fourth time.
SERVIUS CORNELIVS MALU-GINENSIS.

Dictator. M. FURIUS CAMILLUS,
a second time. He triumphs
over the Gauls.

G. of the Horse. L. Valerius Potitus.
Tribunes of the L. Marcius Rutilus.
People. L. Icilius Ruge.

L. Ælius Pætus.
M. Decius Mus.
M. Otacilius.
K. Duilius.
L. Pupius.
M. Appuleius.
M. Albinus.
C. Oppius.
Ædiles. C. Licinius Calvus.
M. Titinius.
Quæstors of L. Menenius Lanatus.
Rome. C. Cornelius Cossus.
Military Quæ- L. Quinctius Cincinnatus. stors. L. Antistius.

364. Y. of R.
Dictator. M. FURIUS CAMILLUS.
G. of the Horse. L. Valerius Potitus.
Tribunes of the C. Marcius Rutilus.
People. L. Hortensius.
C. Claudius Cicero.
L. Fulvius Curvus.
L. Marcius.
C. Appuleius.

C. Sex-

C. Sextilius.
M' Pomponius.
C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.
Q. Petilius.
Ædiles. L. Appuleius.
L. Virginius.
Quæstors of Rome. P. Valerius Poplicola Potitus.
T. Quinctius Capitolinus.
Military Quæstors. L. Quinctius Capitolinus.
L. Horatius Pulvillus.
365. Y. of R.
33. Military Tribune-ship. L. VALERIUS POPLICOLA, a second time.
L. VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS.
P. CORNELIUS COSSUS.
A. MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS.
L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS.
L. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS REGILLEN-
SIS.
Dictator. M. FURIUS CAMILLUS, a third time. He triumphs over the Volsci, Æqui, and Hetrurians.
G. of the Horse. C. Servilius Ahala.
Tribunes of the People. C. Trebonius Asper.
L. Ælius Pœtus.
C. Otacilius.
M. Appuleius.
Lucius Albinus.
Q. Confidius.
Q. Hortensius.
N. Otacilius.
L. Allienius.
C. Acutius.
M. Albinus.
L. Marcius Rutilus.
C. Fabius Dorso.
C. Apronius.
C. Papirius Crassus.
M. Trebonius Flavus.
366. Y. of R.
34. Military Tribune-ship. T. QUINCTIUS CINCIN-NATUS.
Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS FIDENAS, a fifth time.
L. JULIUS IULUS.
L. AQUILIUS CORVUS.
L. LUCRETIVS TRICIPI-
TINUS.
SER. SULPICIUS RUFUS.
M. Titinius.
Cn. Appuleius.

L. Sextius.
L. Numitorius.
C. Appuleius.
C. Licinius Calvus.
C. Sextilius.
M. Juventius.
L. Fulcinius.
T. Roscius.
Ædiles. L. Hortensius.
C. Oppius.
Quæstors of Rome. Q. Publius Philo.
M. Pœtelius Libo.
Military Quæstors. Sp. Papirius Crassus.
M. Mænius.
367. Y. of R.
35. Military Tribune-ship. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR.
C. SERGIUS FIDENAS.
L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS, a second time.
L. MENENIUS LANATUS.
L. VALERIUS POPLICOLA, a second time.
C. CORNELIUS COSSUS.
L. Sicinius Dentatus.
C. Trebonius Asper.
Q. Hortensius.
L. Marcius Rutilus.
M. Trebonius Flavus.
L. Antistius.
C. Acutius.
L. Albinus.
Sp. Mæcilius.
M. Appuleius.
C. Marcius Rutilus.
Sp. Oppius Cornicen.
L. Papirius Crassus.
Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas.
Ser. Sulpicius Prætextatus.
Cn. Apronius.
368. Y. of R.
36. Military Tribune-ship. M. FURIUS CAMILLUS, a fourth time.
SER. CORNELIUS MALUGI-
NENSIS.
Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS FIDENAS, a sixth time.
L. QUINCTIUS CINCIN-
NATUS.
L. HORATIUS PULVILLUS.
P. VALERIUS POTITUS POPLI-COLA.

Tribune

Tribunes of the People. C. Licinius Calvus.
 Sp. Metilius.
 A. Sellius.
 C. Volumnius Flamma.
 M. Pompilius.
 Sex. Tempanius.
 P. Scaptius.
 P. Silius.
 C. Mamilius Vitulus.
 Ti. Pontificius.
Ædiles. C. Sextilius.
 C. Appuleius.
Quæstors of Rome. L. Furius Medullinus.
 Sp. Papirius Cursor.
Military Quæstors. M. Fabius Ambustus.
 P. Mænius.
 369. Y. of R.
37. Military Tribuneship. A. MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS, a second time.
 P. CORNELIUS Cossus, a second time.
 T. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLINUS.
 L. PAPIRIUS CURTUS, a second time.
 C. SERGIUS FIDENAS, a second time.
 L. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLINUS.
Dictator. A. CORNELIUS Cossus. He triumphs over the Volsci.
G. of the Horse. T. Quinctius Capitolinus.
Tribunes of the People. L. Hortensius.
 C. Marcus Rutilus.
 L. Antistius.
 C. Apronius.
 L. Apronius.
 L. Sextius.
 C. Antistius.
 M. Albinus.
 A. Lucerius.
 L. Cædicius.
Ædiles. M. Trebonius Flavius.
 L. Numitorius.
Quæstors of Rome. P. Manlius Capitolinus.
 C. Sulpicius Camerinus.
Military Quæstors. C. Manlius Capitolinus.
 A. Sempronius Atratinus.
 370. Y. of R.
38. Military Tribuneship. SER. CORNELIUS MALUGINENSIS, a third time.

P. VALERIUS POTITUS POPLICOLA, a second time.
 M. FURIUS CAMILLUS, a fifth time.
 SER. SULPICIUS RUFUS, a second time.
 C. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.
 T. QUINCTIUS CINCINNATUS, a second time.
Tribunes of the People. M. Mænius.
 Sp. Mæcilius.
 Q. Hortensius.
 C. Furius.
 T. Romuleius.
 Q. Publilius Philo.
 P. Mænius.
 Cn. Apronius.
 P. Mælius.
 Q. Terentius.
Ædiles. L. Sicinius Dentatus.
 L. Albinus.
Quæstors of Rome. P. Clælius Siculus.
 Q. Decius Mus.
Military Quæstors. Sp. Furius Medullinus.
 M. Horatius Pulvillus.
 371. Y. of R.
39. Military Tribuneship. L. VALERIUS POPLICOLA, a fourth time.
 A. MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS, a third time.
 SER. SULPICIUS RUFUS, a third time.
 L. LUCRETIVS TRICIPITINUS, a third time.
 L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS, a third time.
 M. TREBONIUS FLAVUS.
Tribunes of the People. L. Marcus Rutilus.
 M. Albinus.
 L. Oppius.
 Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
 M. Claudius.
 C. Sextilius.
 T. Juventius.
 C. Oppius Cornicen.
 Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.
 M. Duilius.
Ædiles. C. Apronius.
 C. Mamilius Vitulus.

Quæstors

Quæstors of Rome. L. Geganius Macerinus.
Sp. Servilius Priscus.
 Military Quæ- Q. Claudius Siculus. stors. Q. Mucius Sævola.
 372. Y. of R.
 40. Military Tribuneſhip. SP. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.
L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.
SER. CORNELIUS MALUGINEN-
SIS, a fourth time.
Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS FIDE-
NAS.
SER. SULPICIUS PRÆTEXTA-
TUS.
L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS, a
fourth time.
Tribunes of the People. L. Sicilius Dentatus.
L. Albinus.
L. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.
L. Petilius.
C. Canuleius.
C. Icilius Ruga.
P. Mænius.
L. Publilius Philo Volscus.
L. Canuleius.
L. Rabuleius.
Ædiles. M. Mænius.
L. Sextius.
 Quæstors of Rome. C. Quinctius Cincinnatus.
C. Petarius Crassus Cicurinus.
 Military Quæ- P. Pupius. stors. L. Mætilius.
 373. Y. of R.
 41. Military Tribuneſhip. M. FURIUS CAMILLUS, a sixth
time.
A. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS RE-
GILLEN SIS.
L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS.
L. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS RE-
GILLEN SIS.
L. LUCRETIVS TRICIPITINUS,
a third time.
M. FABIVS AMBUSTUS.
Tribunes of the People. L. Antistius.
A. Lucerius.
A. Tempanius.
Cn. Sellius.
C. Apronius.
C. Marcus Rutilus.
L. Marcus Rutilus.
Sp. Metilius.
L. Tempanius.
C. Sellius.

Ædiles. Q. Hortensius.
Q. Publius Philo.
 Quæstors of Rome. C. Licinius Calvus.
L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
 Military Quæ- Ser. Sulpicius Longus.
 stors. L. Æmilius Barbula.
 374. Y. of R.
 42. Military Tribuneſhip. L. VALERIUS POPLICOLA, a fifth time.
P. VALERIUS POTITUS POPLI-
COLA, a fifth time.
L. MENENIUS LANATUS, a second time.
C. SERGIUS FIDENAS, a third
time.
SP. PAPIRIUS CURSOR.
SER. CORNELIUS MALU-
GINENSIS, a fifth time.
 Dictator. T. QUINCTIVS CINCIN- NATUS. He triumphs over the Prænestini.
G. of the Horse. A. Sempronius Atratinus.
Censors. C. Sulpicius Camerinus.
Sp. Posthumius Albus Regillensis. The latter dies in his Office, and the former ab-dicates on account of the death of his Collegue.
Tribunes of the People. M. Mænius.
Q. Decius Mus.
M. Pompilius.
C. Mamilius.
Sex. Titinius.
Cn. Apronius.
C. Volumnius Flamma.
Q. Marcius Tremulus.
C. Sicinius Bellutus.
C. Titius.
Ædiles. M. Duilius.
C. Icilius Ruga.
 Quæstors of Rome. Q. Silius.
M. Sergius Fidenas.
 Military Quæ- C. Titinius. stors. Q. Antonius Merenda.
 375. Y. of R.
 43. Military Tribuneſhip. P. MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS.
C. MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS.
L. JULIVS IVLVS, a second time.
C. SEXTILIUS.

M. ALBINUS.
 L. ANTISTIVS.
Tribunes of the C. Apronius.
People. L. Sextius.
 C. Canuleius.
 M. Titius.
 L. Rabuleius.
 L. Marcius Rutlius.
 P. Decius Mus.
 Q. Publilius Philo.
 Q. Canuleius.
 Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
Ædiles. P. Mænius.
 L. Canuleius.
Quæstors of L. Genucius Aventinensis.
Rome. P. Sextius Capitolinus.
Military Quæ- M. Genucius Aventinensis. stors. L. Virginus Tricipitius Cælimen-tanus.

376. Y. of R.

44. Military SP. FURIUS MEDULLINUS.
Tribuneship. Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS FIDE-
 NAS, a second time.
 C. LICINIUS CALVUS.
 P. CLOELIUS SICULUS.
 M. HORATIUS PULVILLUS.
 L. GEGANIUS MACERINUS.
Censors. Sp. Servilius Priscus.
 Q. Cloelius Siculus.

The nineteenth Lustrum.

Tribunes of the L. Sicinius Dentatus.
People. L. Domitius Ænobarbus.
 Q. Mucius Scævola.
 C. Icilius Ruge.
 P. Mucius Scævola.
 C. Ælius Pætus.
 P. Ælius Pætus.
 L. Petillius.
 C. Ælius Pætus.
 M. Duilius.

Ædiles. A. Tempanius.
 C. Sellius.

Quæstors of P. Mælius Capitolinus.
Rome. C. Valerius Potitus.

Military Quæ- A. Cornelius Cossus. stors. M. Cornelius Maluginensis.

377. Y. of R.

45. Military L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS, a Tribuneship. fifth time.
 SER. SULPICIVS PRÆTEXTA-
 TUS, a second time.

P. VALERIUS POTITUS POP-
 LICOLA, a fourth time.
 L. QUINCTIVS CINCINNATUS,
 a second time.
 C. VETURIUS CRASSUS CI-
 CURINUS.
 C. QUINCTIVS CINCIN-
 NATUS.

Tribunes of the L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
People. C. Licinius Stolo.

Cn. Pupius.
 Voler. Publilius Philo.
 L. Atinius Longus.
 M. Fulcinius.
 M. Atilius Regulus.
 C. Popillius.
 L. Villius.
 A. Trebonius.
Ædiles. Q. Decius Mus.
 C. Titius.

Quæstors of L. Quinctius Capitolinus.
Rome. Q. Quinctius Cincinnatus.

378. Y. of R.

Anarchy. L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
Tribunes of the C. Licinius Calvus Stolo.
People. M. Mænius.
 Cn. Lucretius.
 C. Metilius.
 C. Sellius.
 Q. Mæcilius.
 A. Acutius.
 A. Tempanius.
 L. Volumnius Flamma.
Ædiles. Q. Canuleius.
 Q. Cæcilius Metellus.

379. Y. of R.

Anarchy. L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
Tribunes of the C. Licinius Calvus Stolo.
People. Q. Publilius Philo.
 Q. Decius Mus.
 C. Atinius Longus.
 M. Atilius Regulus.
 Cn. Genucius Aventinensis.
 L. Villius.
 P. Plautius Proculus.
 Q. Manilius.
Ædiles. P. Mucius Scævola.
 L. Domitius Ænobarbus.

380. Y. of R.

Anarchy. L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.

Tribunes

Tribunes of the People. C. Licinius Calvus Stolo.
L. Genucius Aventinensis.
Cn. Pupius.
Q. Silius.
Cn. Sicilius Bellutus.
M. Genucius Aventinensis.
P. Pupius.
L. Volumnius Flamma.
C. Marcius Rutilus.
Ædiles. M. Fulcinius.
A. Trebius.

381. Y. of R.
Anarchy. L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
Tribunes of the People. C. Licinius Calvus Stolo.
C. Pœtelius Libo Visolus.
M. Popilius Lænas.
L. Atinius Longus.
C. Titinius.
Volero Publilius Philo.
K. Atinius.
Q. Decius Mus.
M. Genucius Aventinensis.
Ædiles. C. Metilius.
C. Acutius.

382. Y. of R.
46. Military Tribuneship. L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, a second time.
P. VALERIUS POTITUS POP-
LICOLA, a fifth time.
A. MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS, a fourth time.
SER. SULPICIUS PRÆTEXTA-
TUS, a fifth time.
C. VALERIUS POTITUS.
SERV. CORNELIUS MALUGI-
NENSIS, a sixth time.

Tribunes of the People. L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
C. Licinius Calvus Stolo.
C. Plautius Proculus, the Son of Publius.
C. Plautius Proculus, the Son of Caius.
P. Curatius.
L. Furius.
P. Plautius Proculus.
C. Atinius Longus.
Cn. Genucius Aventinensis.
P. Mælius Capitolinus.
Ædiles. M. Atilius Regulus.
L. Villius.
Quæstors of Rome. L. Papirius Crassus.
L. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.

Military Quæstors. M. Geganius Macerinus.
M. Popilius.

383. Y. of R.
47. Military Tribuneship. Q. SERVILIUS PRISCUS FIDE-
NAS, a third time.
M. CORNELIUS MALUGINEN-
SIS.
C. VETURIUS CRASSUS CI-
CURINUS, a second time.
Q. QUINCTIUS CINCINNA-
TUS.
A. CORNELIUS COSSUS.
M. FABIVS AMBUSTUS, a second time.

Tribunes of the People. L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
C. Licinius Calvus Stolo.
L. Genucius Aventinensis.
C. Plautius Proculus.
Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.
P. Licinius.
M. Genucius Aventinensis.
M. Popilius Lænas.
M. Minucius Augurinus.
M. Decius Mus.
Ædiles. C. Pœtelius Libo Visolus.
Q. Pœtelius Libo Visolus.
Quæstors of Rome. C. Sulpicius Peticus.
Q. Servilius Ahala.
Military Quæstors. Sp. Furius Camillus.
Q. Pomponius.

384. Y. of R.
48. Military Tribuneship. L. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLI-
NUS.
SP. SERVILIUS STRUCTUS.
SER. CORNELIUS MALUGI-
NENSIS, a seventh time.
L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.
SER. SULPICIUS PRÆTEXTA-
TUS, a fourth time.
L. VETURIUS CRASSUS CICU-
RINUS.

Tribunes of the People. L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
C. Licinius Calvus Stolo.
C. Marcius Rutilus.
Juventius Thalna.
Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.
P. Plautius Proculus.
C. Duilius.
Cn. Fulvius Pætinus.
C. Sempronius Longus.
L. Atinius Longus.
Ædiles. K. Atinius Longus.

C. Plautius Proculus.
 Quæstors of L. Manlius Capitolinus Imper-
Rome. rialis.
Ap. Claudius Cræsus.
 Military Quæ- M. Aulus Cæcilius. stors. Cn. Quinctius Capitolinus.
 385. Y. of R.
 Dictator. M. FURIUS CAMILLUS,
 a fifth time.
G. of the Horse. L. Æmilius Mamercinus.
 Dictator. P. MANLIUS CAPITO-
LINUS.
G. of the Horse. C. Licinius Calvus.
Tribunes of the L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
People. L. Licinius Calvus Stolo.
C. Pætelius Libo Visolus.
C. Plautius Proculus.
M. Marcius.
M. Confidius.
C. Petillius.
L. Allienius.
P. Publilius Philo.
M. Plætorius.
 Ædiles. Valer. Publius Philo.
Cn. Genucius Aventinensis.
 Quæstors of P. Cornelius Scapula.
Rome. P. Cornelius Scipio.
 Military Quæ- C. Cæcilius Maximus. stors. Q. Decius Mus.
 386. Y. of R.
 49. Military A. Cornelius Cossus, a se-
Tribunship. cond time.
L. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus, a second time.
M. Cornelius Maluginen-
sis, a second time.
P. Valerius Potitus Pop-
licola, a sixth time.
M. Geganius Macerinus.
P. Manlius Capitolinus,
a second time.
 Dictator. M. FURIUS CAMILLUS,
 a fifth time. He triumphs
 over the Gauls.
G. of the Horse. T. Quinctius Cincinnatus Capitolinus.
Tribunes of the L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
People. C. Licinius Calvus Stolo.
M. Popilius.
C. Plautius Proculus.

C. Racilius.
C. Trebonius Asper.
C. Marcius Rutilus.
C. Plætorius.
L. Fulcinus.
T. Statius.
 Ædiles. L. Genucius Aventinensis.
C. Sempronius Longus.
 Quæstors of Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis.
Rome. M. Fabius Ambustus.
 Military Quæ- L. Pinaris Natta. stors. M. Pomponius.
 387. Y. of R.
 89. Consulship. L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCI-
NUS.
L. SEXTIUS SEXTINUS LATERANUS. He was the first Plebeian who was made Consul.
First Prætor. Sp. Furius Camillus.
First Cærule Cn. Quinctius Cincinnatus.
 Ædiles. C. Cornelius Scipio.
Tribunes of the M. Plætorius.
People. C. Numitorius.
C. Antius.
M. Acutius.
M. Pontificius.
L. Statius.
M. Antius.
C. Mæcilius.
C. Luccrius.
L. Volscius Fictor.
 Quæstors of Cn. Manlius Capitol. Torquatus.
Rome. Q. Aulus Cæcilius.
 Military Quæ- P. Licinius Calvus. stors. C. Terentius.
 388. Y. of R.
 90. Consulship. L. GENUCIUS AVENTI- NENSIS.
Q. SERVILIUS AHALA.
Prætor. L. MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS
IMPERIOSUS.
Curule-Ædiles. Juventius Thalna.
C. Licinius Calvus.
Tribunes of the Q. Pætelius Libo Visolus.
People. C. Plautius Proculus.
L. Luccrius.
C. Trebonius.
C. Volscius.
M. Popilius.
T. Metus.
M. Sellius.
 T. Statius.

T. Statius.
C. Racilius.
Plebeian Æ- M. Popilius Lænas. diles. C. Martius Rutilus.
Quæstors of C. Fulvius Ambustus.
Rome. L. Hortensius.
Military Quæ- M. Valerius Poplicola. stors. L. Fulvius Curvus.
389. Y. of R.
91. Consulship. C. SULPICIUS PETICUS.
C. LICINIUS CALVUS.
Prætor. CN. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLI-
NUS.
Curule/Ediles. P. Cornelius Scapula.
Appius Claudius Crassus Sabinus
Regillensis.
Tribunes of the C. Plautius Proculus.
People. C. Pæteliu Libo Visolus.
M. Confidius.
L. Appuleius.
C. Sempronius Longus.
I. Racilius.
C. Platorius.
L. Allienius.
M. Marcius.
C. Fulvius Curvus.
Plebeian Æ- L. Fulcinius. diles. L. Volscius Fictor.
Quæstors of M. Æbutius Elva.
Rome. L. Icilius Ruga.
Military Quæ- Cn. Cornelius Lentulus. stors. C. Marcius Rutilus.
390. Y. of R.
92. Consulship. L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCI-
NUS, a second time.
CN. GENUCIUS AVENTI-
NENSIS.
Dictator. L. MANLIUS CAPITO-
LINUS IMPERIOSUS.
G. of the Horse. L. Pinarius Natta.
Censors. M. Fabius Ambustus, the Son of Cæso.
L. Furius Medullinus.
The twentieth Lustrum.
Prætor. M. FABIUS AMBUSTUS, the Son of Numerius.
Curule/Ediles. C. Popillius Lænas.
L. Statius.
Plebeian Æ- C. Pæteliu Libo Visolus. diles. C. Antius.

Tribunes of the M. Antius.
People. C. Numitorius.
M. Popilius Lænas.
Q. Pæteliu Libo Visolus.
L. Pupius.
Q. Aulius Cerretanus.
C. Marcius Rutilus.
A. Allienius.
L. Ælius Pætu.
C. Carviliu Maximu.
Quæstors of P. Valeriu Poplicola.
Rome. C. Julius Iulu.
Military Quæ- Q. Hortensius. stors. M. Curius.
391. Y. of R.
93. Consulship. Q. SERVILIUS AHALA, a
second time.
L. GENUCIUS AVENTI-
NENSIS, a second time.
Dictator. APPIUS CLAUDIUS
CRASSUS SABINUS
REGILLENSIS.
G. of the Horse. P. Cornelius Scapula.
Prætor. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO.
Curule/Ediles. Cn. Manlius Capitolinus Imper- rius.
C. Fabius Ambustus.
Tribunes of the M. Pomponius.
People. Q. Decius Mus.
C. Oppiu.
C. Terentiu Arsa
Q. Romuleiu.
C. Mæliu Capitolinu.
Sp. Oppiu Cornicen.
N. Otaciliu.
M. Terentiu.
L. Rabuleiu.
Plebeian Æ- L. Lucretiu. diles. C. Volsciu.
Quæstors of L. Corneliu Scipio.
Rome. C. Petilliu.
Military Quæ- L. Mæniu. stors. L. Aquiliu Corvuu.
392. Y. of R.
94. Consulship. C. LICINIUS CALVUS, a
second time.
C. SULPICIUS PETICUS, a second time. He triumphs over the Hernici.

Dictator.

Dictator. T. QUINCTIUS PEN-NUS, CAPITOLINUS
CRISPINUS. He triumphs
over the Gauls.

G. of the Horse. Serv. Cornelius Maluginen-
sis.

Prætor. M. VALERIUS POPLICOLA.

Curule Ædiles. M. Platorius.

M. Cæcilius.

Plebeian Æ- C. Platorius.

diles. L. Atilius.

Tribunes of the C. Plautius Hypsæus.

People. M. Marcius.

M' Otacilius.

C. Lætorius, the son of Caius.

P. Furius.

L. Ælius Pætus.

P. Licinius Calvus.

Q. Mælius.

C. Lætorius, the son of Publius.

L. Virginus.

Quæstors of Rome. A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina.

L. Papirius Mugilanus.

Military Quæ- M. Duilius.

stors. C. Duilius.

393. Y. of R.

95. Consulship. M. FABIUS AMBUSTUS.
C. PETILIUS LIBO VISO-
LUS. The latter triumphs over the Gauls, and the Tiburtini. The former, after having defeated the Hernici, obtains the Honours of an Ovation.

Prætor. SPURIUS FURIUS CAMILLUS,
a second time.

Curule Ædiles. P. Valerius Poplicola.

C. Julius Iulus.

Plebeian Æ- Q. Aulus Cerretanus.

diles. C. Corvilius Maximus.

Tribunes of the K. Duilius.

People. M. Cædicius.

C. Apronius.

T. Sicinius Dentatus.

C. Marcius Rutilus.

L. Hortensius.

C. Curatius.

L. Sextius.

C. Titius.

M. Titinius.

Quæstors of Rome. L. Æmilius Barbula.

L. Æmilius Mamercinus.

Military Quæ- T. Manlius Capitolinus Torqua-stors. tus.

C. Livius Dentatus.

394. Y. of R.

96. Consulship. M. POPILIUS LÆNAS.

CN. MANLIUS CAPITOLI-NUS IMPERIOSUS.

Prætor. SER. CORNELIUS MALUGI-
NENSIS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Porporius.

L. Rabulius.

Plebeian Æ- C. Mælius Capitolinus.

diles. C. Terentius Arsa.

Tribunes of the M. Marcius.

People. Sex. Manilius.

P. Silius.

C. Apronius.

M. Terentius.

L. Icilius Ruga.

C. Plautius Hypsæus.

Sex. Pompilius.

P. Villius.

C. Sextius.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Valerius Poplicola.

L. Marcius Rutilus.

Military Quæ- M. Fajius Flaccinator.

stors. C. Servus Fidenas.

395. Y. of R.

79. Consulship. C. FABIUS AMBUSTUS.
C. PLAUTIUS PROCULUS, who triumphs over the Privernates.

Dictator. C. SULPICIUS PETICUS.
He triumphs over the Gauls.

G. of the Horse. M. Valerius Poplicola.

Prætor. T. QUINCTIUS PENNUS CA-
PITOLINUS CRISPINUS.

Curule Ædiles. T. Manlius Torquatus.

A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina.

Plebeian Æ- K. Duilius.

diles. L. Virginus.

Tribunes of the C. Petilius.

People. L. Plautius Venno.

L. Hortensius.

Q. Hortensius.

C. Sextilius.

M. Cædicius.

P. Furius.

P. Licinius.

C. Lætorius.

M. Mænius.

Quæstors

Quæstors of L. Furius Camillus.
Rome. P. Mænius.
 Military Quæ- C. Pæteliu Libo Visolus.
 stors. Sp. Nautius Rutilus.

396. Y. of R.

98. Consulship. C. MARCIUS RUTILUS.
 He triumphs over the Privernates.

CN. MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS IMPERIOSUS, a second time.

Prætor. M. POPILIUS LÆNAS.

Curule Ædiles. C. Duilius.

L. Sextius.

Plebeian Æ- C. Curatius.

diles. C. Titius.

Tribunes of the M. Duilius.

People. L. Mænius.

M. Pomponius.

M. Titinius.

C. Mælius Capitolinus.

C. Claudius Cicero.

C. Apronius.

T. Sicinius.

M' Curius.

Quæstors of M. Pupirius Mugillanus.
Rome. Ti. Coruncanus.

Military Quæ- Sp. Papirius Cursor.
 stors. M' Pomponius.

397. Y. of R.

99. Consulship. M. FABIUS AMBUSTUS, a second time.

M. POPILIUS LÆNAS, a second time.

Dictator. C. MARCIUS RUTILUS.
 He triumphs over the Hetrurians.

G. of the Horse. C. Plautius Proculus.

Prætor. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Cornelius Scipio.

Sp. Nautius Rutilus.

Plebeian Æ- C. Plautius Hypsæus.

diles. C. Sextius.

Tribunes of the C. Livius Denter.

People. P. Licinius Calvus.

Q. Hortensius.

C. Junius Bubulcus.

M. Marcius.

P. Mænius.

K. Duilius.

L. Icilius Ruga.

L. Antistius.

C. Petillius.

Quæstors of Sex. Tullius.
Rome. M. Pætiliu Libo.

Military Quæ- M. Fabius Dors. stors. Ser. Sulpiciu. Pretextatus.

398. Y. of R.

100. Consulship. C. SULPICIUS PETICUS, a third time.

M. VALERIUS POPLICOLA.

Prætor. P. VALERIUS POPLICOLA.

Curule Ædiles. M. Duilius.

L. Mænius.

Plebeian Æ- M. Mænius.

diles. P. Furius.

Tribunes of the L. Hortensius.

People. C. Antistius.

C. Duilius.

Cn. Appuleius.

C. Appuleius.

L. Albinus.

L. Fulcinus.

L. Albinus.

C. Confidius.

L. Numitorius.

Quæstors of Ser. Sulpiciu Camerinus.
Rome. Q. Serviliu Abala.

Military Quæ- Ti. Æmiliu Mamercinus. stors. C. Claudiu Crassus Regillensis.

399. Y. of R.

101. Consulship. M. FABIUS AMBUSTUS, a third time. He triumphs over the Tiburtini.

T. QUINCTIUS PENNUS.
CAPITOLINUS CRISP-
NUS.

Prætor. C. JULIUS IULUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Furius Camillus.

M. Pupirius Mugillanus.

Plebeian Æ- C. Livius Denter.

diles. Q. Hortensius.

Tribunes of the C. Pæteliu Libo Visolus.

People. Sp. Mæcilius.

L. Marcius Rutilus.

Sp. Mætilius.

A. Sellius.

K. Duilius.

Ti. Pontificius.

T. Roscius.

Sex. Tempanius.

L. Villius.

Quæstors

Quæstors of Rome. Q. Fabius Ambulstus.
A. Læstus.
 Military Quæ- C. Junius Brutus. stors. C. P. Junius Cæstus.
 400. Y. of R.
 102. C. Sulpicius Peticus, a
 fourth time.
M. Valerius Poplico-
la, a second time.
 Dictator. T. Manlius Imperi- osus Torquatus.
G. of the Horse. A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina.
Prætor. L. Cornelius Scipio.
 Curule Ædiles. L. Hortensius.
M. Marcius.
 Plebeian Æ- L. Antistius. diles. C. Junius Bubilius Brutus.
 Quæstors of Q. Pubilius Philo.
Rome. P. Decius Mus.
 Military Quæ- C. Manlius. stors. Cn. Cornelius Cossus.
 Tribunes of the C. Plautius Hypsæus.
 People. L. Manlius.
C. Sicinius Bellutus.
C. Titius.
C. Sextius.
M. Duilius.
C. Mamilius Vitulus.
T. Sicinius Dentatus.
C. Apronius.
L. Sextilius.
 401. Y. of R.
 103. C. Sulpicius P. Valerius Popli-
cola.
C. Marcius Rutilus, a
 second time.
 Dictator. C. Julius Iulus.
G. of the Horse. L. Æmilius Mamercinus.
Prætor. Ap. Claudius Crassus Re-
gillensis.
 Curule Ædiles. P. Valerius Poplicola.
L. Pinarius Natta.
 Plebeian Æ- Cn. Appuleius.
 diles. L. Albinius.
 Tribunes of the Sex. Tullius.
 People. K. Duilius.
M. Pomponius.
L. Cædicius.

P. Melius.
P. Menius.
Q. Hortensius.
M. Manlius.
C. Furius.
C. Canuleius.
 Quæstors of L. Æmilius Mamercinus.
Rome. L. Æmilius Esculapius.
 Military Quæ- C. Iulius Frontinus. stors. Q. Æmilius Barbula.
 402. Y. of R.
 104. C. Sulpicius P. C. Sulpicius Peticus,
 a fifth time.
T. Quinctius Cincinnatus Capitolinus.
 Dictator. M. Fabius Ambustus.
G. of the Horse. Q. Servilius Ahala.
 Censors. Cn. Manlius Capitolinus Im-
 periosus.
C. Marcius Rutilus. The first Plebeian who was made Censor.
 The twenty-first Lustrum.
Prætor. M. Papirius Mugillanus.
 Curule Ædiles. C. Pætelius Libo Volsus.
C. Appuleius.
 Plebeian Æ- C. Antistius. diles. L. Vilius.
 Tribunes of the M. Ovinus.
 People. C. Duilius.
L. Canuleius.
L. Rabuleius.
T. Romuleius.
Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.
M. Claudius Cicero.
M. Pætelius Libo.
P. Melius Capitolinus.
Q. Terentius.
 Quæstors of Ser. Sulpicius Longus.
Rome. Sp. Furius Medullinus.
 Military Quæ- P. Lucretius Tricipitinus. stors. Q. Cædicius.
 403. Y. of R.
 105. C. Sulpicius M. Popilius Lænas, a third time. He triumphs over the Gauls.
L. Cornelius Scipio.
 Dictator. L. Furius Camillus.
G. of

G. of the Horse. P. Cornelius Scipio.
Prætor. P. VALERIUS POPLICOLA.
Curule Ædiles. M. Fulvius Dorsus.
Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus.
Plebeian Ædiles. L. Sextilius.
C. Mamilius.
Tribunes of the People. P. Manius.
 K. Duilius.
 T. Juventius.
 L. Oppius.
 P. Decius Mus.
 C. Oppius Cornicen.
 C. Licinius Calvus.
 C. Livius Denton.
 Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
 C. Ælius Pætus.
Quæstors of Rome. M. Horatius Pulvillus.
 L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
Military Quæstors. C. Claudius Hortator.
 A. Posthumius Albinus Regillensis.

404. Y. of R.

106. Consulship. L. FURIUS CAMILLUS.
 AP. CLAUDIUS CRASSUS
 SABINUS REGILLENIS.
 He died in his Office.

Dictator. T. MANLIUS IMPERIOSUS TORQUATUS,
 a second time.

G. of the Horse. A. Cornelius Arvina.
Prætor. L. PINARIUS NATTA.
Curule Ædiles. M' Pomponius.
 L. Cædicius.
Plebeian Ædiles. Sex. Tullius.
 C. Furius.
Tribunes of the People. Q. Publilius Philo.
 C. Icilius Ruge.
 M. Claudius Cicero.
 Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.
 C. Mænius.
 P. Mucius Scævola.
 C. Fabricius Luscinus.
 L. Antistius.
 P. Pupius.
 L. Publilius Philo Volscius.
Quæstors of Rome. P. Ælius Pætus.
 Q. Antonius Mærenda.
Military Quæstors. C. Quinctius Cincinnatus.
 L. Domitius Ænobarbus.

VOL. II.

405. Y. of R.

107. Consulship. M. POPILIUS LÆNAS, a fourth time.

Dictator. M. VALERIUS CORVUS.
 C. CLAUDIUS CRASSUS
 REGILLENIS.

G. of the Horse. C. Livius Denton.
Prætor. M. FABIVS DORSO.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Fabius Ambustus.
 Q. Servilius Ahala.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Pætelius Libo.
 P. Mælius Capitolinus.

Tribunes of the People. K. Duilius.
 A. Trebius.
 Cn. Lucerius.
 A. Tempanius.
 P. Licinius Stolo.
 Cn. Sellius.
 P. Decius Mus.
 C. Appuleius.
 Q. Mæcilius.
 Q. Marcius Tremulus.

Quæstors of Rome. L. Papirius Crassus.
 L. Petilius.

Military Quæstors. L. Posthumius Megellus.
 M. Fulcinius.

406. Y. of R.

108. Consulship. C. PLAUTIVS HYPSEVS.
 T. MANLIUS IMPERIOSUS
 TORQUATUS.

Prætor. SER. SULFICIUS CAMERINUS.
Curule Ædiles. C. Licinius Calvus Stolo.

Plebeian Ædiles. P. Decius Mus.
 Q. Publilius Philo.

Tribunes of the People. T. Juventius.
 Sex. Tullius.

C. Mænius.
 L. Antistius.
 M' Pomponius.
 C. Duilius.
 Volero Publilius Philo Volscus.
 L. Atinius Longus.
 P. Mænius.
 P. Pupius.
 C. Antistius.

Quæstors of Rome. L. Genucius Aventinensis.
 L. Furius Camillus.

Military Quæstors. C. Sulpicius Longus.
 Ser. Sulpicius Saverrio.

4 G

407. Y.

407. Y. of R.

109. Consulship. M. VALERIUS CORVUS, a second time. He triumphs over the Antiates, Volsci, and Satricani.

C. PŒTELIUS LIBO VISO-
LUS.

Secular Games.

Prætor. A. CORNELIUS COSSUS AR-VINA.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Fabius Ambustus.
Ser. Sulpicius Longus.

Plebeian Æ- C. Icilius Ruge. diles. P. Mucius Scaevola.

Tribunes of the P. Decius Mus.
People. M. Claudius Cicero.

C. Ælius Pætus.

P. Licinius Stolo.

Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.

C. Fabricius Luscinius.

Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.

Q. Cecilius Metellus.

P. Mælius Capitolinus.

Q. Cædicius.

Quæstors of M. Atilius Regulus.
Rome. C. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.

Military Quæ- A. Sempronius Atratinus. stors. Q. Canuleius.

408. Y. of R.

110. Consulship. M. FABIVS DORSO.
SER. SULPICIUS CAMERI-
NUS.

Dictator. L. FURIUS CAMILLUS,
a second time.

G. of the Horse. Cn. Manlius Capitolinus Im-
periosus.

Prætor. Q. SERVILIUS AHALA.

Curule Ædiles. C. Mænius.

Q. Mæcilius.

Plebeian Æ- A. Trebians.

diles. Cn. Lucerius.

Tribunes of the C. Claudius Hortator.

People. Q. Publilius Philo.

L. Cædicius.

L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.

M. Titinius.

C. Duilius.

P. Ælius Pætus.

M. Genucius Aventinensis.

Sex. Titius.

Cn. Sicinius Bellutus.

Quæstors of T. Veturius Calvinus,
Rome. Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

Military Quæ- Cn. Papius. stors. M. P. Sergius Fidenas.

409. Y. of R.

111. Consulship. C. MARCIUS RUTILUS, a third time.

T. MANLIUS IMPERIOSUS
TORQUATUS, a second time.

Dictator. P. VALERIUS POPLI-
COLA.

G. of the Horse. Q. Fabius Ambustus.

Prætor. L. FURIUS CAMILLUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Æmilius Mamercinus Priver-nas.

Ti. Æmilius Mamercinus.

Plebeian Æ- P. Decius Mus.

diles. L. Atinius Longus.

Tribunes of the P. Mænius.

People. Q. Manilius.

C. Pompius.

C. Volumnius Flamma.

L. Volumnius Flamma.

C. Titinius.

L. Mamilius Vitulus.

Q. Silius.

L. Villius.

L. Titius.

Quæstors of Cn. Quinctilius Varus.
Rome. C. Pætelius Libo Visellus.

Military Quæ- M. Claudius Marcellus. stors. Cn. Fulvius Pætinus.

410. Y. of R.

112. Consulship. M. VALERIUS CORVUS, a third time. He triumphs over the Samnites.

A. CORNELIUS COSSUS
ARVINA. He triumphs over the Samnites.

Censors. M. Fabius Ambustus.
M. Popillius Lænas.

The twenty-second Lustrum.

Prætor. SER. SULPICIUS LONGUS.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Cædicius.

Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.

Plebeian Æ- P. Licinius Stolo.

diles. Q. Cæcilius Metellus.

Tribunes

Tribunes of the People. P. Atilius Patus.
M. Antonius.
Sca. Titus.
C. Claudius Hortator.
M. Atilius Regulus.
R. Sexias Sextinus.
Cn. Genucius Aventinensis.
M. Genucius Aventinensis.
L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
L. Cædicius.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Papirius Crassus.
L. Papirius Cursor.
Military Quæstors. C. Plautius Decianus.
Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

411. Y. of R.

113. Consulship. C. MARCIUS RUTILUS, a fourth time.

Dictator. Q. SERVILIUS AHALA.
M. VALERIUS CORVUS.

G. of the Horse. L. Æmilius Mamercinus Privernas.

Prætor. L. FURIUS CAMILLUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Papirius Crassus.
C. Sulpicius Longus.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Titinius.
C. Sicinius Bellutus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Genucius Aventinensis.
C. Mænius.
L. Furius.

P. Curatius.
Q. Canuleius.
M. Minucius Augurinus.
M. Decius Mus.
P. Mucius Scævola.
Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.
P. Mælius Capitolinus.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Valerius Poplicola.
L. Cornelius Lentulus.

Military Quæstors. P. Cornelius Rufinus.
M. Aulus Cerritanus.

412. Y. of R.

114. Consulship. C. PLAUTIUS HYPSEUS, a second time.

L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS PRIVERNAS.

Prætor. T. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS.

Curule Ædiles. C. Titinius.
Q. Manilius.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Pomptilius.
L. Villius.

Tribunes of the People. Q. Publilius Philo.
M. Atilius Regulus.
Q. Pomponius.
C. Duilius.
K. Atinius Longus.
Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
Cn. Pupius.
C. Sempronius Sophus.
L. Atinius Longus.
C. Atinius Longus.

Quæstors of Rome. C. Valerius Potitus Flaccus.
Sp. Posthumus Albinus.

Military Quæstors. D. Junius Brutus Scæva.
L. Plautius Venno.

413. Y. of R.

115. Consulship. T. MANLIUS IMPERIOSUS TORQUATUS, a third time. He triumphs over the Latins, Campani, Sidicini, and Aurunci.

Dictator. P. DECIUS MUS.
L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.

G. of the Horse. L. Papirius Cursor.

Prætor. L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS, who was created Dictator.

Curule Ædiles. M. Valerius Corvus.
C. Claudius Crassus Regillensis.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Antonius.
L. Genucius Aventinensis.

Tribunes of the People. L. Allienius.
M. Plætorius.

M' Marcus.
C. Popilius.
C. Petillius.
C. Mæcilius.
P. Publilius Philo.
C. Poetelius Libo Visolus.
M. Claudius Marcellus.
M. Confidius.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Sallonius Sarra.
L. Æmilius Paulus.

Military Quæstors. C. Plautius Proculus.
L. Pinarius Natta.

414. Y. of R.

116. Consulship. T. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS.

Q. PUBLILIUS PHILO. He triumphs over the Latins.

Dictator. Q. PUBLILIUS PHILO.
G. of the Horse. D. Junius Brutus Scæva.

| | | | |
|--------------------------------|---|--------------------------------|---|
| Prætor. | L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS PRIVERNAS. | G. of the Horse. | C. Claudius Hortator. |
| Curule Ædiles. | M. Atilius Regulus.
P. Curatius. | Prætor. | T. MANLIUS IMPERIOSUS TORQUATUS. |
| Plebeian Ædiles. | Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
L. Furius. | Curule Ædiles. | P. Cornelius Rufinus.
M. Papirius Crassus. |
| Tribunes of the People. | C. Lucerius.
M. Pontificius.
L. Villius.
C. Pompilius.
M. Acutius.
Cn. Sicinius Bellutus.
L. Volscius Fictor.
T. Veturius Calvinus.
Q. Mamilius.
P. Silius. | Plebeian Ædiles. | C. Petilius.
L. Allicenius. |
| | | Tribunes of the People. | Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
C. Poetelius Libo Vitolus.
D. Junius Brutus Scæva.
Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.
C. Sempronius Sophus.
L. Plautius Venno.
M. Aulius Cerretanus.
Q. Pomponius.
M. Fulvius Flaccus.
L. Atilius Regulus. |
| Quæstors of Rome. | L. Valerius Petitus.
M. Geganius Mamercinus. | Quæstors of Rome. | P. Cornelius Scapula.
L. Julius Iulus. |
| Military Quæstors. | M. Dillius.
M. Macilius. | Military Quæstors. | Q. Decius Mus.
C. Carvilius Maximus. |
| 415. Y. of R. | | 417. Y. of R. | |
| 117. Consulship. | L. FURIUS CAMILLUS.
He triumphs over the Pedani and Tiburtini. | 119. Consulship. | L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.
K. DUILIUS. |
| | C. MENIUS. He triumphs over the Antiates, Lavinians, and Velitani. | Prætor. | Q. PUBLILIUS PHILO. The first Plebeian who was raised to this Office. |
| Prætor. | M. VALERIUS CORVUS. | Curule Ædiles. | Sp. Posthumius Albinus.
P. Valerius Poplicola. |
| Curule Ædiles. | T. Veturius Crassus.
Cn. Quinctilius Varus. | Plebeian Ædiles. | P. Sallonius Sarra.
P. Silius Nepos. |
| Plebeian Ædiles. | M. Claudius Marcellus.
C. Atinius Longus. | Tribunes of the People. | L. Antonius Nepos.
C. Plautius Decianus.
L. Genucius Aventinensis.
M. Marcus Nepos.
C. Popillius Nepos.
M. Claudius Marcellus.
C. Plautius Proculus.
C. Marcus Rutilus.
P. Publilius Philo.
L. Confidius Nepos. |
| Tribunes of the People. | P. Sempronius Longus.
P. Sallonius Sarra.
C. Plautius Decianus.
M. Minucius Augurinus.
C. Terentius Arsa.
M. Decius Mus.
L. Genucius Aventinensis.
C. Titinius.
Q. Canuleius.
M. Juventius Thalna. | Quæstors of Rome. | Sp. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.
Q. Aulius Cerretanus. |
| Quæstors of Rome. | C. Sulpicius Peticus.
L. Veturius Crassus Augurinus. | Military Quæstors. | L. Fulvius Curcus.
M. Æbutius Elva. |
| Military Quæstors. | P. Furius.
C. Minucius Augurinus. | 418. Y. of R. | |
| 416. Y. of R. | | 120. Consulship. | M. VALERIUS CORVUS, a fourth time. He triumphed over the Inhabitants of the Territory of Cales.
M. ATTILIUS REGULUS. |
| 118. Consulship. | C. SULPICIUS LONGUS.
P. ÆLIUS PÆTUS. | | |
| Dictator. | C. CLAUDIUS CRASSUS REGIENSIS. | | |

Dictator.

Dictator. L. ÆMILIUS MAMERCINUS PRIVERNAS.

G. of the Horse. Q. Publilius Philo.
Prætor. CN. QUINCTILIUS VARUS.

Curule Ædiles. C. Valerius Potitus Flaccus.
L. Valerius Potitus.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Juventius Thalna.
Q. Canuleius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. L. Plautius Venno.
L. Plætorius.

L. Fulcinius.
C. Numitorius.
M. Mæcilius.
C. Plætorius.
C. Racilius.
T. Staius.
C. Antius Restio.
C. Lucerius.

Quæstors of Rome. L. Papirius Mugillanus.
A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina.

Military Quæstors. L. Julius Libo.
M. Aulus Cereetanus.

419. Y. of R.

121. Consulship. T. VETURIUS CALVINUS.
SP. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.

Dictator. P. CORNELIUS RUFINUS.

G. of the Horse. M. Antonius.
Prætor. M. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Cornelius Lentulus.
M. Geganius Macerinus.

Plebeian Ædiles. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.
M. Fulvius Flaccus.

Tribunes of the People. P. Sallonius Sarra.
T. Metilius.

M. Scaptius.
M. Mamilius.
C. Memmius.
L. Racilius.
M. Sellius.
P. Silius.
Q. Cædicius Nocuta.
P. Furius.

Quæstors of Rome. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.
Ap. Claudius Crass. Sabin. Regillensis.

Military Quæstors. C. Acutius Nepos.
T. Pontificius Nepos.

420. Y. of R.

122. Consulship. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR.
C. PŒTELIIUS LIBO VI-SOLUS.

Prætor. C. VALERIUS POTITUS FLACCUS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Valerius Corvus.
L. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. Plautius Venno.
C. Plautius Decianus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Genucius Aventinensis.
C. Popilius Lænas.

C. Mælius Capitolinus.
C. Canuleius Nepos.
Q. Hortensius.
C. Plautius Proculus.
C. Lætorius.

C. Minucius Augurinus.
M. Terentius.

M' Juventius Thalna.

Quæstors of Rome. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus.
Q. Fabius Ambustus.

Military Quæstors. C. Fossius Flaccinator.
Q. Mamilius Vitulus.

421. Y. of R.

123. Consulship. A. CORNELIUS COSSUS,
a second time.
CN. DOMITIUS CALVINUS.

Dictator. M. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.

G. of the Horse. P. Valerius Poplicola.

Censors. Q. Publilius Philo.
Sp. Posthumius Albinus.

The twenty-third Lustrum.

Prætor. L. PAPIRIUS MUGILLANUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Plætorius.
C. Plætorius.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Racilius.
L. Fulcinius.

Tribunes of the People. L. Fulvius Curvus.
L. Hortensius.

A. Ogulnius Gallus.
Q. Decius Mus.
L. Ælius Pætus.
M. Lætorius.

M' Otacilius Crassus.
Sp. Oppius Cornicen.
C. Carvilius Maximus.
M' Curius Dentatus.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Flavius.
A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina.

Military

Military Quæ- M. Furius Aruleus. stors. C. Aquilius Flavius.

422. Y. of R.

124. Consulship. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS.

C. VALERIUS POTITUS.

Dictator. CN. QUINTILIUS VARRUS.

G. of the Horse. L. Valerius Potitus.

Prætor. M. VALERIUS CORVUS.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus.
M. Ælius Elio.

Plebeian Æ- L. Racilius Nepos. diles. M. Mamilius Vitulus.

Tribunes of the Q. Aulus Cerretanus.
People. L. Pupius Nepos.

C. Livius Denter.

C. Fulvius Curvus.

M. Fulvius Flaccus.

Sp. Icilius Ruga.

M. Pomponius Matho.

D. Junius Brutus Scæva.

Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

M. Marcius Nepos.

Quæstors of L. Valerius Flaccus.
Rome. Q. Sulpicius Poterchius.

Military Quæ- M. Æmilius Papus. stors. L. Plautius Venno.

423. Y. of R.

125. Consulship. L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS, a second time.

L. PLAUTIUS VENNO.

Prætor. P. CORNELIUS SCAPULA.

Curule Ædiles. C. Popilius Lanus.

C. Lætorius Nepos.

Plebeian Æ- C. Manlius Capitolinus. diles. C. Minucius Augurinus.

Tribunes of the M. Livius Denter.
People. L. Fulvius Curvus.

A. Allienius Nepos.

M. Racilius Nepos.

A. Trebonius Asper.

M. Aulus Cerretanus.

L. Appuleius Nepos.

L. Plætorius Nepos.

L. Fulcinius Nepos.

P. Numitorius Pullus.

Quæstors of C. Plautius Hypsæus.
Rome. C. Patillius Nepos.

Military Quæ- L. Horatius Pulvillus. stors. L. Æmilius Mamercinus.

424. Y. of R.

120. Consulship. L. TIBULLIUS MAMERCINUS PRAVERNAS, a second time.

C. PLAUTIUS DECIANUS.

Brought triumph over the Praenestines.

Prætor. L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. P. Julius Mucilianus.

C. Cornelius Lentulus.

Plebeian Æ- M. Cn. Decianus.

diles. Q. Decius Mus.

Tribunes of the C. Factorius Nepos.
People. C. Feicennius Nepos.

T. Pontificius Nepos.

Sex. Pompeius Nepos.

Q. Mamilius Vitulus.

Sp. Antius Resto.

C. Auctius Nepos.

P. Silius Nepos.

Sex. Manlius Nepos.

M. Mamilius Vitulus.

Quæstors of M. Fajus Flaccinator.
Rome. L. Furius Camillus.

Military Quæ- M. Popilius Lanus. stors. P. Villius Nepos.

425. Y. of R.

127. Consulship. C. PLAUTIUS PROCULUS.
P. CORNELIUS SCAPULA.

Prætor. D. JUNIUS BRUTUS SCÆVA.

Curule Ædiles. M. Valerius Corvus.
C. Valerius Potitus Flaccus.

Plebeian Æ- C. Fulvius Curvus.

diles. Q. Aulus Cerretanus.

Tribunes of the M. Aulus Cerretanus.
People. M. Titinius Nepos.

Cn. Apronius Nepos.

C. Sextilius Nepos.

L. Manius Nepos.

T. Sicinius Dentatus.

Sex. Titius Nepos.

C. Sextius Calvinus.

C. Curatius Nepos.

A. Virginius Nepos.

Quæstors of L. Papirius Crassus.
Rome. Q. Æmilius Barbula.

Military Quæ- P. Ælius Patus. stors. C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.

426. Y. of R.

128. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.
Q. PUBLILIUS PHILO, a second time.

Dictator. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS.

G. of the Horse. Sp. Posthumius Albinus.

Prætor. Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS RULLIANUS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Fabius Ambustus.

Q. Fabius Ambustus.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. Fulvius Curvus.

M. Licinius Dentatus.

Tribunes of the People. M. Flavius Nepos.

C. Lætorius Nepos.

C. Minucius Augurinus.

C. Aquillius Florus.

C. Quæcilius Nepos.

C. Cæcilius Metellus.

C. Mælius Capitolinus.

C. Rabuleius Nepos.

L. Hortensius Nepos.

Q. Decius Mus.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Pætelius Libo Visolus.

M. Fostius Flaccinator.

Military Quæstors. C. Julius Iulus.

L. Romuleius Nepos.

427. Y. of R.

129. Consulship. C. PÆTELIUS LIBO VISOLUS, a second time.

L. PAPIRIUS MUGILLANUS.

Prætor. C. PLAUTIUS DECIANUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Valerius Flaccus.

A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina.

Plebeian Ædiles. Sex. Manilius Nepos.

Sex. Pompilius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. C. Petillius Nepos.

M. Curius Dentatus.

M. Aulus Cerretanus.

Ti. Coruncanius.

L. Icilius Ruga.

C. Fulvius Curvus.

C. Antistius Nepos.

Sex. Tullius Nepos.

T. Sempronius Blaesus.

L. Marcius Rutilus.

Quæstors of Rome. Q. Mælius Nepos.

L. Marlius Capitolinus.

Military Quæstors. P. Maenius Vulso.

T. Claudius Cicero.

Proconsul. Q. Publius Philo. He triumphs over the Samnites and Palæopolitani.

Pro-Quæstor. L. Romuleius.

428. Y. of R.

130. Consulship. L. FURIUS CAMILLUS, a second time.

D. JUNIUS BRUTUS SCÆVA.

Dictator. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR.

G. of the Horse. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, who abdicates; and L. Papirius Crassus is chosen in his room.

Prætor. L. FULVIUS CURVUS.

Curule Ædiles. C. Fostius Flaccinator.

M. Æmilius Popus.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Flavius Nepos.

A. Virginus Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. L. Plautius Venno.

C. Plautius Hypsæus.

C. Considius Nepos.

L. Numitorius Nepos.

Sp. Mæcilius Nepos.

C. Popilius Lænas.

L. Albinus Nepos.

L. Fulcinius Trio.

T. Roscius Nepos.

A. Lucerius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. L. Quinctius Capitolinus.

M. Antistius Nepos.

Military Quæstors. P. Valerius Poplicola.

P. Plautius Hypsæus.

429. Y. of R.

Dictator. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR.

He triumphs over the Samnites.

G. of the Horse. L. Papirius Crassus.

Censors. M. Valerius Corvus.

C. Pætelius Libo Visolus.

The twenty-fourth Lustrum.

Prætor. M. FABIUS AMBUSTUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Papirius Crassus.

L. Furius Camillus.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Cæcilius Metellus.

L. Hortensius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. P. Ælius Pætus.

C. Fulvius Curvus.

Sex. Tempanius Nepos.

L. Apronius Limo.

C. Mænius Nepos.

C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.

Sp. Metilius Nepos.

L. Villius Nepos.

L. Sextilius.

P. Virginus.

Quæstor.

Quæstors of Sp. Nautius Rutilus.

Rome. C. Fabius Ambustus.

Military Quæ- P. Decius M. stors. T. Pontifex Nepos.

430. Y. of R.

131. Consulship. C. SULPICIUS LONGUS.
Q. AULIUS CERRETANUS.

Prætor. Q. FABIVS AMBUSTUS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Fesius Flaccinator.

Q. Æmilius Barbula.

Plebeian Æ- L. Marcius Rutilus.

diles. T. Sempronius Blaesus.

Tribunes of the M. Flavius Nepos.

People. M. Pætelius Libo.

C. Canuleius Nepos.

M. Aulius Cerretanus.

M' Curius Dentatus.

L. Icilius Ruga.

M. Popillius Lænas.

C. Aurelius Cotta.

P. Ælius Pætus.

Ti. Coruncanius Nepos.

Quæstors of L. Cominius Nepos.

Rome. C. Marcius Rutilus.

Military Quæ- M. Valerius Maximus. stors. A. Virginius Tricestius Rutilus.

431. Y. of R.

132. Consulship. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS RUL-LIANUS. He triumphs over the Samnites and Apu-lians.

L. FULVIUS CURVUS. He
triumphs over the Samnites.

Dictator. A. CORNELIVS COSSVS ARVINA.

G. of the Horse. M. Fabius Ambustus.

Prætor. L. PLAUTIVS.

Curule Ædiles. C. Plautius Hypsæus.

A. Lucerius Nepos.

Plebeian Æ- Sp. Mæcilius Nepos.

diles. L. Albinus Nepos.

Tribunes of the C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.

People. Sex. Tullius Nepos.

C. Petillius Nepos.

C. Considius Nepos.

M. Trebonius Flavius.

A. Atilius Bulbus.

L. Albinus Nepos.

L. Fulcinius Trio.

L. Numitorius Nepos.

C. Volumnius Flamma.

Quæstors of P. Sestius Capitolinus.

Rome. L. Fulvius P.

Military Quæ- M' Sestius Flaccinator. stors. C. Apudius Parja.

432. Y. of R.

133. Consulship. T. VETURIUS CALVINUS,
a second time.

SP. POSTHUMIVS ALBI-
NUS, a second time.

Dictators. Q. FABIVS AMBUSTUS.
M. ÆMILIVS PAPVS.

Generals of the P. Ælius Pætus.

Horje. L. Valerius Flaccus.

Prætor. M. VALERIVS CORVVS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Popillius Lænas.

Sp. Mæcilius Nepos.

Plebeian Æ- Sex. Campanius Nepos.

diles. L. Fulvius Nepos.

Tribunes of the M. Pætelius Libo.

People. C. Mamilius Vitulus.

L. Sextilius Nepos.

C. Manius Nepos.

P. Mælius Capitolinus.

T. Roscius Nepos.

L. Apronius Nepos.

L. Cædicius Nepos.

C. Furius Nepos.

L. Canuleius Nepos.

Quæstors of Cn. Furius Pacilus.

Rome. P. Lucretius Tricipitinus.

Military Quæ- Sp. Papirius Crassus. stors. Cn. Lucerius Nepos.

433. Y. of R.

134. Consulship. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR, a
second time.

Q. PUBLILIUS PHILO, a third time.

Dictators. C. MÆNIUS NEPOS.
L. CORNELIVS LEN-TULVS.

T. MANLIUS IMPERI-OSVS TORQUATVS.

Generals of the M. Fesius Flaccinator.

Horje. L. Papirius Cursor.

L. Papirius Crassus.

Prætor. Q. ÆMILIVS BARBULA.

Curule Ædiles. L. Quintus Capitolinus.

Sp. Nautius Rutilus.

Plebeian

Plebeian Æ- C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus. diles. C. Canuleius Nepos.
Tribunes of the L. Livius Denter.
People. Q. Mælius Nepos.
T. Numicius Nepos. These were all three obliged to abdicate, in order to go to Caudium, as Hostages for the Performance of the Treaty concluded at the Caudian Forks.

P. Decius Mus.
L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus.
P. Mænius Nepos.
C. Sicinius Bellutus.
M. Cædicius Nepos.
P. Virginius Nepos.
T. Romuleius Nepos.
C. Oppius Cornicen.
T. Juventius Nepos.
C. Licinius Calvus Stolo.

Quæstors of L. Volumnius Flamma.
Rome. Q. Fundanius Mendulus.
Military Quæ- M. Fabius Dorso. stors. Q. Antonius Merenda.

434. Y. of R.

135. Consulship. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR, a third time. He triumphs over the Samnites.

Q. AULIUS CERRETANUS,
a second time.

Censors. C. Sulpicius Longus.
C. Plautius Decianus. They both abdicate.

Prætor. M. POPILIUS LÆNAS.
Curule Ædiles. M. Valerius Maximus.
C. Fabius Ambustus.

Plebeian Æ- C. Volumnius Flamma. diles. M. Trebonius Flavius.

Tribunes of the M. Antistius Nepos.
People. M. Poetelius Libo.
L. Apronius Nepos.
L. Cominius Nepos.
C. Mænius Nepos.
Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
C. Marcus Rutilus.
L. Sextilius Nepos.
L. Cædicius Nepos.
C. Furius Nepos.

Quæstors of Q. Marcus Tremulus.
Rome. L. Geganius Macerinus.

VOL. II.

Military Quæ- Q. Clælius Siculus. stors. L. Æmilius Mamercinus.

435. Y. of R.

136. Consulship. L. PLAUTIUS VENNO.
M. FOSLIUS FLACCINA-
TOR.

Censors. L. Papirius Crassus.
C. Mænius.

The twenty-fifth Lustrum.

Prætor. L. FURIUS CAMILLUS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Valerius Corvus.
M. Sergius Fidenas.

Plebeian Æ- P. Decius Mus.

diles. T. Roscius Nepos.

Tribunes of the Q. Mælius Nepos.

People. C. Claudius Hortator.

C. Fabricius Luscinus.

P. Pupius Nepos.

Q. Publilius Philo.

L. Domitius Ænobarbus.

P. Mucius Scævola.

C. Icilius Ruga.

Sex. Tullius Nepos.

C. Plautius Hypsæus.

Quæstors of L. Genucius Aventinensis.
Rome. Ap. Claudius Cæcus.

Military Quæ- M. Fulvius Curvus Patinus. stors. T. Minucius Augurinus.

436. Y. of R.

137. Consulship. Q. ÆMILIUS BARBULA.
C. JUNIUS BUBULCUS
BRUTUS.

Prætor. L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Poetelius Libo.
L. Livius Denter.

Plebeian Æ- T. Numicius Nepos. diles. M. Antistius Nepos.

Tribunes of the L. Cominius Nepos.

People. C. Apuleius Pansa.

M. Trebonius Flavius.

Q. Mæcilius Nepos.

Cn. Sellius Nepos.

A. Trebius Nepos.

Cn. Lucerius Nepos.

Sp. Metilius Nepos.

A. Tempanius.

L. Villius Nepos.

Quæstors of P. Cornelius Arvina.
Rome. L. Papirius Maso.

4 H

Military

Military Quæ- C. Lutatius Catulus. stors. M. Fulcinius Nepos.

437. Y. of R.

135. Consulship. SP. NAUTIUS RUTILUS.
M. POPILIUS LÆNAS.

Dictator. L. ÆMILIUS MAMER-CINUS PRIVERNAS.

G. of the Horse. L. Fulvius Curvus.

Prætor. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Mælius Nepos.

C. Marcius Rutilus.

Plebeian Æ- L. Apronius Lino.

diles. L. Sextilius Nepos.

Tribunes of the P. Decius Mus.

People. M. Titinius Nepos.

Sex. Titius Nepos.

L. Cædicius Nepos.

P. Mænius Nepos.

C. Volumnius Flamma.

Q. Fundanius Fundulus.

M. Genucius Aventinensis.

M. Cædicius Nepos.

C. Furius Nepos.

Quæstors of Ti. Cornelius Lentulus.

Rome. L. Atilius Regulus.

Military Quæ- L. Volumnius Flamma.

stors. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.

438. Y. of R.

139. Consulship. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR, a fourth time.

Q. PUBLILIUS PHILO, a
fourth time.

Dictator. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS
RULLIANVS.

G. of the Horse. Q. Aulus Cerretanus, who was killed in Battle; and
C. Fabius Ambustus chosen in his room.

Prætor. M. VALERIUS CORVUS.

Curule Ædiles. Ap. Claudius Cæcus.

M. Fabius Dors.

Plebeian Æ- L. Cominius Nepos.

diles. Q. Pubilius Philo.

Tribunes of the L. Livius Denter.

People. M. Antistius Nepos.

L. Volumnius Flamma Violens.

Q. Canuleius Nepos.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus.

T. Numicius Nepos.

Q. Marcius Tremulus.

Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.

P. Licinius Nepos Stolo.

L. Domitius Ænobarbus.

Quæstors of C. Marcius Rutilus.

Rome. M. Decius Mus.

Military Quæ- M. Livius Denter.

stors. L. Æmilius Barbula.

439. Y. of R.

140. Consulship. M. PÆTELIUS LIBO.

C. SULPICIUS LONGUS, a third time. He triumphs over the Samnites.

Dictator. C. MÆNIUS.

G. of the Horse. M. Fostius Flaccinator.

Prætor. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Geganius Macerinus.

Q. Clælius Siculus.

Plebeian Æ- C. Appuleius Panja.

diles. A. Trebius Nepos.

Tribunes of the Q. Mælius Nepos.

People. Ti. Minucius Augurinus.

L. Genucius Aventinensis.

C. Claudius Hortator.

P. Mucius Scævola.

M. Trebius.

M. Fulvius Curvus Pætinus.

M. Domitius Calvinus.

M. Claudius Marcellus.

C. Fabricius Luscinus.

Quæstors of P. Cornelius Scipio Barbatus.

Rome. Ser. Cornelius Lentulus.

Military Quæ- L. Domitius Ænobarbus.

stors. P. Sempronius Longus.

440. Y. of R.

141. Consulship. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR, a fifth time.

C. JUNIUS BUBULCUS
BRUTUS, a second time.

Dictator. C. PÆTELIUS LIBO VI-SOLUS.

G. of the Horse. M. Pætelius Libo.

Prætor. C. MARCIUS RUTILUS.

Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Arvina.

Ap. Claudius Cæcus.

Plebeian Æ- M. Titinius Nepos.

diles. Sex. Titius Nepos.

Tribunes of the L. Cominius Nepos.

People. M. Marcius Tremulus.

Cn. Pupius Nepos.

Q. Pub-

Q. Publius Philo.
Q. Petilius Nepos.
L. Livius Denter.
Sp. Icilius Ruga.
L. Atinius Longus.
C. Plautius Decianus.
C. Lutatius Catulus.
Quæstors of Rome. L. Posthumius Aligellus.
C. Furius Nepos.
Military Quæstors. P. Sulpicius Saverrio.
M. Titinius Nepos.

441. Y. of R.

142. Consulship. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS.

He triumphs over the Samnites and Sorani.

P. DECIUS MUS.

Dictator. C. SULPICIUS LONGUS.

G. of the Horse. C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.

Censors. Ap. Claudius Cæcus.

C. Plautius Venox.

The twenty-sixth Lustrum.

Prætor. M. FOSLIUS FLACCINATOR.

Curule Ædiles. M. Valerius Corvus.

L. Papirius Mæso.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Fulvius Curvus Pætinus.

L. Volumnius Flamma Violens.

Tribunes of the People. L. Genucius Aventinensis.

A. Trebius Nepos.

L. Villius Nepos.

Q. Silius Nepos.

Q. Manilius Nepos.

M. Fulcinius Nepos.

A. Acutius Nepos.

L. Volumnius Flamma.

C. Pompilius Nepos.

Cn. Sicinius Bellutus.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Papirius Crassus.

Cn. Fulvius Pætinus.

Military Quæstors. Cn. Sempronius Gracchus.

Q. Appulcius Pansa.

442. Y. of R.

143. Consulship. C. JUNIUS BUBULCUS

BRUTUS, a third time.

He triumphs over the Samnites.

Q. ÆMILIUS BARBULA, a second time. He triumphs over the Hetrurians.

Prætor. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS.

Curule Ædiles. Ser. Cornelius Lentulus.

Ti. Cornelius Lentulus.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Fabricius Luscinus.

P. Mucius Scævola.

Tribunes of the People. L. Atilius Regulus.

C. Marcius Rutilus.

M. Decius Mus.

T. Minucius Augurinus.

M. Trebius Nepos.

M. Antonius Nepos.

Cn. Genucius Aventinensis.

M. Livius Denter.

L. Titius Nepos.

N. Sextius Sextinus.

Quæstors of Rome. L. Ogulnius Gallus.

M. Fulvius Pætinus.

Military Quæstors. Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

C. Patellius Libo Visolus.

443. Y. of R.

144. Consulship. Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS RULLIANUS, a second time.

C. MARCIUS RUTILUS, who was afterwards called Censorinus.

Prætor. P. CORNELIUS ARVINA.

Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Scipio Barbatus.

L. Æmilius Barbula.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Lutatius Catulus.

Q. Petillius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. P. Sempronius Sophus.

L. Genucius Aventinensis.

M. Fulvius Curvus Pætinus.

P. Curatius Nepos.

M. Claudius Marcellus.

Q. Pomponius Nepos.

Cn. Sicinius Bellutus.

M. Aulius Cerretanus.

Sp. Icilius Ruga.

M. Sempronius Tuditanus.

Quæstors of Rome. Q. Anicius Prænestinus.

M. Minucius Fessius.

Military Quæstors. T. Popillius Nepos.

Cn. Fulvius Max. Centumalus.

444. Y. of R.

Dictator. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR.

He triumphs over the Samnites.

G. of the Horse. C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.

Pro-Consuls. Q. Fabius Max. Rullianus.

| | | | |
|--------------------------------|--|--------------------------------|---|
| | nus. He triumphs over the Herurians. | Consuls. | M. Valerius Maximus.
C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus. |
| | P. Cornelius Arvina. | | |
| Prætor. | M. VALERIUS CORVUS. | | |
| Curule Ædiles. | Q. Marcus Tremulus.
L. Atilius Regulus. | | The twenty-seventh Lustrum. |
| Plebeian Ædiles. | T. Minucius Augurinus.
Q. Manilius Nepos. | Pro-Consul. | Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus. |
| Tribunes of the People. | C. Marcus Rutilus.
M. Titinius Nepos.
C. Atinius Labeo.
P. Publilius Philo.
C. Plautius Decianus.
M. Livius Denter.
C. Livius Denter.
C. Atinius Longus.
M. Marcus Nepos.
C. Popilius Nepos.
L. Allienius Nepos. | Prætor. | T. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS. |
| | P. Valerius Falto.
L. Cornelius Blaſio. | Curule Ædiles. | C. Marcus Rutilus.
M. Titinius Nepos. |
| Quæſtors of Rome. | P. Licinius Varus.
M. Duilius Nepos. | Plebeian Ædiles. | M. Sempronius Tuditanus.
Q. Pomponius Nepos. |
| Military Quæſtors. | | Tribunes of the People. | C. Poetelius Libo Visolus.
M. Livius Denter.
L. Lucerius Nepos.
L. Volſcius Fiſtor.
P. Silius Nepos.
Q. Anicius Præneſtinus.
Cn. Fulvius Prætinus.
M. Acutius Nepos.
P. Villius Nepos.
Q. Mamilius Turinus.
Sp. Carvilius Maximus.
M. Atilius Regulus. |
| 445. Y. of R. | | | |
| 145. Conſulſhip. | P. DECIUS MUS, a second time.
Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS RULLIANUS, a third time.
M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS. | Quæſtors of Rome. | M. Atilius Regulus. |
| | | Military Quæſtors. | T. Manius Torquatus.
A. Cornelius Coſſus Arvina. |
| Prætor. | M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS. | 447. Y. of R. | |
| Curule Ædiles. | L. Poſthumius Megellus.
P. Sulpicius Saverrius. | 147. Conſulſhip. | Q. MARCIUS TREMULUS.
He triumphs over the Samnites, and the inhabitants of Anagnia. |
| Plebeian Ædiles. | M. Decius Mus.
M. Antonius Nepos. | | |
| Tribunes of the People. | L. Furius Nepos.
P. Sempronius Sophus.
M. Fulvius Curvus Prætinus.
L. Genucius Aventinensis.
Q. Appuleius Panſa.
M. Plætorius Nepos.
M. Trebius Nepos.
M. Confidius Nepos.
M. Fulcinius Nepos.
M. Mæcilius Tullus. | Dictators. | P. CORNELIUS ARVINA.
P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO BARBATUS. |
| Quæſtors of Rome. | L. Cornelius Scipio.
M. Atilius Regulus. | G. of the Horſe. | P. Decius Mus. |
| Military Quæſtors. | Q. Papirius Turdus.
M. Æmilius Paulus. | Prætor. | SER. CORNELIUS LENTULUS. |
| 446. Y. of R. | | Curule Ædiles. | M. Cornelius Corvus.
P. Valerius Falto. |
| 146. Conſulſhip. | APPIUS CLAUDIUS CÆCUS.
L. VOLUMNIUS FLAMMA VIOLENS. | Plebeian Ædiles. | P. Sempronius Sophus.
L. Genucius Aventinensis. |
| | | Tribunes of the People. | Cn. Flavius Nepos.
M. Decius Mus.
M. Fulvius Prætinus.
Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.
L. Genucius Aventinensis.
P. Furius Nepos.
L. Furius Nepos.
Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
M. Antonius Nepos. |
| | | | P. Curatius |

Quæstors of Rome. P. Curatius Nepos.
C. Corvilius Maximus.
L. Julius Libo.
Military Quæstors. Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
L. Julius Iulus.

448. Y. of R.
148. Consulship. L. POSTHUMIUS MEGELLUS.
TI. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS, who is killed fighting with the Samnites; and
M. FULVIUS CURVUS PÆTINUS chosen in his room. The latter triumphs over the Samnites.

Prætor. AP. CLAUDIUS CÆCUS.
Curule Ædiles. M. Æmilius Paulus.
L. Cornelius Blasio.
Plebeian Ædiles. M. Livius Denter.
Q. Appuleius.
Tribunes of the People. C. Marcus Rutilus.
C. Minucius Augurinus.
L. Ogulnius Gallus.
Q. Decius Mus.
M. Duilius Nepos.
M. Minucius Fessus.
M. Juventius Thalna.
P. Licinius Varus.
Q. Aulius Cerretanus.
Q. Pomponius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. Cn. Ogulnius Gallus.
M. Mamilius Vitulus.
Military Quæstors. C. Sargius Fidenas.
M. Geganius Macerinus.

449. Y. of R.
149. Consulship. C. SEMPRONIUS SOPHIUS.
He triumphs over the Æqui.
P. SULPICIUS SAVERRIO.
He triumphs over the Samnites.

Censors. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus.
P. Decius Mus.

The twenty-eighth Lustrum.

Prætor. P. VALERIUS FALTO.
Curule Ædiles. Cn. Flavius Nepos.
Q. Anicius Prænestinus.
Plebeian Ædiles. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.
L. Furius Nepos.
Tribunes of the People. Cn. Flavius Nepos.
Q. Papirius Turdus.

D. Junius Pera.
M. Pomponius Matho.
M. Sempronius Tuditanus.
T. Popilius Nepos.
Q. Pœtelius Libo Visolus.
M. Fulvius Flaccus.
M. Atilius Regulus.
C. Plautius Proculus.

Quæstors of Rome. L. Papirius Cursor.
M. Curius Dentatus.
Military Quæstors. L. Ælius Pætius.
D. Junius Brutus Scæva.

450. Y. of R.
150. Consulship. SER. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.
L. GENUCIUS AVENTINENSIS.

Prætor. M. VALERIUS CORVUS.
Curule Ædiles. L. Cornelius Scipio.
A. Cornelius Cossus Arzina.
Plebeian Ædiles. L. Genucius Aventinensis.
P. Furius Nepos.
Tribunes of the People. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
L. Publicius Malleolus.
M. Allicenius Nepos.
L. Plætorius Nepos.
L. Racilius Nepos.
Sex. Stadius Nepos.
L. Confidius Nepos.
C. Plætorius Nepos.
C. Apustius Fullo.
C. Numitorius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. L. Cornelius Scipio.
C. Fulvius Curvus.
Military Quæstors. M. Valerius Flaccus.
Q. Mamilius Vitulus.

451. Y. of R.
151. Consulship. M. LIVIUS DENTER.
M. ÆMILIUS PAULUS.

Dictator. C. JUNIUS BUBULCUS BRUTUS. He triumphs over the Æqui.

G. of the Horse. M. Titinius Nepos.
Prætor. Q. APULEIUS PANSA.
Curule Ædiles. L. Posthumius Megellus.
T. Manlius Torquatus.
Plebeian Ædiles. M. Fulvius Pætinus.
C. Minucius Augurinus.
Tribunes of the People. L. Furius Nepos.
Sp. Carvilius Maximus.
M. Atilius Regulus.
C. Metilius

C. Metilius Nepos.
 A. Silius Nepos.
 Q. Papirius Turdus.
 Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.
 Ti. Pontificius.
 M. Volscius Fictor.
 L. Antonius Nepos.
 Quæstors of Rome. Q. Cædicius Nectua.
 C. Acutius Nepos.
 Military Quæstors. C. Fessius Flaccinator.
 Q. Fabius Ambufius.
 452. Y. of R.
 Dictators. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS
 RULLIANVS.
 M. VALERIUS CORVVS.
 He triumphs over the Hetu-rians.
Generals of the Horse. M. Æmilius Paulus.
 P. Sempronius Sophus.
Prætor. L. CORNELIVS SCIPIO.
Curule Ædiles. C. Pæteliu Libo Visilus.
 D. Junius Pera.
Plebeian Ædiles. M. Atilius Regulus.
 C. Plautius Proculus.
Tribunes of the People. Q. Anicius Prænestinus.
 Q. Pæteliu Libo Visilus.
 L. Genucius Aventinensis.
 M. Lætorius Plancianus.
 M. Minucius Fessus.
 C. Memmius Nepos.
 P. Furius Nepos.
 C. Lætorius Nepos.
 C. Mælius Capitolinus.
 M. Terentius Nepos.
 Quæstors of Rome. M. Sergius Nepos.
 Q. Hortensius Nepos.
 Military Quæstors. C. Cædicius Nectua.
 M. Claudius Marcellus.
 453. Y. of R.
 152. Consulship. Q. APULEIVS PANSA.
 M. VALERIUS CORVVS, a
 fifth time.
Prætor. CN. FVLVIUS MAXIMVS CEN-TUMALVS.
Curule Ædiles. L. Julius Iulus.
 L. Julius Lilius.
Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Papirius Turdus.
 Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
Tribunes of the People. Q. Cæcilius Gallus.
 Cn. Ogurnius Gallus.
 M. Mamilius Vitulus.

T. Juventius Thalna.
 C. Otacilius Crassus.
 C. Carvilius Maximus.
 Q. Terentius Arsa.
 M. Otacilius Crassus.
 Sp. Oppius Cornicen.
 Q. Aulius Cerretanus.
 Quæstors of Rome. Q. Fabius Gurgus.
 M. Aquilius Florus.
 Military Quæstors. C. Ælius Pætus.
 L. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.
 454. Y. of R.
 153. Consulship. M. FULVIUS PÆTINVS.
 He triumphs over the Sam-
 nites and Nequinities.
 T. MANLIUS TORQUA-
 TUS, who dies in his office.
 And to supply his room,
 M. VALERIUS CORVVS is chosen Consul a sixth time.
Censors. P. Sempronius Sophus.
 P. Sulpicius Saverrio.
The twenty-ninth Lustrum.
Prætor. L. POSTHUMIVS MEGELLVS.
Curule Ædiles. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus.
 L. Papirius Cursor.
Plebeian Ædiles. L. Antonius Nepos.
 C. Metilius Nepos.
Tribunes of the People. L. Ælius Pætus.
 M. Atilius Regulus.
 D. Junius Brutus Scæva.
 M. Aulius Cerretanus.
 D. Junius Pera.
 C. Fulvius Curvus.
 C. Cæcilius Mætellus.
 L. Pupius Nepos.
 M. Volscius Fictor.
 C. Junius Brutus Bubulcus.
 Quæstors of Rome. P. Cornelius Rufinus.
 M. Valerius Maximus Corvinus.
 Military Quæstors. M. Licinus Denter.
 C. Claudius Canina.
 455. Y. of R.
 154. Consulship. L. CORNELIVS SCIPIO.
 CN. FVLVIUS CENTU-MALVS. He triumphs over the Samnites and Hetu-rians.
Prætor. M. LIVIVS DENTER. Curule

Curule Ædiles. L. Cornelius Scipio.
L. Valerius Flaccus.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Latinus Plancianus.
G. Latinus Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. M. P. Curius Dentatus.
Q. Papirius Turdus.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
A. Atilius Calatinus.

M. Marcius Nepos.
C. Plautius Proculus.

M. Flavius Nepos.
M. Atilius Regulus.

M. Popilius Lanatus.
L. Plautius Venno.

Quæstors of Rome. G. Trebenius Asper.
M. Scantius Nepos.

Military Quæstors. L. Cæcilius Metellus.
A. Manlius Vulso Longus.

456. Y. of R.

155. Consulship. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS RULLIANVS, a fourth time.

P. DECIVS MUS, a fourth time.

Prætor. L. Julius Iulus.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Fabius Ambustus.
M. Sergius Fidenas.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Atilius Regulus.
D. Junius Brutus Scæva.

Tribunes of the People. Q. Hortensius Nepos.
Q. Cædicius Noctua.

C. Plautius Hypsæus.
C. Petillius Nepos.

A. Alienius Nepos.
C. Cædicius Noctua.

M. Æmilius Regulus Serranus.
M. Pætelius Libo.

L. Apuleius Saturinus.
C. Pontificius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Fulvius Pætinus.
Ti. Sempronius Blæsus.

Military Quæstors. L. Manlius Capitolinus.
Ser. Cornelius Rufinus.

457. Y. of R.

156. Consulship. AP. CLAVDIVS CÆCVS, a second time.

L. VOLUMNIVS FLAMMA VIOLENS, a second time.

Prætor. P. Sempronius Sophus.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
Cn. Ogulnius Gallus.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. Ælius Pætus.
C. Fulvius Curvus.

Tribunes of the People. C. Junius Brutus Babulcus.
Q. Papirius Turdus.

P. Numitorius Pullus.
Q. Sallonius Sarra.

M. P. Curius Dentatus.
M. Claudius Marcellus.

M. Racilius Nepos.
Sp. Antius Restio.

M. Acutius Nepos.
M. Mætilius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. C. Nautius Rutilus.
M. Valerius Maximus Potitus.

Military Quæstors. L. Flaminius Chilo.
Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

Pro-Consuls in Samnium. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus.
P. Decius Mus.

458. Y. of R.

157. Consulship. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS RULLIANVS, a fifth time; He triumphs over the Samnites, the Hetrurians, and the Gauls.

P. DECIVS MUS, a third time.

Prætor. AP. CLAVDIVS CÆCVS.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Fabius Gurgæ.
L. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.

Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Hortensius Nepos.
L. Plautius Venno.

Tribunes of the People. Q. Cædicius Noctua.
P. Villius Nepos.

Sex. Pompilius Nepos.
L. Sicinius Dentatus.

Sex. Titius Nepos.
C. Ælius Petus.

P. Silius Nepos.
C. Manilius Nepos.

Q. Titinius Nepos.
Cn. Apronius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. Sp. Nautius Rutilus.
Cn. Æmilius Papus.

Military Quæstors. C. Ælius Pætus.
C. Fabricius Luscinus.

Pro-Consuls. L. Volumnius Flamma Violens.

L. Cornelius Scipio.

Cn. Fulvius Maximus Centumalus.

L. Posthu-

L. Posthumius Megellus.
M. Livius Denter.

459. Y. of R.

158. Consulship. L. POSTHUMIUS MEGELLUS, a second time. He triumphs over the Samnites and Hetrurians.

M. ATILIUS REGULUS.
He triumphs over the Volscinenses and the Samnites.

Censors.

P. Cornelius Arvina.
C. Marcius Rutilus.

The thirtieth Lustrum.

Prætor. D. JUNIUS BRUTUS SCÆVA.
Curule Ediles. M. Valerius Maximus Cereinus.
P. Cornelius Rufinus.

Plebeian Ediles. M. Curius Dentatus.
M. Claudius Marcellus.

Tribunes of the People. C. Trebonius Asper.
M. Livius Denter.

C. Claudius Canina.
C. Sextilius Nepos.
L. Mænius Nepos.
A. Virginius Nepos.
C. Sextius Calvinus.
C. Curatius Nepos.
T. Memmius Nepos.
M. Lætorius Plancianus.

Quæstors of Rome. L. Opimius Pansa.
Q. Marcus Philippus.

Military Quæstors. M. Æmilius Lepidus.
C. Servilius Tucca.

460. Y. of R.

159. Consulship. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR.
SP. CARVILIUS MAXIMUS. They both triumph over the Samnites.

Prætor. M. ATILIUS REGULUS.
Curule Ediles. C. Junius Brutulus Brutus.

Q. Cædicius Nectua.
Plebeian Ediles. P. Nuvitorius Pullus.

S. Atilius Regillus.
Tribunes of the People. M. Scantius Nepos.

Q. Hortensius Nepos.
C. Canuleius Nepos.
C. Aquilius Florus.
Q. Ogulnius Galus.
T. Claudius Cicero.

L. Cæcilius Metellus.
L. Romuleius Nepos.
C. Ogulnius Galus.
C. Aurclius Cotta.

Quæstors of Rome. Ti. Coruncanus.
L. Furius Camillus.
Military Quæstors. Q. Mælius Nepos.
C. Furius Pacius.

461. Y. of R.

160. Consulship. Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS GURGES.

D. JUNIUS BRUTUS CÆVA.

Dictator. APPIUS CLAUDIUS CÆCUS.

G. of the Horse. C. Marcius Rutilus.
Prætor. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR.

Curule Ediles. C. Ælius Pætus.
C. Claudius Canina.

Plebeian Ediles. C. Apronius Nepos.
P. Silius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. C. Rabuleius Nepos.
M. Claudius Marcellus.
M. Pupius Nepos.
M. Fulvius Pætinus Nobilior.
L. Flaminius Chilo.
L. Hortensius Nepos.
L. Icilius Ruga.
Sex. Tullius Nepos.
C. Flavius Nepos.
M. Atilius Nepos.

These ten abdicated, because their election was deemed defective; and in their room were chosen

L. Tullius Nepos.
M. Antistius Nepos.
L. Albinus Nepos.
C. Confidius Nepos.
M. Racilius Nepos.
C. Junius Pullus.
P. Plautius Hypsæus.
L. Allienius Nepos.
M. Plætorius Nepos.
L. Fulcinius Trio.

Quæstors of Rome. Q. Æmilius Papus.
L. Aurelius Cotta.
Military Quæstors. C. Cornelius Scapula.
P. Decius Mus.

462. Y.

462. Y. of R.

101. Consulship. L. POSTHUMIUS MEGELLUS, a third time.

C. JUNIUS BRUTUS BULCUS.

Prætor. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS.

Curule Ædiles. C. Nautius Rutilus.

M. Valerius Maximus Potitus.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Livius Dentor.

C. Trebonius Asper.

Tribunes of the People. Q. Cædicius Noctua.

Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

M. Trebonius Flavus.

T. Roscius Nepos.

Sex. Tempanius.

Q. Hortensius.

C. Fabricius Luscinus.

L. Numitorius Pullus.

Cn. Lucerus Nepos.

C. Scaptius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Cornelius Dolabella Maximus.

L. Æmilius Barbula.

Military Quæstors. C. Antius Restio.

Sp. Mæcilius.

Pro-Consul in Samnium. Q. Fabius Maximus Gurges. He triumphs over the Samnites.

Pro-Quæstor. L. Aurelius Cotta.

463. Y. of R.

162. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS RUFINUS. M' CURIUS DENTATUS.

The latter triumphs over the Samnites and Sabines at two different times.

Prætor. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS.

Curule Ædiles. Sp. Nautius Rutilus.

Cn. Æmilius Papus.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. Cæcilius Metellus.

C. Aurelius Cotta.

Tribunes of the People. C. Ælius Pætus.

Q. Marcius Philippus.

C. Mamilius Vitulus.

L. Antonius Nepos.

L. Cominius Nepos.

A. Atilius Bulbus.

C. Volumnius Flamma.

Cn. Apronius Nepos.

C. Sextius Calvinus.

M. Cædicius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Valerius Lævinus.

L. Volumnius Flamma Violens.

Vol. II.

Military Quæstors. C. Genucius Clepsina.

Q. Fundanius Fundulus.

464. Y. of R.

163. Consulship. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS CORVINUS.

Q. CÆDICIIUS NOCTUA.

Censors. M. Æmilius Paulus.

L. Volumnius Flamma Violens.

The thirty-first Lustrum.

Prætor. C. NAUTIUS RUTILUS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Æmilius Lepidus.

C. Serrilius Tucca.

Plebeian Ædiles. Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

C. Fabricius Luscinus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Papirius Turdus.

C. Ælius Pætus.

Ti. Coruncanius Nepos.

P. Virginus Nepos.

Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.

L. Canuleius Nepos.

C. Claudius Canina.

P. Curatius Nepos.

C. Furius Aculeo.

T. Numicius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Sulpicius Saverrio.

Sp. Papirius Cursor.

Military Quæstors. L. Papirius Cursor.

C. Mænius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in Lucania. M' Curius Dentatus. He enjoys the honours of an Ovation, after having subdued the Lucani.

Pro-Quæstor. C. Genucius Clepsina.

465. Y. of R.

164. Consulship. Q. MARCIUS TREMULUS. P. CORNELIUS ARVINA.

Both the second time.

Prætor. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS POTITUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Furius Camillus.

C. Furius Pacilus.

Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Marcius Philippus.

M. Trebonius Flavus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Cæcilius Metellus.

Q. Romuleius Nepos.

C. Aurelius Cotta.

C. Ælius Pætus.

P. Mucius Scævola.

P. Decius Mus.

M. Oppius Cornicen.

4 I Q. Cæcilius

Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
 C. Claudius Hortator.
 C. Icilius Ruga.
 Quæstors of Rome. M. Licinius Calvus.
 M. Fabius Dors.
 Military Quæ- L. Domitius Ænobarbus.
 stors. T. Antonius Merenda.
 466. Y. of R.
 105. Consulship. M. CLAUDIUS MARCEL-
 LUS.
 C. NAUTIUS RUTILUS.
 Dictator. Q. HORTENSIVS NE-
 POS. He dies in his office.
G. of the Horse. M. Livius Dentor, who abdicated after the death of Hortensius.
 Dictator. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS
 RULLIANVS.
G. of the Horse. L. Volumnius Flamma Vio-lens.
Prætor. C. CLAVDIVS CANINA.
 Curule Ædiles. Q. Æmilius Papus.
 C. Cornelius Scapula.
 Plebeian Æ- Ti. Coruncanius Nepos. diles. P. Decius Mus.
 Tribunes of the P. Mænius Nepos.
 People. P. Pupius Nepos.
 C. Fabricius Luscinus.
 L. Livius Dentor.
 Q. Marcius Tremulus.
 C. Lutatius Catulus.
 Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
 L. Antistius Nepos.
 L. Aurelius Cotta.
 L. Publilius Philo.
 Quæstors of Rome. M. Fulvius Curvus.
 L. Atilius Regulus.
 Military Quæ- Cn. Quinctilius Varus. stors. P. Quinctilius Varus.
 467. Y. of R.
 106. Consulship. M. VALERIUS MAXIMVS POTITVS.
 C. ÆLIUS PÆTUS.
Prætor. C. SERVILIUS TUCCA.
 Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Dolabella.
 L. Æmilius Barbula.
 Plebeian Æ- L. Papirius Turdus. diles. C. Furius Aculeo.

Tribunes of the L. Cæcilius Metellus.
 People. C. Genucius Clepsina.
 M. Platorius Nepos.
 A. Trebius Nepos.
 Sp. Mæcilius Nepos.
 Q. Marcius Philippus.
 M. Albinus Nepos.
 C. Antius Nepos Restio.
 M. Trebonius Flavius.
 M. Mæcilius Tullus.
 Quæstors of Rome. M. Sempronius Tuditanus.
 M. Metilius Nepos.
 Military Quæ- M. Fostius Flaccinator. stors. C. Fabius Ambustus.
 468. Y. of R.
 107. Consulship. C. CLAVDIVS CANINA.
 M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDVS.
Prætor. Cn. DOMITIUS CALVINVS.
 Curule Ædiles. P. Valerius Lævinus.
 T. Geganius Macerinus.
 Plebeian Æ- M. Oppius Cornicen.
 diles. Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
 Tribunes of the C. Fabricius Luscinus.
 People. P. Decius Mus.
 M. Titinius Nepos.
 L. Genucius Aventinensis.
 C. Mænius Nepos.
 T. Coruncanius Nepos.
 L. Volumnius Flamma Violens.
 C. Fundanius Fundulus.
 C. Claudius Hortator.
 P. Curatius Nepos.
 Quæstors of Rome. L. Cornelius Lentulus.
 L. Papirius Mafio.
 Military Quæ- L. Sextius Lateranus. stors. M. Antonius Nepos.
 469. Y. of R.
 108. Consulship. C. SERVILIUS TUCCA.
 L. CÆCILIUS METELLVS.
Prætor. Q. ÆMILIUS PAPVS.
 Curule Ædiles. P. Sulpicius Saverrio.
 Sp. Papirius Cursor.
 Plebeian Æ- C. Genucius Clepsina. diles. L. Aurelius Cotta.
 Tribunes of the Q. Marcius Philippus.
 People. Q. Canuleius Nepos.
 M. Licinius Calvus.
 L. Domitius Ænobarbus.
 P. Mucius Scævola.
 Ti. Minucius Augurinus.
 P. Licinius Stolo.
 C. Ælius Pætus.

M. Clau-

Quæstors of Rome. M. Claudius Marcellus.
C. Icilius Ruga.
Military Quæ- Ser. Cornelius Merenda. stors. C. Fabius Dorso Licinus.
L. Genucius Clepsina.
M. Decius.

470. Y. of R.

169. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS DOLABEL-LA MAXIMUS.

CN. DOMITIUS CALVI-
NUS.

Prætor. L. CÆCILIUS METELLUS. He was killed in the battle with the Hetrurians; and M^r CURIUS DENTATUS was chosen in his room.

Curule Ædiles. L. Papirius Cursor.
M. Fabius Dorso.

Plebeian Æ- M. Albinus Nepos. diles. M. Plætorius Nepos.

Tribunes of the Ti. Coruncanius Nepos.
People. C. Junius Pullus.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

L. Atinius Longus.

Q. Petillius Nepos.

P. Decius Mus.

M. Fulvius Curvus.

L. Atilius Regulus.

C. Plautius Decianus.

M. Trebonius Flavus.

Quæstors of Rome. Sp. Furius Purpureo.
C. Sempronius Tuditanus.

Military Quæ- Q. Lutatius Catulus. stors. A. Posthumus Albinus.

471. Y. of R.

170. Consulship. C. FABRICIUS LUSCINUS.

He triumphs over the Sam-
nites, Lucani, and Brutii.

Q. Æmilius PAPUS.

Prætor. M. LIVIUS DENTER DRUSUS.

Curule Ædiles. Cn. Quinctilius Varus.

P. Quinctilius Varus.

Plebeian Æ- C. Fundanius Fundulus.

diles. L. Genucius Aventinensis.

Tribunes of the C. Genucius Clepsina.

People. L. Trebius Nepos.

L. Villius Nepos.

Q. Silius Nerva.

Cn. Sicinius Bellutus.

M. Trebius Nepos.

C. Acutius Nepos.

L. Volumnius Flamma Violens.

Quæstors of Rome. C. Pompilius Nepos.
M. Titinius Nepos.
Military Quæ- Q. Ogulnius Gallus. stors. Q. Valerius Falto.
Ti. Claudius Nero.
P. Clælius Siculus.

472. Y. of R.

171. Consulship. L. ÆMILIUS BARBULA.

Q. MARCIUS PHILIPPUS.

He triumphs over the Hetr-urians.

Prætor. P. SULPICIUS SAVERRIO.

Curule Ædiles. M. Fostius Flaccinator.

C. Fabius Ambustus.

Plebeian Æ- T. Minucius Augurinus.
diles. M. Claudius Marcellus.

Tribunes of the L. Titius Nepos.

People. P. Licinius Varus.

Sp. Icilius Ruga.

C. Sempronius Gracchus.

P. Publilius Philo.

M. Genucius Aventinensis.

M. Aulius Cerretanus.

Cn. Pupius Nepos.

C. Marcius Rutilus.

T. Popillius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. C. Quinctius Claudus.
P. Sempronius Sophus.

Military Quæ- Q. Servilius Cæpio. stors. C. Valerius Potitus Flaccus.

473. Y. of R.

172. Consulship. P. VALERIUS LÆVINUS.

TI. CORUNCANIUS NE-

POS. He triumphs over the Volsinenses, and Volcientes.

Censors.

Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

Q. Fabius Maximus Gurgès.

The thirty-second Lustrum.

Prætor. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR.

Curule Ædiles. L. Cornelius Lentulus.

L. Papirius Mase.

Plebeian Æ- M. Fulvius Curvus.

diles. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

Tribunes of the C. Genucius Clepsina.

People. C. Atinius Longus.

Q. Petilius Nepos.

Q. Apuleius Pansa.

M. Pletorius Nepos.

Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

C. Plautius Decianus.

C. Pœtelius Libo Visolus.
 M. Albinus Nepos.
 Q. Anicius Prænестinus.
 Quæstors of Rome. Cn. Servilius Cæpio.
 Sp. Carvilius Ruga.
 Military Quæstors. M. Atilius Regulus.
 L. Publicius Malleolus.
 Pro-Consul against the Samnites, Tarentini, and Salentini. L. Æmilius Barbula. He triumphs over the Tarentini, Samnites, and Salentini.
 Pro-Quæstor. Q. Servilius Cæpio.
 474. Y. of R.
 173. Consulship. P. SULPICIUS SAVERRIO.
 P. DECIUS MUS.
 Prætor. TI. CORUNCANIUS NEPOS.
 Curule Ædiles. Ser. Cornelius Merenda.
 C. Fabius Dorsæ Licinus.
 Plebeian Ædiles. M. Trebius Nepos.
 Q. Silius Nerva.
 Tribunes of the People. L. Genucius Clepsina.
 P. Sallonius Sarra.
 L. Villius Nepos.
 Q. Silius Nerva.
 Q. Manilius Nepos.
 L. Trebius Nepos.
 A. Acutius Nepos.
 L. Volumnius Flamma Violens.
 C. Pompilius Nepos.
 Cn. Sicinius Bellutus.
 Quæstors of Rome. C. Fabius Pictor.
 D. Junius Pera.
 Military Quæstors. Q. Mamilius Turinus.
 Cn. Cornelius Blasio.
 475. Y. of R.
 174. Consulship. C. FABRICIUS LUSCINUS, a second time. He triumphs over the Lucani, Brutii, Tarentini, and Samnites.
 Q. ÆMILIUS PAPUS, a second time.
 Prætor. C. GENUCIUS CLEPSINA.
 Curule Ædiles. L. Titius Nepos.
 T. Popilius Nepos.
 Plebeian Ædiles. P. Licinius Nepos.
 C. Sempronius Gracchus.
 Tribunes of the People. M. Titinius Nepos.
 N. Sextius Sextinus.
 L. Furius Nepos.
 T. Minucius Augurinus.
 M. Aulus Cerretanus.
 M. Titius Rufus.
 C. Curatius Nepos.

T. Veturius Calvinus.
 Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
 C. Icilius Ruga.
 Quæstors of Rome. Ap. Claudius Crassus.
 Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
 Military Quæstors. L. Mamilius Vitulus.
 T. Clælius Siculus.
 476. Y. of R.
 175. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS RUFINUS, a second time.
 C. JUNIUS BRUTUS BULCUS, a second time. He triumphs over the Lucani and Brutii.
 Prætor. L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.
 Curule Ædiles. P. Clælius Siculus.
 Q. Valerius Falto.
 Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Apuleius Pansa.
 C. Plautius Decianus.
 Tribunes of the People. Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
 Sp. Icilius Ruga.
 Q. Pomponius Nepos.
 M. Fulvius Curvus.
 C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
 Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
 Cn. Pupius Nepos.
 M. Livius Denter.
 Cn. Fulvius Pætinus.
 C. Atinius Labeo.
 Quæstors of Rome. C. Papirius Mæso.
 A. Posthumius Albinus.
 Military Quæstors. Cn. Fulvius Maximus Centumalus.
 M. Duilius Nepos.
 477. Y. of R.
 176. Consulship. Q. FABIUS MAX. GURGES, a second time. He triumphs over the Lucani and Brutii.
 C. GENUCIUS.
 Dictator. P. CORNELIUS RUFINUS.
 G. of the Horse. C. Ælius Pætus.
 Prætor. SER. CORNELIUS MERENDA.
 Curule Ædiles. C. Quinctilius Claudus.
 C. Valerius Potitus Flaccus.
 Plebeian Ædiles. L. Genucius Clepsina.
 P. Sallonius Sarra.
 Tribunes of the People. P. Sempronius Sophus.
 C. Atinius Longus.
 T. Popilius Nepos.

C. Pœtelius.

C. Pœtelius Libo Visolus.
 Cn. Apuleius Panfa.
 M. Fulvius Pœtinus.
 M' Marcius Nepos.
 Q. Petilius Nepos.
 Q. Lutatius Catulus.
 L. Alienius Nepos.
 Quæstors of Rome. M. Fulvius Flaccus.
 N. Fabius Pictor.
 Military Quæ- L. Julius Libo. stors. Cn. Apronius Lino.

478. Y. of R.
 177. Consulship. M. CURIUS DENTATUS,
 a second time. He triumphs over the Samnites and King Pyrrhus.
 L. CORNELIUS LENTU-LUS, who has the Surname of Caudinus given him. He triumphs over the Samnites and Lucani.

Censors. C. Fabricius Luscinus.
 Q. Æmilius Papus.

The thirty-third Lustrum.
 Prætor. C. FABIVS DORSO LICINUS.
 Curule Ediles. Cn. Servilius Cæpio.
 Q. Servilius Cæpio.
 Plebeian Æ- M. Titius Rufus. diles. N. Sextius Lateranus.
 Tribunes of the M. Atilius Regulus.
 People. Q. Confidius Nepos.
 L. Trebius Nepos.
 L. Lucerius Nepos.
 L. Volscius Fictor.
 L. Publicius Malleolus.
 L. Anicius Prænestinus.
 M. Trebius Nepos.
 M. Acutius Nepos.
 Ti. Villius Tappulus.

Quæstors of C. Otacilius Crassus.
Rome. M' Otacilius Crassus.
 Military Quæ- L. Quinctius Capitolinus. stors. L. Papirius Crassus.

479. Y. of R.
 178. Consulship. M' CURIUS DENTATUS,
 a third time.
 SER. CORNELIUS MÆ-RENDA.
 Prætor. L. GENUCIUS CLEPSINA.
 Curule Ediles. C. Fabius Pictor.
 Cn. Cornelius Blasio.

Plebeian Æ- Q. Ogulnius Gallus. diles. P. Sempronius Soplus.
 Tribunes of the D. Junius Pera.
 People. M. Minucius Fessius.
 C. Curatius Nepos.
 Q. Papirius Turdus.
 C. Minucius Augurinus.
 Q. Mamilius Turinus.
 M. Titinius Nepos.
 P. Furius Nepos.
 Y. Veturius Calvinus.
 C. Minucius Rufus.

Quæstors of Ap. Claudius Caudex.
Rome. Q. Mamilius Vitulus.
 Military Quæ- L. Sempronius Atratinus. stors. L. Flaminius Chilo.

480. Y. of R.
 179. Consulship. C. FABIVS DORSO LIC-
 NUS.
 C. CLAUDIVS CANINA, a second time. He triumphs over the Lucani, Samnites, and Brutii.

Prætor. C. QUINCTIVS CLAVDIVS.
 Curule Ediles. T. Clælius Siculus.
 Ap. Claudius Crassus.
 Plebeian Æ- M. Fulvius Petinus. diles. Q. Lutatius Catulus.
 Tribunes of the L. Mamilius Vitulus.
 People. M' Juventius Thalna.
 Q. Aulius Cerretanus.
 L. Pomponius Nepos.
 Cn. Flavius Nepos.
 M. Aquilius Florus.
 Sp. Carvilius Max. Ruga.
 L. Ælius Petus.
 M. Pomponius Matho.
 Cn. Fulvius Pœtinus.

Quæstors of M' Cornelius Cethegus.
Rome. T. Manlius Torquatus.
 Military Quæ- T. Otacilius Crassus. stors. Q. Ogulnius Gallus.

481. Y. of R.
 180. Consulship. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR, a second time. He triumphs over the Tarentini, Sam-
 nites, Lucani, and Brutii.
 SP. CURVILIUS MAXI-MUS, a second time. He triumphs over the Lucani, Brutii, Samnites, and Tarentini.

Censors.

| | | | |
|--------------------------------|---|--------------------------------|---|
| Consuls. | M. Curius Dentatus.
L. Papirius Cursor. | Plebeian Ædiles. | L. Mamilius Titulus.
M. Aquilius Florus. |
| | The thirty-fourth Ætrium. | Tribunes of the People. | D. Junius Pera.
A. Acutius Nepos.
C. Volscius Fictor.
A. Silius Nepos.
Q. Racilius Nepos.
M. Otacilius Crassus.
Ti. Pontificius Nepos.
C. Metilius Nepos.
C. Sallonius Sarra.
C. Plætorius Nepos. |
| Prætor. | CN. CORNELIUS BLASIO. | Quæstors of Rome. | M. Junius Brutus.
Cn. Cornelius Scipio Africanus. |
| Curule Ædiles. | L. Publicius Malleolus.
Q. Confidius Nepos. | Military Quæstors. | A. Atilius Calpurnius.
Q. Sulpicius Paternulus. |
| Plebeian Ædiles. | M. Atilius Regulus.
D. Junius Pera. | 484. Y. of R. | |
| Tribunes of the People. | Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
T. Sempronius Gracchus.
C. Atilius Regulus.
C. Plautius Proculus.
M. Alienus Nepos.
M. Duilius Nepos.
Cn. Fulvius Max. Centumalus.
M. Marcius Nepos.
M. Pætelius Libo Visolus.
L. Confidius Nepos. | 183. Consulship. | Q. OGULNIUS GALLUS.
C. FABIVS PICTOR. |
| Quæstors of Rome. | Q. Fabius Ambustus.
M. Valerius Maximus. | | Silver first coined at Rome. |
| Military Quæstors. | Cn. Minutius Fessus.
C. Duilius Nepos. | Prætor. | M. ATILIUS REGULUS. |
| 482. Y. of R. | | Curule Ædiles. | Ap. Claudius Caudex.
L. Sempronius Atratinus. |
| 181. Consulship. | C. QUINCTIVS CLAVDVS.
L. GENVCIVS CLEPSINA. | Plebeian Ædiles. | M. Duilius Nepos.
Ti. Sempronius Gracchus. |
| Prætor. | C. FABIVS PICTOR. | Tribunes of the People. | Q. Mamilius Vitulus.
Q. Confidius Nepos.
M. Alienus Nepos.
C. Plautius Proculus.
C. Atilius Regulus.
C. Plætorius Nepos.
L. Confidius Nepos.
L. Publicius Malleolus.
M. Marcius Nepos.
C. Sempronius Longus. |
| Curule Ædiles. | L. Julius Libo.
N. Fabius Pictor. | Quæstors of Rome. | L. Apustius Fullo.
C. Atilius Regulus Serranus. |
| Plebeian Ædiles. | Q. Mamilius Turinus.
M. Minucius Fessus. | Military Quæstors. | L. Manlius Torquatus.
L. Pinarius Natta. |
| Tribunes of the People. | M. Fulvius Flaccus.
P. Sempronius Sophus.
C. Otacilius Crassus.
C. Racilius Nepos.
L. Flaminius Chilo.
Cn. Apronius Lino.
C. Plætorius Nepos.
C. Apustius Fullo.
L. Numitorius Nepos. | 485. Y. of R. | |
| Quæstors of Rome. | L. Posthumius Megellus.
L. Valerius Flaccus. | 184. Consulship. | P. SEMPRONIUS SOPHUS.
He triumphs over the People of Picenum. |
| Military Quæstors. | D. Junius Brutus Scæva.
C. Aquilius Florus. | | APPIVS CLAVDIVS CRASSVS. He triumphs over the same Nation. |
| 483. Y. of R. | | Prætor. | Q. FABIVS PICTOR. |
| 182. Consulship. | C. GENVCIVS CLEPSINA, a second time.
CN. CORNELIVS BLASIO.
He triumphs over the Sarsinates. | Curule Ædiles. | M. Fulvius Flaccus.
C. Apustius Fullo. |
| Prætor. | AP. CLAVDIVS CRASSVS, | | |
| Curule Ædiles. | L. Quinctius Capitolinus.
L. Papirius Crassus. | | |

Plebeian

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Otacilius Crassus.
C. Volscius Fictor.
Tribunes of the People. T. Otacilius Crassus.
M' Pomponius Matho.
M' Curius Dentatus.
C. Ælius Pætus.
M. Aulus Cerretanus.
M. Flavius Nepos.
L. Acilius Glabrio.
M. Claudius Marcellus.
C. Lælius Nepos.
L. Carvilius Maximus.
Quæstors of Rome. L. Cornelius Scipio.
C. Sulpicius Paterculus.
Military Quæstors. M. Lætorius Plancianus.
Q. Cædicius Nepos.
486. Y. of R.
185. Consulship. M. ATILIUS REGULUS.
L. JULIUS LIBO. They both triumph over the Salentini.
Prætor. L. MAMILIUS VITULUS.
Curule Ædiles. M' Valerius Maximus.
L. Posthumius Megellus.
Plebeian Ædiles. M. Otacilius Crassus.
C. Sallomius Sarra.
Tribunes of the People. Cn. Minucius Fessus.
C. Cæcilius Metellus.
Sp. Oppius Cornicen.
Q. Terentius Arsa.
C. Æbutius Carus.
C. Duilius Nepos.
Cn. Ogulnius Gallus.
T. Juventius Thalna.
M. Minucius Fessus.
P. Mælius Capitolinus.
Quæstors of Rome. Ti. Sempronius Blæsus.
Ser. Fulvius Pætinus Nobilior.
Military Quæstors. Q. Hortensius Nepos.
A. Sempronius Atratinus.
487. Y. of R.
186. Consulship. N. FABIVS PICTOR. He triumphs twice. 1st. Over the Sassinates. 2dly. Over the Salentini, and Messapii.
D. JUNIVS PERA. He triumphs twice. 1st. Over the Sassinates. 2dly. Over the Salentini, and Messapii.
Prætor. AP. CLAVDIVS CAVDX.
Curule Ædiles. L. Valerius Flaccus.
Q. Fabius Ambustus.

Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Mamilius Vitulus.
Cn. Apronius Lima.
Tribunes of the People. M. Fulvius Flaccus.
D. Junius Brutus Scæva.
C. Cædicius Noctua.
C. Manilius Nepos.
C. Antonius Nepos.
C. Aquilius Florus.
L. Memmius Nepos.
M. Antonius Nepos.
L. Mamilius Nepos.
M. Aquilius Florus.
Quæstors of Rome. L. Manlius Vulso Longus.
C. Sempronius Blæsus.
Military Quæstors. A. Manlius Vulso Longus.
Q. Marcus Philippus.
488. Y. of R.
187. Consulship. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS GURGES, a third time.
L. MAMILIUS VITVLVS.
Censors. Cn. Cornelius Blasio.
C. Marcius Rutilus, who was then surnamed Censorinus.
The thirty-fifth Lustrum.
Prætor. M' OTACILIUS CRASSVS.
Curule Ædiles. Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina.
Q. Sulpicius Paterculus.
Plebeian Ædiles. T. Otacilius Crassus.
C. Atilius Calatinus.
Tribunes of the People. C. Titius Nepos.
M. Junius Brutus.
Cn. Ogulnius Gallus.
L. Carvilius Maximus.
C. Ælius Pætus.
M. Claudius Marcellus.
A. Atilius Calatinus.
C. Oppius Cornicen.
C. Lælius Nepos.
Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
Quæstors of Rome. C. Aurelius Cotta.
Q. Æmilius Papus.
Military Quæstors. C. Claudius Canina.
M. Horatius Pulvillus.
Four new Quæstors created for the Provinces in Italy, which were become subject to the Republick.
489. Y. of R.
188. Consulship. AP. CLAVDIVS CAVDX.
M. FVLVIVS FLACCVS.
He

He triumphs over the Volturniensis.

Prætor. Q. MAMILIUS VITULUS.
Curule Ædiles. L. Pinarius Natta.
 L. Manlius Torquatus.
Plebeian Ædiles. C. Duilius Nepos.
 Cn. Minucius Fessus.
Tribunes of the People. C. Atilius Regulus Serranus.
 C. Ælius Carus.
 M. Popilius Lænas.
 L. Acilius Glabrio.
 M. Pœtelius Libo.
 Q. Terentius Arsa.
 M. Marcius Nepos.
 T. Juventius Thalna.
 C. Plautius Hypsæus.
 M. Racilius Nepos.
Quæstors of Rome. M. Æmilius Paulus.
 M. Claudius Marcellus.
Military Quæstors. L. Cæcilius Metellus.
 Sp. Furius Philus.
Provincial Quæstors. C. Marcius Censorinus.
 P. Minucius Rufus.
 T. Æbutius Elva.
 L. Hortensius Nepos.

490. Y. of R.

189. Consulship. M' VALERIUS FLACCUS, who was then surnamed MESSALA. He triumphs over the Carthaginians, and King Hiero.

Dictator. M' OTACILIUS CRASSUS.
 CN. FULVIUS MAXIMUS CENTUMALUS.

G. of the Horse. Q. Marcius Philippus.
Prætor. L. VALERIUS FLACCUS.
Curule Ædiles. L. Cornelius Scipio.
 C. Sulpicius Paterculus.
Plebeian Ædiles. C. Aquilius Florus.
 Cn. Ogulnius Gallus.
Tribunes of the People. Cn. Aulus Calatinus.
 M. Lætorius Plancianus.
 L. Apustius Fullo.
 L. Fescennius Nepos.
 M. Acutius Nepos.
 Q. Sellius Nepos.
 Q. Cæditius Nepos.
 Sp. Antius Restio.
 C. Sallonius Sarra.
 C. Pontificius Nepos.
Quæstors of Rome. Q. Servilius Geminus.
 M. Livius Drusus.

Military Quæstors. C. Flaminius Nepos.
 L. Junius Pullus.
Provincial Quæstors. L. Opimius Pansa.
 A. Trebonius Asper.
 Q. Sallonius Sarra.
 Sex. Pompilius Nepos.

491. Y. of R.

190. Consulship. L. POSTHUMIUS MEGELLUS.

Prætor. Q. MAMILIUS VITULUS.
 CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO ASINA.

Curule Ædiles. M. Junius Brutus.
 C. Oppius Cornicen.
Plebeian Ædiles. A. Atilius Calatinus.
 Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
Tribunes of the People. Ti. Sempronius Blæsius.
 Q. Titinius Nepos.
 L. Sextilius Rufus.
 Q. Hortensius Nepos.
 A. Virginius Nepos.
 Ser. Fulvius Petinus Nobilior.
 M. Antonius Nepos.
 C. Cæditius Noctua.
 L. Memmius Nepos.
 T. Æbutius Carus.

Quæstors of Rome. Cn. Servilius Capius.
 P. Servilius Geminus.
Military Quæstors. M. Sergius Fidenus.
 L. Sicinius Dentatus.
Provincial Quæstors. Cn. Apronius Nepos.
 C. Nautius Rutilus.
 Sex. Titius Nepos.
 C. Julius Iulus.

492. Y. of R.

191. Consulship. L. VALERIUS FLACCUS.
 T. OTACILIUS CRASSUS.

Prætor. CN. MINUCIUS FESSUS.
Curule Ædiles. L. Manlius Vulso.
 A. Manlius Vulso Longus.
Plebeian Ædiles. C. Atilius Regulus.
 M. Popilius Lænas.
Tribunes of the People. C. Aquilius Florus.
 C. Sempronius Blæsius.
 L. Lætorius Mergus.
 A. Ogulnius Gallus.
 L. Acilius Gabrio.
 C. Canuleius Nepos.
 L. Aurelius Cotta.
 Q. Marcius Philippus.
 Ti. Claudius Cicero.
 M. Pupius Nepos.

Quæstors

Quæstors of Rome. Q. Fabius Maximus Gurgæ.
L. Minucius Thermus.
 Military Quæstors. C. Fabricius Lucinus.
C. Livius Drusus.
 Provincial Quæstors. C. Furius Pacilus.
C. Sempronius Atratinus.
Sp. Veturius Crassus.
C. Ælius Pætus.

493. Y. of R.

192. Consulship. CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO ASINA.

C. DUILIUS. He was the first who obtained the Honour of a Naval Triumph, for having destroyed the Carthaginian Fleet.

Prætor. C. SULPICIUS PATERCULUS.

Curule Ædiles. Ti. Sempronius Blæsus.

Q. Cædicius Nepos.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. Apustius Fullo.
M. Lætorius Plancianus.

Tribunes of the People. M. Atilius Calatinus.
C. Aurelius Cotta.
C. Flavius Nepos.
C. Plautius Hypsæus.
P. Apuleius Saturninus.
L. Tullius Nepos.
C. Claudius Canina.
M' Marcius Nepos.
L. Allienius Nepos.
L. Trebonius Flavius.

Quæstors of Rome. C. Claudius Pulcher.
Cn. Bæbius Tampilus.

Military Quæstors. C. Popillius Lænas.
Q. Petillius Nepos.

Provincial Quæstors. P. Cornelius Rufinus.
P. Plautius Hypsæus.
C. Fulcinius Trio.
L. Veturius Philo.

494. Y. of R.

193. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS SCIPIO.

He triumphs over the Carthaginians, Sardinians, and Corsicans.

C. AQUILIUS FLORUS.

Prætor. C. ATILIUS REGULUS SER-RANUS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Æmilius Paulus.

Sp. Furius Philus.

Plebeian Ædiles. T. Æbutius Carus.
Ser. Fulvius Patinus Nobiliar.

VOL. II.

Tribunes of the People. C. Marcius Censorinus.
M. Claudius Marcellus.
L. Hortensius Nepos.
Q. Sallonius Sarra.
M. Acutius Nepos.
L. Cæcilius Metellus.
P. Ælius Pætus.
Sp. Antius Restio.
C. Lucerius Nepos.
P. Minucius Rufus.

Quæstors of Rome. A. Manlius Torquatus Atticus.
Ser. Cornelius Rufinus.

Military Quæstors. C. Cornelius Scapula.
L. Numitorius Pullus.

Provincial Quæstors. C. Antius Restio.
L. Roscius Nepos.
L. Atilius Bulbus.
P. Cornelius Dolabella.

495. Y. of R.

194. Consulship. A. ATILIUS CALATINUS.

C. SULPICIUS PATERCULUS. He triumphs over the Carthaginians and Sardinians.

Censors.

C. Duilius Nepos.
Appius Claudius Caudex.

The thirty-sixth Lustrum.

Prætor. L. MANLIUS VULSO LONGUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Aurelius Cotta.

L. Lætorius Mergus.

Plebeian Ædiles. A. Ogulnius Gallus.
C. Sempronius Blæsus.

Tribunes of the People. Q. Cædicius Nepos.
A. Trebonius Asper.
Sex. Pompilius Nepos.
M. Livius Drusus.
L. Sextius Calvinus.
L. Junius Pullus.
P. Silius Nepos.
Q. Titinius Nepos.
C. Flaminius Nepos.
C. Genucius Clepsina.

Quæstors of Rome. N. Fabius Buteo.
C. Atilius Bulbus.

Military Quæstors. L. Flaminius Nepos.
T. Antonius Merenda.

Provincial Quæstors. P. Pompilius Nepos.
Q. Antonius Merenda.
L. Volumnus Flamma Violens.
Q. Fundanius Fundulus.

4 K

Pro-Consul.

Pro-Consul. C. Aquilius Florus. He triumphs over the Carthaginians.

Pro-Quæstor. L. Roscius Nepos.

496. Y. of R.

195. Consulship. C. ATILIUS REGULUS SERRANUS. He triumphs over the Carthaginians, whom he had beaten at Sea.
CN. CORNELIUS BLASIO.

Dictator. Q. OGULNIUS GALLUS.

G. of the Horse. M. Lætorius Plancianus.

Prætor. SER. FULVIUS PÆTINUS NOBILIOR.

Curule Ædiles. Cn. Servilius Capio.
P. Servilius Geminus.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Aurelius Cotta.
C. Claudius Canina.

Tribunes of the People. L. Sicinius Dentatus.
L. Cominius Nepos.

P. Curatius Nepos.

P. Virginus Nepos.

Q. Mælius Capitolinus.

Cn. Apronius Dentatus.

M. Cædicius Nepos.

C. Mænius Nepos.

L. Papirius Turdus.

T. Æbutius Carus.

Quæstors of Rome. T. Geganius Macerinus.
C. Cominius Nepos.

Military Quæstors. Sp. Nautius Rutilus.
M. Æmilius Lepidus.

Provincial Quæstors. C. Sulpicius Longus.
L. Æmilius Barbula.
P. Sulpicius Saverrio.
P. Furius Aculeo.

Pro-Consul. A. Atilius Calatinus. He triumphs over the Carthaginians.

497. Y. of R.

169. Consulship. A. MANLIUS VULSO LONGUS. He triumphs over the Carthaginians, whom he had beaten at Sea.

Q. CÆDICIVS, who died in his Office; and in his room

T. ATILIUS REGULUS was chosen Consul a second time.

Prætor. M. LÆTORIUS PLANCIANUS.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Fabius Maximus Gurgæ.
Sp. Veturius Crassus.

Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Marcius Censorinus.
M. Claudius Marcellus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Minucius Thermus.
T. Numicius Nepos.

Q. Romuleius Nepos.

L. Hortensius Nepos.

L. Aurelius Cotta.

C. Claudius Cicero.

L. Canuleius Nepos.

M. Oppius Cornicen.

P. Ælius Pætus.

C. Fabricius Luscinus.

Quæstors of Rome. C. Fabius Dorso Læcinus.
C. Fundanius Fundulus.

Military Quæstors. M. Veturius Crassus.
M. Canuleius Nepos.

Provincial Quæstors. Cn. Quinctilius Varus.
P. Decius Mus.

L. Domitius Ænobarbus.

M. Licinius Calvus.

498. Y. of R.

197. Consulship. SER. FULVIUS PÆTINUS NOBILIOR.

M. ÆMILIUS PAULUS.

Prætor. T. SEMPRONIUS BLÆSUS.

Curule Ædiles. C. Furius Pacilus.
P. Claudius Pulcher.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. Junius Pullus.
L. Cæcilius Metellus.

Tribunes of the People. C. Aurelius Cotta.
C. Claudius Hortator.

Cn. Bæbius Tamphilus.

P. Plautius Hypsæus.

M. Antistius Nepos.

C. Rabuleius Nepos.

Ti. Coruncanius Nepos.

P. Popilius Lænas.

Q. Petillius Nepos.

C. Fulcinius Trio.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Fabius Licinus.
M. Cornelius Cethegus.

Military Quæstors. Cn. Cornelius Dolabella.
P. Quinctilius Varus.

Provincial Quæstors. P. Mucius Scævola.

L. Papirius Mafæ.

Q. Æmilius Barbula.

L. Livius Denter.

Pro-Consul. M. Atilius Regulus.

Pro-Quæstor. M. Canuleius Nepos.

499. Y. of R.

198. Consulship. CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO ASINA, a second time.

A. ATI-

A. ATILIUS CALATINUS,
a second time.

Prætor. P. SERVILIUS GEMINUS.

Curule Ædiles. A. Manlius Torquatus.
C. Cornelius Dolabella.

Plebeian Æ- L. Papirius Turanus. diles. P. Mænius Nepos.

Tribunes of the C. Marcius Censorinus.
People. C. Flaminius Nepos.
C. Atilius Bulbus.
C. Antius Restio.
M. Tullius Nepos.
L. Marcius Philippus.
L. Numitorius Pullus.
L. Roscius Nepos.
L. Antistius Nepos.
M. Albinus Nepos.

Quæstors of M. Fabius Buteo.
Rome. M. Calpurnius Flamma.

Military Quæ- C. Sulpicius Gallus. stors. C. Lutatius Catulus.

Provincial M. Sempronius Tuditanus.
Quæstors. Sp. Papirius Cursor.
L. Papirius Cursor.
C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.

Præ-consuls. Ser. Fulvius Pætinus Nobilior. He triumphs over the Corcyræans and Carthaginians, whom he had beaten at Sea.

M. Æmilius Paulus. He triumphs over the same Nations.

500. Y. of R.
199. Consulship. CN. SERVILIUS CÆPIO.
C. SEMPRONIUS BLÆSUS.
He triumphs over the Carthaginians.

Censors. D. Junius Pera.
L. Posthumius Megellus. He died in his Office, and after his death his Collegue abdicated according to custom.

Prætor. L. POSTHUMIUS MEGELLUS, who was Censor at the same time.

Curule Ædiles. N. Fabius Buteo.
T. Antonius Merenda.

Plebeian Æ- C. Fabricius Luscinus. diles. L. Minucius Thermus.

Tribunes of the L. Cæcilius Metellus.
People. C. Atilius Bulbus.
L. Flaminius Nepos.

C. Pompilius Nepos.
L. Genucius Aventinenſis.
L. Mænius Nepos.
Q. Fundanius Fundulus.
L. Volumnius Flamma Violens.
L. Cædicius Nepos.
A. Virginius Nepos.
T. Sempronius Gracchus.
Q. Lutatius Cerco.
P. Valerius Lævinus.
Ser. Sulpicius Longus.
L. Sextius Lateranus.
L. Geganius Macerius.
Sex. Julius Cæsar.
A. Virginius Rutilus.

Quæstors of Cn. Cornelius Scipio Afina.
Rome. He triumphs over the Carthaginians.

Military Quæ- Sp. Papirius Cursor.
stors. 501. Y. of R.

Provincial 200. Consulship. C. AURELIUS COTTA.
Quæstors. He triumphs over the Carthaginians and Sicilians.

Præ-consul. P. SERVILIUS GEMINUS.
M. Valerius Maximus Messalla.
P. Sempronius Sophus.

The thirty-seventh Lustrum.

Prætor. P. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.

Curule Ædiles. L. Æmilius Barbula.
M. Æmilius Lepidus.

Plebeian Æ- Cn. Bæbius Tampilus. diles. P. Popilius Lænas.

Tribunes of the L. Junius Pullus.
People. L. Cominius Nepos.
C. Fulcinius Trio.
L. Numitorius Pullus.
C. Antius Restio.
P. Furius Aculeo.
M. Albinus Nepos.
M. Trebius Gallus.
L. Roscius Nepos.
L. Mæcilius Tullus.

Quæstors of M. Sempronius Tuditanus.
Rome. L. Genucius Clepsina.

Military Quæ- Ser. Sulpicius Saverrio. stors. L. Æmilius Lepidus.

Provincial Q. Mamilius Turinus.
Quæstors. L. Quinctius Flaminius.
C. Valerius Potitus Placens.
L. Albinus Nepos.

502. Y. of R.

201. Consulship. L. CÆCILIUS METELLUS.
C. FURIUS PACILUS.A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS ATTICUS.

Curule Ædiles. R. Atilius Bulbus.

C. Flaminius Nepos.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Tullius Nepos.

L. Marcianus Philippus.

Tribunes of the People. C. Fundanius Fundulus.
M. Licinius Calvus.

L. Domitius Ænobarbus.

Q. Silius Nerva.

C. Titinius Nepos.

M. Canuleius Nepos.

P. Decius Mus.

M. Metilius Nepos.

C. Pompilius Nepos.

Q. Fundanius Fundulus.

Quæstors of Rome. A. Posthumius Albinus.

C. Claudius Centho.

Military Quæstors. P. Licinius Crassus.

A. Hostilius Mancinus.

Provincial Quæstors. Q. Petillius Spurius.

C. Cornucanius Nepos.

L. Cornucanius Nepos.

Sp. Furius Camillus.

503. Y. of R.

202. Consulship. C. ATILIUS REGULUS, a second time.L. MANLIUS VULSO, a second time.

Prætor. N. FABIVS BUTEO.

Curule Ædiles. M. Fabius Licinus.

M. Cornelius Cethegus.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Atilius Bulbus.

L. Genucius Aventinensis.

Tribunes of the People. P. Mucius Scævola.

L. Sextius Lateranus.

L. Mænius Nepos.

Ti. Minucius Augurinus.

M. Decius Mus.

L. Livius Denter.

L. Cædicius Nepos.

A. Virginius Nepos.

C. Licinius Stolo.

Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

Quæstors of Rome. Q. Valerius Falto.

C. Mamilius Turinus.

Military Quæstors. C. Quinctius Claudus.

Sp. Furius Purpureus.

Provincial

Quæstors.

C. Licinius Varus.

M. Æmilius Numida.

C. Fostius Flaccinator.

Q. Mucius Scævola.

Pro-Consul.

L. Cæcilius Metellus. He triumphs over the Carthaginians.

Pro-Quæstor.

Q. Petillius Spurius.

504. Y. of R.

203. Consulship. P. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.
L. JUNIUS PULLUS.

Dictator.

M. CLAUDIUS GLICIA.

He was forced to abdicate,
andA. ATILIUS CALATI-
NUS chosen in his room.

G. of the Horse.

L. Cæcilius Metellus.

Prætor.

C. FURIUS PACILUS.

Curule Ædiles.

M. Fabius Buteo.

C. Sulpicius Gallus.

Plebeian Ædiles.

P. Furius Tullus.

L. Mæcilius Trullus.

Tribunes of the People.

C. Fundanius Fundulus.

M. Sempronius Tuditanus.

M. Calpurnius Flamma.

Sp. Icilius Ruga.

C. Sempronius Tuditanus.

C. Lutatius Catulus.

C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.

L. Domitius Ænobarbus.

M. Tullius Nepos.

Papius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome.

Ti. Claudius Nero.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

Military Quæstors.

Q. Ogulnius Gallus.

P. Sempronius Sophus.

Provincial

Quæstors.

Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.

C. Atilius Longus.

Ser. Cornelius Merenda.

L. Quinctius Claudus.

Pro-Consul.

L. Manlius Vulso.

Pro-Quæstor.

Sp. Furius Purpureus.

505. Y. of R.

204. Consulship. C. AURELIUS COTTA.
P. SERVILIUS GEMINUS.

Both a second time.

Prætor.

M. FABIVS LICINUS.

Curule Ædiles.

Q. Fundanius Fundulus.

P. Decius Mus.

Plebeian Æ- M. Licinius Calvus. diles. Q. Silius Nerva.
Tribunes of the Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
People. L. Sextius Lateranus.
P. Publilius Philo.
C. Scantius Nepos.
C. Pompilius Nepos.
Q. Lutatius Cerco.
Q. Anicius Prænestinus.
Q. Apuleius Pansa.
Q. Plætorius Nepos.
Q. Mamilius Nepos.
Quæstors of L. Publicius Malleolus.
Rome. P. Valerius Falto.
Military Quæ- Sp. Carvilius Maximus. stors. L. Marcius Rutilus.
Provincial C. Lutatius Catulus.
Quæstors. M. Valerius Potitus.
T. Popillius Sabellus.
P. Clælius Siculus.
506. Y. of R.
205. Consulship. L. CÆCILIVS METELLVS,
a second time.
M. FABIVS BUTEO.
Censors. A. Atilius Calatinus.
A. Manlius Torquatus Atticus.

The thirty-eighth Lustrum.

Prætor. C. Atilius Bulbus.
Curule Ædiles. P. Mutius Scævola.
L. Livius Denter.
Plebeian Æ- C. Lutatius Catulus. diles. C. Licinius Stolo.
Tribunes of the M. Sempronius Tuditanus.
People. Q. Mamilius Turinus.
C. Titinius Nepos.
L. Genucius Clepsina.
N. Sextius Lateranus.
M. Anicius Gallus.
C. Sicinius Nepos.
M. Titius Rufus.
L. Albinus Nepos.
L. Genucius Aventinensis.
Quæstors of M. Publicius Malleolus.
Rome. L. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus.
Military Quæ- T. Villius Tappulus. stors. T. Clælius Siculus.
Provincial M. Claudius Glicia.
Quæstors. C. Papirius Maf.

L. Mamilius Vitulus.
Q. Sextius Capitolinus.
Pro-Consul. C. Aurelius Cotta.
Pro-Quæstor. Sp. Carvilius Maximus.
507. Y. of R.
206. Consulship. M. OTACILIUS CRASSVS,
a second time.
M. FABIVS LICINVS.

Dictator. TI. CORUNCANIUS NEPOS.

G. of the Horse. M. Fulvius Flaccus.
Prætor. C. Sulpicius Gallus.
Curule Ædiles. A. Posthumius Albinus.
C. Claudius Centho.
Plebeian Æ- C. Fundanius Fundulus.
diles. Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
Tribunes of the Q. Petillius Spurius.
People. M. Fulvius Flaccus.
M. Genucius Aventinensis.
C. Cornelius Nepos.
L. Coruncanius Nepos.
L. Trebius Nepos.
P. Licinius Crassus.
Ti. Minucius Augurinus.
M. Decius Mus.
K. Duitius Nepos.
Quæstors of Cn. Servilius Cæpio.
Rome. C. Calpurnius Piso.
Military Quæ- M. Genucius Cippus. stors. P. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus.
Provincial C. Fabius Pictor.
Quæstors. A. Posthumius Albinus.
Cn. Furius Brochus.
Ser. Sulpicius Galba.

508. Y. of R.
207. Consulship. M. FABIVS BUTEO.
C. Atilius Bulbus.

Prætor. L. Aurelius Cotta.
Curule Ædiles. Q. Valerius Falto.
M. Æmilius Nævius.

Plebeian Æ- Q. Lutatius Cerco. diles. P. Publilius Philo.

Tribunes of the C. Mamilius Turinus.
People. Cn. Pupius Nepos.
C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
Q. Anicius Prænestinus.
Cn. Apuleius Pansa.
C. Licinius Crassus.
M. Fulvius Pætinus.

C. Atinius

C. Atinius Labeo.
 M. Anicius Gallus.
 Q. Pætelius Libo Vitellus.
 Quæstors of Rome. D. Junius Pera.
 L. Veturius Philo.
 Military Quæstors. L. Furius Bibaculus.
 M. Pomponius Matron.
 Provincial Quæstors. Q. Sulpicius Rufus.
 Cn. Pomponius Rutilus.
 Q. Sulpicius Camerinus.
 M. Livius Denther.
 509. Y. of R.
 208. Consulship. A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS ATTICUS.
 C. SEMPRONIUS BLÆSUS, a second time.
 Prætor. C. LUTATIUS CATULUS.
 Curule-Ediles. M. Sempronius Tuditanus.
 C. Cornelius Nepos.
 Plebeian Ædiles. L. Cornucanius Nepos.
 Q. Petillius Spurius.
 Tribunes of the People. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
 P. Sempronius Sophus.
 C. Atinius Longus.
 Q. Plætorius Nepos.
 P. Silius Nerva.
 Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
 Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
 Q. Condidius Nepos.
 L. Trebius Nepos.
 M. Silius Nerva.
 Quæstors of Rome. L. Posthumius Albinus.
 T. Manlius Torquatus.
 Military Quæstors. M. Junius Pera.
 N. Fabius Picter.
 Provincial Quæstors. P. Claudius Nero.
 L. Titinius Nepos.
 T. Virginus Rutilus.
 Cn. Apronius Lino.
 510. Y. of R.
 209. Consulship. C. FUNDANIUS FUNDULUS.
 C. SULPICIUS GALLUS.
 T. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS.
 Prætor. P. Valerius Falto.
 Curule-Ediles. M. Valerius Maximus Petitus.
 Plebeian Ædiles. M. Fulvius Flaccus.
 C. Mamilius Turinus.
 Tribunes of the People. L. Publicius Malleolus.
 Sp. Carvilius Maximus Ruga.

T. Popillius Sabellus.
 T. Veturius Calvinus.
 M. Manilius Nepos.
 L. Titius Rufus.
 Q. Lutatius Catulus.
 L. Marcius Rutilus.
 Q. Sicinius Nepos.
 Q. Manilius Nepos.
 Quæstors of Rome. M. Æmilius Lepidus.
 M. Pomponius Matron.
 Military Quæstors. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.
 Ap. Claudius Crassus.
 Provincial Quæstors. L. Anicius Gallus.
 L. Patirius Crassus.
 Q. Papirius Turdus.
 Q. Servilius Abala.
 511. Y. of R.
 210. Consulship. C. LUTATIUS CATULUS.
 A. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.
 Prætors. M. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS.
 Q. VALERIUS FALTO.
 The Establishment of a second Prætorship.
 Curule-Ediles. L. Cornelius Lentulus.
 C. Papirius Mæso.
 Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
 C. Licinius Varus.
 Tribunes of the People. M. Publicius Malleolus.
 L. Mamilius Vitulus.
 Q. Aulius Cerretanus.
 L. Pomponius Nepos.
 Cn. Flavius Nepos.
 Ti. Villius Tapulus.
 Sex. Curatius Nepos.
 L. Ælius Pætus.
 Q. Fulvius Pætinus.
 M. Claudius Glicia.
 Quæstors of Rome. Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus.
 C. Valerius Lævinus.
 Military Quæstors. Cn. Cornelius Blasio.
 C. Minucius Rufus.
 Provincial Quæstors. M. Minucius Fessus.
 M. Otacilius Crassus.
 M. Juventius Thalna.
 P. Cornelius Cethegus.
 512. Y. of R.
 211. Consulship. A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS ATTICUS, a second time. He triumphs over the Falisci.
 Q. LUTATIUS

Q. LUTATIUS CERCO.
He triumphs over the Falisci.
Censors. C. Aurelius Cotta.
M. Fabius Buteo.

The thirty-ninth Lustrum.

Prætors. C. MAMILIUS TURINUS.
P. VALERIUS FALTO.
Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Lentulus Caulinus.
C. Fabius Pictor.
Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
C. Sempronius Sophus.
Tribunes of the People. M. Genucius Cipus.
Cn. Furius Brochus.
M. Fulvius Flaccus.
C. Atilius Regulus.
C. Calpurnius Piso.
C. Plautius Proculus.
M. Flavius Nepos.
Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
C. Atinius Longus.
M. Marcius Racca.
Quæstors of Rome. Cn. Minucius Fessus.
C. Minucius Augurinus.
Military Quæstors. C. Aquilius Florus.
C. Otacilius Crassus.
Provincial Quæstors. Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
P. Sulpicius Rufus.
M. Atilius Regulus.
L. Cornelius Blasio.
Pro-Consul in Sicily. C. Lutatius Catulus. He triumphs over the Carthaginians, who were beaten at Sea.
Pro-Prætor. Q. VALERIUS FALTO. He triumphs over the Carthaginians, who were beaten at Sea.
Pro-Quæstors. Cn. Cornelius Blasio.
C. Minucius Rufus.

513. Y. of R.

212. Consulship. C. CLAUDIUS CENTHO.
M. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANIUS.
Prætors. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS POTITUS.
A. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.
Curule Ædiles. Q. Sulpicius Rufus.
L. Furius Bibaculus.
Dramatic pieces, composed by Livius Andronicus, now first acted at Rome.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. Publicius Malleolus.
M. Publicius Malleolus.
Tribunes of the People. M. Pomponius Matho.
Cn. Pomponius Rufus.
Q. Poetelius Libo Visolus.
C. Confidius Nepos.
Sex. Stadius Nepos.
D. Junius Pera.
M. Livius Denter.
M. Allienius Nepos.
C. Plætorius Nepos.
M. Claudius Glicia.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Æmilius Barbula.
Cn. Otacilius Nepos.
Military Quæstors. C. Duilius Nepos.
M. Mamilius Vitulus.
Provincial Quæstors. L. Apustius Fullo.
M. Papirius Crassus.
T. Quinctius Capitolinus.
L. Acilius Glabrio.

Pro-Consul in Sicily. Q. Lutatius Cerco.

Pro-Quæstor. Cn. Cornelius Blasio.

514. Y. of R.

213. Consulship. C. MAMILIUS TURINUS.
Q. VALERIUS FALTO.
Prætors. L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS CAUDINUS.
C. LICINIUS VARUS.
Curule Ædiles. L. Posthumius Albinus.
T. Manlius Torquatus.
Plebeian Ædiles. Sp. Carvilius Maximus Ruga.
Q. Aulius Cerretanus.
Tribunes of the People. M. Junius Pera.
C. Arennius Nepos.
L. Mamilius Vitulus.
Sextius Curatius Nepos.
Ti. Veturius Calvinus.
C. Numitorius Nepos.
C. Volscius Fictor.
L. Titinius Nepos.
L. Papirius Turdus.
Cn. Apronius Limo.
Quæstors of Rome. Q. Fabius Verrucosus.
C. Atilius Regulus.
Military Quæstors. L. Posthumius Megellus.
Q. Fabius Ambustus.
Provincial Quæstors. P. Numitorius Nepos.
A. Posthumius Albinus.
C. Salloni Sarra.
Ser. Sulpicius Paterculus.

Pro-Consul.

Pro-Consul in Sicily. Q. Lutatius Cerco.

515. Y. of R.

214. Consulship. T. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS.

P. VALERIUS FALTO.

Prætors. C. FABIUS PICTOR.

M. GENUCIUS CIPUS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Æmilius Lepidus.

Sp. Claudius Crassus.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Pomponius Matro.

C. Atilius Regulus.

Tribunes of the People. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

L. Anicius Gallus.

M. Aquilius Florus.

M. Aulus Cerretanus.

M. Curius Dentatus.

M. Pomponius Matho.

Q. Papirius Turdus.

L. Carvilius Maximus.

C. Ælius Pætus.

M. Claudius Glicia.

Quæstors of Rome. C. Servilius Nepos.

L. Cornelius Cethegus.

Military Quæstors. M. Lætorius Plancianus.

T. Quinctius Flaminius.

Provincial Quæstors. Q. Cassius Longinus.

Cn. Quinctius Capitolinus.

M. Pinarius Natta.

P. Melius Capitolinus.

Pro-Consul. Q. Valerius Falto.

Pro-Quæstor. C. Atilius Regulus.

516. Y. of R.

215. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS CAUDINUS. He triumphs over the Ligures.

Q. FULVIUS FLACCUS.

Prætors. L. PUBLICIUS MALLEOLUS.

L. FURIUS BIBACULUS.

Curule Ædiles. Cn. Cornelius Blasio.

Q. Fabius Verrucosus.

Plebeian Ædiles. D. Junius Pera.

Cn. Pomponius Rufus.

Tribunes of the People. C. Minucius Rufus.

M. Juventius Thalna.

Q. Pomponius Nepos.

C. Sempronius Longus.

M. Marcius Ralla.

M. Minucius Fessius.

M. Otacilius Crassus.

D. Junius Brutus.

C. Calpurnius Piso.

M. Allicenius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. A. Atilius Calatinus.

C. Flaminius Nepos.

Military Quæstors. P. Valerius Flaccus.

Sp. Furius Philas.

Provincial Quæstors. C. Lælius Nepos.

M. Claudius Marcellus.

A. Manlius Julius Longus.

L. Manlius Torquatus.

Pro-Consul in Sicily. Q. Valerius Falto.

Pro-Quæstor. C. Atilius Regulus.

517. Y. of R.

216. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS CAUDINUS.

C. LICINIUS VARUS.

The Secular Games celebrated a third time under the direction of M. Æmilius, and

M. LIVIUS SALINATOR.

Censors. L. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus.

Q. Lutatius Cerco. The latter died before his office expired.

Prætors. L. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.

SP. CARVILIUS MAXIMUS

RUGA.

Curule Ædiles. L. Papirius Turdus.

M. Junius Pera.

Plebeian Ædiles. Ti. Veturius Calvinus.

Cn. Apronius Lino.

Tribunes of the People. M. Atilius Regulus.

C. Minucius Augurinus.

Q. Ogulnius Gallus.

C. Æbutius Carus.

L. Statius Nepos.

Cn. Minucius Fessius.

C. Otacilius Crassus.

C. Aquilius Florus.

L. Plætorius Nepos.

C. Metilius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Valerius Messalla.

Q. Æmilius Papus.

Military Quæstors. M. Junius Brutus.

L. Junius Brutus.

Provincial Quæstors. Ser. Fulvius Pætinus Nobilior.

L. Cornelius Scipio.

P. Pinarius Natta.

C. Apustius Fullo.

Pro-Consul.

Pro-Consul. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
Pro-Quæstor. Sp. Furius Philus.
 518. Y. of R.
 217. Consulship. T. MANLIUS TORQUA-
 TUS. He triumphs over the Sardinians.
 C. ATILIUS BULBUS.
Prætors. M' POMPONIUS MATHO.
 M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS.
Curule Ædiles. M. Æmilius Barbula.
 M. Papirius Crassus.
Plebeian Æ- Cn. Fulvius Centumalus. diles. M. Pomponius Matho.
Tribunes of the L. Apustius Fullo.
People. C. Manilius Nepos.
 Q. Cædicius Noctua.
 L. Memmius Nepos.
 L. Acilius Glabrio.
 M. Pontificius Nepos.
 C. Antonius Nepos.
 C. Cædicius Noctua.
 Cn. Octavius Nepos.
 C. Duilius Nepos.
Quæstors of M. Valerius Flaccus.
Rome. M. Fulvius Nobilior.
Military Quæ- C. Servilius Capio. stors. M. Horatius Pulvillus.
Provincial L. Manilius Nepos.
Quæstors. M. Antonius Nepos.
 Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina.
 M. Minucius Rufus.
Pro-Consul in Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
Sicily.
Pro-Quæstor. Sp. Furius Philus.
 519. Y. of R.
 218. Consulship. L. POSTHUMIUS ALBI-
 NUS.
 SP. CARVILIUS MAXI-
 MUS. He triumphs over the Sardinians.
Censors. C. Atilius Bulbus.
 A. Posthumius Albinus.

The fortieth Lustrum.

Prætors. M. PUBLICIUS MALLEOLUS.
 P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS
 CAUDINUS.
Curule Ædiles. L. Posthumius Megellus.
 A. Posthumius Albinus.

VOL. II.

2

Theatrical Pieces of Cn. Nævius.

Plebeian Æ- M' Juventius Thalna. diles. M' Otacilius Crassus.
Tribunes of the C. Atilius Regulus.
People. P. Numitorius Nepos.
 Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.
 M. Terentius Nepos.
 C. Oppius Cornicinus.
 M. Manlius Vitulus.
 C. Sallonius Sarra.
 Q. Minucius Thermus.
 T. Juventius Thalna.
 Cn. Ogulnius Gallus.
Quæstors of C. Scantinius Capitolinus.
Rome. L. Æmilius Papus.
Military Quæ- M. Æmilius Paulus. stors. M. Livius Salinator.
Provincial C. Centenius Penula.
Quæstors. D. Lætorius Mergus.
 L. Sergius Fidenas.
 L. Flaminius Cilo.
Pro-Consul. M. Æmilius Lepidus.
Pro-Quæstor. M. Minucius Rufus.
 520. Y. of R.
 219. Consulship. Q. FABIUS MAX. VERRU-COSUS. He triumphs over the Ligures.
 M' POMPONIUS MATHO.
 He triumphs over the Sardi-nians.
Prætors. C. PAPIRIUS MASO.
 M. JUNIUS PERA.
Curule Ædiles. C. Otacilius Crassus.
 Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
Plebeian Æ- C. Aquilius Florus.
diles. M. Atilius Regulus.
Tribunes of the T. Æbutius Carus.
People. C. Æbutius Carus.
 M. Lætorius Plancianus.
 P. Mælius Capitolinus.
 Cn. Minucius Fessus.
 L. Hortensius Nepos.
 C. Servilius Nepos.
 Q. Cassius Longinus.
 C. Aquilius Florus.
 Cn. Octavius Nepos.
Quæstors of C. Sulpicius Patertulus.
Rome. M. Claudius Marcellus.
Military Quæ- P. Furius Philus. stors. Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus.

4 L

Provincial

| | | | | |
|------------------|-------------------------------|------------------|----|--------------------------------|
| Provincial | Q. Ælius Pætus. | Plebeian | Æ- | C. Atilius Regulus. |
| Quæstors. | Ti. Sempronius Longus. | diles. | | Cn. Ogulnius Galus. |
| | C. Acilius Glabrio. | Tribunes of the | | C. Apustius Fullo. |
| | Q. Bæbius Tampillus. | People. | | M. Junius Brutus. |
| Pro-Consul. | A. Posthumius Albinus. | | | Ti. Claudius Canina. |
| Pro-Quæstor. | C. Centenius Penula. | | | C. Fabricius Luscinus. |
| 521. Y. of R. | | | | C. Flavius Nepos. |
| 220. Consulship. | M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS. | | | Ser. Fulvius Pætinus Nobilior. |
| | M. POBLICIUS MALLEOLUS. | | | L. Junius Brutus. |
| Prætors. | M. ÆMILIUS BARBULA. | | | C. Claudius Asellus. |
| | Cn. Fulvius Centumalus. | | | L. Tullius Nepos. |
| Curule-Ediles. | P. Valerius Flaccus. | Quæstors of | | P. Popillius Lænas. |
| | Sp. Furius Philus. | Rome. | | T. Annius Læscus. |
| Plæbeian | L. Apustius Fullo. | Military Quæ- | | L. Manius Vulso. |
| diles. | Q. Cæcilius Nectus. | stors. | | L. Cæcilius Metellus. |
| Tribunes of the | C. Flaminius Nepos. | Provincial | | C. Nautius Rutilus. |
| People. | C. Carvilius Maximus. | Quæstors. | | L. Junius Pullus. |
| | M. Atilius Calatinus. | | | M. Licinius Drusus. |
| | M. Claudius Marcellus. | | | C. Sergius Fidenus. |
| | C. Minucius Augurinus. | | | L. Valerius Messalla. |
| | P. Ælius Pætus. | Pro-Consul in | | Sp. Furius Philus. |
| | C. Lælius Nepos. | Sicily. | | |
| | M. Cæcilius Metellus. | Pro-Quæstor. | | P. Cornelius Scipio Asina. |
| | Q. Aulius Cerretanus. | 523. Y. of R. | | |
| | C. Claudius Canina. | 222. Consulship. | | M. ÆMILIUS BARBULA. |
| Quæstors of | C. Lutatius Catulus. | | | M. JUNIUS PERA. |
| Rome. | C. Cornelius Scipio Asina. | Censors. | | Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus. |
| Military Quæ- | Ser. Pomponius Nepos. | | | M. Sempronius Tuditanus. |
| stors. | L. Quinctius Flaminius. | | | |
| Provincial | T. Otacilius Crassus. | | | |
| Quæstors. | L. Aurelius Cotta. | | | |
| | C. Aurelius Cotta. | | | |
| | L. Furius Philus. | | | |
| Pro-Consul in | M. Junius Pera. | | | |
| Sicily. | | | | |
| Pro-Quæstor. | Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus. | | | |
| 522. Y. of R. | | | | |
| 221. Consulship. | M. POMPONIUS MATHO. | | | |
| | C. PAPIRIUS MASO. He | | | |
| | triumphs over the Corsicans, | | | |
| | on the hill of Alba. | | | |
| Dictator. | C. DUILIUS. | | | |
| G. of the Horse. | C. Aurelius Cotta. | | | |
| Censors. | L. Manlius Torquatus. | | | |
| | Quintus Fulvius Flaccus. | | | |
| | Their election was defective, | | | |
| | and they abdicated. | | | |
| Prætors. | L. POSTHUMIUS MEGELLUS. | | | |
| | M' OTACILIUS CRASSUS. | | | |
| Curule-Ediles. | M. Valerius Messalla. | | | |
| | Q. Æmilius Papus. | | | |

| | |
|------------------|-------------------------------|
| Quæstors of | T. Annius Læscus. |
| Rome. | L. Manius Vulso. |
| Military Quæ- | L. Cæcilius Metellus. |
| stors. | C. Nautius Rutilus. |
| Provincial | L. Junius Pullus. |
| Quæstors. | M. Licinius Drusus. |
| | C. Sergius Fidenus. |
| | L. Valerius Messalla. |
| Pro-Consul in | Sp. Furius Philus. |
| Sicily. | |
| Pro-Quæstor. | P. Cornelius Scipio Asina. |
| 523. Y. of R. | |
| 222. Consulship. | M. ÆMILIUS BARBULA. |
| | M. JUNIUS PERA. |
| Censors. | Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus. |
| | M. Sempronius Tuditanus. |
| | |
| | The forty-first Lustrum. |
| Prætors. | M. ATILIUS REGULUS. |
| | M. ATILIUS CRASSUS. |
| Curule-Ediles. | C. Servilius Cæpio. |
| | M. Valerius Flaccus. |
| Plebeian | C. Servilius Nepos. |
| diles. | Q. Cassius Longinus. |
| Tribunes of the | M. Minucius Rufus. |
| People. | L. Manilius Nepos. |
| | A. Atilius Bulbus. |
| | M. Antonius Nepos. |
| | M. Fulvius Nobilior. |
| | M' Marcius Nepos. |
| | C. Marcius Censorinus. |
| | Q. Petillius Nepos. |
| | P. Plautius Hypsæus. |
| | P. Apuleius Saturninus. |
| Quæstors of | Q. Terentius Culeo. |
| Rome. | L. Ælius Pætus Tubero. |
| Military Quæ- | P. Cornelius Scipio. |
| stors. | P. Scantinius Capitolinus. |
| | |
| | Provincial |

Provincial L. Marcus Philippus.
Q. Sulpicius Paternulus.
C. Furius Pacilus.
C. Sulpicius Longus.
Pro-Consul in Sicily. Sp. Furius Philus.
Pro-Consul in Sardinia and Corsica. M. Pomponius Matho.
Pro-Quæstors. L. Manlius Vulso.
T. Annius Luscus.
524. Y. of R.
223. Consulship. L. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS, a second time.
CN. FULVIUS CENTUMALUS.
Prætors. P. VALERIUS FLACCUS.
L. APUSTIUS FULLO.
Curule-Ediles. L. Æmilius Papus.
M. Æmilius Paulus.
Plebeian Ædiles. C. Flaminius Nepos.
T. Æbutius Carus.
Tribunes of the People. C. Scantinius Capitolinus.
C. Centenius Penula.
L. Apuleius Saturninus.
L. Racilius Nepos.
L. Roscius Nepos.
M. Livius Salinator.
L. Lætorius Mergus.
L. Allienius Nepos.
L. Trebonius Flavus.
M. Antius Restio.
Quæstors of Rome. L. Æmilius Paulus.
M. Æmilius Barbula.
Military Quæstors. C. Atilius Serranus.
Cn. Papius Nepos.
Provincial Quæstors. L. Opimius Pansa.
C. Fulcinius Trio.
Cn. Furius Pacilus.
Q. Servilius Geminus.
Pro-Consul in Liguria. M. Æmilius Barbula.
Pro-Consul in Sicily. Sp. Furius Philus.
Pro-Consul in Corsica and Sardinia. M. Pomponius Matho.
Pro-Quæstors. P. Cornelius Scipio.
L. Manlius Vulso.
T. Annius Luscus.

525. Y. of R.
224. Consulship. SP. CARVILIUS MAXIMUS, a second time.
Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS VERUCOSUS, a second time.
Prætors. M. VALERIUS MESSALLA.
C. ATILIUS REGULUS.
Curule-Ediles. P. Furius Philus.
Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus.
Plebeian Ædiles. C. Apustius Fullo.
M. Junius Brutus.
Tribunes of the People. M. Minucius Rufus.
Q. Ælius Pætus.
Q. Bæbius Tamphilus.
C. Acilius Glabrio.
A. Sellijs Nepos.
M. Claudius Marcellus.
Ti. Sempronius Longus.
A. Trebonius Asper.
C. Lucerius Nepos.
C. Scaptius Nepos.
Quæstors of Rome. L. Veturius Philo.
M. Fabius Licinus.
Military Quæstors. P. Claudius Pulcher.
C. Terentius Varro.
Provincial Quæstors. C. Lætrius Mergus.
M. Marcus.
Cn. Fulvius Max. Centumalus.
P. Servilius Geminus.
Pro-Consul in Illyricum. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.
Pro-Consul in Sicily. Sp. Furius Philus.
Pro-Consul in Sardinia and Corsica. M. Pomponius Matho.
Pro-Quæstors. Cn. Papius Nepos.
L. Manlius Vulso.
T. Annius Luscus.
526. Y. of R. ch
225. Consulship. P. VALERIUS FLACCUS.
M. ATILIUS REGULUS.
Prætors. L. ÆMILIUS PAPUS.
C. SERVILIUS NEPOS.
Sicily and Sardinia made a Prætorship.
Prætor in Sicily. C. FLAMINIUS NEPOS.
Prætor in Sardinia. M. VALERIUS FLACCUS.

Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Scipio Asina.
K. Quinctius Flaminius.
Plebeian Ædiles. A. Atilius Bullus.
P. Plautius Hypsæus.
Tribunes of the People. C. Lutatius Catulus.
Sex. Pomponius Nepos.
L. Sextius Calvinus.
C. Aurelius Cotta.
L. Villius Tappulus.
T. Otacilius Crassus.
L. Aurelius Cotta.
M. Volumnius Flamma.
L. Sextilius Nepos.
Q. Titius Nepos.
Quæstors of Rome. M. Valerius Læcinus.
Cn. Servilius Geminus.
Military Quæstors. C. Genucius Clepsina.
C. Fundanius Fundulus.
Provincial Quæstors. C. Volumnius Flamma Vislens.
N. Fabius Buteo.
M. Pomponius Nepos.
T. Antonius Merenda.
Pro-Quæstors. C. Lætorius Mergus.
Cn. Fufius Centumalus.
527. Y. of R.
226. Consulship. M. VALERIUS MESSALLA.
L. APUSTIUS FULLO.
Prætors of Rome. M. ÆMILIUS PAULUS.
M. JUNIUS BRUTUS.
Prætors in Sicily and Sardinia. C. SERVILIUS CÆPIO.
T. ÆBUTIUS CARUS.
Curule Ædiles. M. Claudius Marcellus.
C. Scantinius Capitolinus.
Plebeian Ædiles. M. Minucius Rufus.
L. Lætorius Mergus.
Tribunes of the People. T. Annius Læscus.
Q. Ælius Pætus.
L. Cæcilius Mætellus.
M. Livius Drusus.
M. Cædicius Nepos.
M. Livius Salinator.
Ti. Sempronius Longus.
L. Junius Pullus.
C. Cominius Nepos.
P. Curatius Nepos.
Quæstors of Rome. P. Cornelius Merenda.
M. Æmilius Lepidus.
Military Quæstors. Q. Mucius Scaevola.
C. Fannius Strabo.
Provincial Quæstors. C. Livius Drusus.
L. Petillius Geminus.

T. Geganius Macerinus.
Sp. Nautius Rutilus.
Pro-Quæstors. N. Fabius Buteo.
T. Antonius Merenda.

The war between the Romans and the inhabitants of Gallia Cisalpina.

528. Y. of R.

227. Consulship. L. ÆMILIUS PAPUS. He triumphs over the Gauls.
C. ATILIUS REGULUS.
Censors. C. Claudius Centho.
M. Junius Pera.

The forty-second Lustrum.

Prætors of Rome. P. FURIUS PHILUS.
CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO CALVUS.

Prætors in Sicily and Sardinia. C. APUSTIUS FULLO.
P. PLAUTIUS HYPSEUS.

Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Scipio.
L. Munlius Vulso.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Lutatius Catulus.
Q. Bæbius Tampilus.

Tribunes of the People. Q. Terentius Culeo.
C. Centenius Penula.

L. Marcius Philippus.

C. Mænius Nepos.

P. Furius Aculeo.

L. Ælius Pætus Tubero.

M. Atilius Serranus.

P. Scantinius Capitolinus.

C. Virginus Nepos.

L. Papirius Turdus.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Antistius Nepos.
T. Metilius Croto.

Military Quæstors. L. Apustius Fullo.
L. Genucius Clepsina.

Provincial Quæstors. Ti. Veturius Philo.
Q. Sulpicius Longus.

L. Papirius Cursor.

P. Cornelius Dolabella.

Pro-Quæstors. T. Geganius Macerinus.
Sp. Nautius Rutilus.

529. Y. of R.

228. Consulship. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, a second time.
Q. FULVIUS FLACCUS, a second time.

Dictator.

Dictator. L. CÆCILIVS METELLVS.

G. of the Horse. N. Fabius Buteo.

Prætors of Rome. K. QUINCTIVS FLAMINIVS.
A. ATILIVS BVLBVS.

Prætors in Sicily and Sardinia. M. CLAVDIVS MARCELLVS.
P. CORNELIVS ASINA.

Curule Ædiles. L. Æmilius Paulus.
M. Æmilius Barbula.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Livius Salinator.
Ti. Sempronius Longus.

Tribunes of the People. C. Atilius Serranus.
C. Fulcinius Trio.
Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.
M. Canuleius Nepos.
Cn. Pupius Nepos.

T. Otacilius Crassus.
L. Opimius Pansa.

C. Numicius Nepos.
A. Ogulnius Gallus.

M. Oppius Cornicen.

Quæstors of Rome. A. Cornelius Mammula.
Cn. Cornelius Dolabella.

Military Quæstors. Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
M. Claudius Marcellus.

Provincial Quæstors. M. Æmilius Regillus.
L. Porcius Licinus.

M. Aurelius Cotta.
Ser. Cornelius Rufinus.

Pro-Quæstors. T. Veturius Philo.
P. Cornelius Dolabella.

530. Y. of R.

229. Consulship. C. FLAMINIUS NEPOS. He triumphs over the Gauls.

P. FURIUS PHILVS. He triumphs over the Gauls and Ligures.

Prætors of Rome. M. MINUCIVS RVFVS.
C. LVTATIVS CATVLVS.

Prætors in Sicily and Sardinia. M. FAIVS LICINVS.
P. CLAVDIVS PVLCHER.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Ælius Pætus.
C. Centenius Penula.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Terentius Varro.
T. Annius Luscus.

Tribunes of the People. M. Narcius Sermo.
C. Licinius Varus.

Q. Decius Mus.
T. Coruncanius Nepos.

M. Tullius Nepos.

Cn. Fulvius Max. Centumalus.

L. Aurelius Orestes.

Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.

C. Livius Denter.

L. Flaminius Chilo.

Quæstors of Rome. Q. Claudius Flamininus.
L. Publicius Bibulus.

Military Quæstors. M. Atilius Regulus.
M. Minucius Rufus.

Provincial Quæstors. C. Claudius Centho.
P. Sempronius Gracchus.

L. Papirius Mæso.

M. Fundanius Fundulus.

Pro-Quæstors. Ser. Cornelius Rufinus.
M. Aurelius Cotta.

531. Y. of R.

230. Consulship. CN. CORNELIVS SCIPIO CALVINVS.

M. CLAVDIVS MARCELLVS. He triumphs over the Gauls, Insubres, and Germans.

Prætors of Rome. M. LIVIVS SALINATOR.
M. ÆMILIVS BARBULA.

Prætors in Sicily and Sardinia. Q. BÆBIVS TAMPFILVS.
P. SERVILIVS GEMINVS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Veturius Philo.
M. Valerius Lævinus.

Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Terentius Culeo.
L. Ælius Pætus Tubero.

Tribunes of the People. C. Lætorius Mergus.
M. Pompilius Nepos.

C. Genucius Clepsina.

L. Antistius Nepos.

P. Publicius Philo.

C. Volumnius Flamma Violens.

C. Fundanius Fundulus.

C. Sempronius Gracchus.

M. Anicius Gallus.

C. Popillius Sabellus.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Metilius Nepos.
Vibius Terentius Varro.

Military Quæstors. Ap. Claudius Pulcher.
P. Sempronius Tuditanus.

Provincial Quæstors. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.
C. Calpurnius Piso.

Nævius Priscus.

Ap. Claudius Centho.

Pro-Quæstors. L. Papirius Mæso.
M. Fundanius Fundulus.

532. Y.

532. Y. of R.

231. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO
ASINA. He triumphs over the Istrians.Dictators. M. MINUCIUS RUFUS.
Q. FABIUS MAX. VER-RUCOSUS.
M. ÆMILIUS BARBU-
LA.Generals of the C. Flaminius Nepos.
Hosts. Q. Ælius Pætus.Prætors of L. ÆMILIUS PAULUS.
Rome. TI. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS.Prætors in Sici- C. CENTENIUS PENULA. ly and Sardi- Q. SERVILIUS GEMINUS.
nia.Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Merenda.
M. Æmilius Lepidus.Plebeian Æ- C. Atilius Serranus. diles. Cn. Pupius Nepos.Tribunes of the Q. Mucius Scævola.
People. C. Fannius Strabo.Q. Publius Philo.
C. Publicius Malleolus.
L. Albinus Nepos.
C. Livius Drusus.
L. Petillius Geminus.
Q. Petillius Spurius.
Q. Lutatius Cerco.
Q. Plætorius Nepos.Quæstors of P. Cornelius Lentulus.
Rome. M. Ogulnius Gallus.Military Quæ- L. Quinctius Flaminius. stors. Sex. Julius Cæsar.Provincial T. Minucius Augurinus.
Quæstors. L. Villius Tappulus.L. Scribonius Libo.
Ser. Cornelius Merenda.Pro-Consul in Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus.
Cisalpine Gaul.Pro-Quæstors. Ap. Claudius Pulcher.
C. Calpurnius Piso.
Ap. Claudius Centho.

533. Y. of R.

232. Consulship. L. VETURIUS PHILO.
C. LUTATIUS CATULUS.They abdicated, because there was some defect in their election, and in their room were chosenM. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS, a second time, and
M. VALERIUS LÆVINUS.
L. Æmilius Papus.
C. Flaminius Nepos.Consuls.The forty-third Lustrum.Prætors of T. ANNIUS LUSCUS.
Rome. C. SERVILIUS NEPOS.Prætors in Sici- Q. TERENTIUS CULEO. ly and Sardi- P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO.
nia.Curule Ædiles. C. Terentius Varro.
T. Gracilius Crassus.Plebeian Æ- L. Flaminius Ghibo. diles. C. Furius Fundulus.Tribunes of the M. Metilius Croto.
People. C. Petillius Spurius.M. Marcius Sermo.
M. Antistius Nepos.
L. Apustius Fullo.
C. Antius Restio.
M. Anicius Gallus.
L. Genucius Clepsina.
A. Trebius Gallus.
L. Mæcilius Tullus.Quæstors of P. Cornelius Lentulus Suræ.
Rome. Q. Fabius Maximus.Military Quæ- M. Æmilius Lepidus. stors. C. Oppius Salinator.Provincial L. Pomponius Vicientanus.
Quæstors. Cn. Fulvius Flaccus.Q. Catius Nepos.
L. Porcius Licinus.Prætors of L. SCRIBONIUS LICO.
Rome. SER. CORNELIUS MERENDA.

534. Y. of R.

233. Consulship. M. LIVIUS SALINATOR.
L. ÆMILIUS PAULUS.Prætors of L. ÆLIUS PÆTUS TUBERO.
Rome. Q. ÆLIUS PÆTUS.Prætors in Si- P. CORNELIUS MERENDA. cily and Sar- CN. SERVILIUS GEMINUS.
dinia.Curule Ædiles. M. Æmilius Regillus.
A. Cornelius Mammula.Plebeian Æ- C. Livius Drusus. diles. C. Popilius Sabellus.Tribunes of the Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
People. C. Lætorius Mergus.
M. Claudius Marcellus.

Ti. Villius Tappulus.
 C. Titinius Nepos.
 L. Porcius Licinus.
 M. Aurelius Cotta.
 C. Volumpius Flamma Violens.
 Q. Silius Nerva.
 Cn. Sicinnius Nepos.
 Quæstors of Rome. L. Hostius Manianus.
 Military Quæstors. L. Cæcilius Alimentus.
 T. Fontæus Capito.
 T. Popillius Sabe'llus.
 Provincial Quæstors. Q. Fabius Piclor.
 C. Arunculeius Cotta.
 C. Papirius Maso.
 P. Licinius Varus.
 Pro-Prætor in Sicily. Q. Terentius Culeo.
 Pro-Quæstors. L. Pomponius Flentanus.
 L. Æmilius Paulus.
 Q. Cælius Nepos.
 M. Livius Salinator.

535. Y. of R.

234. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO.
 TI. SEMPRONIUS LONGUS.

The second Punic War.

Prætors of Rome. C. TERENTIUS VARRO.
 C. ATILIUS SERRANUS.
 Prætors in Sicily and Sardinia. M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS.
 L. MANLIUS VULSO.
 Curule Ædiles. Q. Mucius Scævola.
 C. Fannius Strabo.
 Plebeian Ædiles. T. Metillius Croto.
 L. Apustius Fullo.
 Tribunes of the People. Q. Claudius Flaminius.
 L. Publius Bibulus.
 M. Fundanius Fundulus.
 M. Titinius Nepos.
 C. Genucius Clepsina.
 Q. Apronius Nepos.
 M. Atilius Regulus.
 Q. Minucius Rufus.
 C. Fundanius Fundulus.
 N. Sextius Lateranus.
 Quæstors of Rome. M. Genucius Cippus.
 P. Licinius Crassus.
 Military Quæstors. C. Fulvius Flaccus.
 L. Lucretius Trio.
 Provincial Quæstors. M. Cornelius Cethegus.
 M. Junius Silanus.

C. Sulpicius Gallus.
 L. Cornelius Lentulus.

536. Y. of R.

235. Consulship. C. FLAMINIUS NEPOS, a second time. He was killed in the battle of the lake Trasymenus; and in his room was chosen

M. ATILIUS REGULUS, a second time.

Dictator.

Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS VERRUCOSUS.

G. of the Horse. M. Minucius Rufus.

Dictator. L. VETURIUS PHILO-

G. of the Horse. M' Pomponius Matho.

Prætors of Rome. M. ÆMILIUS REGILLUS.

M. POMPONIUS MATHO.

Prætors in Sicily and Sardinia. T. OTACILIUS CRASSUS.

A. CORNELIUS MAMMULA.

Curule Ædiles. Ap. Claudius Pulcher.

P. Cornelius Lentulus.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. Porcius Licinius.

M. Antistius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. M. Metillius Nepos.

Vibius Terentius Varro.

P. Sempronius Tuditanus.

Nævius Crispus.

Cn. Sicinius Nepos.

C. Numicius Nepos.

Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

C. Calpurnius Piso.

M. Mænius Nepos.

C. Licinius Stolo.

Quæstors of Rome. Ti. Sempronius Blasus.

P. Sulpicius Galba Maximus.

Military Quæstors. C. Servilius Casca.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus.

Provincial Quæstors. C. Claudius Nero.

P. Cornelius Rufinus.

Sp. Carvilius Maximus.

L. Carvilius Maximus.

Pro-Consul in Spain. P. Cornelius Scipio.

Pro-Prætor in Cisalpine Gaul. C. Centenius Penula.

Pro-Quæstors. M. Cornelius Cethegus.

C. Papirius Maso.

537. Y. of R.

236. Consulship. C. TERENTIUS VARRO.

L. Æ-

| | | | |
|--------------------------------|--|---|--|
| | L. ÆMILIUS PAULUS,
a second time. He was killed in the battle of Cannæ. | 538. Y. of R.
237. Consulship . | L. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS was designed for Consul a third time, but was killed before he enter'd upon his office. |
| Dictators. | M. JUNIUS PERA.
M. FABIVS BUTEO. | | TI. SEMPRONIUS GRAC-
CHUS. |
| G. of the Horse. | Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
He was then Curule Ædile . | | M. CLAUDIUS MARCEL-LUS, was elected in the room of L. POSTHUMIUS; but he abdicated, because he found his election defective, and in his room |
| Prætors of
Rome. | M. POMPONIVS MATHO.
P. FURIUS PHILUS. | | Q. FABIVS MAX. VERRU-COSUS was chosen a third
time. |
| Prætor in Sicily. | M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS. | | Prætors of Rome. Q. FULVIUS FLACCUS.
M. VALERIUS LÆVINUS. |
| Prætor in Cis-
alpine Gaul. | L. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.
He was killed in a battle with the Gauls. | | Prætor in Sicily. AP. CLAUDIUS PULCHER. |
| Curule Ædiles. | Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
G. Lætorius Mergus. | | Prætor in Sardinia. Q. MUCIVS SCÆVOLA. |
| Plebeian Æ-
diles. | M. Aurelius Cotta.
M. Claudius Marcellus Otacilia-
nus. | | Curule Ædiles. Q. Fabius Maximus, the son of the Consul of the same name.
M. Æmilius Lepidus. |
| Tribunes of the
People. | L. Scribonius Libo.
Ti. Minucius Augurinus.
L. Villius Tappulus.
M. Ogulnius Gallus.
P. Decius Mus.
M. Claudius Glicia.
P. Pupius Nepos.
K. Duilius Nepos.
M. Domitius Calvinus.
C. Icilius Ruga. | | Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Claudius Flaminius.
M. Atilius Regulus. |
| Quæstors of
Rome. | T. Quinctius Crispinus.
Q. Mamilius Vitulus. | | Tribunes of the People. C. Oppius Salinator.
M. Atinius Labeo.
M. Fulvius Flaccus.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
L. Pomponius Veientanus.
M. Pomponius Matho.
M. Atilius Bulbus.
M. Fundanius Fundulus.
Cn. Fulvius Flaccus.
L. Livius Denter.
P. Villius Tappulus.
M. Lucretius Gallus. |
| Military Quæ-
stors. | L. Atilius Bulbus.
L. Furius Bibaculus. They were both killed in the battle of Cannæ. | | Military Quæstors. P. Popillius Lænas.
P. Manlius Vulso.
Provincial Quæstors. L. Arennius Nepos.
M. Æmilius Papus.
L. Veturius Philo.
C. Hestilius Tubulus. |
| Provincial
Quæstors. | C. Arennius Nepos.
L. Manlius Acidinus.
M. Cæcilius Metellus.
C. Servilius Pulex Geminus. | | Pro-Consul at
Picenum. C. Terentius Varro. |
| Pro-Consuls. | Cn. Servilius Geminus.
M. Atilius Regulus. They were both killed in the battle of Cannæ. | | Pro-Consul in
Campania. M. Claudius Marcellus. |
| Pro Consul in
Spain. | P. Cornelius Scipio. | | Pro-Consul in
Lucania. Ti. Sempronius Longus. |
| Pro-Prætor in
Sicily. | T. Otacilius Crassus. | | Pro-Consul in Spain. P. Cornelius Scipio. |
| Pro-Prætor in Sardinia. | A. Cornelius Mammula. | | |
| Pro-Quæstors. | M. Cornelius Cetbegus.
P. Cornelius Rufinus.
Sp. Carvilius Maximus. | | Pro-Prætor |

Pro-Prætor in T. Otacilius Crassus.
Sicily.

Pro-Prætor in M' Pomponius Matho.
Cisalpe. Gaul.

Pro-Quæstors. M. Cornelius Cethegus.
C. Antonius Nepos.

539. Y. of R.

238. Consulship. Q. FABIVS MAX. VERRUCOSUS, a fourth time.
M. CLAVDIVS MARCELLVS, a third time.

Censors. M. Atilius Regulus.
P. Furius Philus. He died before his office expired.

Prætor of Rome. Q. Fulvius Flaccus. He had no Collegue.

Prætor in A-pulia. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS, the son of the Consul.

Prætor in Sicily. P. Cornelius Lentulus.

Admiral of the Roman Fleet in Sicily. T. Otacilius Crassus.

Curule Ædiles. P. Sempronius Tuditanus.
Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Calpurnius Piso.
M. Metellius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People. L. Cincius Alimentus.
T. Popillius Sabellus.
M. Calpurnius Flamma.
Q. Pœtilius Libo.
Cn. Apuleius Panfa.
C. Arunculeius Cotta.
T. Fonteius Capito.
C. Plautius Hypsæus.
M. Poblicius Malleolus.
Q. Considius Nepos.

Quæstors of Rome. P. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus.
M. Sempronius Tuditanus.

Military Quæstors. L. Cæcilius Metellus.
M. Valerius Messala.

Provincial Quæstors. L. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus.
Ser. Sulpicius Galba.
C. Poblicius Bibulus.
Q. Mamilius Turinus.

Pro-Consul at Luceria. Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.

Pro-Consul in Picenum. C. Terentius Varro.

Pro Consul in Lucania. Ti. Sempronius Longus.

Pro-Consul in Spain. P. Cornelius Scipio.

Pro Prætor in Sardinia. Q. Mucius Scævola.

Pro-Prætor in Cisalpe. Gaul. M' Pomponius Matho.

Pro-Prætor at Brundisium. M. Valerius Lævinus.

Pro-Quæstors. M. Æmilius Papus.
L. Veturius Philo.

540. Y. of R.

239. Consulship. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS.
Ti. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHVS, a second time.

Dictator. C. CLAVDIVS CENTHO.
G. of the Horse. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

Prætors of Rome. M. Atilius Regulus.
M. Æmilius Lepidus.

Prætor in Cisalpine Gaul. P. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANVS.

Prætor in Campania. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Scipio, who was afterwards surnamed Africanus.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Cornelius Cethegus.
L. Villius Tappulus.
M. Fundanius Fundulus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Cæcilius Metellus.
L. Licinius Pollio.

C. Mamilius Vitulus.
L. Porcius Licinius.
P. Licinius Crassus.
L. Lucretius Gallus.
A. Trebius Nepos.
Q. Cadius Nepos.
C. Fulvius Flaccus.
L. Anicius Gallus.

Quæstors of Rome. M. Fulvius Flaccus.
M' Acilius Glabrio.

Military Quæstors. A. Hostilius Cato.
C. Hostilius Cato.

Provincial Quæstors. Ti. Claudius Asellus.
Sp. Lucretius Gallus.
Sex. Julius Cæsar.
L. Valerius Antias.

Pro-Consul in Picenum. C. Terentius Varro.

Pro-Consul in Sicily. M. Claudius Marcellus.

Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Scipio.

Spain.

Pro-Prætor in P. Cornelius Lentulus.

Sicily.

Tre Prætor T. OTACILIUS CRASSUS.

common to the Roman feet.

Pro-Prætor in Q. Mucius Scaevola.

Sardinia.

Pro-Prætor in M. Valerius Lævinus.

Brundisium.

Pro-Quæstors. L. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus.

M. Valerius Messalla.

C. Publicius Bibulus.

541. Y. of R.

240. Consulship. Q. FULVIUS FLACCUS, a third time.

AP. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.

Prætor at P. CORNELIUS RUFINUS SULLA.

Rome.

He had no Collegue.

Prætor in He- M. JUNIUS SILANUS.

transia.

Prætor at Sues- C. CLAUDIUS NERO.

fula.

Prætor in Apu- CN. FULVIUS FLACCUS, brother to the Consul.

Curule-Ediles. C. Sulpicius Gallus.

P. Manlius Vulso.

Plebeian Æ- L. Cincius Alimentus.

diles.

T. Popilius Sabellus.

Tribunes of the Sp. Cornelius Maximus.

People.

L. Carvilius Maximus.

C. Servilius Casca.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus.

C. Sallonius Sarra.

P. Silius Nerva.

Sex. Staius Nepos.

P. Licinius Varus.

M. Scantius Nepos.

M. Silius Nerva.

Quæstors. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.

Cn. Servilius Cæpio.

Ser. Cornelius Lentulus.

Cn. Octavius Nepos.

M. Junius Pennus.

M. Pomponius Matro.

Q. Lutatius Catulus.

M. Æmilius Regillus.

Pro-Consul in Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.

Lucania.

Pro-Consul in M. Claudius Marcellus.

Sicily.

Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Scipio.

Spain.

Pro-Prætor at P. Sempronius Tuditanus.

Ariminum.

Pro-Prætor in P. Cornelius Lentulus.

Sicily.

Pro-Prætor Ad-T. Otacilius Crassus.

miral of the fi et.

Pro-Prætor at M. Valerius Lævinus.

Brundisium.

Pro-Prætor in Q. Mucius Scaevola.

Sardinia.

Pro-Quæstors. L. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus.

Ti. Claudius Asellus.

C. Publicius Bibulus.

Sp. Lucretius Gallus.

Sex. Julius Cæsar.

M. Æmilius Rapus.

542. Y. of R.

241. Consulship. P. SULPICIUS GALBA.
MAXIMUS.

C. FULVIUS CENTUMA-
LUS.

Prætors of C. CALPURNIUS PISO.

Rome.

C. SULPICIUS GALLUS.

Prætors in Sici- M. CORNELIUS CETHEGUS.

ly and Sar-

L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.

dinia.

Curule-Ediles. P. Licinius Crassus.

L. Licinius Pollio.

Plebeian Æ- L. Arunculeius Cotta.

diles.

C. Manilius Vitulus.

Tribunes of the C. Sempronius Blaesus.

People.

C. Servius Pulex Geminus.

M. Aulius Cerretanus.

P. Villius Tappulus.

C. Sicinius Nepos.

Sex. Curatius Nepos.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

M. Manilius Nepos.

Cn. Apronius Limo.

L. Titius Rufus.

Quæstors. Tib. Claudius Nero.

C. Livius Salinator.

M. Servilius Pulex Geminus.

P. Ælius Pætus.

D. Junius Brutus.

L. Æmilius Papus.

M. Marcius Ralla.

L. Scribonius Libo.

Pro-

Pro-Consul in Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
Campania.
Pro-Consul in M. Claudius Marcellus. He Sicily. triumphs on mount Alba, and receives the honours of an Ovation at Rome, for having taken Syracuse.
Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Scipio.
Spain.
Pro-Consul be- C. Claudius Nero.
fore Capua.
Pro-Prætor in M. Junius Silanus.
Hetruria.
Pro-Prætor on T. Otacilius Crassus.
the Coast of
Sicily.
Pro-Prætor at M. Valerius Lævinus.
Brundisium.
Pro Quæstors. Ser. Cornelius Lentulus.
Cn. Octavius Nepos.
L. Cornelius Lentulus.
M. Æmilius Papus.

543. Y. of R.

242. Consulship. M. VALERIUS LÆVINUS,
a second time.

M. CLAUDIUS MARCEL-
LUS, a fourth time.

Dictators. Q. FULVIUS FLACCUS.

G. of the Horse. P. Licinius Crassus.

Prætors of L. MANLIUS ACIDINUS.

Rome. C. LÆTORIUS MERGUS.

Prætors in Sici- L. CINCIUS ALIMENTUS.

ly and Sar- P. MANLIUS VULSO.
dinia.

Curule Ædiles. L. Veturius Philo.

P. Licinius Varus.

Plebeian Æ- Q. Catius Nepos.

diles. L. Porcius Licinius.

Tribunes of the L. Atilius Regulus.

People. M. Lucretius Gallus.

C. Arennius Nepos.

L. Arennius Nepos.

M. Cæcilius Metellus.

P. Silius Nerva.

Cn. Lætorius Plancianus.

Q. Mamilius Vitulus.

Cn. Furius Brocchus.

C. Papirius Turdus.

Quæstors. C. Flaminius Nepos.

P. Quintilius Varus.

M. Sextius Sabinus.

C. Aurelius Cotta.

Q. Fulvius Gills.

P. Ælius Tubero.

C. Sulpicius Galla.

L. Lætorius Plancianus.

Pro-Consul on P. Sulpicius Galba.

the sea-coasts

of Greece.

Pro-Consul in Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

Apulia.

Pro-Consul in Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

Campania.

Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Scipio.

Spain.

Pro-Prætor in C. Calpurnius Piso.

Hetruria.

Pro-Prætor in M. Junius Silanus.

Spain.

Pro-Quæstors. M. Servilius Pulex Geminus.

P. Ælius Pætus.

Ser. Cornelius Lentulus.

L. Scribonius Libo.

544. Y. of R.

243. Consulship. Q. FABIUS MAX. VERRU-COSUS, a fifth time. He triumphs over the Tarentini.

Q. FULVIUS FLACCUS, a fourth time.

Censors.

M. Cornelius Cethegus.

P. Sempronius Tuditanus.

Prætors of

C. HOSTILIUS TUBULUS.

Rome.

L. VETURIUS PHILO.

Prætors in Ca-

T. QUINCTIUS CRISPINUS.

pua and at

C. ARUNCULEIUS COTTA.

Sardinia.

Curule Ædiles. L. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus.

Ser. Sulpicius Galba.

Plebeian Æ-

C. Servilius Pulex Geminus.

diles.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus.

Tribunes of the

C. Publicius Bibulus.

People.

P. Clodius Asellus.

Q. Manlius Turinus.

Ti. Claudius Asellus.

C. Veturius Calvinus.

C. Minucius Rufus.

M. Pomponius Matho.

Q. Cassius Longinus.

C. Minucius Augurinus.

M. Aquilius Florus.

Quæstors.

Ap. Claudius Pulcher.

T. Manlius Torquatus.

L. Licinius Lucullus.
C. Babius Tampophilus.
M. Cincius Alimentus.
M. Claudius Marcellus.
C. Cornelius Lentulus.
L. Cornelius Blaſius.
 Pro-Conſul in M. Claudius Marcellus.
 Apulia.
 Pro-Conſul in M. Valerius Lævinus.
 Sicily.
 Pro-Conſul on P. Sulpicius Galba Maximus. the ſea-coaſts
 of Greece.
 Pro-Conſul in P. Cornelius Scipio.
 Spain.
 Pro-Prætor in C. Calpurnius Piſo.
 Hetruria.
 Pro-Prætor in L. Cincius Alimentus.
 Sicily.
 Pro-Prætor in M. Junius Silanus.
 Spain.
 Pro-Quæſtors. Q. Fulvius Gilla.
 C. Aurelius Cotta.
 P. Ælius Tubero.
 545. Y. of R.
 244. Conſulſhip. M. CLAUDIUS MARCEL-
 LUS.
 T. QUINCTIUS CRISPI-
 NUS.
 Dictator. T. MANLIUS TORQUA-
 TUS.
 G. of the Horſe. C. Servilius Pulex Geminus.
 He was Curule Ædile at the ſame time.
 Prætors of P. LICINIUS VARUS.
 Rome. L. LICINIUS CRASSUS DIVES.
 Prætors in Si- Sex. JULIUS CÆſAR. cily and at Q. CLAUDIUS FLAMININUS.
 Tarentum.
 Curule Ædiles. Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
 C. Servilius Pulex Geminus.
 Plebeian Æ- Q. Mamilius Vitulus.
 diles. M. Cæcilius Metellus.
 Tribunes of the Ti. Claudius Aſellus.
 People. Sp. Lucretius Gallus.
 P. Villius Tappulus.
 M. Hortenſius Nepos.
 Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
 M. Aulius Cerretanus.
 Q. Pomponius Nepos.
 M. Acilius Glabrio.

M. Otacilius Craſſus.
 L. Carvilius Maximus.
 T. Quinctius Flamininus.
 M. Fabius Buteo.
 M. Valerius Falto.
 C. Tremellius Flaccus.
 L. Æmilius Lepidus.
 Q. Æmilius Lepidus.
 L. Apuſtius Fullo.
 Q. Minucius Rufus.
 Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
 Pro-Conſul at Capua.
 Pro-Conſul in M. Valerius Lævinus.
 Sicily.
 Pro-Conſul on P. Sulpicius Galba Maximus. the coaſts of Greece.
 Pro-Conſul on P. Cornelius Scipio.
 Spain.
 Pro-Prætor in C. Hoſtilius Tubulus.
 Hetruria.
 Pro-Prætor at C. Terentius Varro.
 Arretium.
 Pro-Prætor in L. Veturius Philo.
 Ciſalp. Gaul.
 Pro-Prætor on L. Cincius Alimentus. board the Roman fleet.
 Pro-Prætor in C. Arunculeius Cotta.
 Sardinia.
 Pro-Prætor in M. Junius Silanus.
 Spain.
 Pro-Quæſtors. C. Flaminius Nepos.
 C. Aurelius Cotta.
 M. Cincius Alimentus.
 C. Cornelius Lentulus.
 546. Y. of R.
 245. Conſulſhip. C. CLAUDIUS NERO.
 M. LIVIUS SALINATOR.
 Dictator. M. LIVIUS SALINA-
 TOR.
 G. of the Horſe. Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
 Prætor at C. HOSTILIUS CATO.
 Rome.
 Prætor in Ciſ- M. PORCIUS LICINUS.
 alpine Gaul.
 Prætor in Si- C. MAMILIUS VITULUS.
 ly.
 Prætor in Sar- A. HOSTILIUS CATO.
 dinia.
 Curule Ædiles. Cn. Servilius Cæpio.
 Ser. Cornelius Lentulus.

Plebeian

Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Mamilius Turinus.
M. Pomponius Matho.
 Tribunes of the People. Cn. Helvius Blasio.
Cn. Octavius Nepos.
Q. Lutatius Catulus.
Cn. Pompeius Rufus.
L. Flavius Timbria.
Q. Fulvius Pætinus.
M. Junius Pennus.
T. Otacilius Crassus.
D. Junius Brutus.
Q. Flavius Nepos.
 Quæstors. L. Furius Purpureo, the son of Spurius.
L. Furius Purpureo, the son of Lucius.
Sex. Ælius Pætus Catus.
L. Terentius Massa.
L. Villius Tappulus.
L. Cornelius Merula.
L. Attilius Regulus.
L. Cassius Longinus.
 Pro-Consul in Q. Fulvius Fiaccus.
 Bruttium.
 Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Scipio.
 Sicily.
 Pro-Consul on P. Sulpicius Galba Maximus.
 the coasts of
 Greece.
 Pro-Prætor at C. Hostilius Tubulus.
 Capua.
 Pro-Prætor at Q. Claudius Flaminius.
 Tarentum.
 Pro-Prætor at L. Mamilius Acidinus.
 Narnia.
 Pro-Prætor in M. Junius Silanus.
 Spain.
 Pro-Prætor in C. Terentius Varro.
 Hetruria.
 Pro-Quæstors. C. Flaminius Nepos.
C. Aurelius Cotta.
M. Livius Salinator.
C. Claudius Nero.
 547. Y. of R.
 246. Consulship. Q. CÆCILIVS METELLVS.
L. VETURIVS PHILO.
 Prætors at M. CÆCILIVS METELLVS.
 Rome. Q. MAMILIVS TURINVS.
 Prætor in Si- C. SERVILIVS PULEX GEMI- cily. NVS.

Prætor in Sar- Ti. CLAVDIVS ASELLVS.
 dinia.
 Curule Ædiles. Ti. Claudius Nero.
P. Quintilius Varus.
 Plebeian Ædiles. Sp. Lucretius Gallus.
Cn. Octavius Nepos.
 Tribunes of the People. M. Marcius Ralla.
P. Ælius Pætus.
M. Pætilius Libo Visolus.
A. Allienius Nepos.
C. Licinius Salinator.
L. Scribonius Libo.
P. Villius Tappulus.
L. Flaminius Nepos.
C. Confidius Nepos.
M. Servilius Pulex Geminus.
 Quæstors. L. Valerius Flaccus.
Q. Quinctius Flaminius.
Q. Minucius Thermus.
M. Acilius Glabrio.
M. Helvius Elasio.
Cn. Sergius Plancus.
M. Sergius.
 Pro-Consul in M. Livius Salinator.
 Hetruria.
 Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Scipio.
 Spain.
 Pro-Consul on P. Sulpicius Galba.
 the coast of
 Greece.
 Pro-Prætor at C. Hostilius Tabulus.
 Capua.
 Pro-Prætor at T. Quinctius Flaminius.
 Tarentum.
 Pro-Quæstors. C. Flaminius Nepos.
L. Cassius Longinus.
 548. Y. of R.
 247. Consulship. P. CORNELIVS SCIPIO.
F. LICINIVS CRASSVS.
 Dictator. C. CÆCILIVS METELLVS.
 G. of the Horse. L. Veturius Philo.
 Prætor at Cn. SERVILIVS CÆPIO.
 Rome.
 Prætor at Ari- Sp. LUCRETIVS GALLVS.
 minum.
 Prætor in Sici- L. ÆMILIVS PAPVS.
 ly.
 Prætor in Sar- Cn. OCTAVIVS NEPOS.
 dinia.

Curule Ædiles. L. Cornelius Lentulus.
Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.
 Plebeian Æ- Ti. Claudius Asellus. diles. M. Junius Papus.
Tribunes of the Q. Navius Pollio.
People. Q. Trebellius Caica.
M. Sextilius Sabinus.
Q. Fulvius Gillo.
L. Plætorius Nepos.
L. Staius Nepos.
C. Aurelius Cotta.
P. Ælius Tubero.
L. Lætorius Plancianus.
P. Numitorius Pullus.
 Quæstors. C. Cornelius Cethegus.
Q. Bæbius Tamphilus.
Ti. Sempronius Longus.
L. Stertinius Nepos.
C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
M. Minucius Rufus.
L. Quinctius Flaminius.
C. Valerius Flaccus.
Pro-Consul in M. Livius Salinator.
Hetruria.
Pro-Consul at M. Valerius Lævinus.
Arretium.
Pro-Consul in Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
Bruttium.
Pro-Consul in L. Cornelius Lentulus.
Hither Spain.
Pro-Consul in L. Manlius Acidinus.
Farth. Spain.
Pro-Consul on P. Sempronius Tuditanus.
the coasts of
Greece.
Pro-Consul at T. Quinctius Flaminius.
Tarentum.
Pro-Consul at C. Hostilius Tabulus.
Capua.
Pro-Consul at Q. Pleminius Nepos.
Rhegium.
 Pro-Quæstor. M. Sergius Nepos.
 549. Y. of R.
 248. Consulship. M. CORNELIUS CETHE-
GUS.
P. SEMPRONIUS TUDI-TANUS.
 Cæfers. M. Livius Salinator.
C. Claudius Nero.
The forty-fifth Lustrum.
Prætors at M. MARCIUS RALLA.
Rome. L. SCRIBONIUS LIEO.

Prætor in Si- M' POMPONIUS MATHO.
cily.
Prætor in Sar- Ti. CLAUDIUS NERO.
dinia.
 Curule Ædiles. C. Livius Salinator.
M. Servilius Pulex Geminus.
 Plebeian Æ- P. Ælius Pætus. diles. P. Vitius Tappulus.
Tribunes of the M. Claudius Marcellus.
People. M. Cincius Alimentus.
Cn. Bæbius Tamphilus.
L. Licinius Lucullus.
C. Scantinius Capitolinus.
M. Pontificius Nepos.
P. Manlius Nepos.
C. Duilius Nepos.
L. Fescennius Nepos.
Sex. Pompilius Nepos.
 Quæstors. M. Porcius Cato.
M. Fulvius Nobilior.
C. Fabricius Luscinus.
L. Manlius Vulso.
M. Porcius Læca.
M. Curius Dentatus.
C. Atinius Labeo.
C. Scribonius Curius Maximus.
Pro-Consul in M. Livius Salinator.
Gaul.
Pro-Consul in P. Licinius Crassus Dives.
Bruttium.
Pro-Consul in L. Cornelius Lentulus.
Hither Spain.
Pro-Consul in L. Manlius Acidinus.
Farth. Spain.
Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Scipio.
Sicily.
Pro-Prætor in Sp. Lucretius Gallus.
Ariminum.
Pro-Prætor at C. Hostilius Tubulus.
Capua.
Pro-Prætor at T. Quinctius Flaminius.
Tarentum.
Pro-Prætor on Cn. Octavius Nepos.
the coasts of
Sardinia.
Pro-Prætor at Q. Pleminius.
Locres.
 Pro-Quæstors. C. Cornelius Cethegus.
L. Stertinius Nepos.
C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
M. Minucius Rufus.
L. Quinctius Flaminius.

550. Y. of R.
 249. Consulship. CN. SERVILIUS CÆPIO.
 C. SERVILIUS NEPOS.
 Dictator. P. SULPICIUS GALBA
 MAXIMUS.
 G. of the Horse. M. Servilius Pulex Geminus.
 Prætor at Rome. P. ÆLIUS PÆTUS.
 Prætor at Ariminum. P. VILLIUS TAPPULUS.
 Prætor in Sicily. L. VILLIUS TAPPULUS.
 Prætor in Sardinia. CN. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.
 Curule Ædiles. M. Fabius Buteo.
 M. Valerius Falto.
 Plebeian Ædiles. M. Sextius Sabinus.
 C. Tremellius Flaccus.
 Tribunes of the People. C. Oppius Cornicinus.
 P. Titinius Nepos.
 L. Apustius Fullo.
 Q. Minucius Rufus.
 C. Mamilius Turinus.
 L. Titinius Nepos.
 Q. Sicinius Nepos.
 C. Cominius Nepos.
 C. Antonius Nepos.
 Q. Cædicius Noctua.
 Quæstors. M. Sergius Silus.
 Q. Fulvius Nobilior.
 C. Acilius Glabrio.
 L. Porcius Læca.
 Q. Fabius Buteo.
 Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.
 T. Junius Thalna.
 Sex. Digitius Nepos.
 Pro-Consul in Cisalp. Gaul. M. Cornelius Cethegus.
 Pro-Consul in Bruttium. P. Sempronius Tuditanus.
 Pro-Consul in Hither Spain. L. Cornelius Lentulus.
 Pro-Consul in Farth. Spain. L. Manlius Acidinus.
 Pro-Consul in Africa. P. Cornelius Scipio.
 Pro-Prætor in Liguria. Sp. Lucretius Gallus.
 Pro-Prætor on the coasts of Sardinia. M. Pomponius Matho.

Pro-Prætor on the coasts of Italy. The Prætor M. Marcius Rulla.
 Pro-Quæstors. M. Porcius Cato.
 C. Cornelius Cethegus.
 M. Manlius Vulso.
 M. Porcius Læca.
 C. Atinius Labeo.
 C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
 C. Scribonius Curio Maximus.
 551. Y. of R.
 250. Consulship. TI. CLAUDIUS NERO.
 M. SERVILIUS PULEX
 GEMINUS.
 Dictator. C. SERVILIUS NEPOS.
 G. of the Horse. P. ÆLIUS PÆTUS.
 Prætor of Rome. C. AURELIUS COTTA.
 Prætor at Ariminum. M. SEXTIUS SABINUS.
 Prætor in Bruttium. C. LIVIUS SALINATOR.
 Prætor in Sicily. C. TREMELLIUS FLACCUS.
 Curule Ædiles. L. Licinius Lucullus.
 Q. Fulvius Pætinus.
 Plebeian Ædiles. P. Ælius Tubero.
 L. Lætorius Plancianus.
 M. Cincius Alimentus.
 C. Scantinius Capitolinus.
 Tribunes of the People. L. Terentius Massa.
 L. Villius Tappulus.
 L. Memmius Gallus.
 Sp. Mælius Capitolinus.
 C. Æbutius Carus.
 Sex. Ælius Pætus.
 L. Cassius Longinus.
 P. Mælius Capitolinus.
 T. Æbutius Carus.
 Sp. Veturius Calvinus.
 Quæstors. C. Lælius Nepos.
 P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.
 Cn. Manlius Vulso.
 L. Oppius Salinator.
 C. Ursanius Nepos.
 Ap. Claudius Nero.
 C. Attilius Serranus.
 L. Scribonius Libo.
 Pro-Consul in Hetruria. C. Servilius Nepos.
 Pro-Consul in Cisalp. Gaul. M. Cornelius Cethegus.

Pro-

Pro-Consul in L. Cornelius Lentulus.
Hither Spain.

Pro-Consul in L. Manlius Acidinus.
Farth. Spain.

Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Scipio.
Africa.

Pro-Prætor in Sp. Laetorius Gaius.
Liguria.

Pro-Prætor in Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.
Sardinia.

Pro-Prætor on P. Villius Tappulus.
the sea-coasts
of Sicily.

Pro-Prætor on Cn. Octavius Nepos.
the coasts of
Sardinia.

Pro-Prætor on M. Marcius Rallia.
the sea-coasts
of Italy.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Cornelius Cethegus.
Sex. Digitius Nepos.
T. Juventius Thalna.

552. Y. of R.

251. Consulship. CN. CORNELIUS LENTU-
LUS.

Prætors of P. ÆLIUS PÆTUS.
Rome. M. JUNIUS PENNUS.

Prætor in M. VALERIUS FALTO.
Campania.

Prætor in Si- P. ÆLIUS TUEERO.
cily.

Prætor in M. FABIVS BUTEO.
Sardinia.

Curule-Ediles. L. Valerius Flaccus.
T. Quinctius Flaminius.

Plebeian Æ- L. Apulius Fullo. diles. Q. Minucius Rufus.

Tribunes of the Q. Minucius Thermus.
People. M' Acilius Glabrio.

C. Helvius Blasio.

L. Atilius Regulus.

M. Minucius Rufus.

L. Cnuleius Dives.

L. Hortensius Nepos.

M. Helvius Blasio.

M. Minucius Fessus.

C. Terentius Varro.

Quæstors. Q. Marcius Rex.

Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

P. Manlius Vulso.

Cn. Cornelius Mercator.

C. Atinius Labeo.

T. Remulcius Nipos.

M. Junius Brutus.

Q. Oppius Salinator.

Pro-Consul in M. Servilius Pulex Geminus.
Hetruria.

Pro-Consul in L. Cornelius Lentulus.
Hither Spain.

Pro-Consul in L. Manlius Acidinus.
Farth. Spain.

Pro-Consul in P. Cornelius Scipio
Africa.

Pro-Prætor on Cn. Octavius Nepos.
the coasts of
Sardinia.

Pro-Prætor on M. Valerius Lævinus.
the sea-coasts
of Greece.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Cornelius Cethegus.

C. Lælius Nepos.

P. Cornelius Scipio.

L. Oppius Salinator.

Scipio triumphs over Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Syphax King of Numidia.

553. Y. of R.

252. Consulship. P. SULPICIUS GALBA
MAXIMUS.
C. AURELIUS COTTA.

The Macedonian War.

Prætor of CN. SERGIUS PLANCUS.
Rome.

Prætor in Cis- L. FURIUS PURPUREO. He alpine Gaul. triumphs over the Gauls.

Prætor in Q. MINUCIUS RUFUS.
Bruttium.

Prætor in Si- Q. FULVIUS GILLO.
cily.

Curule-Ediles. M. Claudius Marcellus.
Sex. Ælius Pætus Catus.

Plebeian Æ- L. Terentius Massa. diles. Cn. Bæbius Tamphilus.

Tribunes of the C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
People. M. Minucius Rufus.

L. Ogulnius Gallus.

Q. Bæbius Tamphilus.

Ti. Sempronius Longus.

M. Domitius Calvinus.

L. Stertinius Nepos.

Q. Ogulnius Gallus.

Q. Aulius Cerretanus.

P. Ælius Pætus.

Quæstors.

Quæstors. L. Cornelius Scipio.
L. Valerius Tappus.
M. Junius Brutus.
D. Junius Brutus.
M. Valerius Messalla.
L. Porcius Licinus.
M. Fundanius Fundulus.
Pro-Consul in C. Cornelius Cethegus.
Hither Spain.
Pro-Consul in L. Manlius Acidinus.
Farth. Spain.
Pro-Prætor on M. Valerius Læcinus.
the se-coasts
of Greece.
Pro-Prætor in M. Valerius Falto.
Sardinia.
Pro-Quæstors. M. Junius Brutus.
Cn. Cornelius Merenda.
L. Cornelius Lentulus. Upon his return from Spain he receives the honours of an Ovation.
554. Y. of R.
253. Consulship. I. CORNELIUS LENTU-
LUS.
P. VILLIUS TAPPULUS.
Censors. P. Cornelius Scipio Africa-
nus.
P. Ælius Pætus.
The forty-sixth Lustrum.
Prætor of L. QUINCTIUS FLAMINIVS.
Rome.
Prætor at Ari- CN. BÆBIUS TAMPHILUS.
minum.
Prætor in Si- L. VALERIUS FLACCUS.
cily.
Prætor in Sar- L. VILLIUS TAPPULUS.
dinia.
CuruleÆdiles. C. Valerius Flaccus.
C. Cornelius Cethegus.
Plebeian Æ- M. Porcius Cato. diles. C. Helvius Blasio.
Tribunes of the M. Porcius Læca.
Peopls. M. Fulvius Nobilior.
M' Curius Dentatus.
C. Scribonius Curio.
C. Fabricius Luscinus.
T. Otacilius Crassus.
C. Cæcilius Metellus.
Ti. Claudius Canina.
L. Aurelius Orestes.
C. Flaminius Nepos.
Quæstors. Q. Ælius Tubero.

Quæstors.
VOL. II.

M. Sempronius Tuditanus.
M. Licinius Lucullus.
M. Bæbius Tamphilus.
M. Tuccius Nepos.
A. Cornelius Mammula.
C. Livius Salinator.
L. Arunculeius Cotta.
Pro-Consul in P. Sulpicius Galba Maximus.
Macedon.
Pro-Consul in Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.
Hither Spain.
Pro-Consul in L. Stertinius Nepos.
Farth. Spain.
Pro-Prætor in Q. Minucius Rufus.
Bruttium.
Pro-Quæstors. L. Valerius Tappus.
D. Junius Brutus.
L. Porcius Licinus.
555. Y. of R.
254. Consulship. T. QUINCTIUS FLAMI- NIVS.
SEX. ÆLIUS PÆTUS CA-
TUS.
Prætor of L. CORNELIUS MERULA.
Rome.
Prætor in Cis- C. HELVIUS BLASIO.
alpine Gaul.
Prætor in Si- M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS.
cily.
Prætor in Sar- M. PORCIUS CATO.
dinia.
CuruleÆdiles. Q. Minucius Thermus.
Ti. Sempronius Longus.
Plebeian Æ- C. Sempronius Tuditanus. diles. M. Helvius Blasio.
Tribunes of the Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.
People. Sex. Digitius Nepos.
C. Ælius Pætus.
C. Claudius Canina.
P. Rutilius Rufus.
T. Juventius Thalna.
Sp. Carvilius Maximus.
Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
M. Porcius Licinus.
C. Cosconius Nepos.
C. Licinius Lucullus.
C. Plætorius Nepos.
C. Salloniussarra.
M. Æmilius Lepidus.
Cn. Fulvius Flaccus.
C. Atinius Labeo.
C. Cornelius Blasio.
Cn. Cornelius Merula.

Quæstors.

4 N

Pro-

Pro-Consul in L. Cornelius Lentulus.
Cisalpe. Gaul.

Pro-Consul in Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.
Hither Spain.

Pro-Consul in L. Stertinius Nepos.
Farth. Spain.

Pro-Prætor on L. Quinctius Flaminius.
the coasts of
Greece.

Pro-Quæstors. M. Licinius Lucullus.
M. Tullius Nepos.
A. Cornelius Mammula.
L. Arunculeius Cotta.

556. Y. of R.

255. Consulship. C. CORNELIUS CETHE-
GUS. He triumphs over the Insubres and Cænomani.

Q. MINUCIUS RUFUS. He triumphs over the Ligures and Boii, on the hill of Alba.

Prætors of M. SERGIUS SILUS.
Rome. M. MINUCIUS RUFUS.

Prætor in Si- L. MANLIUS VULSO.
cily.

Prætor in Sar- L. ATILIUS REGULUS.
dinia.

Prætor in Hi- C. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS.
ther Spain.

Prætor in Far- M. HELVIUS BLASIO.
ther Spain.

Curule-Ædiles. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.
Cn. Manlius Vulso.

Plebeian Æ- M. Acilius Glabrio. diles. C. Lælius Nepos.

Tribunes of the L. Oppius Salinator.
People. Q. Fulvius Nobilior.

C. Acilius Glabrio.

C. Atinius Labeo.

C. Ursanius Nepos.

L. Porcius Læca.

L. Scribonius Libo.

C. Rutilus Rufus.

K. Duilius Nepos.

Cn. Pupius Nepos.

Quæstors. L. Æmilius Regillus.

L. Plautius Hypsæus.

L. Babius Dives.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

M. Cecilius Metellus.

M. Claudius Marcellus.

Q. Marcius Philippus.

Sex. Pompeius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in T. Quinctius Flaminius.
Macedon.

Pro-Prætor on L. Quinctius Flaminius.
the sea-coasts
of Greece.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Sallonius Sarra.
Cn. Cornelius Merula.
L. Arunculeius Cotta.
Cn. Cornelius Blasio.

557. Y. of R.

256. Consulship. L. FURIUS PURPUREO.
M. CLAUDIUS MARCEL-LUS. He triumphs over the inhabitants of Coma and the Insubres.

Prætors at L. AFUSTIUS FULLO.
Rome. M' ACILIUS GLABRIO.

Prætor in Si- C. LÆLIUS NEPOS.
cily.

Prætor in Sar- T. SEMPRONIUS LONGUS.
dinia.

Prætor in Hi- Q. MINUCIUS THERMUS.
ther Spain.

Prætor in Far- Q. FABIUS BUTEO.
ther Spain.

Curule-Ædiles. M. Fulvius Nobilior.
C. Flaminius Nepos.

Plebeian Æ- Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus. diles. C. Scribonius Curio.

Tribunes of the Q. Marcius Rex.
People. C. Atinius Labeo.

M. Romuleius Nepos.

C. Atilius Serranus.

M. Junius Brutus.

Q. Oppius Salinator.

Sex. Tullius Nepos.

L. Flavius Nepos.

L. Marcius Censorinus.

C. Livius Drusus.

Quæstors. Q. Fabius Labeo.

L. Aurelius Cotta.

Sp. Posthumius Ællinus.

P. Sempronius Blasius.

C. Stertinius Nepos.

C. Aurelius Scaurus.

M. Furius Luscus.

T. Manius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in T. Quinctius Flaminius.
Macedon.

Pro-Prætor on L. Quinctius Flaminius.
the sea-coasts
of Greece.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Sallonius Sarra.
Cn. Cornelius Merula.
L. Arunculeius Cotta.

Cn. Cor-

Cn. Cornelius Blasio.

Cn. Cornelius Lentulus. He receives the honours of an Ovation.

558. Y. of R.

257. Consulship. M. PORCIUS CATO.
L. VALERIUS FLACCUS.

Prætors of C. FABRICIUS LUSCINUS.
Rome. C. ATINIUS LABEO.

Prætor in Si- CN. MANLIUS VULSO.
cily.

Prætor in Hi- P. MANLIUS VULSO.
ther Spain.

Prætor in Far- AP. CLAUDIUS NERO.
ther Spain.

Prætor in He- P. PORCIUS LÆCA.
truria.

Curule Ædiles. L. Cornelius Scipio.

M. Valerius Messala.

Plebeian Æ- M. Juventius Thalna.
diles.

Sex. Digitius Nepos.

Tribunes of the M. Fundanius Fundulus.
People.

L. Valerius Tappus.

M. Junius Brutus.

D. Junius Brutus.

L. Porcius Licinus.

C. Æbutius Carus.

Q. Minucius Thermus.

Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

M' Marcius Ralla.

C. Numicius Nepos.

Quæstors.

P. Claudius Pulcher.

L. Manlius Acidinus Fulvianus.

M. Furius Crassipes.

C. Sempronius Blæsus.

C. Calpurnius Piso.

Q. Fabius Pictor.

Q. Nævius Matho.

C. Afranius Stellio.

Pro-Consul in T. Quinctius Flaminius.
Greece.

Pro-Prætor on L. Quinctius Flaminius.
the coasts of
Greece.

Pro-Consul in Ti. Sempronius Longus.
Sardinia.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Sallonius Sarra.

C. Aurelius Scaurus.

Cn. Cornelius Merula.

M. Helvius Blasio, Pro-Prætor in Hither Spain. He receives the honours of an Ovation.

Q. Minucius Thermus. He triumphs over Hither Spain.

559. Y. of R.

258. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO
AFRICANUS, a second time.
TI. SEMPRONIUS LONGUS.

Censors.

Sextius Ælius Pætus Catus.

C. Cornelius Cethegus.

The forty-seventh Lustrum.

Prætors of CN. DOMITIUS ÆNOBARBUS.
Rome. T. JUVENTIUS THALNA.

Prætor in Si- CN. CORNELIUS BLASIO.
cily.

Prætor in Hi- SEX. DIGITIUS NEPOS.
ther Spain.

Prætor in Far- P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO NASICA.
ther Spain.

Curule Ædiles. C. Atilius Serranus.
L. Scribonius Libo.

Plebeian Æ- M. Junius Brutus.
diles.

Q. Oppius Salinator.

Tribunes of the Q. Ælius Tubero.
People.

C. Livius Salinator.

L. Arunculeius Cotta.

Q. Salonius Sarra.

C. Lutatius Catulus.

P. Popilius Lænas.

M. Tuccius Nepos.

A. Atilius Serranus.

M. Bæbius Tamphilus.

Q. Lutatius Catulus.

Quæstors.

L. Posthumius Tympanus.

Ap. Claudius Pulcher.

P. Sulpicius Galba.

P. Sempronius Gracchus.

C. Sempronius Rutilus.

Q. Terentius Culeo.

C. Decimius Flavius.

C. Atilius Serranus.

Pro-Consul in L. Valerius Flaccus.
Cisalpine Gaul.

Pro-Consul in M. Porcius Cato.
Hither Spain.

Pro-Consul in T. Quinctius Flaminius.
Greece. He triumphs over Macedon, and King Philip, for three days together.

Pro-Consul on L. Quinctius Flaminius.
the coasts of
Greece.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Sempronius Blaesus.
C. Sallonius Sarra.
C. Afranius Stellio.
M. Furius Crassipes.
C. Calpurnius Piso.
Q. Nævius Matro.
Marcus Porcius Cato. He triumphs over Hither Spain.

560. Y. of R.

259. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS MERULA.
Q. MINUCIUS THERMUS.

Prætors of Rome. C. SCRIBONIUS CURIO.
M. VALERIUS MESSALLA.
Prætors in Sicily. L. CORNELIUS SCIPIO.
L. PORCIUS LICINUS.
Prætor in Hither Spain. C. FLAMINIUS NEPOS.
Prætor in Farther Spain. M. FULVIUS NOBILIOR.

Curule Ædiles. M. Æmilius Lepidus.
L. Æmilius Paulus.
Plebeian Ædiles. L. Oppius Salinator.
M. Junius Brutus.
Tribunes of the People. M. Sempronius Tulitanus.
M. Titinius Nepos.
C. Titinius Nepos.
M. Licinius Lucullus.
Cn. Fulvius Flaccus.
L. Juventius Thalna.
C. Antistius Nepos.
L. Poblicius Bibulus.
L. Plautius Hypsæus.
C. Licinius Lucullus.

Quæstors. C. Valerius Tappus.
Ser. Sulpicius Galba.
P. Cornelius Sulla.
L. Quinctius Crispinus.
M. Claudius Marcellinus.
P. Sempronius Longus.
L. Posthumius Tympanus.
Cn. Sicinius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in Cisalp. Gaul. Ti. Sempronius Longus.

Pro-Consul in Farth. Spain. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Decimius Flavius.
C. Afranius Stellio.
Q. Nævius Matro.
C. Atilius Serranus.

561. Y. of R.

200. Consulship. L. QUINCTIUS FLAMINI-
NUS.

CN. DOMITIUS ÆNO-BARBUS.

Prætors of Rome. CN. FULVIUS CENTUMALUS.
L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO.

Prætor in Sicily. L. VALERIUS TAPPUS.

Prætor in Sardinia. Q. SALLONIUS SARRA.

Prætor in Bruttium. M. BÆBIUS TAMPHILUS.

Prætor in Farther Spain. A. ATILIUS SERRANUS.

Curule Ædiles. M. Tuccius Nepos.
D. Junius Brutus.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Livius Salinator.
C. Arunculeius Cotta.

Tribunes of the People. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
M. Claudius Marcellus.

C. Atinius Labeo.
P. Puppius Nepos.
Sex. Pomponius Nepos.
L. Bæbius Dives.
Q. Marcius Philippus.
M. Cæcilius Mætellus.
P. Plautius Hypsæus.
L. Apuleius Saturninus.

Quæstors. Q. Petilius Spurius.
Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
P. Cornelius Cethegus.
M. Aburius Geminus.
A. Terentius Varro.
L. Mummius Nepos.
L. Puppius Nepos.

Pro-Consul in Liguria. Q. Minucius Thermus.

Pro-Prætor in Hith. Spain. C. Flaminius Nepos.

Pro-Prætor in Farth. Spain. M. Fulvius Nobilior.

Pro-Prætor on the coasts of Italy. L. Oppius Salinator.

Pro-Quæstors. L. Quinctius Crispinus.
Cn. Sicinius Nepos.
L. Posthumius Tympanus.
C. Atilius Serranus.

War with Antiochus the Great.

562. Y. of R.

261. Consulship. M' ACILIUS GLABRIO.
P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO NASICA. He triumphs over the Boii.

Prætor

Prætor of Rome. M. JUNIUS BRUTUS.
 Prætor in Bruttium. A. CORNELIUS MAMMULA.
 Prætor in the fleet sent against Antiochus. C. LIVIUS SALINATOR.
 Prætor in Sicily. M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS.
 Prætor in Sardinia. L. OPPIUS SALINATOR.
 Prætor in Farther Spain. L. ÆMILIUS PAULUS.
 Curule Ædiles. Sp. Posthumius Albinus.
 Q. Fabius Pictor.
 Plebeian Ædiles. L. Plantius Hypsæus.
 M. Sempronius Tuditanus.
 Tribunes of the People. P. Sempronius Blæsus.
 C. Stertinius Nepos.
 C. Aurelius Scaurus.
 L. Albinus Nepos.
 M. Allienius Nepos.
 C. Centenius Penula.
 T. Mænius Nepos.
 C. Terentius Massa.
 C. Albius Carrinas.
 L. Apustius Fullo.
 Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
 Sp. Posthumius Albinus Paullulus.
 C. Terentius Istra.
 L. Cæcilius Denter.
 L. Duronius Nepos.
 C. Fannius Strabo.
 Q. Petillius Spurius.
 Q. Mummius Nepos.
 Pro-Consul in Cisalp. Gaul. Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.
 Pro-Consul in Liguria. Q. Minucius Thermus.
 Pro-Prætor in Sicily. L. Valerius Tappus.
 Pro-Prætor in Hith. Spain. G. Flaminius Nepos.
 Pro-Prætor in Epirus and Greece. M. Bæbius Tamphilus.
 Pro-Prætor on the sea-coasts of Greece. A. Atilius Serranus.
 Pro-Quæstors. L. Quinctius Crispinus.
 L. Posthumius Tympanus.

L. Pupius Nepos.
 M. Alurius Geminus.
 L. Mummius Nepos.
 M. Fulvius Nobilior. He receives the honours of an Ovation at his return from Farther Spain.

563. Y. of R.

262. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS SCIPIO.
 C. LÆLIUS NEPOS.

Prætors of Rome. L. ARUNCULEIUS COTTA.
 Cn. FULVIUS FLACCUS.

Prætor in He-truria. D. JUNIUS BRUTUS.

Prætor in Apulia and Bruttium. M. TUCCIUS NEPOS.

Prætor in Sicily. L. ATINIUS LABEO.

Prætor on board the fleet designed to act against Antiochus. L. ÆMILIUS REGILLUS.

Curule Ædiles. P. Claudius Pulcher.
 L. Manlius Acidinus Fulvianus.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Claudius Marcellus.
 Q. Marcus Philippus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Aurelius Cotta.
 T. Sempronius Rutilus.

C. Calpurnius Piso.
 M. Ogulnius Gallus.
 Ti. Sempronius Rutilus.
 M. Furius Crassipes.
 M. Furius Luscus.
 M. Albinus Nepos.
 P. Petillius Nepos.
 M. Confidius Nepos.

Quæstors. C. Furius Aculeo.
 Ti. Minucius Augurinus Mellius.

M. Valerius Lævinus.
 L. Julius Cæsar.
 P. Valerius Lævinus.
 P. Cornelius Sisenna.
 A. Manlius Vulso.
 P. Cornelius Cethegus.

Pro-Consul in Cisalp. Gaul. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.

Pro-Consul in Greece. M. Acilius Glabrio. He triumphs over King Antiochus, and the Ætolians.

Pro-Consul

Pro-Consul in Q. Minucius Thermus.
Liguria.

Pro-Consul in L. Æmilius Paulus.
Farth. Spain.

Pro-Prætor in A. Cornelius Mammula.
Ætolia.

Pro-Prætor in L. Valerius Tappus.
Sicily.

Pro-Prætor in L. Oppius Salinator.
Sardinia.

Pro-Prætor in C. Flaminius Nepos.
Hist. Spain.

Pro-Quæstors. Q. Petillius Spurius.
C. Fannius Strabo.
L. Postumius Tynætorus.
M. Aburius Geminus.

564. Y. of R.

263. Consulship. CN. MANLIUS VULSO.
M. FULVIUS NOBILIOR.

Censors. T. Quinctius Flaminius.
M. Claudius Marcellus.

The forty-eighth Lustrum.

Prætor of SP. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.
Rome.

Prætor in Si- M. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS.
cily.

Prætor in Sar- Q. FABIVS PICTOR.
dunia.

Prætor in Hi- L. PLAUTIVS HYPSEVS.
ther Spain.

Prætor in Far- L. BÆBIUS DIVES.
ther Spain.

Prætor on the Q. FABIVS LABÆO. sea-coasts of Greece.

Curule-Ædiles. Ap. Claudius Pulcher.
P. Sulpicius Galba.

Plebeian Æ- Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
diles. M. Cæcilius Metellus.

Tribunes of the P. Sempronius Gracchus.
People. C. Sempronius Rutilus.

Q. Terentius Culco.

C. Atilius Serranus.

C. Petillius Spurius.

Q. Fictorius Nepos.

Q. Plætorius Nepos.

C. Decimius Flavius.

C. Mænius Nepos.

C. Nævius Crispus.

Quæstors. Q. Fabius Buteo.

P. Cornelius Mammula.

L. Postumius Albinus.

Q. Fictorius Scævola.

P. Fictorius Ligus.

T. Mænius Carus.

iv. Titinius Curtus.

vi. Pictorius Postea.

Pro-Consul in C. Lælius Nepos.

Cisalpe Gaul.

Pro-Consul in L. Æmilius Paulus.

Farth. Spain.

Pro-Prætor in D. Junius Brutus.

Hæthia.

Pro-Prætor in M. Tuccius Nepos.

Bruttia.

Pro-Prætor in L. Oppius Salinator.

Sardinia.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Valerius Lævinus.

C. Fannius Strabo.

P. Cornelius Cethegus.

Q. Petillius Spurius.

A. Manlius Vulso.

P. Cornelius Sisenna.

L. Æmilius Regillus has a Naval Triumph for having beaten
Antiochus's fleet.

L. Cornelius Scipio Asiaticus triumphs for having vanquished Antiochus.

Q. Fabius Labeo triumphs after his happy expedition in the island of Crete.

565. Y. of R.

264. Consulship. C. LIVIVS SALINATOR.
M. VALERIUS MESSALLA.

Prætor of M. CLAUDIVS MARCELLVS.
Rome.

Prætor in Si- Q. MARCIUS PHILIPPVS.
cily.

Prætor in Sar- C. STERTINIUS NEPOS.
dunia.

Prætor in Hi- L. MANLIUS ACIDINVS FUL-ther Spain. VIANVS.

Prætor in Far- Q. ATINIUS LABEO.
ther Spain.

Curule-Ædiles. P. Cornélius Sylla.
L. Quinctius Crispinus.

Plebeian Æ- M. Licinius Lucullus. diles. T. Mænius Nepos.

Tribunes of the C. Valerius Nepos.

People. M. Claudius Marcellinus.

Q. Nævius Matho.

Cn. Si-

Quæstors. Cn. Sicinius Nepos.
 M. Racilius Nepos.
 M. Decimius Nepos.
 P. Minucius Rufus.
 P. Sempronius Longus.
 L. Posthumius Tympanus.
 Sex. Roscius Nepos.
Q. Fabius Maximus.
C. Licinius Crassus.
P. Licinius Crassus.
C. Claudius Nero.
P. Mucius Scævola.
M. Titinius Nepos.
T. Fœnicus Capito.
M. Æmilius Lepidus.
Pro-Consul in M. Fulvius Nobilior.
 Ætolia.
Pro-Consul in Cn. Manlius Vulso.
 Asia.
Pro-Prætor in M. Tuccius Nepos.
 Bruttium.
Pro-Quæstors. Q. Mucius Scævola.
P. Cornelius Sisenna.
P. Cornelius Cethegus.
L. Posthumius Albinus.
A. Manius Vulso.
 566. Y. of R.
 265. Consulship. M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS.
C. FLAMINIUS NEPOS.
Prætors at SER. SULPICIUS GALBA.
 Rome. Q. TERENTIUS CULEO.
Prætor in Cis- M. FURIUS CRASSIPES.
 alpine Gaul.
Prætor at Ta- AP. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.
 rentum.
Prætor in Si- L. TERENTIUS MASSA.
 cily.
Prætor in Sar- Q. FULVIUS FLACCUS.
 dinia.
Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Cethegus.
A. Posthumius Albinus.
Plebeian Æ- C. SEMPRONIUS BLÆSUS. diles. M. Furius Luscus.
Tribunes of the Q. PETILLIUS SPURINUS, the son of People. Quinctus.
 Q. PETILLIUS SPURINUS, the son of Caius.
 M. NÆVIUS CRISPUS.
 C. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS.
 L. MUMUNIUS NEPOS.
 Q. MUMUNIUS NEPOS.
 C. FANNIUS STRABO.

Quæstors. T. Sempronius Gracchus.
 M. Aburius Geminus.
 L. Pupius Nepos.
C. Claudius Pulcher.
Cn. Cornelius Scipio.
C. Numicius Nepos.
L. Apulius Gallus.
M. Popilius Lænas.
M. Licinius Crassus.
M. Fulvius Flaccus.
P. Valerius Lævinus.
Pro-Prætor in L. Manlius Acidinus Fulvianus.
 Hith. Spain.
Pro-Prætor in C. Atinius Labeo.
 Farth. Spain.
Pro-Quæstors. Q. Fabius Maximus.
C. Licinius Crassus.
P. Valerius Lævinus.
A. Manlius Vulso.
M. Fulvius Nobilior. He triumphs over the Ætolians and Cephallenians.
Cn. Manlius Vulso. He triumphs over the Asiatick Gauls.

567. Y. of R.

266. Consulship. SP. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.

Q. MARCIUS PHILIPPUS.
M. LICINIUS LUCULLUS.

Prætor of Rome.

Prætor in Si- P. CORNELIUS SYLLA.
 cily.

Prætor in Sar- C. AURELIUS SCAURUS.
 dinia.

Prætor in Hi- L. QUINCTIUS CRISPINUS.
 ther Spain.

Prætor in Far- C. CALPURNIUS PISO.
 ther Spain.

Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Sisenna.
Sp. Posthumius Albinus Palulus.

Plebeian Æ- Q. Nævius Matho. diles. C. Decimius Flaccus.

Tribunes of the M. Fulvius Flaccus.
 People. M. Ogulnius Gallus.

C. Terentius Istra.

L. Acilius Glabrio.

Q. Opimius Nepos.

Q. Opimius Panfa.

A. Terentius Varro.

L. Cæcilius Denter.

L. Duronius Nepos.

M. Trebonius Flavus.

Quæstors.

Quæstors. A. Hostilius Mancinus.
L. Villius Tappulus.
L. Postumius Albinus.
C. Papilius Lænas.
Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispalus.
C. Valerius Lævinus.
C. Lucretius Trio.
C. Clavius Saxula.

Pro-Prætors in The same as the last year.
Spain.

Pro-Quæstors. Q. Fabius Maximus.
C. Licinius Crassus.
M. Fulvius Flaccus.
P. Valerius Lævinus, the son of Publius.
P. Valerius Lævinus, the son of Marcus.
A. Manius Vulso.

568. Y. of R.
 267. Consulship. AP. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.
M. SEMPRONIUS TUDI-
TANUS.

Prætors. P. CORNELIUS CETHEGUS.
C. AFRICANUS STELLIO.
M. CLAUDIUS MARCEL-
LINUS.
A. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.
C. ATILIUS SERRANUS.
L. POSTHUMIUS TYMPANUS.

Curule Ædiles. L. Julius Cæsar.
M. Valerius Lævinus.

Plebeian Æ- Cn. Sicinius Nepos. diles. L. Puppilius Nepos.

Tribunes of the M. Nævius Crispus.
 People. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
A. Trebius Gallus.
C. Trebonius Asper.
L. Mædus Tullus.
T. Minucius Augurinus Mol-liculus.
Q. Catius Nepos.
M. Trebius Gallus.
Sp. Antius Restio.
P. Scantinius Capitolinus.
Ti. Claudius Nero.
A. Licinius Nerva.
C. Quinctius Flaminius.
C. Abarius Geminus.
T. Annius Lusus.
C. Mummius Gallus.
C. Arrenius Nepos.
T. Metilius Cretæ.

Pro-Prætors in L. Quinctius Crispinus,
Hisber and C. Calpurnius Piso.
Fort. Spain.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Lucretius Trio.
M. Fulvius Flaccus.
L. Clavius Saxula.
P. Valerius Lævinus Fulvianus.
L. Manlius Acidinus Fulvianus.
 He receives the Honours of an Ovation, at his return from his Pro-Prætorship in Spain.

569. Y. of R.

268. Consulship. P. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.
L. PORCIUS LICINUS.
 Censers. L. Valerius Flaccus.
M. Porcius Cato.

The forty-ninth Lustrum.

Prætors at C. DECIMIUS FLAVUS.
 Rome. P. CORNELIUS CETHEGUS.

Prætor in Si- C. Sempronius BLÆSUS.
 cily.

Prætor in Sar- Q. NÆVIUS MATHO.
 dinia.

Prætors in Hi- A. TERENTIUS VARRO.
 ther and Far- P. SEMPRONIUS LONGUS.
 ther Spain.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Pulvius Flaccus.
M. Ogulnius Gallus.

Plebeian Æ- L. Mummius Nepos. diles. T. Cæcilius Denter.

Tribunes of the M. Titinius Curvus.
 People. L. Minucius Thermus.
P. Villius Tappulus.
M. Fannius Strabo.
C. Fundanius Fundulus.
Q. Mucius Scævola.
M. Scaptius Nepos.
M. Pompilius Nepos.
Q. Titius Nepos.
Q. Apronius Nepos.

Quæstors.

Cn. Servilius Cæpio.
Ap. Claudius Centho.
C. Papirius Turdus.
Ser. Cornelius Sylla.
C. Cassius Longinus.
M. Atilius Serranus.
C. Valerius Lævinus.
M. Mattienius Nepos.

Pro-Prætor

L. Cornelius Dolabella.

T. Metellus Creso.

C. Cicereius Nepos.

C. Arennius Nepos.

A. Terentius Varro. He receives the Honours of an Ovation, after having conquered the Celtiberians.

572. Y. of R.

271. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS CETHEGUS.

M. BÆBIUS TAMPHILUS.

Prætors at Q. PETILLIUS SPURINUS.

Rome. Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS.

Prætor in Cis- Q. FABIUS BUTEO.

alpine Gaul.

Prætor in Apu- L. DURONIUS NEPOS.

lia.

Prætor in Si- C. CLAUDIUS NERO.

cily.

Prætor in Sar- M. PINARIUS POSCA.

dinia.

Curule Ædiles. Gn. Cornelius Scipio.

C. Valerius Lævinus.

Plebeian Æ- Q. Mucius Scaevola.

diles.

P. Mucius Scaevola.

Tribunes of the C. Orcius Nepos.

People.

L. Aquilius Gallus.

C. Popilius Lænas.

Cn. Furius Broechus.

C. Veturius Calvinus.

M. Aquilius Florus.

C. Cluvius Saxula.

D. Quinctius Nepos.

T. Numicius Nepos.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus.

Quæstors.

L. Cornelius Scipio.

P. Furius Philus.

Sp. Lucretius Gallus.

L. Hortensius Nepos.

C. Hostilius Tubulus.

M. Fabius Buteo.

P. Licinius Varus.

M. Fabius Dorsæ.

Pro-Consuls in Cn. Bæbius Tampophilus.

Liguria.

L. Æmilius Paulus. He triumphs over the Ligures.

Pro-Prætors in Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

Hither and P. Manlius Vulso.

Farth. Spain.

Pro-Quæstors. Cn. Sicinius Nepos.

Sp. Cluvius Saxula.

L. Arennius Nepos.

M. Claudius Marcellus.

C. Furius Bibaculus.

L. Cornelius Dolabella.

573. Y. of R.

272. Consulship. A. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.

C. CALPURNIUS PISO.

The latter dies in his Office, and is succeeded by

Q. FULVIUS FLACCUS.

Prætors at A. HOSTILIUS MANCINUS.

Rome.

TI. MINUCIUS AUGUR-

NUS MOLLICULUS.

C. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.

Prætor in Si- P. CORNELIUS MAMMULA.

cily.

Prætor in Sar- C. MÆNIUS NEPOS.

dinia.

Prætors in Hi- TI. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS.

ther and Far-

L. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.

ther Spain.

Curule Ædiles. TI. CLAUDIUS NERO.

C. QUINCTIUS FLAMINIUS.

Plebeian Æ- M. TICINIUS CURVUS.

diles.

P. ÆLIUS LIGUS.

Tribunes of the L. VILLIUS TAPPULUS.

People.

C. CANINIUS REBILUS.

M. CANINIUS REBILUS.

M. CÆCILIUS DENTER.

Q. BÆBIUS SULCA.

T. ANNIUS LUSCUS.

M. MARCIUS RALLA.

T. METILLIUS CROTO.

C. MEMMIUS GALLUS.

C. ARENNIUS NEPOS.

C. MARCIUS FIGULUS.

C. LUCRETIUS GALLUS.

Cn. OCTAVIUS NEPOS.

T. MANLIUS TERQUATUS.

Q. MÆNIUS NEPOS.

M. CORNELIUS MAMMULA.

C. LUTATIUS CERTO.

C. FABIUS LICINUS.

Pro-Consuls in P. CORNELIUS Cethegus.

Liguria.

M. Bæbius Tampophilus. They both triumph over the Li-gures.

Pro-Prætor in Q. Fabius Buteo.

Cisalp. Gaul.

Pro-

Pro-Prætor at L. Duronius Nepos.
Tarentum.

Pro-Prætor in M. Pinarius Posca.
Sardinia.

Pro-Prætors in Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
Hither and P. Manlius Vulso. The former Farth. Spain. triumphs for having conquered Hither Spain.

Pro-Quæstors. Sp. Lucretius Gallus.
Ser. Sulpicius Paterculus.
P. Licinius Varus.
L. Cornelius Dolabella.
C. Cicereius Nepos.
C. Furius Bibaculus.
M. Fabius Dorso.

574. Y. of R.

273. Consulship. L. MANLIUS ACIDINUS FULVIANUS.

Q. FULVIUS FLACCUS, brothers. The latter triumphs over the Ligures.

Censors. M. Aelius Lepidus.
M. Fulvius Nobilior.

The fiftieth Lustrum.

Prætors of P. MUCIUS SCÆVOLA.
Rome. CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO HIS- PALUS.

Prætor in Si- Q. MUCIUS SCÆVOLA.
cily.

Prætor in Sar- C. VALERIUS LÆVINUS.
dinia.

Curule Ædiles. Gn. Servilius Cæpio.
Ap. Claudius Centho.

Plebeian Æ- C. Numisius Nepos. diles. M. Popilius Lænas.

Tribunes of the T. Juventius Thalna.
People. A. Terentius Varro.
C. Cassius Longinus.
L. Minucius Thermus.
C. Mattienius Nepos.
P. Aquillius Gallus.
M. Atilius Serranus.
C. Lucretius Trio.
P. Mattienius Nepos.
T. Otacilius Crassus.

Quæstors. Gn. Babius Tamphilus.
L. Anicius Gallus.
M. Servilius Pulex.
L. Porcius Licinus.
M. Marcius Sermo.
C. Sulpicius Galba.

L. Furius Philus.

P. Fonteius Capito.

Pro-Prætor in Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
Hither and L. Posthumius Albinus.
Farth. Spain.

Quæstors. T. Manlius Torquatus.
M. Fabius Dorso.
C. Fabius Licinus.
L. Cornelius Dolabella.

575. Y. of R.

274. Consulship. M. JUNIUS BRUTUS.
A. MANLIUS VULSO.

Prætors at M. TITINIUS CURVUS.
Rome. Ti. CLAUDIUS NERO.

Prætor in Si- P. AELIUS LIGUS.
cily.

Prætor in Sar- T. AEBUTIUS CARUS.
dinia.

Prætors in Hi- M. TITINIUS NEPOS.
ther and Far- T. FONTEIUS CAPITO.
ther Spain.

Curule Ædiles. L. Papirius Mæso.
M. Cornelius Scipio Maluginensis.

Plebeian Æ- C. Popilius Lænas. diles. L. Aquillius Gallus.

Tribunes of the A. Licinius Nerva.
People. C. Papirius Turdus.

Q. Aelius Pætus.
L. Egilius Nepos.
C. Cicereius Nepos.
L. Canuleius Dives.
C. Mattienius Nepos.
M. Mattienius Nepos.
L. Claudius Afellus.
M. Racius Nepos.

Quæstors. Sex. Julius Cæsar.
Q. Cassius Longinus.
Q. Apuleius Pansa.
C. Servilius Geminus.
T. Manlius Torquatus.
C. Papirius Carbo.
P. Fonteius Balbus.
C. Decimius Flavius.

Pro-Prætors in Ti. Sempronius Gracchus. He tri-Hither and umphs over the Celtiberians.
Farth. Spain. L. Posthumius Albinus. He triumphs over the Lusitani and Raccæi.

Pro-Quæstors. Ti. Manlius Torquatus.
L. Furius Philus.
M. Fabius Dorso.
L. Fabius Licinus.

P. Fonteius Capito.
L. Cornelius Dolabella.

576. Y. of R.

275. Consulship. C. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.

He triumphs over the Ligures and Istri.

TI. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS.

Prætors at P. ÆLIUS TUBERO.
Rome. C. QUINCTIUS FLAMININUS.

Prætors in Cis- C. CORNELIUS SCIPIO.
alpine Gaul. P. VALERIUS LÆVINUS.

Prætor in Si- C. NUMISIUS NEPOS.
cily.

Prætor in Sar- L. MUMMIUS NEPOS.
dinia.

Curule Ædiles. Ser. Cornelius Sylla.
N. Fabius Buteo.

Plebeian Æ- T. Arrius Luscus. diles. C. Memmius Gallus.

Tribunes of the Cn. Fulvius Flaccus Nobilior.
People.

C. Sallonius Sarra.
 L. Terentius Massa
 M. Claudius Marcellus.
 Sp. Carvilius Maximus.
 Cn. Sicinius Nepos.
 L. Flavius Nepos.
 M. Junius Pænnus.
 L. Decimus Flavius.
 Sp. Cluvius Saxula.

Quæstors. Ser. Cornelius Lentulus.

L. Apuleius Saturninus.

M. Fonteius Capito.

L. Livius Denter.

C. Licinius Nerva.

Q. Marcianus Ralla.

C. Sulpicius Gallus.

P. Terentius Lucanus.

Pro-Consuls at M. Junius Brutus.

Aquileia and A. Manlius Vulso. in Istria.

Pro-Consul at Ti. Claudius Nero.
Pisa.

Pro-Consul in T. Æbutius Carus.
Sardinia.

Pro-Prætors in M. Titinius Nepos.

Hither and T. Fonteius Capito.

Farth. Spain.

Pro-Quæstors. Q. Apuleius Pansa.

C. Papirius Carbo.

C. Decimus Flavius.

C. Servilius Geminus.

P. Fonteius Balbus.
P. Fonteius Capito.

577. Y. of R.

276. Consulship. CN. CORNELIUS SCIPIO HISPALLUS.

Q. PETILLIUS SPURINUS. The former dies in his office, and is succeeded by

C. VALERIUS LÆVINUS.
 The latter was killed in Liguria.

Prætors at L. PAPIRIUS MASO.

Rome. M. ABURIUS GEMINUS.

Prætor in Si- L. AQUILIUS GALLUS.
cily.

Prætor in Sar- M. POPILIUS LÆNAS.
dinia.

Prætors in Hi- P. LICINIUS CRASSUS.

ther and Far- M. CORNELIUS SCIPIO MAther Spain. LUGINENSIS.

Curule Ædiles. P. Furius Philus.

N. Fabius Buteo.

Plebeian Æ- C. Cassius Longinus.

diles. M. Atilius Serranus.

Tribunes of the C. Aburius Geminus.

People. L. Hortensius Nepos.

C. Munatius Plancus.

P. Licinius Varus.

C. Servilius Casca.

Sp. Lucretius Gallus.

A. Pompeius Nepos.

Cn. Licinius Nerva.

M. Aurelius Cotta.

Sex. Pompeius Nepos.

Quæstors of Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.

Rome. A. Manlius Torquatus.

M. Acilius Glabrio.

M. Claudius Marcellus.

M. Fulvius Nobilior.

C. Titinius Nepos.

M. Æbutius Elva.

P. Clælius Siculus.

Pro-Consul in L. Claudius Pulcher.

Cisalp. Gaul.

Pro-Consul at Ti. Claudius Nero.

Pisa.

Pro-Consul in Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.

Sardinia.

Pro-Prætor in T. Æbutius Carus.

Sardinia.

Pro-Prætors in M. Titinius Nepos.

Hither and T. Fonteius Capito.

Farth. Spain.

Pro-

Pro-Quæstors. M. Fonteius Capito.
C. Papirius Carbo.
C. Decimius Flavius.
L. Livius Dentor.
P. Fonteius Balbus.
 The Consul Valerius triumphs
 over the Ligures.

578. Y. of R.

277. Consulship. P. MUCIUS SCÆVOLA.
M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS, a second time. He triumphs
 over the Ligures.

Prætors. C. POPILLIUS LÆNAS.
T. ANNIUS LUSCUS.
C. MEMMIUS GALLUS.
C. CLUVIUS SAXULA.

Prætor in Sar- SER. CORNELIUS SYLLA.
 dinia.

Prætor in Far- AP. CLAUDIUS CENther Spain. THO.

Curule Ædiles. L. Camuleius Dives.
C. Licinius Crassus.

Plebeian Æ- L. Villius Tappidus. diles. C. Caninius Rebilus.

Tribunes of the C. Marcus Figulus.
 People. Q. Mænius Nepos.
M. Decimus Flavius.
T. Memmius Nepos.
Sex. Marcus Rex.
C. Lucretius Gallus.
C. Lutatius Cerco.
Cn. Apuleius Pansa.
C. Furius Brocchus.
P. Decius Subulo.

Quæstors. M. Juventius Thalna.
M. Cornelius Cethegus.
C. Posthumius Albinus.
G. Fannius Strabo.
Sex. Sulpicius Galba.
Ti. Claudius Nero.
P. Quinctilius Varus.
P. Cornelius Blasio.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Titinius Nepos.
P. Clodius Sículus.
M. Æbutius Elva.

579. Y. of R.

278. Consulship. *SP. POSTHUMIUS ALBI-
 NUS.*

Censors. Q. MUCIUS SCÆVOLA.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
A. Posthumius Albinus.

Prætors at C. CASSIUS LONGINUS.
 Rome. L. CORNELIUS SCIPIO.

Prætor in Si- L. CLAUDIUS ASELLUS.
 cily.

Prætor in Sar- M. ATILIUS SERRANUS.
 dinia.

Prætor in Hi- P. FURIUS PHILUS.
 ther Spain.

Prætor in Far- CN. SERVILIUS CÆPIO.
 ther Spain.

Curule Ædiles. C. Sulpicius Galba.
L. Furius Philus.

Plebeian, Æ- C. Sicinius Nepon. diles. M. Junius Pennus.

Tribunes of the Cn. Bæbius Tampilus.
 People. P. Fonteius Capito.

Cn. Octavius Nepos.
C. Racius Nepon.

M. Marcus Sermo.
L. Anicius Gallus.

M. Servilius Pulex Geminus.
L. Porcius Licinus.

Q. Marcus Figulus.
L. Publilius Philo.

Quæstors. Q. Voconius Saxa.
P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.
P. Cornelius Lentulus.
C. Sulpicius Rufus.
M. Claudius Flamininus.
C. Scribonius Curia.
Cn. Aufidius Nepon.
P. Rutilus Calvus.

Pro-Prætor in Ser. Cornelius Sylla.
 Sardinia.

Pro-Prætor in Ap. Claudius Cench. He van-Hith. Spain. quishes the Celtiberians, and receives the honours of an Ovation.

Pro-Quæstors. Ti. Claudius Nero.
C. Titinius Nepon.
P. Clælius Sículus.
P. Quinctilius Varus.
M. Æbutius Elva.

580. Y. of R.

279. Consulship. *L. POSTHUMIUS ALBI-
 NUS.*

M. POPILIUS LÆNAS.

Prætors at A. ATILIUS SERRANUS.
 Rome. C. CLUVIUS SAXULA.

Prætor in Si- M. FURIUS CRASSIPES.
 cily.

Prætor in Sar- C. CICEREIUS NEPOS.
 dinia. Prætors

Prætors in Hi- N. FABIVS BUTEO. ther and Far- M. MATTIENIVS NEPOS.
ther Spain.

Curule Ediles. T. Manlius Torquatus.
 Q. Hostilius Tubulus.

Plebeian Æ- M. Claudius Marcellus. diles. C. Servilius Casca.

Tribunes of the Q. Cassius Longinus.
People. C. Papirius Carbo.

C. Decimius Flavius.

Cn. Fulvius Gilla.

L. Petillius Geminus.

C. Servilius Geminus.

P. Fonteius Balbus.

L. Cælius Caldus.

Q. Trebellius Nepos.

M. Publicius Malleolus.

Quæstors. C. Tremellius Fiacus.

P. Decimius Flavius.

L. Postumius Timpæus.

M. Aufidius Nepos.

Q. Publicius Bibulus.

A. Bæbius Sulca.

L. Cincius Alimentus.

Q. Nævius Pollio.

Pro-Prætor in M. Atilius Serranus.
Sardinia.

Pro-Prætor in P. Furius Philus.
Hib. Spain.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Scribonius Curio.
 P. Clælius Siculus.
 Cn. Aufidius Nepos.

581. Y. of R.

280. Consulship. C. POPILIUS LÆNAS.
 P. ÆLIUS LIGUS. Both
 Plebeians, for the first time.

Prætors at C. LICINIUS CRASSUS.
Rome. Cn. SICINIUS NEPOS.

Prætor in Si- C. MEMMIUS GALLUS.
cily.

Prætor in Sar- Sp. CLUVIUS SAXULA.
dinia.

Prætor in Hi- M. JUNIUS PENNUS.
ther Spain.

Prætor in Far- Sp. LUCRETIVS GALLUS.
ther Spain.

Curule Ediles. C. Sulpicius Gallus.
 Ser. Cornelius Lentulus.

Plebeian Æ- Q. Manius Nepos.

diles. C. Marcus Fugius.

Tribunes of the M. Lucretius Gallus.

People. M. Marcus Serrus.

Q. Marcius Ralla.

Q. Apuleius Pansa.

L. Livius Denter.

M. Perperna.

C. Antistius Labeo.

L. Apuleius Saturninus.

P. Terentius Tuscivicanus.

L. Junius Silanus.

Quæstors. M. Valerius Messalla.

M. Cornelius Cethegus.

L. Bæbius Dices.

A. Antonius Nepos.

C. Apuleius Saturninus.

A. Posthumius Albinus.

M. Antoninus Nepos.

M. Pomponius Matho.

Pro-Consul in M. Popilius Lænas.

Liguria.

Pro-Quæstors. M. Aufidius Nepos.

M. Cincius Alimentus.

Q. Nævius Pollio.

P. Clælius Siculus.

C. Cicereius. He triumphs over the Corsicans on the hill of Alba.

The second War with Macedon.

582. Y. of R.

281. Consulship. P. LICINIUS CRASSUS.
 C. CASSIVS LONGINVS.

Prætors at C. SULPICIVS GALBA.
Rome. L. VILLIVS TAPPVLVS.

Prætor on board P. LUCRETIVS GALLVS. the fleet designed to act against Per-ses.

Prætor in Si- C. CANINIUS REBILVS.
cily.

Prætor in Sar- L. FURIUS PHILVS.
dinia.

Prætor in Hi- L. CANULEIVS DIVES. ther and Far-
ther Spain.

Curule Ediles. Cn. Bæbius Tampilus.
 Cn. Otavius Nepos.

Plebeian Æ- P. Fonteius Capito. diles. L. Anicius Gallus.

Tribunes of the M. Furius Nobilior.

People. M. Claudius Marcellus.

M. Icilius Glabrio.

Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.

T. Numisius

Quæstors. T. Numisius Tarquinienfis.
M. Fonteius Capito.
P. Manilius Nepos.
C. Licinius Nerva.
C. Titinius Nepos.
Cn. Anicius Gallus.
L. Aurelius Orestes.
M. Æmilius Lepidus.
Ti. Sempronius Longus.
C. Sempronius Longus.
Ti. Sempronius Musca.
L. Nævius Balbus.
M. Sergius Silus.
Cn. Sergius Plancus.

Pro-Quæstors. L. Cincius Alimentus.
Q. Nævius Polleo.

583. Y. of R.
282. Consulship. A. HOSTILIUS MANCI-
NUS.
A. ATILIUS SERRANUS.

Prætors at Rome. M. RÆCIUS NEPOS.
Q. MÆNIUS NEPOS.

Prætor on the sea-coasts of Greece. L. HORTENSIUS NEPOS.

Curule Ædiles. Ser. Sulpicius Galba.
C. Posthumius Albinus.
Q. Cassius Longinus.
Cn. Fulvius Gilla.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Juventius Thalna.
Cn. Aufidius Nepos.
C. Fannius Strabo.
Q. Mamilius Vitulus.
M. Titius Rufus.
P. Cominius Nepos.
L. Silius Nerva.
Q. Manilius Nepos.
C. Apronius Limo.

Tribunes of the People. C. Cædicius Noctua.
Cn. Cornelius Dolabella.
C. Mamilius Turrinus.
Ti. Veturius Calvinus Semproni-
anus.
Sex. Julius Cæsar.
Q. Æmilius Lepidus.
Q. Valerius Falto.
M. Æmilius Ragillus.
P. Curatius Nepos.

Quæstors. P. Licinius Crassus.

Pro-Consul in Macedon. C. Lucretius Gallus.

Pro-Consul on board the fleet.

Pro-Quæstors. Ti. Sempronius Longus.
M. Sergius Silus.
Ti. Sempronius Musca.
L. Cincius Alimentus.

584. Y. of R.
283. Consulship. Q. MARCIUS PHILIPPUS,
a second time.
CN. SERVILIUS CÆPIO.
C. Claudius Pulcher.
Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.

Censors.

The fifty-second Lustrum.

Prætors at Rome. C. SULPICIUS GALLUS.
C. DECIMIUS FLAVUS.

Prætor on the coasts of Greece. C. MARCIUS FIGULUS.

Prætor in Sicily. SER. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.

Prætor in Sardinia. P. FONTEIUS CAPITO.

Prætor in Spain. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS.

Curule Ædiles. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.
P. Cornelius Lentulus.

Plebeian Ædiles. A. Licinius Nerva.
L. Livius Denton.

Tribunes of the People. C. Sulpicius Rufus.
M. Claudius Flaminius.
P. Rutilius Calvus.
Q. Voconius Saxa.
L. Anicius Gallus.
Q. Minucius Rufus.
L. Ogulnius Gallus.
C. Scribonius Curio.
C. Otacilius Crassus.
M. Licinius Lucullus.

Quæstors of Rome. Q. Opimius Nepos.
L. Pompeius Nepos.
T. Minucius Rufus.
L. Æmilius Lepidus.
L. Licinius Pollio.
Q. Aulus Cerretanus.
Q. Minucius Rufus.
C. Aurelius Cotta.

Pro-Consul in Macedon. A. Hostilius Mancinus.

Pro-Quæstors. Ti. Veturius Calvinus Semproni-anus.
M. Æmilius Regillus.
P. Curatius Nepos.

585. Y. of R.

264. Consulship. L. ÆMILIUS PAULUS, a
second time.

C. LICINIUS CRASSUS.

Prætor at CN. BÆBIUS TAMPHILUS.
Rome.Prætor in Illy- L. ANICIUS GALLUS. ricum.Prætor on the CN. OCTAVIUS NEPOS, coasts of
Greece.Prætor in Si- M. ÆBUTIUS ELVA. cily.Prætor in Sar- C. PAPIRIUS CAREO. dinia.Prætor in P. FONTEIUS BALEUS.
Spain.Curule-Ediles. M. Claudius Marcellus.
Cn. Domitius Æmobarbus.Plebeian Æ- C. Titinius Nepos. diles. C. Fannius Strabo.Tribunes of the L. Posthumius Tympanus.
People. P. Decimius Flavius.

C. Tremellius Flaccus.

Q. Publicius Bibulus.

Q. Ælius Tubero.

Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

M. Aufidius Nepos.

L. Cincius Alimentus.

Q. Lollius Nepos.

P. Claudius Asellus.

Quæstors.

L. Manlius Acidinus.

L. Stertinius Nepos.

L. Valerius Flaccus.

T. Annius Luscus.

L. Marcius Censorinus.

L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus.

Q. Marcius Rex.

T. Claudius Canina.

Pro-Consul in Cn. Servilius Cæpio.
Cisalp. Gaul.Pro-Prætor in P. Fonteius Capito.
Sardinia.Pro-Prætor in M. Claudius Marcellus.
Spain.Pro-Quæstors. L. Æmilius Lepidus.

L. Licinius Pollio.

C. Aurelius Cotta.

P. Curatius Nepos.

586. Y. of R.

285. Consulship. Q. ÆLIUS PÆTUS.
M. JUNIUS PENNUS.Prætors at Q. CASSIUS LONGINUS.

Rome. M. JUVENTIUS THALNA.

Prætors in Si- Ti. CLAUDIUS NERO.
cily.Prætor in Sar- A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS. dinia.Prætors in Hi- Cn. FULVIUS GILLO.ther and Far- C. LICINIUS NERVA.ther Spain.Curule-Ediles. M. Cornelius Cethegus.

M. Valerius Messala.

Plebeian Æ- Cn. Aufidius Nepos.diles. L. Silius Nerva.Tribunes of the M. Antonius Nepos.People. M. Pomponius Matho.

Ti. Sempronius Longus.

L. Bæbius Dives.

C. Apuleius Saturninus.

M. Porcius Læca.

M. Cosconius Nepos.

A. Antoninus Nepos.

P. Rutilius Rufus.

M. Curius Dentatus.

Quæstors.

L. Cornelius Scipio.

Q. Fulvius Nobilior.

P. Licinius Muraena.

C. Afranius Stellio.

P. Porcius Læca.

M. Tuccius Nepos.

M. Helvius Blasis.

Q. Fulcinius Trio.

Pro-Consul in L. Æmilius Paulus. He tri-Macedon. umphs over Macedon, and King Perseus, for three days together.Pro-Consul in C. Licinius Crassus.
Cisalp. Gaul.Pro-Prætor on Cn. Octavius. He obtains a the coasts of Naval Triumph.
Greece.Pro-Prætor in P. Fonteius Capito.
Sardinia.Pro-Prætor in L. Anicius Gallus. He triumphs Illyricum. over King Gentius and the Illyrians.Pro-Quæstors. L. Valerius Flaccus.

L. Cornelius Lupus.

Q. Aulus Cerretanus.

L. Marcius Censorinus.

C. Aurelius Cotta.

587. Y. of R.

268. Consulship. C. SULPICIUS GALLUS.
M. CLAUDIUS

M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS. He triumphs over the Gauls and Ligures.

Prætors. L. LIVIUS DENTER.
A. LICINIUS NERVA.
P. QUINCTILIUS VARUS.
L. APULEIUS SATURNINUS.¹
P. RUTILIUS CALVUS.
M^r FONTEIUS CAPITO.

Curule Ædiles. M. Fulvius Nobilior.
M^r Acilius Glabrio.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. Anicius Gallus.
C. Sulpicius Rufus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Aurelius Orestes.
Ti. Sempronius Musca.
C. Urfanius Nepos.
Sex. Staius Nepos.
C. Fescennius Nepos.
C. Sempronius Longus.
C. Nævius Balbus.
T. Pædanius Nepos.
C. Numitorius Pullus.
P. Sallonius Sarra.

Quæstors. L. Posthumius Albinus.
L. Licinius Lucullus.
L. Cornelius Marula.
M^r Acilius Glabrio.
Q. Marcius Philippus.
M^r Mamilius Nepos.
C. Ælius Tabero.
Sex. Digitius Nepos.

Pro-Quæstors. M. Helvius Blasio.
Q. Fulcinius Trio.
Q. Aulus Cerretanus.

588. Y. of R.
287. Consulship. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS.

Prætors. CN. OCTAVIUS NEPOS.
P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO NASICA.
P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.
CN. DOMITIUS ÆNOBARBUS.
SER. SULPICIUS GALBA.
M. CLAUDIUS FLAMININUS.
M. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.

Curule Ædiles. Sex. Julius Cæsar.
Cn. Cornelius Dolabella.

Plebeian Ædiles. Q. Voconius Saxa.
P. Decimius Flævus.

Tribunes of the People. C. Mamilius Turinus.
P. Curatius Nepos.
C. Pontificius Nepos.
C. Tarquitius Flaccus.

VOL. II.

P. Sestius Nepos.
C. Cædicius Noctua.
Q. Scantius Nepos.
M. Urbinius Nepos.
L. Tuccius Nepos.
L. Julius Sequetris.
M. Fossius Nepos.
Sex. Potitius Nepos.
L. Calpurnius Piso Cæsoninus.
Cn. Tremellius Flaccus.
P. Cornelius Lentulus.
M. Manlius Acidinus.
C. Helvius Blasio.
M. Fundanius Fundulus.

Quæstors. M. Fonteius Capito.

Pro-Prætor in Farth. Spain.
Pro-Quæstors. M. Helvius Blasio.
Q. Fulcinius Trio.
Sex. Digitius Nepos.

589. Y. of R.
288. Consulship. A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS.

Censors. Q. CASSIUS LONGINUS.
He dies during his Office.
L. Æmilius Paulus.
Q. Marcius Philippus.

The fifty-third Lustrum.

Prætors. M. VALERIUS MESSALA.
C. FANNIUS STRABO.
M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS.
C. TITINIUS NEPOS.
CN. AUFIDIUS NEPOS.
C. SCRIBONIUS CURIO.

Curule Ædiles. M. Antonius Nepos.
M. Pomponius Matho.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Tremellius Flaccus.
L. Posthumius Tympanus.

Tribunes of the People. L. Pomponius Nepos.
T. Minucius Rufus.
L. Licinius Pollio.
C. Aurelius Cotta.
M. Servilius Geminus.
C. Antonius Nepos.
Q. Opimius Nepos.
Q. Minucius Rufus.
Q. Aulus Cerretanus.
C. Æbutius Carus.

Quæstors. L. Mummius Nepos.
L. Atilius Regulus.
M^r Acilius Balbus.

4 P

G. Car.

C. Cornelius Cethegus.
Cn. Cornelius Mehenis.
L. Rutilius Flaccus.
L. Furius Purpureus.
C. Rutilius Rufus.
 Pro-Quæstors. M. Marcius Minimus.
M. Fannius Fannulus.
Sex. Digitius Nepos.
 592. Y. of R.
 289. Consulship. TI. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS, a second time.
M' JUVENTIUS THALNA.
 Prætors. M. CORNELIUS CETHEGUS.
M. FULVIUS NOBILIOR.
M. ACILIUS GLABRIO.
L. ANILIUS GALLUS.
C. SULPICIUS RUFUS.
Q. PUBLICIUS BIBULUS.
 Curule-Ædiles. L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus.
L. Valerius Flaccus.
 Plebeian Ædiles. Ti. Sempronius Longus.
L. Aurelius Orestes.
 Tribunes of the People. L. Stertinius Nepos.
L. Marcus Censorinus.
M. Minucius Fessius.
Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
M. Decius Mus.
T. Annius Luscus.
Q. Marcus Rex.
C. Terentius Culeo.
C. Oppius Cornicinus.
M. Cælius Rufus.
 Quæstors. M. Porcius Cato.
A. Posthumius Albinus.
T. Vitorius Philo.
M. Opimius Nepos.
L. Oppius Salinator.
M. Licinius Stolo.
L. Pinarius Natta.
M' Minucius Thermus.
 Pro-Quæstors. C. Rutilius Rufus.
Sex. Digitius Nepos.

591. Y. of R.

290. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO NASICA.
C. MARCIUS FIGULUS.
 But there was some defect in their election; and in their room were chosen
P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.

CN. DOMITIUS ÆNO-BARBUS.

Prætors.

M. ÆMILIUS LÆPIDUS.
Q. VOCONIUS SAXA.
L. BÆBIUS DIVES.
CN. CORNELIUS DOLABELLA.
P. DECIMIUS FLAVUS.
A. ANTONIUS NEPOS.

Curule-Ædiles.

L. Manlius Acidinus.
L. Cornelius Scipio Asiaticus.

Plebeian Ædiles.

C. Mamilius Turrinus Limitanus.
L. Pomponius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People.

Q. Fulvius Nobilior.
C. Afranius Stellio.
M. Tuccius Nepos.
M. Helvius Blasio.
Cn. Domitius Calvinus.
P. Licinius Muræna.
P. Porcius Læca.
Q. Fulcinius Trio.
Sp. Carvilius Maximus.
C. Cosconius Nepos.
T. Quinctius Flamininus.
C. Livius Drusus.
Sp. Posthumius Albinus.
C. Aurelius Scaurus.
A. Gabinus Nepos.
L. Æmilius Regillus.
C. Cæcilius Nepos.
L. Fabricius Luscinius.

Quæstors.

Pro-Corsul in Sardinia.

Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.

Pro-Prætor in Sicily.

M' Acilius Glabrio.

Pro-Quæstors.

M. Opimius Nepos.
L. Pinarius Natta.
L. Oppius Salinator.
M. Minucius Thermus.

592. Y. of R.

291. Consulship. M. VALERIUS MESSALA.
C. FANNIUS STRABO.
 Prætors. M. POMPONIUS MATRO.
SEX. JULIUS CÆSAR.

C. TRIMELLIUS FLACCUS.
L. POSTHUMIUS TYPANUS.
P. SEXTIUS NEPOS.
M. ANTONIUS NEPOS.

Plebeian Ædiles.

Q. Opimius Nepos.
C. Antonius Nepos.

Tribunes of the People.

L. Licinius Lucullus.
M' Acilius Glabrio.

4 M' Mamilius

M' Mamilius Nepos.
 C. Ælius Tubero.
 Q. Marcius Philippus.
 Sex. Pomponius Nepos.
 Ti. Sempronius Rutilus.
 Sex. Digitius Nepos.
 L. Flavius Nepos.
 L. Atilius Bulbus.
 Quæstors. C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
 C. Titius Nepos.
 Q. Ælius Pætus.
 M. Junius Silanus.
 Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
 P. Sempronius Blæsus.
 M. Atilius Serranus.
 C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
 Pro-Quæstors. M. Minucius Termus.
 L. Fabricius Luscinus.
 593. Y. of R.
 292. Consulship. L. ANICIUS GALLUS.
 M. CORNELIUS CETHE-
 GUS.
 Prætors. L. ORELIUS ORESTES.
 T. SEMPRONIUS LONGUS.
 L. JULIUS SEQUESTRIUS.
 L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS
 LUPUS.
 T. MINUCIUS RUFUS.
 L. TUCCIUS NEPOS.
 Curule Ædiles. Q. Fulvius Nobilior.
 L. Marcius Censorinus.
 Plebeian Æ- T. Annius Luscus. diles. L. Stertinius Nepos.
 Tribunes of the Cn. Tremellius Flaccus.
 People. Sex. Potitius Nepos.
 L. Calpurnius Piso Cæsonius.
 M. Fostius Nepos.
 M. Fundanius Fundulus.
 L. Antistius Labeo.
 C. Albius Carrinus.
 C. Helvius Blæsius.
 Q. Lutatius Catulus.
 P. Petillius Geminus.
 Quæstors. Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
 P. Juventius Thalna.
 C. Vetillius Nepos.
 C. Sempronius Blæsus.
 C. Atinius Labeo.
 Cn. Helvius Blæsius.
 L. Arunculeius Cotta.
 M. Aburius Geminus.
 Pro-Quæstors. C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
 L. Fabricius Luscinus.

594. Y. of R.
 293. Consulship. CN. CORNELIUS DOLA-BELLA.
 M. FULVIUS NOBILIOR.
 P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.
 M. Popilius Lænas.
 Censors.
 The fifty-fourth Lustrum.
 Prætors. L. VALERIUS FLACCUS.
 L. CORNELIUS SCIPIO.
 L. POMPEIUS NEPOS.
 L. MANLIUS ACIDINUS.
 C. MAMILIUS TURINUS.
 L. LICINIUS POLLIO.
 Curule Ædiles. Q. Marcius Rex.
 P. Licinius Muræna.
 Plebeian Æ- C. Afranius Stellio. diles. L. Porcius Læca.
 Tribunes of the L. Atilius Regulus.
 People. M. Acilius Balbus.
 C. Rutilius Rufus.
 C. Apustius Fullo.
 C. Centenius Penula.
 L. Memmius Nepos.
 L. Rutilius Flaccus.
 L. Rufrius Purpureo.
 A. Bæculonius Nepos.
 Q. Fictorius Nepos.
 Pro-Prætor in M. Tuccius Nepos.
 Farth. Spain.
 Quæstors. L. Aurelius Cotta.
 Ser. Sulpicius Galba.
 C. Plautius Hypsæus.
 Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.
 Sp. Mummius Nepos.
 A. Terentius Varro.
 Q. Bæbius Tamphilus.
 C. Apustius Fullo.
 Pro-Quæstors. M. Aburius Geminus.
 C. Sempronius Blæsus.
 C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
 595. Y. of R.
 294. Consulship. M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS.
 C. POPILIUS LÆNAS, a second time.
 Prætors. Q. OPIMIUS NEPOS.
 L. CORNELIUS MERULA.
 L. ANTONIUS NEPOS.
 C. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.
 M' ACILIUS GLABRIO.
 Q. OGULNIUS GALLUS.
 4 P 2 Curule

Curule Ædiles. A. Postumius Albinus.
Ti. Veturius Philo.
Plebeian Ædiles. L. Licinius Lucullus.
M. Manilius Nepos.
Tribunes of the People. M. Porcius Cato.
M. Opimius Nepos.
M. Licinius Stolo.
M. Nævius Crispus.
M. Urbinius Nepos.
C. Sempronius Rutilus.
L. Oppius Salinator.
Cn. Nævius Crispinus.
C. Plætorius Nepos.
C. Volumnius Flamma.
Quæstors. M. Junius Brutus.
Q. Nævius Matro.
L. Julius Cæsar.
Q. Fabius Butco.
Cn. Cicinius Nepos.
Q. Cælius Nepos.
Q. Cælius Achilles.
C. Numifus Nepos.
Pro-Consul in Liguria. M. Fulvius Nobilior. He triumphs over the Ligures.
Pro-Quæstors. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.
C. Apustius Fullo.
Q. Cælius Nepos.
C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
596. Y. of R.
295. Consulship. SEX. JULIUS CÆSAR.
L. AURELIUS ORESTES.
Prætors. L. STERTINIUS NEPOS.
M. TUCCIUS NEPOS.
M. HELVIUS BLASIO.
T. ANNIUS LUSCUS.
Q. FULCINIUS TRIO.
SP. CARVILIUS MAXIMUS.
Curule Ædiles. T. Quinctius Flaminius.
Sp. Posthumius Albinus Magnus.
Plebeian Ædiles. Cn. Tremellius Flaccus.
L. Calpurnius Piso Cæsonius.
Tribunes of the People. C. Livius Drusus.
C. Aurelius Scaurus.
T. Villius Tappulus.
C. Silius Nerva.
C. Lætorius Mergus.
A. Gabinus Nepos.
M. Minucius Thermus.
L. Fabricius Luscinus.
T. Mænius Nepos.
Q. Papirius Turdus.

Quæstors. Q. Fabius Maximus Æmilianus.
Claudius Unimannus.
L. Cæcilius Metellus Calvus.
Q. Fabius Pictor.
M. Aurelius Scaurus.
L. Valerius Tappus.
L. Cornelius Blasio.
Pro-Prætor in Farth. Spain. Q. Ogulnius Gallus.
Pro-Quæstors. Q. Cælius Nepos.
C. Apustius Fullo.
Q. Cælius Achilles.
597. Y. of R.
296. Consulship. L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS LUPUS.
C. MARCIUS FIGULUS, a second time.
Prætors. Q. FULVIUS NOBILIOR.
Q. MARCIUS REX.
P. PORCIUS LÆCA.
P. LICINIUS MURÆNA.
C. AFRANIUS STELLIO.
SEX. DIGITIUS NEPOS.
Curule Ædiles. L. Mummius Nepos.
L. Atilius Regulus.
Plebeian Ædiles. M. Acilius Balbus.
L. Rutilius Flaccus.
Tribunes of the People. Q. Ælius Pætus.
M. Fufius Nepos.
C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
C. Titius Nepos.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
M. Atilius Serranus.
C. Cosconius Nepos.
M. Junius Silanus.
P. Sempronius Blæsus.
C. Minucius Augurinus.
Quæstors. Cn. Servilius Cæpio.
C. Lælius Nepos.
L. Hostilius Mancinus.
C. Nigidius Figulus.
C. Valerius Tappus.
Ser. Fabius Pictor.
P. Cornelius Sylla.
L. Posthumius Tympanus.
Pro-Quæstors. Q. Fabius Pictor.
L. Cornelius Blasio.
L. Valerius Tappus.
598. Y. of R.
297. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO NASICA.
M. CLAU-

M. CLAUDIUS MARCEL-
LUS, a second time.
The former triumphs over the Dalmatians; the latter over the Ligures.

Prætor in Far- M' MANILIUS NEPOS.
ther Spain.

*Curule*Ædiles. M. Porcius Cato.
C. Sempronius Rutilus.

Plebeian Æ- L. Oppius Salinator. diles. M. Licinius Stolo.

Tribunes of the Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
People. P. Juventius Thalna.
C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
Cn. Helvius Blasio.
C. Atinius Labeo.
A. Arunculeius Cotta.
M. Auburius Geminus.
C. Veturius Nepos.
C. Sempronius Blaesus.
T. Numicius Nepos.

Quæstors. Q. Servilius Cæpio.
Ap. Claudius Pulcher.
Q. Pompeius Nepos.
M. Titius Nepos.
T. Juvenius Thalna.
L. Cæcilius Denter.
C. Arunculeius Cotta.

Pro-Prætor in P. Porcius Læca.
Sardinia.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Valerius Tappus.
Ser. Fabius Piclor.
L. Posthumius Tympanus.

599. Y. of R.
298. Consulship. Q. OPIMIUS NEPOS.
L. POSTHUMIUS ALBI-
NUS.
The latter died in his office;
and in his room was chosen
M' ACILIUS GLABRIO.
M' Valerius Messala.
C. Cassius Longinus.

Censors.

The fifty-fifth Lustrum.

Prætor in Far- L. CALPURNIUS PISO CÆSOner Spain. NIUS.

*Curule*Ædiles. Ser. Sulpicius Galba.
Cn. Cornelius Lentulus.

Plebeian Æ- C. Livius Drusus. diles. A. Gabinius Nepos.

Tribunes of the L. Aurelius Cotta.
People. C. Plautius Hypsæus.
A. Terentius Varro.
C. Apustius Fullo.
M. Porcius Licinus.
Cn. Pupius Nepos.
Sp. Mummius Nepos.
Q. Bæbius Tamphilus.
Q. Aulius Cerretanus.
Sex. Roscius Nepos.

Quæstors. C. Terentius Varro.
L. Calpurnius Piso.
L. Scribonius Libo.
Cn. Calpurnius Piso.
M. Popilius Lænas.
A. Licinius Nerva.
L. Lollius Nepos.
Sex. Ælius Pætus Catus.

Pro-Quæstors. L. Cæcilius Denter.
Ser. Fabius Piclor.
L. Posthumius Tympanus.

600. Y. of R.
299. Consulship. Q. FULVIUS NOBILIOR.
T. ANNIUS LUSCUS.

Prætor in Far- L. MUMMIUS NEPOS.
ther Spain.

*Curule*Ædiles. C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
M. Fufius Nepos.

Plebeian Æ- C. Titius Nepos. diles. Q. Ælius Pætus.

Tribunes of the M. Junius Brutus.
People. C. Numicius Nepos.
Cn. Sicinius Nepos.
C. Claudius Canina.
M. Claudius Marcellinus.
Q. Cotius Achilles.
Q. Nævius Matho.
Q. Catius Nepos.
Sex. Tullius Nepos.
C. Flavius Fimbria.
P. Licinius Crassus.

Quæstors. Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus.
D. Junius Brutus.
M. Pinarius Posca.
C. Ælius Tubero.
P. Ælius Ligus.
L. Acilius Glabrio.
L. Flaminius Nepos.

Pro-Quæstors. L. Cæcilius Denter.
Ser. Fabius Piclor.

601. Y. of R.

300. Consulship. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, the third time.

L. VALERIUS FLACCUS.

He died in his office.

Prætor. MARCUS PORCIUS CATO. He died in his Prætorship.Prætor in Farther Spain. M. ATILIUS SERRANUS.Curule Ædiles. Q. Fabius Emilianus.

Q. Fabius Pictor.

Plebeian Ædiles. C. Furcius Nepos.

P. Jervinus Taler.

Tribunes of the People. M. Scatinus Aricinus.

M. Atilius Serranus.

Claudius Unimanus.

L. Cæcilius Metellus Calvus.

M. Aurelius Scaurus.

L. Valerius Tappus.

Ti. Sempronius Blæius.

C. Petillius Spurius.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

M. Atilius Bulbus.

Quæstors. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Emilianus.

L. Hostilius Tubulus.

M. Licinius Crassus.

C. Lutatius Cætes.

C. Cæsius Saxula.

C. Atilius Serranus.

Sex. Axtisius Nepos.

Sex. Albinus Carrinus.

Pro-Quæstors. L. Flaminius Nepos.

L. Cæcilius Denter.

L. Mummius. Appian only affirms that he triumphed over the Lusitanians.

602. Y. of R.

301. Consulship. L. LICINIUS LUCULLUS.

A. POSTHUMIUS ALBINUS.

Prætor in Farther Spain. SER. SULPICIUS GALBA.Curule Ædiles. Q. Cæcilius Metellus.

L. Aurelius Cotta.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. Hostilius Mancinus.

C. Plautius Hærius.

Tribunes of the People. C. Lælius Nepos.

C. Nigidius Figulus.

L. Posthumius T. mpanus.

M. Fulcinius Nepos.

M. Pletorius Nepos.

M. Statilius Nepos.

C. Valerius Tappus.

M. Cincius Alimentus.

C. Malvius Nepos.

C. Ricilius Nepos.

Quæstors.

L. Fabius Philus.

D. Junius Silanus Manlianus.

C. Hostilius Mancinus.

Ser. Fulvius Flaccus.

Sex. Atilius Serranus.

L. Duvetius Nepos.

C. Petillius Lænas.

Q. Petillius Spurius.

Pro-Consul in Hither Spain. C. Aurelius Scaurus.Pro-Quæstors. C. Cluvius Saxula.

Sex. Albinus Carrinus.

Sex. Atilius Nepos.

L. Flaminius Nepos.

603. Y. of R.

302. Consulship. T. QUINCTIUS FLAMINIUS.

M. ACILIUS BALBUS.

Prætors.

C. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS.

Q. ÆLIUS PÆTUS.

M. ALBINUS GEMINUS.

M. FUFIVS NEPOS.

C. TITIVS NEPOS.

L. AURUNCULEIVS COTTA.

Curule Ædiles. Cn. Servilius Cæpio.

Q. Servilius Cæpio.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. Junius Brutus.

Q. Cælius Achilles.

Tribunes of the People. Q. Pompeius Nepos.

M. Furius Crassipes.

C. Aurunculeius Cotta.

L. Cæcilius Denter.

C. Trebonius Asper.

M. Titius Nepos.

M. Toranius Nepos.

T. Juventius Thalna.

M. Turpilius Nepos.

A. Trebius Gallus.

Quæstors.

L. Æmilius Paulus.

C. Terentius Varro.

C. Licinius Crassus.

Q. Calpurnius Piso.

P. Manilius Nepos.

P. Gallonius Nepos.

M. Atinius Labco.

Q. Sterti-

Q. Stertinius Nepos.
Pro-Prætor in C. Cæcilius Nepos.
Macedon.

Pro-Quæstors. C. Popilius Lænas.
Sex. A. Cæcilius Nepos.
Q. Petillius Spurius.

The third Punic war.

604. Y. of R.

303. Consulship. L. MARCIUS CENSORI-
NUS.

M. MANLIUS NEPOS.

Prætor in Far- C. VETILIUS NEPOS.
ther Spain.

Prætor in Ma- P. JUVENTIUS THALNA.
cedon.

Other Prætors. Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS ÆMI- LIANUS.

A. TERENTIUS VARRO.

Q. FABIUS PICTOR.

Q. BÆBIUS TAMPHILUS.

Curule Ædiles. Ap. Claudius Pulcher.
Ser. Fabius Pictor.

Plebeian Æ- L. Cæcilius Metellus. diles. Claudius Unimanus.

Tribunes of the L. Scribonius Libo.
People. L. Calpurnius Piso Frugi.

Cn. Calpurnius Piso.

A. Licinius Nerva.

Sex. Ælius Pætus Catus.

Sp. Mæcilius Tullus.

M. Popilius Lænas.

L. Lollius Nepos.

Sp. Antius Restio.

C. Urbinius Nepos.

Quæstors. M. Claudius Marcellus.

Cn. Servilius Geminus.

P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.

Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispallus.

M. Æmilius Lepidus Percina.

P. Furius Philus.

C. Fulvius Flaccus.

C. Calpurnius Piso.

Pro-Prætor in M. Aburicus Geminus.
Sardinia.

Pro-Quæstors. P. Manilius Nepos.

Q. Stertinius Nepos.

Sex. A. Cæcilius Nepos.

P. Cæcilius Nepos.

Q. Petillius Spurius.

The Secular Games celebrated the fourth time.

605. Y. of R.

304. Consulship. SP. POSTHUMIUS ALBI-
NUS.

L. CALPURNIUS PISO
CÆSONIUS.

Prætors. L. AURELIUS COTTA.

Q. NÆVIUS MATHO.

C. NUMISIUS NEPOS.

Prætor on board L. HOSTILIUS MANCINUS.
the fleet ordered for Africa.

Prætor in Far- C. PLAUTIUS HYPÆUS.
ther Spain.

Prætor in Ma- Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS.
cedon.

Curule Ædiles. Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus.
M. Pinarius Poſca.

Plebeian Æ- C. Lælius Sapiens. diles. C. Nigidius Figulus.

Tribunes of the D. Junius Brutus.
People. C. Ælius Tubero.

L. Acilius Glabrio.

M. Pomponius Nepos.

Q. Apronius Nepos.

P. Licinius Crassus.

P. Ælius Ligus.

L. Volumnius Flamma.

C. Fundanius Fundulus.

M. Sextilius Nepos.

Quæstors. Ser. Sulpicius Galba.

L. Cornelius Lentulus.

P. Licinius Crassus Mucianus.

T. Didius Nepos.

P. Rupilius Nepos.

P. Popilius Lænas.

Ap. Claudius Centho.

M. Sergius Silus.

Pro-Consul in M. Manilius Nepos.
Africa.

Pro-Prætors in Q. Fabius Pictor.

Sicily and Hi- Q. Bæbius Tamphilus.
ther Spain.

Pro-Quæstors. Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispallus.

P. Manilius Nepos.

P. Furius Philus.

Q. Petillius Spurius.

P. Gallonius Nepos.

Q. Stertinius Nepos.

606. Y.

606. Y. of R.

305. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO
AFRIC. ÆMILIANUS.
C. LIVIUS MAMILIANUS DRUSUS.

Consuls. L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus.
L. Marcius Censorinus.

The fifty-sixth Legion.

Prætors. M. JUNIUS BRUTUS.
L. CÆCILIUS METELLUS
CALVUS.

AP. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.
Q. COTIUS ACHILLES.

Prætor on board the fleet designed for Africa. M. ATILIUS SERRANUS.

Prætor in Farther Spain. CLAUDIUS UNIMANUS.

Curule-Ediles. Sp. MUMMIUS NEPOS.
Q. POMPEIUS NEPOS.

Plebeian Ædiles. M. TITIUS NEPOS.
M. FURIUS CRASSIPES.

Tribunes of the People. L. FLAMINIUS NEPOS.
L. LUTATIUS CERCO.

C. ATILIUS SERRANUS.
C. GENUCIUS NEPOS.
C. MÆNIUS NEPOS.

L. HOSTILIUS TUBULUS.
C. CLUVIUS SAXULA.

Sex. ANTISTHIUS NEPOS.
M. LICINIUS CRASSIUS.

Ti. MEMMIUS NEPOS.
M. CÆSONIUS NEPOS.

Quæstors. C. CORNELIUS SCIPIO HISPALLUS.
L. PLANTIUS HYPSEUS.
P. CORNELIUS CETHEGUS.
T. POSTHUMIUS TYMPANUS.
Ser. SULPICIUS PATERCULUS.
M. TITINIUS CURVUS.
P. VIRGINIUS RUTILUS.

Pro-Consul in Africa. L. CAPURNIUS PISO CÆSONIUS.

Pro-Prætor on board the fleet in Africa. L. HOSTILIUS MANCINUS.

Pro-Prætor in Macedonia. Q. CECILIUS METELLUS.

Pro-Prætor in Sardinia. Q. NAVIUS MATTA.

Pro-Quæstors. Ser. SULPICIUS GALBA.

P. RUPILIUS NEPOS.

Ap. CLAUDIUS CENITHO.

M. SERGIUS SILUS.

P. MANILIUS NEPOS.

Q. STERTINIUS NEPOS.

607. Y. of R.

306. Consulship. CN. CORNELIUS LENTU-
LUS.

L. MUMMIUS ACHAICUS.
He triumphs over the Achæans and Corinthians.

Prætor in His-ther Spain. C. NIGIDIUS FIGULUS.

Prætor in several other Places. Q. FABIUS MAXIMUS SER-VILIANUS.
CN. SERVILIUS CÆPIO.
C. VALERIUS TAPPUS.

SERVIUS FABIUS PICTOR.
L. POSTHUMIUS TYMPANUS.

Curule-Ediles. M. POPILIUS LÆNAS.
A. LICINIUS NERVA.

Plebeian Ædiles. L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO.
CN. CALPURNIUS PISO.

Tribunes of the People. Sex. ATILIUS SERRANUS.
C. HOSTILIUS MANCINUS.

Sex. ALBIUS CARRINAS.
C. POPILIUS LÆNAS.

M. FURIUS LUSCUS.
Ser. FULVIUS FLACCUS.

D. JUNIUS MANLIANUS.
L. DURONIUS NEPOS.

A. VIRGINIUS NEPOS.
C. FURIUS ACULEO.

Quæstors. C. ATILIUS SERRANUS.
L. RUPILIUS NEPOS.
P. MUCIUS SCÆVOLE.
P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS.
L. CORNELIUS SALLA.
L. CORNELIUS CETHEGUS.
M. TITINIUS NEPOS.
C. LICINIUS NERVA.

Pro-Consul in Africa. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO AFRICAnus ÆMILIANUS. He triumphs over Africa, Carthage, and Asdrubal.

Pro-Prætor on board the fleet in Africa. M. ATILIUS SERRANUS.

Pro-Prætor in Macedonia. Q. CECILIUS METELLUS MACEDONIcus. He triumphs over Macedon, and the false Philip.
Pro-

Pro-Prætor in L. Cæcilius Metellus Calvus.
Sicily. Ser. Sulpicius Galba.

Pro-Quæstors. L. Plautius Hypsæus.
T. Posthumius Tympanus.
M. Sergius Silus.
Ap. Claudius Centho.
P. Virginus Rutilus.

Carthage and Corinth destroyed by the Romans.

608. Y. of R.

307. Consulship. Q. FABIVS MAX. ÆMILI-
ANUS.
L. HOSTILIUS MAN-
CINUS.

Prætor in Hi- C. LÆLIUS SAPIENS.
ther Spain.

Prætors in dif- SP. MUMMIUS.
ferent Coun- M. TORANIUS.
tries. T. JUVENTIVS THALNA.
M. PINARIUS POSCA.

Curule Ædiles. M. Æmilius Lepidus Porcina.
P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica Serapio.

Plebeian Æ- L. Calpurnius Piso Frugi. diles. D. Junius Brutus, afterwards Callaicus.

Tribunes of the C. Licinius Crassus.
People. Q. Calpurnius Piso.
P. Manilius.

Q. Petillius Spurius.
Q. Stertinius.

M. Servilius.
P. Gallonius.
C. Terentius Varro.

M. Atinius Labco.
L. Arennius.

Quæstors. C. Sempronius Tuditanus.
M. Perpenna.

C. Memmius Gallus.
M. Aquilius.

C. Livius Salinator.
P. Cornelius Lentulus Sura.

Q. Antonius Balbus.
C. Persus Flaccus.

609. Y. of R.

308. Consulship. SER. SULPICIUS GALBA.
L. AURELIUS COTTA.

Prætors. M. TITIVS.
Q. SERVILIUS CÆPIO.

L. LOLLIVS.
SEX. ÆLIUS PÆTVS CATVS.

VOL. II.

Q. POMPEIVS.

M. FURIUS CRASSIPES.

Curule Ædiles. Sex. Atilius Serranus.

C. Hostilius Mancinus.

Plebeian Æ- D. Junius Silanus Manlianus. diles. L. Hostilius Tubulus.

Tribunes of the M. Claudius Marcellus.
People. C. Calpurnius Piso.

C. Furius Brocchus.

L. Lætorius Plancianus.

C. Papirius Turdus.

C. Fulvius Flaccus.

C. Æbutius Carus.

C. Lucretius Trio.

D. Quinctius.

C. Servilius Casca.

Quæstors. Cn. Octavius.

L. Valerius Flaccus.

T. Annius Luscus.

A. Gabinus Nepos.

Sp. Lucretius Gallus.

T. Villius Tappulus Annalis.

L. Cornelius Sisenna.

Pro-Consul in C. Lælius Sapiens.
Hith. Spain.

Pro-Consul in Q. Fabius Maximus Æmili- Farth. Spain. anus.

610. Y. of R.

309. Consulship. AP. CLAUDIVS PVLCHER, who triumphs over the Salassi.

Q. CÆCILIUS METELLVS MACEDONICVS.

Prætors. M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDVS POR- CINA.

M. POPILIUS LÆNAS.

M. TITIVS.

Q. POMPEIVS, etc.

Curule Ædiles. P. Furius Philus.
L. Cornelius Lentulus.

Plebeian Æ- Ser. Fulvius Flaccus.
diles. L. Dronius.

Tribunes of the Titus Didius. The other nine People. are unknown.

Quæstors. C. Marcius Figulus.

C. Antonius Nepos.

L. Aurelius Orestes, etc.

611. Y. of R.

310. Consulship. L. CÆCILIUS METELLVS CALVVS.

Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS SERVILIANVS.

4 Q.

Censors.

Censors. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Æmilianus.
L. Mummius.

The fifty-seventh Lustrum.

Prætors. L. Hostilius Tubulus.
A. Licinius Nerva.

Tribunes of the People. C. Fannius Strabo. The other nine are unknown.

Quæstors. L. Tremellius, Flaccus, Scæva, etc.
Pro-Consul in Q. Cæcilius Metellus Macedonicus.
Hith. Spain.

612. Y. of R.

311. Consulship. CN. SERVILIUS CÆPIO.
Q. POMPEIUS.

Prætors. D. JUVENTIUS SILANUS MANLIANUS.

L. Hostilius Tubulus, etc.

Tribunes of the People. P. Mucius Scævola. The other nine are unknown.

Pro-Consul in Q. Cæcilius Macedonicus.
Hith. Spain.

Pro-Consul in Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus.
Farth. Spain.

613. Y. of R.

312. Consulship. C. LÆLIUS SAPIENS.
Q. SERVILIUS CÆPIO.

Prætors. L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS, etc.

Tribunes of the People. C. Memmius Gallus. The other nine are unknown.

Pro-Consul in Q. Pompeius.
Hith. Spain.

614. Y. of R.

313. Consulship. CN. CALPURNIUS PISO.
M. POPILIUS LÆNAS.

Prætors. B. CORNELIUS SCIPIO HIS-PALLUS.

L. CALPURNIUS PISO.

Tribunes of the People. A. Gabinus.

Ti. Claudius Asellus. The other eight are unknown.

Pro-Consul in Q. Servilius Cæpio.
Farth. Spain.

615. Y. of R.

314. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO
NASICA SERAPIO.

D. JUNIUS BRUTUS CAL-LAICUS.

Prætors. T. Didius, etc.

Tribunes of the People. C. Curatius. The other nine are unknown.

Pro-Consul in M. Popilius Lænas.
Hith. Spain.

616. Y. of R.

315. Consulship. M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS
PORCINA.

C. HOSTILIUS MAN-
CINUS; who abdicated.

Prætors. P. MANILIUS NEPOS.

M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS.

Tribunes of the People. L. Cassius Longinus, who published a law for voting by tablets.

M. Antius Brisso. The other
eight are unknown.

Quæstors. T. Sempronius Gracchus, etc.

Pro-Consul in D. Junius Brutus Callaicus.
Farth. Spain.

617. Y. of R.

316. Consulship. P. FURIUS PHILUS.
SEX. ATILIUS SERRANUS.

Censors. App. Claudius Pulcher.
Q. Fulvius Nobilior.

The fifty-eighth Lustrum.

Prætors. P. MUCIUS SCÆVOLA.

P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS, etc.

Tribunes of the People. L. Furius Brocchus. The other nine are unknown.

Pro-Consul in M. Æmilius Lepidus.
Hith. Spain.

Pro-Consul in D. Junius Brutus Callaicus.
Farth. Spain.

618. Y. of R.

317. Consulship. SER. FULVIUS FLACCUS; who triumphs over the Var-dæi, a people of Illyricum.

Q. CALPURNIUS PISO.

Prætors. C. CALPURNIUS PISO.

M. COSCONIUS NEPOS.

Tribunes of the People. P. Rupilius Rufus. The other nine are unknown.

Pro-Consul in Sex. Atilius Serranus. the Country of the Veneti in Italy.

619. Y. of R.

318. Consulship. P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO A-FRICANUS ÆMILIANUS,
a second time.

C. FULVIUS FLACCUS.

Prætors.

Prætors. C. HOSTILIUS MANCINUS.
L. PLAUTIUS HYPSEUS, etc.
Tribunes of the People. C. FANNIUS STRABO. The other nine are unknown.
Pro-Consul in D. JUNIUS BRUTUS CALLAÏCUS.
Farth. Spain.
620. Y. of R.
319. Consulship. P. MUCIUS SCÆVOLA.
L. CALPURNIUS PISO.
Prætors. T. ANNIUS LUSCUS RUFUS.
C. OCTAVIUS, etc.
Curule Ædiles. Q. Lucretius Flavius Vespillo.
Tribunes of the People. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, who was killed in his office.
M. OCTAVIUS CÆCINA.
Q. MUMMIUS.
L. RUBRIUS VARRO.
P. APULIUS SATURNINUS.
Q. ÆLIUS TUBERO, etc.
Pro-Consul in D. JUNIUS BRUTUS CALLAÏCUS.
Farth. Spain.
Pro-Consuls in Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS MACEDONICUS.
Campania.
Cn. SERVILIUS CÆPIO.
621. Y. of R.
320. Consulship. P. POPILIUS LÆNAS.
P. RUPILIUS.
Prætors. C. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS.
C. MARCIUS FIGULUS, etc.
Tribunes of the People. Q. POMPEIUS RUFUS. The other nine are unknown.
Pro-Consul in D. JUNIUS BRUTUS CALLAÏCUS,
Farth. Spain. who triumphs over the Lusitanians and Gallicians.
Pro-Consul in P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO AFRIC.
Hither Spain. Æmilianus, who takes Numentia, and obtains a triumph at Rome.
622. Y. of R.
321. Consulship. P. LICINIUS CRASSUS
MUCIANUS, the Pontifex Maximus.
L. VALERIUS FLACCUS,
the Flamen of Mars.
Censors. Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS MACEDONICUS.
Q. POMPEIUS.
The fifty-ninth Lustrum.
Tribunes of the People. C. PAPIRIUS CARBO. The other nine are unknown.

Pro-Consul in P. RUPILIUS, who received the Sicily. honour of an Ovation, after he had reduced the slaves in Sicily.
623. Y. of R.
322. Consulship. C. CLAUDIUS PULCHER.
M. PERPENNA.
Tribunes of the People. C. ATINIUS LABEO. The other nine are unknown.
Pro-Consul in P. LICINIUS CRASSUS MUCI-Asia. nus.
624. Y. of R.
323. Consulship. C. SEMPRONIUS TUDI-TANUS, who triumphs over the Iapidians, a people of Istria.
M. AQUILLIUS.
Pro-Consul in M. Perpenna.
Asia.
625. Y. of R.
324. Consulship. CN. OCTAVIUS.
T. ANNIUS LUSCUS RU-FUS.
Pro-Consul in M. Aquillius.
Asia.
626. Y. of R.
325. Consulship. L. CASSIUS LONGINUS.
L. CORNELIUS CINNA.
Pro-Consul in M. Aquillius.
Asia.
627. Y. of R.
326. Consulship. M. ÆMILIUS LEPIDUS.
L. AURELIUS ORESTES.
The secular games, for the fourth time.
Censors. Q. Fabius Max. Servilianus.
L. Cæcilius Metellus Calvus, who both abdicated.
Prætor in Si- T. QUINCTIUS FLAMININUS.
cily.
Tribunes of the People. M. Junius Pennus. The other nine are unknown.
Quæstor in C. Sempronius Gracchus.
Sardinia.
Pro-Consul in M. Aquillius, who triumphs.
Asia.
628. Y. of R.
327. Consulship. M. PLAUTIUS HYPSEUS.
M. FULVIUS FLACCUS.
Censors.

Consuls. Cn. Servilius Cæpio.
L. Cassius Longinus.

The fifth Lustrum.

Prætors. C. FANNIUS STRABO.
L. OPIMIUS.
Q. FABIVS MAXIMUS, etc.

Pro-Consul in L. Aurelius Orestes.
Sardinia.

Pro-Quæstor C. Sempronius Gracchus. in Sardinia.

629. Y. of R.

328. Consulship. C. CASSIUS LONGINUS.
C. SEXTIUS CALVINUS.

Pro-Consul in M. Fulvius Flaccus.
Transalpine
Liguria.

Pro-Consul in L. Aurelius Orestes.
Sardinia.

Pro-Consul at L. Opimius.
Fragellæ.

Pro-Consul in Q. Fabius Maximus.
Hither Spain.

630. Y. of R.

329. Consulship. Q. CÆCILIVS METELLVS
BALEARICVS.
T. QVINCTIVS FLAMINI-NVS.

Prætors. SEX. JULIVS CÆSAR.
Q. MARCIVS REN.
Q. ÆLIVS TUBERO.
L. JULIVS CÆSAR, etc.

Tribunes of the C. Sempronius Gracchus.
People. Aufæius Nepos. The other eight
are unknown.

Pro-Consul in C. Sextius Calvinus.
Transalpine
Gaul.

Pro-Consul in L. Aurelius Orestes.
Sardinia.

Pro-Consul in Q. Fabius Maximus.
Hither Spain.

Pro-Consul in M. Fulvius Flaccus, who tri-Transalpine umphs over the Ligures, Vo-
Gaul. contii, Saluvii, etc.

631. Y. of R.

330. Consulship. CN. DOMITIUS ÆNO-BARBUS.

Tribunes of the C. FANNIUS STRABO.
People. C. Sempronius Gracchus.
M. Livius Drusus.

Q. Rubrius Varro.
M. Bæbius Tamphilus. The other six are unknown.

Pro-Consul in Q. Cæcilius Metellus.
the Balearic islands.

Pro-Consul in C. Sextius Calvinus, who tri-Transalpine umphs over the Ligures, Vo-
Gaul. contii, Saluvii, etc.

Pro-Consul in L. Aurelius Orestes, who tri-Sardinia. umphs over the Sardinians.

632. Y. of R.

331. Consulship. L. OPIMIUS.
Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS AL-LOBROGICVS.

Prætor in Asia. QUINTIVS MUCIVS SCÆVOLA.

Tribunes of the M. Minucius Rufus.
People. L. Calpurnius Piso Bestia.

C. Licinius Nerva. The other seven are unknown.

Quæstor in Asia. P. Rutilius Rufus.

Pro-Consul in Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus.
Transalpine
Gaul.

Pro-Consul in Q. Cæcilius Metellus Baleathe Balearic ricus.
islands.

THE END OF THE SECOND VOLUME.

150/150

THE ROMAN HISTORY,

FROM THE BUILDING OF ROME
TO THE RUIN OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

ILLUSTRATED WITH MAPS AND OTHER PLATES.

VOL. III.

By N. HOOKE, Esq;

The FIFTH EDITION.

L O N D O N:

Printed for G. HAWKINS, W. STRAHAN, J. and F. RIVINGTON, R. BALDWIN, W. JOHNSTON, T. LONGMAN, and T. CADELL.

M.DCC.LXX.

T H E

Roman History.

S E V E N T H B O O K.

From the death of the younger GRACCHUS, in the year of Rome 632, when, real Liberty expiring, the Form only of the old Constitution remained, to the Dictatorship of SYLLA, in 671, who changed the very Form of that Constitution.

I N T R O D U C T I O N.

C H A P. I.

A Brief relation of the domestic and foreign transactions of the Romans, from the death of C. Gracchus, in the year 632, to the beginning of the Jugurthine war in 642. The conquests of the Romans in Transalpine Gaul page 7

C H A P. II.

The occasion of the Jugurthine war ; its commencement, progress, and conclusion 17

C H A P. III.

The war with the Cimbri. The second, third, fourth, and fifth Consulships of Marius 72

C H A P. IV.

The second servile war in Sicily 87

C H A P. V.

The sixth Consulship of Marius, year of Rome 653. The violences of Saturninus, Tribune of the Commons. Metellus Numidicus banished. Saturninus, and his associates in sedition, are crushed. Metellus is recalled by a decree made in 654, and returns in 655. Marius makes a voyage into Asia, has a conference there with Mithridates, and returns to Rome in 656. The condemnation of Servilius Cæpio to banishment, in 658. The trial and acquittal of his prosecutor Norbanus, in 659. Rutilius Rufus is maliciously prosecuted, and unjustly condemned to banishment, in 660 page 90

C H A P. VI.

Sylla, in 661, is sent into Asia, to check the ambition of Mithridates, King of Pontus. The genealogy, early adventures, and enterprises of this monarch 100

C H A P. VII.

Livius Drusus, Tribune of the People, undertakes, without success, to procure to the Italian allies the privileges of Roman Citizenship 105

C H A P. VIII.

The war called the Marfic, the Social, the Italic war; being the war of Rome with her Italian allies 108

C H A P. IX.

The occasion of the first Mithridatic war. It commences under the conduct of three Roman Generals. 120

C H A P. X.

Civil commotions raised by Marius, and Sylla now Consul, year of Rome 665. Sylla procures the banishment of his rival. The distresses and adventures of Marius. He passes into Africa. He returns into Italy, on the invitation of Cinna, Consul in 666. The violence and cruelties of Marius and Cinna. Marius dies in the seventh Consulship, year of Rome 667 123

C H A P. XI.

Valerius Flaccus, associated by Cinna in the Consulship for the remainder of the year 667, is likewise appointed by him to succeed to Sylla's command in Asia.

An account of the progress of Mithridates after his defeating the three Roman Generals in 665. The arrival of Sylla in Greece in 666. He there vanquishes the armies of Mithridates.

Sylla passes into Asia, and concludes a peace with the King of Pontus, in 668; returns into Greece in 669 (being the fourth Consulship of Cinna, and the third year of his holding that magistracy by usurpation.) From Athens, Sylla writes a menacing letter to the Senate, who had suffered him to be declared an exile, and so be loaded with other injuries and indignities. In 670, he lands in Italy, totally subdues the Marian faction; and prescribes those of his enemies who had escaped his sword, and, in 671, he is constituted Perpetual Dictator. 136

EIGHTH BOOK.

From the year 671, when SYLLA was created Perpetual Dictator, to the commencement of the first Triumvirate, formed in the end of 693.

C H A P. I.

The laws and institutions of Sylla, when Dictator. Pompey's successes in Africa, for which he obtains a Triumph at his return to Rome. Sylla abdicates the Dictatorship in 674, and dies in 675 page 163

C H A P. II.

Lepidus attempts unsuccessfully an imitation of Sylla. In 676, Pompey is sent into Spain against Sertorius 176

C H A P. III.

The War of Sertorius in Spain 180

C H A P. IV.

The War of Spartacus the Gladiator 194

C H A P. V.

Crassus and Pompey are chosen Consuls for the year 683. Pompey makes his court to the People, by repealing some of Sylla's laws 201

C H A P. VI.

The Capitol consecrated. War declared against the Cretans. The Gabinian law in favour of Pompey, year of Rome 686. The war with the Pirates. The Manilian law in favour of Pompey, year of Rome 687 212

C H A P. VII.

The occasion and commencement (in 669 or 670) of the second Mithridatic war, under the conduct of Muræna. He concludes a peace with the King in 672, by order of Sylla, then Dictator. The third Mithridatic war commences in 679, under the conduct of L. Licinius Lucullus, then Consul, and is carried on by him to the year 687, when he is succeeded in the command by Pompey 223

C H A P. VIII.

The third Mithridatic war continued, under the conduct of Pompey, to the death of Mithridates in 690 251

C H A P. IX.

Extraordinary honours are decreed to Pompey by the Senate, at the motion of M. Tullius Cicero, then Consul; and by the People, at the motion of two of their Tribunes. An account of the birth, education, and travels of Cicero; his progress through the Quæstorship, Ædileship, and Prætorship, to the Consular dignity; his acts and proceedings in his Consulship, prior to his discovery of Catiline's conspiracy. Brief histories of C. Julius Cæsar, M. Porcius Cato, and L. Sergius Catilina, to that time. The Conspiracy is quashed. Honours done to Cicero by the Senate. He is affronted by Metellus Nepos, one of the Tribunes, but contrives to make the affront turn to his glory

270

C H A P. X.

The spirited conduct of Cæsar in his Prætorship (year of Rome 691.) Several persons of distinction are brought to trial in form, on the accusation of having been associates in Catiline's conspiracy. P. Sylla is defended by Cicero. Metellus Nepos, the Tribune, continues to inveigh against the illegal proceedings of Cicero in his Consulship. The Senate, by a vote, forbids molesting him on that account. Metellus hereupon proposes a law to call home Pompey, with his army, to reform and settle the State. This motion, opposed by Cato, occasions civil broils and contests, which the Senate appeases for the present by acts of Power. P. Clodius prophanes the mysteries of the Good Goddess. The consequences of this enormity, in the Consulship of Pupius Piso, and Valerius Messala, year of Rome 692. Pompey returns into Italy, and disbands his army. His equivocal conduct after his arrival at Rome. His Triumph

380

C H A P. XI.

Catulus dies. The union of the Senate with the Knights, which was formed in 690, is broke in this year, 692.

The next year, Metellus Celar and Afranius being Consuls, Pompey endeavours to get a confirmation, by the Senate, of all his acts in Asia, and to obtain an Agrarian law in favour of his soldiers. The City is alarmed with the rumour of a Gallic war. Clodius forms a scheme to revenge himself on Cicero, for having appeared a witness against him at his trial for impiety. Cicero's conduct on occasion of this danger. Julius Cæsar from Farther Spain (of which Province he had been appointed to take the government after the expiration of his Prætorship) returns with glory to Rome. In the end of the year 693 the first Triumvirate is formed

393

NINTH BOOK.

From the end of the year 693, when that Triple League between CRASSUS, POMPEY, and CÆSAR, which is called the FIRST TRIUMVIRATE, was formed, to the beginning of the Civil War in the year 704.

C H A P. I.

The acts of the Triumvirate during Cæsar's Consulship, year of Rome 694. page 403

C H A P. II.

Clodius, a Tribune of the People, in the Consulship of Piso and Gabinius, year of Rome 695, passes several new laws. He distresses Cicero, who being deserted by those from whom he expected support, is constrained to go into banishment. To get rid of Cato, the Tribune engages the People to commission him to dethrone Ptolemy, King of Cyprus, and seize his treasures, which commission he executes with great punctuality. The next year (696) Lentulus Spinther and Metellus Nepos being Consuls, Cicero is recalled home, and restored to his dignity and estates; on which occasion Clodius raises mischievous riots in the City 428

C H A P. III.

Debates and contests in the Senate about restoring Ptolemy, King of Ægypt. Clodius is chosen Ædile. He impeaches Milo. Pompey pleads Milo's cause. Clodius turns the fury of his anger against Pompey. Civil feuds and contests ensue.

Cicero defends Sextius, inveighs against Vatinius, and moves to have Cæsar's Act relating to the Campanian lands reconsidered; but soon desists from this pursuit. The Senate refuses to decree a Thanksgiving for a victory obtained by Gabinius in Judæa. Prodigies are reported to have happened: Various interpretations of them. Piso is recalled from his government of Macedonia. Cæsar is continued in his command in Gaul. He comes to Luca: Pompey and Crassus meet him there. The Tribune Cato hinders the proceeding to an election of new Consuls. The government falls into an Interregnum 474

C H A P. IV.

Pompey and Crassus are elected Consuls for the year 698. The state of King Ptolemy's affairs at this time. Cato repulsed from the Prætorship. Provinces assigned to the Consuls, by the law of Trebonius, for five years. They attempt reformatations at home. Pompey's theatre. Piso returns to Rome ignominiously from his government of Macedonia. Crassus, in spite of bad omens, embarks for Syria (the Province fallen to him by lot) even before the the year of his Consulship is expired. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus and Appius Claudius Pulcher are elected Consuls for the year 699 490

C H A P. V.

Cicero defends, in the Senate, the interests of Crassus absent, and enters into a correspondence and intimacy of friendship with Cæsar. Unprecedented knavery of the Consuls and consular candidates. The Tribunitian candidates do honour to Cato's virtue. Cicero defends several persons accused; and, among the rest, Vatinius: in justification of this, and of the whole change of his political conduct, he writes a long letter to Lentulus Spinther 503

C H A P. VI.

The trial of Gabinius for treasonable conduct in King Ptolemy's affair. He is brought to trial a second time for plundering his province of Syria. Cicero defends him at this second trial, and defends likewise Rabirius, accused of being an accomplice in Gabinius's treason. Julia, the daughter of Cæsar, and wife of Pompey, dies. Pontinius fights his way to the Capitol, in triumph. Cicero accepts, and presently after resigns, a Lieutenantcy under Pompey. The election of new Consuls is obstructed by the Tribunes. A design is started to create Pompey Dictator, but is quickly dropt. An inter-regnum during the first six months of the year 700. M. Messala and Cn. Domitius are chosen Consuls 521

C H A P. VII.

Crassus makes war upon the Parthians; the enterprize unjust, the event unfortunate. Cicero, at Rome, is elected into the college of Augurs 527

C H A P. VIII.

Scandalous proceedings of the Candidates for the Consulship. Milo, who is one of them, has a fatal rencounter with Clodius on the Appian way, which occasions terrible tumults and mischiefs in the City. To remedy these disorders, Pompey is elected sole Consul: he publishes several new laws. Milo is brought to trial, and, though defended by Cicero, is condemned. Cicero's conduct in relation to the sale of Milo's effects. Two of the late candidates for the Consulship are tried for bribery by Pompey's new laws. His shameful partiality on this occasion. Two of the late Tribunes are sentenced to banishment for their riotous proceedings in their magistracy. The government of Cilicia falls by lot to Cicero. The usurious extortion practised by M. Brutus, the renowned patriot-assassin. Cicero's military achievements. His excellent conduct in the civil government of his Province. Appius and Piso are chosen Censors, the last who bore that office during the Republican state of Rome 540

C H A P. IX.

The war of Cæsar in Gaul, commenced in the year 695, and continued to the year 703. 585

T H E

T H E

Roman History.

S E V E N T H B O O K.

From the death of the younger GRACCHUS, in the year of Rome 632, when, real Liberty expiring, the form only of the old Constitution remained, to the Dictatorship of SYLLA, in 671, who changed the very Form of that Constitution.

I N T R O D U C T I O N.

WHEN, in the year of Rome 386, the contest between the Patricians and Plebeians, on occasion of the new laws preferred by the Tribune Licinius, was come to such a degree of heat, as to threaten a sudden flame of civil war; the great CAMILLUS, being then Dictator, turned himself towards the Capitol, and having prayed the Gods to put an end to the commotion, made a vow to build a temple to CONCORD, if union might be restored among his fellow-citizens. To his devotion he added his best endeavours to re-establish tranquillity, not by a bloody exercise of his dictatorial power, but by exhorting the furious disputants to mutual concessions. His persuasions proved effectual: the Patricians suffered the new laws in favour of the Plebeians to take place; the Plebeians consented to the creation of a new magistracy [the Prætorship] in favour of the Patricians; and, by this compromise, an end was put to the fierce, and dangerous conflict: and what, though already mentioned, is well worthy to be repeated, The domestic

See Vol. I
B. iii. c. 4.

peace,

VOL. III.

B

peace, thus restored, had no considerable interruption^a for the space of 230 years, till those Licinian laws of freedom and equality, the observance of which had so long maintained the happy coalition, were outrageously violated by the Nobles. To put a stop to this abuse, which, if not ^a In the year 465 there was a secession of the debtors and bankrupts to mount Janiculum; but, as Mr. Moyle observes (Vol. I. p. 116.) "this is omitted by several historians in the catalogue of the Roman seditions;" and "all authors agree that it was composed without bloodshed by Hortensius the Dictator, and that it ended in the revival of an excellent but antiquated law." He adds, "From this tumult to the sedition of Gracchus, in the 620th year of the city, Rome enjoyed a profound quiet and prosperity, not interrupted by the least domestic dissensions; an example of lasting tranquillity that can be paralleled in no monarchy whatsoever. This interim of time was the most happy and most glorious period of the Roman Commonwealth, &c." Ibid. ch. v.

^b During the Regal State, and for many years after the establishment of the Commonwealth, none but the Patricians, that is, none but the Senators and their descendants, were NOBLE. Hence in many places of Livy, and other authors, we find nobilitas used for the Patrician order, and so opposed to plebs. But in aftertimes, when the Plebeians obtained access to the Curule magistracies, they (without ceasing to be Plebeian) procured, by those honours, the title of NOBLE, and left it to their posterity: [Vid. Sigon. de Jur. Civ. Rom. lib. ii. c. xx.] And these Plebeian Nobles were, generally speaking, united with the Patricians in political views and measures.

"The common division of the people into nobiles, novi, & ignobiles, was taken from the right of using pictures or statues: an honour only allowed to such whose ancestors or themselves had bore some curule office, that is, had been Curule Aedile, Censor, Prætor, or Consul. He that had the pictures or statues of his ancestors, was termed Nobilis; he that had only his own, Novus; he that had neither, Ignobilis. So that jus imaginis was much the same thing among them as the right of bearing a coat of arms among us: and their Nobilitas Honor is equivalent to our upstart gentleman."

What Mr. Kennet, in the same chapter, writes concerning another division of the Romans, the times we are entering upon make very proper to be here transcribed.

"When we find the Optimates and the Populares opposed in authors, it would be unreasonable to make the same distinction betwixt these parties, as Sigonius and others lay down, That the POPULARES were those who endeavoured by their words and actions to ingratiate themselves with the multitude; and the OPTIMATES those who so behaved themselves in all affairs as to make their conduct approved by every good man. This explication agrees much better with the sound of the words, than with the sense of the things. For at this rate the Optimates and the Populares will be only other terms for the virtuous and the vicious; and it would be equally hard in such large divisions of men, to acknowledge one side to have been wholly HONEST, and to affirm the other to have been entirely wicked. I know that this opinion is built on the authority of Cicero; [Duo genera semper in hac civitate fuerunt—ex quibus alteri se populares, alteri optimates et haberi et esse voluerunt. Qui ea, quæ faciebant, quæque dicebant, jucunda multitudini esse volebant, populares; qui autem ita se gerebant, ut sua consilia optimo cuique probarent, optimates habebantur. Cic. pro Sext. 45.] but if we look on him, not only as a prejudiced person, but as an orator too, we shall not wonder, that in distinguishing the two parties he gave so infamous a mark to the enemies side, and so honourable a one to his own. Otherwise the murderers of Cæsar (who were the Optimates) must pass for men of the highest probity; and the followers of Augustus (who were of the opposite faction) must seem in general a pack of profligate knaves. It would therefore be a much more moderate judgment, to found the difference rather on Policy than on Morality, rather on the principles of Government, than of Religion and private Duty."

Kenn.
Art.

Ibid.
Part II.
Book II.
c. 1.

checked, checked, must totally ruin the free constitution of Rome, was the enterprize of Tiberius Gracchus, for which he was murdered by a band of Rufian-Senators, headed by Scipio Nasica, who had neither magistracy, nor even the warrant of a special commission from the Senate; though the greater part of its members approved the attempt, and assisted him in the execution. But when Caius Gracchus was to be taken off, for having renewed his brother's enterprize, the nobles, who remembered the disadvantages they brought themselves under, by acts of violence without the shew of authority, and who had now a Consul fit for their purpose, and wholly at their devotion, armed him with a despotic power to execute the dictates of their rage. And when Opimius, by massacres and by executions, without previous forms of process, had cut off the most active partisans of the popular cause, he had the piety (in this, without question, an emulator of the devout CAMILLUS) to erect, in memory of his exploit, a temple to CONCORD, as if by the soft arts of persuasion, and by mutual concessions, the civil commotion had been quieted. The people could not behold this monument of tyrannical outrage without indignation. Under the inscription, on the frontispiece of the temple, was fixed up in the night, by an unknown hand, a line to this effect:

See Vol. II.
B. II. c. 7.

Plut.

SENSELESS FURY BUILDS A TEMPLE TO CONCORD.

And, indeed, what could be more extravagant than to hope, that domestic peace and union would be the effect of such measures; or that any measures could be effectual to those ends, so long as the source of the disunion remained?

A late celebrated writer considers the government of Rome as then brought to its perfect state, when its honours were no longer confined to particular families [the Patrician], but proposed equally and indifferently to every citizen; who by his virtue and services, either in war or in peace, could recommend himself to the notice and favor of his countrymen; and therefore he commends the Tribunes of the Commons (as I have elsewhere observed) for their labouring this point, and says, they were certainly in the right, and acted like true patriots." Nevertheless the same writer, in the very same discourse, presently adds, "The Tribunes however would not stop here; nor were content with securing the rights of the Commons without destroying those of the Senate; and as oft as they were disappointed in their private views, and obstructed in the course of their ambition, used to recur always to the populace; whom they could easily inflame to what degree they thought fit, by the proposal of factious laws for dividing the public lands to the poorer Citizens; or by the free distribution of corn; or the abolition of all debts;

Dr. MIDD.
Pref. to L. of Cic.
p. 37.

See Vol. I.
3d Edit.
P. 471, and Hooke's
Observ. on
Rom. Sen.
p. 193.

* VECORDIAE. OPVS. AEDEM. FACIT. CONCORDIAE.

“ which are all contrary to the quiet, and discipline, and public faith of “ societies. This abuse of the tribunician power was carried to its greatest “ height by the two Gracchi, who left nothing unattempted, that could “ mortify the Senate, or gratify the People; till by their Agrarian Laws, “ and other seditious acts, which were greedily received by the city, they “ had in great measure overturned that Æquilibrium of power in the Re“ public, on which its peace and prosperity depended.”

See V. I. Surely it must appear somewhat strange, that this admired author should applaud the Tribunes, as true Patriots, for effecting that which it was impossible for them to effect by any other measures than those which he condemns as factious and seditious. Should it be granted, that what he says of dividing the public lands, distribution of corn, and abolition of debts, is, in the general, true, yet certainly it is not true with regard to the particular case of the Roman Republic. In vain would Licinius (in 386) have obtained the law which capacitated PLEBEIANS for the highest offices in the state, had the Patricians been still permitted to engross to themselves the lands and possessions belonging to it*. Nor, to make that law effectual, and thereby establish an Æquilibrium of power in the Republic, would his Agrarian Law have been sufficient, without the Abolition of the S. B. III. Debts; those debts retaining the debtors in a real servitude to the Patrician creditors, the noble usurers. (There was experience of this during many years after the Plebeians were, by a law enacted in 308, made capable of the military Tribuneship.) Whatever portion, in the distribution of the public lands, might have fallen to any poor indebted commoner, his creditor would soon have got it from him in payment either of the principal sum, or of exorbitant interest. And so long as the nobles were possessors

See Hooker's Observ. on
 Rom. Sen.
 p. 65.

* Dr. Middleton, in judging of these matters, seems to have paid too blind a deference to the authority of Cicero. The ingenious translator of some of Cicero's orations into English, not dazzled by the splendor of his author's amazing talents, writes thus, in the preface to his third volume, p. 7. “ I am “ sorry to say it, but it appears that our “ author, though an excellent Senator, was “ but an indifferent Patriot; and, though “ always an advocate for the Government, he “ seems often to have lost sight of the Cen- “ sitation.—

“ As our author, from his first entering “ upon public life, was a party in all the “ transactions of his own times, it is unjust
 “ to form a decisive notion of public mea“ sures, persons, or characters, from his wri“ tings.—If I find that the people of Rome, “ from the confession of our author, from the “ concurring testimonies of all writers, and “ from the nature of their constitution, had “ not only a natural but a positive right to “ the benefit of Agrarian Laws, I am war“ ranted by historical credibility to look up“ on this as an indisputable fact. Therefore “ when I see them struggling for the enjoy“ ment of those privileges, I am bound in “ common justice to think them in the right,

 “ and those who oppose them in the wrong.
 “ —When I see a justifiable measure pur“ sued, and all the reason that I know for “ opposing that measure, must be gathered “ from the representations of the other party,
 “ with whom there is no difference as to facts,
 “ common sense obliges me to be very cau“ tious, and distrustful in believing the re“ presentations of that party, and look upon “ them as colourings designed to heighten the “ beauty of his own features, and to give a “ stronger relief to the deformity of his anta“ gonist.”

of

of all the lands, so long they could not but be absolute Lords of the State.

“ Land (says a very ingenious writer) is the true center of power ; and the “ balance of dominion changes with the balance of property.—This is, an “ eternal truth, and confirmed by the experience of all ages and govern“ ments; and so fully demonstrated by the great Harrington, in his OCEANA, “ that it is as difficult to find out new arguments for it, as to resist the co“ gency of the old.” The nobles of Rome, in the time of Tiberius Gracchus, seem to have been fully convinced of this ; when, even upon the terms of receiving, in money, the value of the lands they had usurped, they could not with any patience listen to the proposal of transferring them to the poor Plcbeians.

See Moyle's Works,
 Vol. I.
 p. 72.
 See Rom.
 Hist. Vol.
 II. B. vi.
 c. 7.

The Æquilibrium, of which the admired writer speaks, had been destroyed some years before either of the Gracchi was in the office of Tribune : their attempt was to re-establish equality and liberty. And as to the charge against them, that they were not content with securing the rights of the Commons, without destroying those of the Senate, it may be answered, that the proper authority of the Senate, that is, their influence in the direction of those affairs, which concerned the whole State, was not the thing in question, in the times of the Gracchi : nor does it appear that they had any view or desire to destroy it. Caius enlarged the prerogative of the Senate in one instance ; and, while times continued regular, that is, while things stood upon a foot of equality, the Senate's authority, its influence, its weight in the councils, and transactions of the State, was never diminished. The people did always suffer themselves to be governed by the sentiments of the Conscrip Fathers, when those sentiments did not tend to the destruction of equality : but the Fathers, intoxicated and blinded by their covetousness and ambition, neither would nor could see their own interest, as a Senate, in the reformatiions proposed by the Gracchi ; they chose rather to have power than authority, rather to be feared than revered. And therefore it would seem that all the mischiefs which, after the murder of those two excellent patriots, happened to the Republic, from civil dissensions, ought to be principally imputed to the Senate's inexcusable folly of returning to its old pursuit of constitutional wealth and sway.

Ib. c. 10.
 See Hook's Observ. on
 Rom. Sen.
 p. 201.

If it should be said, that, when Rome had attained to that prodigious height of power and opulence, to which she was raised by the conquest of Macedon and Carthage, the SCHEME of confining the estates of the great men within the limits prescribed by the Licinian Law, or within any fixed limits, and of binding the Roman Freemen of inferior rank from alienating their Lands, was impracticable ; the proper answer seems to be, That, if so, then it was impracticable to preserve the constitution any longer : For nothing can be more absurd than to imagine Liberty and Equality, an Æqui-librium of power, to endure in a State, where the majority of those, who make the laws, and determine the most important affairs of the Public, have:

have no Land^a, no stable Property; and who, for a subsistence, depend chiefly on what they can get by selling their votes to the rich and the ambitious. And from these premisses this inference will, I think, be unavoidable, That all the severe censures, which have been passed upon those persons, who, after the murder of the GRACCHI, aimed at Oligarchy or Monarchy, all the invectives against JULIUS CÆSAR, as the Invader and Destroyer of the liberties of his country, are idle talk, empty, unmeaning declamation.

^a The ingenious writer, above quoted, imagines (perhaps without sufficient ground) that Polybius was unacquainted with the true causes of the Revolutions of the Roman Government. I shall transcribe, from the writer's Essay, some passages that are invidious to his charge against the Greek Historian, and are pertinent to our present subject.

Macle's Works,
Vol. I.
p. 63.
[Varr. de
Re Rom.
l. 1. c. 10.]

" Romulus — to reward the good affections of his new subjects, made an equal distribution among the people, of the territories belonging to Rome, except of the Crown and Church Lands: and, as he grew greater, divided all the Conquered Lands among the multitude (a custom followed by most of the succeeding Kings.) This donation was a false step, never to be reconciled to the true interest of sovereign power, from that eternal principle, that equality of possession makes equality of power: and whenever the balance of property sways to the People, the Monarchy naturally resolves into a popular government. —

P. 63, 64.

—" The generous ambition of extending their Empire, made the Kings of Rome sacrifice the rights of the Monarchy to the liberties of the People; for without Freedom and Property they found it impossible to compose a brave or a numerous militia: both which are the genuine roots of a Commonwealth; for a People that have property in possession, and swords in their hands, rarely submit to the dominion of one."

— P. 71. " The [Roman] Monarchy resolved into an Aristocracy; and that into a Democracy; and that too relapsed into a Monarchy, as the balance of lands varied from one order to another.

" These periods and revolutions of Empires are the natural transmutations of dominion, from one form of government to another; and make the common circle in the generation and corruption of all States. The succession of these changes POLYBIUS knew from experience, but not from their true natural causes: for he plainly derives these alterations from moral reasons; such as vices and corruptions, the oppression and tyranny of their Governors, which made the People impatient of the yoke, and fond of new forms; and not from the change of the only true ground and foundation of power, Property."

The Reader, if he considers those extracts, from Polybius's sixth book, which are in p. 118—123 of the Observations on the Roman Senate, will, perhaps, judge, that he imputes the destruction of Liberty, and of the Æquilibrium of Power, in the Roman State, to covetousness and ambition, no otherwise than as the unequal and undue distribution of property among the members of it, in the latter times of the republic, was owing to the prevalency of those vices.

C H A P. I.

A brief relation of the domestic and foreign Transactions of the Romans, from the death of Caius Gracchus, in the year 632, to the beginning of the Jugurthine war in 642.

The Consuls for the year 633 were P. Manilius and C. Papirius Carbo.

THAT Papirius Carbo, whom we have seen a Commissioner for the execution of the Agrarian Law, and, professedly, a fast friend of Caius Gracchus, should be immediate successor, in the Consulship, to Opimius, the principal actor in the murder of Gracchus, will appear very strange, if we do not call to mind, that it was customary to elect the Consuls many months before the time appointed for their entrance on the office. Carbo had unquestionably been designed to the Consulship, while Gracchus's friends were the prevailing party : otherwise, it would be very hard to account for his being, at this time, in that high station^a. For, that the late massacres, perpetrated by the Nobles, had struck an extreme terror into the minds of their adversaries, there needs no stronger proof than the part which Carbo acted, presently after his taking possession of the consular fasces. When Opimius was, by one of the Tribunes, brought into judgment before the people, for having put Roman citizens to death without previous trial and condemnation, Carbo undertook his defence. Indeed the commencing this prosecution, while the accused and his faction were^b triumphant, seems to indicate that it was a mere farce.

Y.R. 633.
Bel. Chr.
119.
332d Conf.

^a Though the time of the Comitia for other matters was undetermined ; yet the Magistrates, after the year of the City 601, when they began to enter on their place on the kalends of January, were constantly designed about the end of July, or the beginning of August. Kenn. Pt. II. B. III. ch. xvi.

^b Popillius, formerly condemned to banishment for the like violent and illegal proceedings against the friends of Tiberius Gracchus, had just been recalled at the motion of L. Calpurnius Bestia, one of the Tribunes. Cic. in Brut.

Cicero boasts much of this, That, not at the motion of Opimius, nor by a decree of the Senate, but at the request of a Tribune, Popillius was restored, HIS ENEMIES BEING SLAIN. Nunquam de P. Popillio L. Opimius fortissimus consul---senatum aut populum est co-bortatus. Post Red. ad Quir. iv.

Nil unquam senatus de P. Popillio decrevit : nunquam in hoc ordine Q. Metelli mentio facta est : Tribunitiis sunt illi rogationibus, INTER-FECTIS INIMICIS, restituti. Post Red. in Sen. 15.

And .

force, where the Tribune acted in concert with the Nobles, who knew before-hand what Carbo, in his fright, would do, and were sure of a judgment in favour of Opimius. Be that as it will, Carbo employed all his eloquence (and he was a great orator) to defend the murderer of his friend Caius Gracchus. Nor did he content himself with urging, in behalf of his client, the decree of the Senate under which he had acted; but maintained that the action itself was just, and that the killing Gracchus was for the public good¹. His rhetoric being assisted by the influence of his consular authority, and by the whole weight of the Senate, who were made parties in the cause, it is no great wonder if, at this juncture, Opimius was acquitted. The Comitia, likewise, at the motion of Octavius, one of the Tribunes, abrogated the law of Caius Gracchus in relation to the distribution of corn, and past another where the largess was less; and, according to Cicero, necessary for the people.

But Carbo, who had thus basely deserted one party, was himself in the following Consulship of L. Cæcilius Metellus and L. Aurelius Cotta, deserted by both parties, and suffered to fall a victim to the early glory of the celebrated Lucius Crassus, an orator, at that time but one and twenty years of age: who picked out this hated offender, as a proper subject whereon to make the first trial of his talent for accusing at the bar². Crassus, being naturally bashful, and having to do with a man of eminent abilities, no sooner began to speak, but his heart failed him, he turned pale, trembled, and was unable to proceed. The Prætor, Fabius Eburnus, who presided in the court, perceiving his distress, adjourned the trial to the next day.

The matter of the charge is no where mentioned; but from passages which Cicero has preserved of Crassus's oration, it appears, that the prosecution was set on foot by Carbo's new friends. “Carbo, (says Crassus) “ though you defended Opimius, the judges will not therefore look upon “ you as a good citizen; for that you then dissembled, and in your defence of Opimius had something else in view, is manifest: because you “ have often in public assemblies deplored the death of Tiberius Gracchus; “ were an accomplice in the murder of Publius Scipio; in your Tribune-

And again, Ille qui expulsi sunt inquit, sed tamen legibus et B. INIMICIS INTERFECTIS, ergo et tunc tunc in interitum in laqueum sunt. Pro Dom. 23.

¹ Carbo. Opimianum defendebat apud populum. C. Carbo censo in his de C. Gracchi non legibus, sed in iure pro salute patriæ factum defendebat. Cic. de Crat. l. iii. c. 27.

² Tit. Liv. l. vi. cap. 8. report, that one of Carbo's slaves, having stolen from him a little money, which were many papers that would have served to convict him, brought it to Crassus, who generously sent back the slave in chains to his master, together with the box unopened; and the same author, l. iii. c. 7. says, that Carbo was condemned to banishment, but in this disagrees with Cicero; and though the former story has in itself nothing improbable, yet as Cicero never mentioned it in any of his panegyrics on Crassus, the truth of it may very well be doubted.

“ ship proposed that law [the law^a empowering the People to re-elect
 “ as often as they pleased the same men to be their Tribunes] and always “ dissented from the honest.”

Y. R. 634.
 Bef. Chr.
 118.
 333d Conf.

Cicero tells us^b, that Carbo's coming over to the honest not being sufficient to engage the honest to protect him, he, to avoid an ignominious sentence^c, put an end to his own life, and (as the report went) by poisoning himself^d with Cantharides.

It was in this Consulship that the renowned CAIUS MARIUS first became a Statesman, being now one of the^e Tribunes of the People; a Hero who had no Statutes nor Pictures of his Ancestors to shew, had no eloquence, no Greek; but whom, nevertheless, we shall hereafter see a match for the learned, and illustrious NOBLES, in their own way of carrying on business; of talents not inferior to theirs for terminating civil disputes and promoting CONCORD. At the time of his election to the Tribuneship, he was known only for a brave soldier, and skilful officer, of singular assiduity and alacrity in service, unblemished life, strict probity, exemplary sobriety, and a peculiar patience of hardships and discipline. By these qualities, especially the last, he had, during the Numantine war, recommended himself to the esteem and favour of Scipio Æmilianus, whose only difficulty in that war was to banish luxury from his camp, and restore the ancient discipline among his troops. Scipio, from his observation of the martial talents of Marius, who was then but twenty-three years of age, gave a kind of prophetic testimony of his future glory: for, being asked in flattery, by some of his officers, where, in case of any accident to himself, the Republic would find a general? he, gently clapping Marius on the shoulder, answered, Perhaps, here: words, which, as Plutarch reports, were heard by Marius as oracular, and which animated him with the hope of being one day able to make a figure in his country. Yet he laboured under great disadvantages with regard to this ambition, by reason of his obscure birth, and illiberal education. Born at Arpinum^{*}, or in a village near it, he had there passed all his early youth with his Parents, who

Plut. in
 Mar.

* A City anciently of the Sam-nites, now, in the Kingdom of Naples.

^a The law did not pass in the Tribuneship of Carbo. See Vol. II. p. 542.

^b De leg. l. iii. c. xvi. Cui ne reditus quidem ab bonos salutem a bonis potuit asferre.

^c Cic. in Brut. cap. xxvii. speaking of T. Gracchus and Carbo: sed eorum alter propter turbulentissimum tribunatum ab ipsâ Republicâ interfectus est; alter propter perpetuam in populari ratione levitatem morte voluntaria se a severitate judicium vindicavit.

N. B. By this it would seem that Carbo was prosecuted for the part he had acted in the dispute, before his Consulship; and so Pighius conjectures that the inquisition was continued concerning the sedition, and the accused tried by the Prætors.

^d Cic. Ep. Fam. l. ix. ep. 21. Caius [Papirius Carbo] accusante L. Crasso, cantharidas sumpsisse dicitur.

^e Pighius conjectures he was Quæstor in 629, and his Province Sicily; though it does not evidently appear that he was ever Quæstor, since nothing certain can be built upon this passage of Valerius Maximus, which is the only foundation of his supposed Quæstorship: Arpini honoribus judicatus inferior, quæsturam Romæ petere ausus est: patientia deinde repulsarum, irrupit magis in curiam quam venit. Val. Max. lib. vi. cap. ix.

C

were

Y.R. 634 were poor, and earned their bread by the labour of their hands: As Ennius soon* as he was able to bear arms, he had entered himself a soldier^a, and, from that time, had lived, almost wholly, in camps and the toils of war; and to use the phrase which Plutarch has borrowed from Plato) had never sacrificed to the Muses or the Graces: However, in the military road to Honour, he took such effectual care to distinguish himself, that, when [after serving the term, by law required, for a qualification] he put in for the post of Tribune in a Legion, he had the vote of every Tribe: For though few of the Citizens knew his face, none of them were strangers to his Name and Character.

That Intrepidity, Resolution, Steadiness, would be the stile of his behaviour in Civil offices, no less than in Military, he gave sufficient ground to expect, presently after his commencing Tribune of the Commons, which (as above mentioned) was in this year 634. Having proposed to the People a law more effectually to prevent candidates for offices from tampering with the voters, the Senate (who did not like the measure) made a decree that the law in question should not be put to the vote, and they sent for Marius to give an account of his conduct in this matter. Marius appeared indeed, but not as to answer for his conduct. Without any ceremony, he let the Consul know that he would send him to prison, if the decree were not instantly revoked. Cotta, turning to Metellus, asked his opinion, who signifying his approbation of the decree, Marius called in one of his serjeants, and bade him lead Metellus to prison. Metellus appealed to the other Tribunes; but not one of them interposed, and the Senate were obliged to revoke their decree. Then Marius hastened to the Comitia, and got his law past.

This action of their new Tribune made the People imagine they had found a champion who would fight all their battles against the Senate, with the like inflexible resolution: He very soon undeceived them: for, with a steadiness equal to that, with which he had opposed the Senate's decree, he opposed a motion of one of his Collegues, for a free distribution of

* Is natus, et omnem pueritiam Arpinialtus, ubi primum ætas militiæ patiens fuit, Stigendius facundis, non Græca facundia neque urbanis munditiis, sese exercuit; ita inter artis bonas integrum ingenium brevi adolevit. Ergo ubi primum tribunatum militarem, &c.

Plutarch reports, that Marius made his first campaign under Scipio Æmilianus, at the siege of Numantia, and was then about 18 years old. But neither of these can be true if, as Plutarch himself repeatedly tells us, Marius died at the age of 70. For it is certain that the death of Marius happened in the year of Rome 667; consequently he was born in 597, and was twenty-three, in the year 620, when Scipio besieged Numantia. And as 17 was the age when the Romans were reckoned capable of bearing arms, and, according to both Sallust and Plutarch, Marius became a soldier about that age, we must suppose that he had served five or six years before he came under Scipio's command, who had no military employment from the year 606 to 619. It is also reasonable to think, that Marius, when Scipio made him the compliment above-mentioned (in the Text) was an officer, and had more experience in war than is to be got by serving one year, or a year and a half. Dr. Middleton, nevertheless, in Vol. I. p. 24. of his Life of Cicero, has adopted Plutarch's mistake.

A MAP OF PART OF THE ROMAN PROVINCE.

corn to the citizens, and defeated the design: so that now, says Plutarch, he gained the esteem of both parties, being looked upon as a man who would gratify neither at the expence of what he thought the public good. He seems however to have lost a great part of his credit, when, not long after, standing successively for the Curule Ædileship, and the Plebeian, both in one and the same day (the first instance of the kind, he could carry neither; and when, three years after his Tribuneship, though chosen Prætor, he was the last named, and even the validity of his election disputed, as if procured by illegal methods. It seems a slave of one Cassius Sabaco, a particular friend of Marius, had been seen in the voting-place among the citizens, who were giving their suffrages. Sabaco, upon his examination, could not deny the fact, but pretended, that, being extremely thirsty, he had called for some water, and that his servant, though he had indeed brought it, did not stay a moment*. Among those, whom the accusers of Marius desired might be examined, was his patron Caius Herennius, who pleading that the law exempted patrons from giving testimony against their clients, the Judges would have admitted the excuse; but Marius himself opposed it: he said, that, from the time any man became a Magistrate, he was nobody's client; which, if we may believe Plutarch, was not true but of those who obtained the Curule Magistracies. It does not appear what evidence Herennius gave, or whether he gave any; not what foundation there was for the charge; but in the end, the Judges being equally divided in opinion, Marius stood confirmed in his office. We are not told where his jurisdiction was. The next year he went Proprætor into further Spain, where he had some success against the Lusitanians, and settled a Colony of Celtiberians at Colenda, in reward for their having assisted him in his expedition. From this time we hear no more of him as acting any part in public life, till the Jugurthine war, a memorable period of the Roman story, on account both of the surprising events of the war itself, and of the civil commotions it gave birth to at Rome. But before we enter on the war with Jugurtha, it will be proper to see what had been doing in the military way, while the affair of Caius Gracchus was depending, and what was afterwards done during the ten years between his murder and that war.

N. R. 1. 1.
B. 1. 1.
110.
333d C.

The conquests of the Romans in Transalpine Gaul.

OF all the Nations beyond the Alps, the Salyi, says Florus, were the first who felt the Roman arms. The city of *Massilia, ever faithful and friendly to Rome, had complained of the hostile incursion of those her

Or Sallu-
vii. See
Vol. II. p.
540.
* Marseilles.

* Sabaco for this affair, was the next year, 638, expelled the Senate by the Censors Mellus Dalmaticus, and Domitius Ænobarbus, (two very wrong-headed men, if we judge of them by their behaviour when Generals.) They said that Sabaco deserved to be stigmatized, whether he spoke true or false: if false, for his perjury; if true, for his intemperance. They also degraded 32 of the Senators, among whom was C. Licinius Geta, a man of consular dignity, and who was himself afterwards chosen Censor. Liv. Epit. lib. lxii. Cic. in Cluent. Val. Max. lib. ii. cap. ix.

C 2

neighbours.

See Vol.
II. p. 554.

neighbours. It has been already mentioned, that in the years 628 Fulvius Flaccus^a, then Consul, began the war, and that it was continued by one of the succeeding Consuls, Sextius Calcinus, who vanquished the enemy in a pitched battle, made a complete conquest of their country, and, the next year, when Proconsul, having built the city of Aix, planted there a Roman Colony, the first that ever past into Transalpine Gaul.

Aurunois in Burgundy.

Auvergne.

Y. R. 632.
Bef. Chr.
120.

After this success there could not be wanting a pretext to make further acquisitions. It was alledged, that the Allobroges (who inhabited a tract of country that lies between the Rhone and the Alps, from the Isere to the lake of Geneva, and whose capital was Vienne) had granted protection to Teutomalius, king of the Sabji, when dispossessed of his kingdom. This was sufficient. But it was further alledged, that they had ravaged the lands of the Ædui, at that time in alliance with the Republic: for the Romans seldom failed to have allies at the back of whatever people they purposed to subdue. It is said however, that the Ædui had of their own motion sought the friendship of the Romans, and were proud to be by them called Brethren. Over these Allobroges, assisted by the forces of Bituitus, king of the Arveni, the Consul Domitius^b, in 631 obtained, by means chiefly of his elephants, a victory, in which he slew 20000 of the enemy, and took 3000 prisoners. The vanquished brought a new army into the field. Their whole force is said to have amounted to 200,000 men; yet Fabius (successor of Domitius) with only 30000 gave them an intire overthrow upon the banks of the Rhone; in which river, the bridge breaking under them in their flight, most of them were drowned. Domitius, who was still in the Province, hearing that Bituitus, totally discouraged by his second defeat, was disposed to ask peace of the Consul, and submit, invited him to an amicable conference; and, when the King came, seized on his person, and sent him prisoner to Rome, the Proconsul being angry that he chose rather to yield to the Consul than to him. The Senate, says Valerius Maximus, could not approve the deed, yet would not release the King, lest he should renew the war; but having got his son into their hands, they gave him a Roman education, and then sent him home^c.

Fabius,

^a The same Fulvius who was afterwards slain with Caius Gracchus.

^b Collegue of that Fannius, who, being elected Consul on the recommendation of C. Gracchus, employed his consular power in opposing him.

^c This year Q. Mucius Scaevola, called the Æger, to distinguish him from Q. Mucius Scaevola, the Pontifex Maximus, went Prætor into Asia, where he reformed the abuses of the Publicans, and regulated the affairs of the province with so much justice and integrity, that the Asiatics instituted a festival in honour of him, and called it Mucia, from his name. P. Rutilius Rufus, one of the most worthy men in Rome, assisted him in quality of Quæstor. Cic. de Fin. lib. i. cap. iii. Ascon. Pæd. in Divinat. § 2 Verr. Val. Max. lib. viii. cap. xv. § 6.

Val. Max. (lib. viii. cap. xv. § 6.) says, that Q. Mucius Scaevola, collegue to Crassus in the Consulship (which Scaevola was the Pontifex Maximus) so excellently administered affairs in Asia, that the Senate used to propose his Government as an example to the Magistrates that were sent into the provinces.

Pigbius

Fabius, at his return to Rome, called himself Allobrogicus, and had a triumph, of which the captive Monarch, clad in the splendid arms he used to wear, was the principal ornament. Domitius, some time after, with the same King to attend him, had the like honour of the triumph: though indeed he had already triumphed abroad; for with his army following him in procession, he had been riding up and down the conquered countries, like an overgrown idiot, upon an elephant. Florus remarks, that these two Generals were the first of the Romans that ever insulted the vanquished nations, by erecting, in their countries, trophies of the victories obtained over them. Sueton. in Ner. cap. 2.

In this same year Quintus Metellus (the eldest son of Macedonicus) had his triumph, as conqueror [in 630] of the islands called Baleares: and the vain man, for having with his heavy-arm'd Legionaries defeated a number of Fishermen, who went naked, and fought only with slings, foolishly took the title of Balearicus.

In 634 the Consul L. Metellus leading an army into Illyricum, the Segeſtani, a people of that country, surrendered to him: after which, he, without any provocation, entered Dalmatia, where, being received amicably, he took up his winter quarters in the capital, and, for this exploit, he had a triumph upon his return to Rome, and called himself Dalmaticus. Y. R. 634.
Bef. Chr. 118.
App. in Illyricis.

The next year M. Porcius Cato, and Q. Marcius Rex, being Consuls, the former was sent into Africa, (on what occasion is not known) and there died. Marcius, who had Transalpine Gaul for his province, subdued the Stæni, at the foot of the Alps, and planted a Colony at Narbonne, called from him Narbo Marcius, which became the capital of the Roman conquests in Transalpine Gaul, when, four years after, they erected them into the form of a Prætorian province. Y. R. 635.
Bef. Chr. 117.

* In the following Consulships of L. Metellus Diadematus, (second son of Macedonicus) and Q. Mucius Sævola; C. Licinius Geta, and Q. Fabius Maximus Eburnus, it does not appear that any thing was done in the way of conquest. Y. R. 636.
Y. R. 637.

But in the year following, M. Æmilius ^b Scaurus (colleague to M. Metellus, third son of Macedonicus) having Transalpine Gaul for his province, made a successful expedition against the Carni, at the foot of the Alpes Penninæ. He afterwards employed his army in draining the marshes near the Trebia and Placentia, and making roads in that country. At his return home, he Y. R. 638.
Auct. de Vir. Illust.
Strab. lib. v. p. 217.

Pighius (in anno 632 & 654) says, that both Sævolas were Prætors in Asia, and that both employed Rutilius, the one as his Quæstor, the other as his Lieutenant; and applies the two Quotations above from Asconius Pædianus to Sævola the Pontifex, though Asconius speaks of Rutilius as being Quæstor, not Lieutenant to Sævola.

* It was in the former of these Consulships that Marius suffered the affront before mentioned, when he stood for the Ædileship, and in the latter, that being chosen Prætor he was prosecuted for briguing.

^b A further account of Scaurus will be given where the knowledge of his character is more necessary.

was decreed a triumph; and, by the Censors Metellus Dalmaticus, and Domitius Ahenobarbus, named President of the Senate, in the place of Metellus Minucius, who died this year, and whose bier was carried by his four sons, of whom one had been Consul and was now Censor, the second had also been Consul, the third was at this time Consul, and the fourth soon after [the very next year] obtained the Consulship.

Scantus this year got two new laws passed; the one, forbidding the use of some foreign dainties; the other concerning the votes of the Freedmen^a.

The Sordisci, a People of Thrace, originally descended from the Gauls, who followed Brennus, having made an irruption into Macedon, C. Percius Cato (who had been raised to the Consulship with M. Acilius Balbus) was sent with an army to defend the province. Surprised by the Barbarians in an ambush, his army was routed with such slaughter that scarce a man, except himself, escaped. The conquerors immediately spread themselves over Thessaly and Dalmatia, as far as to the Adriatic, where finding a vast extent of waters that put a stop to their progress, they, in despite and rage, darted a shower of javelins into the sea. Soon after, Didius, Prætor of Illyricum, falling upon them suddenly, while they were plundering the country, put them to the rout, and drove them back into Thrace. Cato, at his return to Rome, was prosecuted for extortion in his province, and being condemned, went into banishment to Tarraco in Spain. The sum in question was no more than about 32 pounds, according to Velleius Paterculus, or 150 according to Cicero; a mere trifle; but Paterculus most gravely remarks, that men had more attention to the nature of the crime, and the disposition of the criminal, than the extent of the injustice done. The Knights, who were the Judges at this time, must have been very worthy men, contrary to what Cicero would have us believe; or this remark of Paterculus is very much misplaced. The condemnation of Cato was undoubtedly owing to some private spleen, or perhaps the public indignation against him, for letting himself be surprised by the enemy, and thereby losing the lives of so many citizens, whose kinsmen and friends could not forgive him.

In this Consulship happened an accident which alarmed the Roman superstition, and was followed by a discovery that occasioned a good deal of noise and bustle at Rome. Helvius, a Roman Knight, going with his daughter into Apulia, was overtaken upon the road by a storm of thunder.

^a Freedman. This, as Pigbius conjectures enacted that the Freedman should vote in the four Urban Tribes, whereas from the time of Sempronius (the father of the Gracchi) they had been confined to one Tribe.

It is said that this haughty Consul was so offended with the Prætor Decius Mus, for not rising up when he passed by him, that he made his Lictors force him to it, and break his Curule Chair to pieces. He also by edict prohibited the bringing causes before that Prætor's tribunal. Aul. de Vir. Illustr. in Scant.

A flash

A flash of lightning killed the young woman, and the horse she rode upon, at the same time stripping her of her clothes, and the horse of his saddle, and bridle. The Augurs declared that this mischance portended disgrace to unmarried women, and the Equestrian order. Soon after a criminal correspondence was discovered between three Roman Knights and three Veitals.

And the next year, when C. Metellus, surnamed Caprarius (the fourth son of Macedonicus) and Cn. Papirius Carbo, were Consuls, L. Metellus the Pontifex, and the pontifical college condemned Æmilia, the most guilty of the three priestesses, to the usual punishment in such cases; but acquitted the other two, Marcia and Licinia, the latter of whom was defended by her relation Crassus the Orator, he being then 27 years old.

The People, dissatisfied with this sentence, ordered the cause to be tried anew; and by a special commission appointed L. Cassius to be Judge; a man so severe, that his Tribunal was called Scopulus Recrum; that is, the rock, on which, those who were arraigned before him, were sure to split, if they were guilty. He condemned Marcia and Licinia, and several others; and, to expiate their crime, the Senate, after consulting the Sibylline books, ordered a temple to be built to Venus Verticordia, who was to be implored to change the hearts of the Roman women, and make them more chaste. When the statue of this Goddess was to be consecrated, the Romans judged it proper to give the honour to her of all the ladies who had the best reputation for chastity. First a hundred ladies of the most irreproachable manners were selected from the rest; then from this number ten were taken by lot; and these ten gave the preference to Sulpitia, daughter of Paterculus, and wife of Fulvius Flaccus.

Among the accused was M. Antonius, the famous orator, and grandfather of the Triumvir. He was at this time Quæstor, and just setting out from Brundisium for Asia, when he received notice that an accusation was lodged against him before Cassius. By the law he might have declined appearing, as being employed in the service of the Commonwealth; but chusing to stand a trial, he came back to Rome. It is said that, though innocent, he was somewhat alarmed, when the prosecutors demanded that a young slave, who was supposed to be privy to his intrigue, should be examined by torture, because he doubted of the resolution and steadiness of the youth. But the boy bid his master fear nothing, offered himself to the torture, and supported it with an unshaken constancy.

An inundation of Barbarians from the North, at this time threatened Italy. The Cimbri, a People whose origin is uncertain, but who not long before this inhabited the Cimbria Chersonesus (now Jutland and Holstein) had in a confederacy with the Teutoni, their neighbours, left that country to seek for new habitations. Plutarch makes their number amount to 300,000 fighting men, who were followed by a yet greater number of women and children. At first they fell upon the Boian Gauls, who inhabited part of the Hercynian forest (which part had from them the name of Bobemia) by whom being repulsed, they turned towards the Roman provinces, penetrating into Noricum. The Consul Papirius, whom the Senate immediately ordered into Ilyricum, to oppose their progress, posted himself in the passes of the Alps, and thence sent to ask why they ravaged the territory of the Norici, who, he said, were Friends of the Romans, though in truth, the Romans had no treaty of friendship with them. The Cimbri, by their Ambassadors, answered, that they respected the Roman name, had no intention to attack any nation in alliance with Rome, were going to quit Noricum, and to seek a settlement in countries where the Romans had no concern. Papirius, believing this answer to proceed from fear, and wisely projecting to gain abundance of honour by a stroke of perfidy, furnished the Cimbrian Ambassadors with guides, who, under pretence of conducting them back by the best road, were to lead them by such a round-about way, as to give him an opportunity, by taking a shorter, to surprize them, and with his whole army fall upon them at once. The stratagem did not succeed; the Cimbri, though surprized, were not disconcerted; they drove the Consul out of the field, and, had it not been for the sudden tempestuousness of the weather, would have destroyed his whole army. The Barbarians made no advantage against the Romans of their victory; but, for some reason unknown, turned away to the country of the Helvetii, where they were probably joined by the Ambrones (who are thought to have been a Canton of the Helvetii) and from thence spread themselves over Transalpine Gaul, carrying with them slaughter and desolation.

* Plutarch tells us, that the Sibylline books directed the Romans to bury alive two Greeks and two Gauls, as offerings to certain strange malignant Genii. Plut. in Quæst. Rom. c. lxxxii.

Metellus, the other Consul, made a successful expedition against the Sordisci.

And the next year M. Livius Drusus (who was in the consulship with L. Calpurnius Piso) forced them to repass the Danube, which served ever after as a barrier between them and the Roman provinces.

According to Liv. Epit. l. lxvii. and J. L. Obsequ. de Prodig. 103. the Teutoni did not join the Cimbri till some years after this: but Quintus Patricius, Plutarch, Florus, Entrepian, and Orosius, speak of the Teutoni as joined with the Cimbri in all their wars with the Romans.

C H A P. II.

The occasion of the Jugurthine war ; its commencement, progress, and conclusion.

SALUST tells us, that he wrote the History of the Jugurthine war for these two reasons, That it was an important and bloody war, and of great variety in the fortune of it ; and that, during this war, the first stand was made against the insolent pride of the Nobility ; the commencement of a struggle maintained with such party rage as at length to produce a civil war, and the desolation of Italy.

To give an account of the cause and origin of the Numidian war, it will be necessary to go a little back. It has been formerly observed, that Masiniſſa received from the Romans the Kingdom of Numidia, in reward of the services he had done them against the Carthaginians. At his death he left three legitimate sons, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Manastabal, who, without dividing their father's Kingdom, shared * the Government of it among them. The two latter dying, Micipsa reigned alone. This Prince had two sons, Adherbal the elder, Hicmſſal the younger. He had also a nephew, named Jugurtha, the son of his brother Manastabal, but whom, being born of a concubine, Masiniſſa had left in a private condition. Micipsa however took him into his own house, and educated him with his own sons. Jugurtha had great natural talents, was remarkably handsome, and excelled in strength. Active and industrious, he continually exercised himself in riding, throwing the lance, disputing the prize with his companions in the race, or in hunting lions and other wild beasts ; at which sports he always endeavoured to be the first, or among the foremost, to wound the beast. And though he performed more hardy exploits than any of his companions, and was much superior to them all in his exercises, yet, never boasting of his advantages, he was by all extremely beloved. At first the King of Numidia rejoiced in the good success of his care, as thinking Jugurtha would be an honour to the Kingdom. But afterwards reflecting on his own great age, the tender years of his sons, the temptation of a throne, and the fondness of the Numidians for his nephew, he began to fear, lest the daring and ambitious spirit of that Prince should meet with too favourable an opportunity to display itself. Under these apprehensions the King would have privately made away with him, had he not been afraid of a sedition, or a general rebellion, as the probable consequence of such an act. Being at this time to furnish the Romans with a body of troops to serve under Scipio at the siege of Numantia, he resolved to give Jugurtha the command of them, entertaining some hope of getting rid of him by the chance of war; a hope founded on the forward and enterprising spirit of the youth. But this measure, taken for the destruction of Jugurtha, turned to his advantage. By his ability in council, his bravery in fight, his strict obedience to orders, and his success in every enterprize, he gained in a short time the esteem and love both of the Roman soldiers and of their General. There were at that time in the army many persons, both of the old and new Nobility, with whom wealth was preferable to virtue and honour, all furious party men, very powerful at Rome, and more known than esteemed among the confederates. These men inflamed the ambition of Jugurtha, by telling him that, at the death of Micipsa, he might easily make himself the master of Numidia; that he did not want ability for such an enterprize, and that at Rome all things were venal.

* The elder Scipio is said to have made him by the verbal will of Masiniſſa when dying. See Vol. II. Book V. ch. xxvi.

When Scipio, after the reduction of Numantia, was about to send back the auxiliary troops, he, in the presence of the whole army, made Jugurtha magnificent presents, accompanied with extraordinary praises; and then leading him into his own pavilion, there admonished him privately, to cultivate the friendship of the Roman people, rather by services to the public, than by gifts to private men; adding, that it would be dangerous to attempt to purchase of a few, what belonged to many; that if he would continue in the diligent exercise of his talents and virtues, he could not fail of acquiring both glory and a crown^{*}; but that if he should be so hasty to attain his purpose as to have recourse to bribery, his money would prove his destruction. After this advice, he dismissed him with a letter for Micipsa to the following effect:

“Your Jugurtha has behaved himself incomparably well in the war of Numantia; to know this, will, I am sure, give you much joy. To me his merit has made him very dear: and I shall use my best endeavours that he be equally so to the senate and people of Rome. I congratulate you on this occasion with the cordiality that our friendship requires. Your nephew is indeed worthy of you, and of his grandfather Mafniffa.”

Micipsa, finding the reports he had already heard of his nephew's merit, confirmed by the Roman General, and, perhaps, now finding his

* If we call to mind the unprecedented division, which the first Africanus, upon the death of King Mafniffa, made of the regal power among his three sons; and if we compare it with the discourse of the Roman Nobles, in the camp, to Jugurtha; the encouragement, which accompanied the more sage advice of the second Africanus to the youth, to hope a crown; and the proceedings of the Roman

Senate, in relation to the affairs of Numidia, after the death of Micipsa and Jugurtha's usurpation of the kingdom; may we not from the whole, without too great refinement, conclude, that the Romans had, at least, from the demise of Mafniffa, if not long before, formed the design of taking Numidia into their own possession?

former scheme less practicable than before, turned his thoughts how to gain the affection of Jugurtha, and to secure, for a friend and protector of his children, him, whom he could not destroy as an enemy ; and with this view he adopted him, and, by his will, left him joint heir with his own sons. And when, a few years after, he found himself drawing near his end, he is said to have pressed his nephew, in a very pathetic manner, to be friendly to his sons, and to have exhorted his sons to imitate the virtues of his nephew, their adopted brother, telling them what a reproach it would be to them, if it should appear to the world, that their father had been more happy in adopting, than in begetting sons.

The old King died, and, when the funeral was over, the three Princes met to consult about their affairs. At this meeting, Hiempsal, the younger of the legitimate sons, a youth of high spirit, seated himself on Adherbal's right hand, that Jugurtha, whom he had always despised for his mean birth, might not be in the middle, the place of honour among the Numidians ; and it was with great difficulty he was prevailed upon by the earnest intreaties of his brother to remove to the left of Jugurtha. And when Jugurtha proposed the repealing all the acts and edicts made by Micipsa in the five last years of his reign, because the King was then old, and his intellects impaired, Hiempsal briskly answered, “ by all means ; I am entirely of your opinion ; for within the three last years you were adopted into the family.” Words, which sunk deeper into the mind of Jugurtha than any one at that time imagined. His whole study from that moment was how to accomplish a speedy revenge.

According to Sallust, Jugurtha compassed his design by corrupting the host, with whom Hiempsal had taken up a temporary residence. This traitor admitted by night into the house a party of soldiers, who having found Hiempsal in a loft, where he had hid himself upon the first alarm, cut off his head, and carried it to their master^a. Upon the news of this base murder, the Numidians divided themselves into two parties ; the greater number declared for Adherbal ; but all the best soldiers adhered to Jugurtha. The latter soon appeared in the field, and took some towns by force ; others voluntarily submitted to him ; and he pushed for the entire monarchy of Numidia.

Adherbal, though he had dispatched Ambassadors to Rome, to inform the Senate of the murder of his brother, and his own situation, yet, depending upon his superiority in number, ventured a battle with the enemy. Being vanquished, he fled into the Roman province, and from thence proceeded to Rome.

Jugurtha, now master of all Numidia, and having leisure to reflect upon what he had done, began to dread lest the Romans should take up the quarrel of his rival. His only hope of being screened from their resentment was in his own treasures, and the covetousness of the Roman Nobles. He dispatched Ambassadors therefore in all haste to Rome, with immense sums of money, and with orders, first, by most ample presents, to secure his old friends, then to acquire new; and lastly, to buy all who were to be bought. The Ambassadors executed their commission with unwearied diligence; and such a change, says Sallust, ensued, that Jugurtha, from being hated and detested, became a great favourite of the Nobility, inso-much that some, engaged by hope, others, gained by actual bribes, made themselves solicitors to the rest of the Senate, that no severe decree might pass against the King. When the Ambassadors thought themselves sufficiently secure of their point, the Senate gave audience to both parties. Adherbal is said to have made a long speech, wherein he displayed the uncommon kindness which his father Micipsa had shewn to Jugurtha, from his very infancy to the time when he adopted him; the extreme baseness of the latter, whom no obligations could engage to gratitude. He repeatedly expressed a concern that he should be troublesome to the Senate before he had merited their favour by any service, yet he hoped that the remembrance of Masiniissa's services, and constant zeal for the glory of the Roman name, would be sufficient to procure, from the Roman Senate and People, a protection for his grandson.

^a If we believe the epitome of Livy, Hiempsal, was vanquished and slain in battle by Jugurtha.

As soon as the King had done speaking, Jugurtha's Ambassadors, relying more on the force of their presents than the justice of their cause, returned a short answer; That Hiempsal had been slain by the Numidians for his cruelty; that Adherbal had been the aggressor in the late war; that because, being vanquished, he could not do the injury he intended, he now complained; and that as to Jugurtha, he earnestly requested of the Senate not to think, that he was a different man from him they had known at Numantia, nor give less credit to his actions than to his enemy's words.

This said, Adherbal and the Ambassadors withdrew, and the Senate went upon the affair. Not only all those of the Fathers whom Jugurtha had corrupted, but those who were under their influence, treated with scorn whatever had been alledged by Adherbal, extolled, in the highest strains of praise, the virtue of the King, pleaded for him, solicited for him, and, in short, expressed as much zeal for the justification of his infamous actions, as if their own honour had been in question. Some few there were, who, preferring justice and good conscience to money, declared for succouring Adherbal, and severely revenging the murder of his brother. The man who spoke the most warmly for this measure, but not from any love of virtue or justice, was Æmilius Scaurus^a, a person of high birth, of active spirit, factious, greedy of power, honours and riches, but very skilful in concealing his vices. He observing in how open and shameless a manner the King's money was distributed among the Senators, and apprehending lest such prostitute venality should rouse the popular indignation, laid a restraint, for the present, on his habitual covetousness.

^a He was afterwards Consul and Prince of the Senate, as we have observed, in the year 635.

The party, however, which favoured Jugurtha, prevailed; and it was voted that ten Commissioners should be sent into Africa, to divide Numidia between the two rivals. At the head of these Commissioners was L. Opimius, a person of great distinction, and at that time of great weight in the Senate, because he had so cruelly executed the revenge of the Nobles upon C. Gracchus and the commons. Though Opimius had been bought by Jugurtha, and had appeared his friend at Rome, yet, when that Senator landed in Africa with the other Commissioners, he was received with wonderful ceremony by the Numidian; who, presently after, by rich presents, in private, and a promise of richer, gained him so effectually, that he preferred the interest of the King's ambition to his own reputation, honour, and every other concern. The greater part of his colleagues were likewise gained to the King by the same means; so that, in the division of Numidia, the most populous and most fertile provinces, which are those bordering upon Mauritania, were assigned to Jugurtha. Adherbal's share had a better appearance, as being better provided with harbours, and fine buildings, but, in reality, had more of shew than of strength.

Jugurtha perceiving, by this new partition of Numidia, that his crimes, instead of being punished, were rewarded by the Roman deputies, became perfectly convinced of the truth of what his friends at Numantia had told him, that all things were venal at Rome; and being likewise animated by the promises of those whom he had just loaded with presents, he boldly resolved to possess himself of the territory allotted to Adherbal. With this view, at the head of a great army, he made incursions upon his frontiers, carrying thence abundance of captives, cattle, and other booty; into his own dominions. He supposed that Adherbal would resent and revenge the injury, and, by making reprisals, furnish him with some shadow of pretence to commence a war in form. But Adherbal, being a weak and spiritless Prince, conscious of his inferiority to his brother, not only in troops, but in the art of war, and depending more upon the friendship of the Romans than upon his Numidian subjects, sent deputies to Jugurtha to complain of his depredations; and, though he received an insulting answer, he chose to bear every thing rather than expose himself to an open war. Jugurtha finding that he could not provoke Adherbal to have recourse to arms, and being eager to attain his purpose, threw off all disguise, and with a numerous and regular army invaded his neighbour's kingdom, with a manifest purpose to make a conquest of it. Adherbal had now no other choice, but either to abandon his kingdom a second time, or attempt to defend it with the sword. He chose the latter. The armies of the two Kings advanced to meet each other, and both encamped near Cirta. Jugurtha, the night following, surprised the camp of his enemy, and forced it. Adherbal, with a few horse, fled to Cirta,

Cirta, and, had it not been for a considerable number of Romans then in the town, who defended the walls against the pursuers, the same day had seen the beginning and end of the war between the two Kings.

Jugurtha laid close siege to the place, employing his utmost efforts to take it before any message should arrive from Rome; for he had learnt that the distressed King had sent Ambassadors thither before the late battle. The Senate having advice that the Kings were at war, dispatched three young Romans to signify to both, that it was the will and appointment of the Senate and people of Rome, they should desist from the war, and have recourse to reason, instead of arms, for terminating their differences. These Ambassadors made the more expedition, because, while they were preparing for their departure, a report arrived (though not much credited) of the battle, and of the siege of Cirta. When, after their arrival, they had declared their commission to Jugurtha, he answered to this effect, that there was nothing he so perfectly revered as the authority of the Roman Senate—that from his earliest youth he had always endeavoured to behave himself so as to merit the approbation of every good man—that it was by a virtuous, not a vicious, conduct, he had gained the favour of that great man, P. Scipio—that Micipsa, for the same reason, and not for want of sons, had adopted him—that the more praise-worthy his course of life had been, the less patiently was he able to bear with insults and injuries—that Adberbal had insidiously attempted his life; and that, for his part, he had only taken measures to preserve himself—that the Roman people would not do justly, if they forbade him to defend what was his right by the law of nations; and he concluded with saying, that he would shortly send Ambassadors to Rome, to satisfy the Senate in every particular.

With this answer, and without having been permitted to see Adberbal, the Ambassadors returned to Italy, while Jugurtha renewed his attacks on the place with fresh vigour.

Adberbal, after five months siege, driven to extremity by famine, engaged two of his followers to attempt making their way through the enemy's quarters to the next sea-port, and thence to Rome, with a letter from him to the Senate. His messengers had the fortune to succeed; they arrived at Rome, and delivered the letter. It contained a moving complaint of Jugurtha's unjust violences, and more cruel intentions. In the most pressing terms, he begged of the Fathers, not that they would restore him to his kingdom (they might give that to whom they pleased; it was theirs); not that they would preserve him from death; but only that they would save him from falling into the hands of Jugurtha, the most cruel of men, and who would not fail to tear away his life by the most exquisite tortures.

Some of the Fathers were of opinion, that they ought, with all possible expedition, to send an army into Africa; and, in the mean time, come to a resolution concerning what punishment should be inflicted on Jugurtha,
for

for his disobedience to the orders of the Senate. His friends however bestirred themselves so effectually in his behalf, that they hindered this advice from being followed. All that the favourers of Adberbal could obtain was, that new Commissioners, men of dignity and weight in the Republic, should be sent into Africa to decide the differences between the two Kings. At the head of these Commissioners was Æmilius Scaurus, now Prince of the Senate. They set sail three days after their being named; and landing at Utica, sent orders to Jugurtha to repair to them immediately, they having a message to him from the Senate. The King was much disconcerted to find that men of such high rank and distinction were come to oppose his designs. But though he feared the resentment of the Senate, should he disobey their orders, yet, urged by the eager desire he had to accomplish his grand design, he made a general assault, in hopes to carry the place at once, destroy his rival, and so leave nothing to be adjusted between them by the Commissioners. Failing in this attempt, and fearing to provoke Scaurus, whom he chiefly dreaded, by any further delay, he repaired to the Commissioners, attended by a few of his cavalry, leaving the greater part of his army to continue the siege. Many useless conferences were held; terrible menaces were sounded by the Commissioners in the name of the Senate for his not having raised the siege. The Numidian heard them with much respect, but a total disregard as to any change of his measures. He trusted doubtless to his money; and Scaurus and his colleagues were not ashamed to return to Rome without having obtained any thing in favour of Adberbal.

When the ill success of this commission was once known at Cirta, the Italians, by whose steady courage the town had been chiefly defended, and who hoped they should be spared out of respect to Rome, advised Adberbal to surrender himself and the city to Jugurtha, to covenant only for his life, and leave the rest to the Senate. The unhappy Prince, knowing that it was in their power to force him to a compliance, followed their advice. Jugurtha, admitted into the place, discharged his first fury upon Adberbal, whom he put to death by torture; and then massacred all whom he found in arms, whether Numidians or strangers.

Notwithstanding this new murder, with all its aggravating circumstances, Jugurtha did not want advocates, who, when the matter was brought before the Senate, endeavoured to extenuate the crime, and lessen the horror of it in the minds of those whom at first it had extremely shocked; and so assiduous were these pensioners of the King in his defence, that if C. Memmius, Tribune of the People elect, a man of spirit, and a declared enemy to the usurped power of the Nobles, had not fully apprized the Roman People, that a few leading men of a faction were bent upon screening Jugurtha from the punishment due to his crimes, the affair had been entirely dropt: such a mighty influence had the gold of Jugurtha upon the minds of the venerable Fathers.

But

But when the Senate, conscious of their own guilt, began in earnest to fear the People's resentment, they (in conformity to the Sempronian Law) decreed that the provinces of the Consuls elect should be Italy and Numidia. Numidia fell to L. Calpurnius Bestia, Italy to P. Scipio Nasica. Soon after an army was enrolled for the expedition into Africa, and all the funds decreed for its support.

Jugurtha receiving advice, that, contrary to his expectation, the Romans were determined to commence a war against him, dispatched his son and two of the most trusty friends to the Senate, with private orders (like those which he had formerly given to his Ambassadors on occasion of the murder of Himylas) to buy every man that was to be purchased. But when these drew near to Rome, Bestia moved to know the pleasure of the Senate, whether they should be admitted within the walls, or not. Whereupon it was decreed, that unless they were come to surrender both the King and his kingdom, they should leave Italy in ten days. The Consul signified to them this resolution, and they returned to Numidia.

Bestia, in the mean while, having compleated his troops, chose for his Lieutenants, men eminent by their quality, and no less distinguished for their skill in intrigues, (among whom was Scaurus before-mentioned) under the shelter of whose authority he flattered himself he might, with impunity, do whatever his passions should dictate. The Consul was a brave man, patient of fatigues, a vigilant and able General; but these excellent qualities were rendered fruitless by a sordid avarice; so that, though, upon his first entering into Numidia, he acted with vigour; yet Jugurtha being informed of his ruling passion, very soon made court to it with success. Scaurus entered into the infamous traffic; and it was not the first time that he had been corrupted by Jugurtha's gold. The king, at first, had hoped no more than to purchase a suspension of the war, while he might carry on his intrigues at Rome; but when he learnt from his Agents that they had entirely gained Scaurus, he presently entertained the flattering project of concluding a peace, in person, with these worthy Generals. But, before he repaired to the Consul, he took care to have an hostage for his security. Sextus, the Quæstor, was dispatched to Tacca, a town belonging to Jugurtha, under pretence of receiving a quantity of corn which Calpurnius had publicly ordered the King's Deputies to provide, there being now a truce in order to the King's surrendry in form.

When Jugurtha was come to the Roman camp, Calpurnius, to blind the public, assembled his council, where the King, after making a short apology for his conduct, offered to surrender himself and his kingdom to the Senate and People of Rome. The particular conditions were adjusted in private with Calpurnius and Scaurus; and, the next day, the King's surrendry was formally accepted by the Council, as if the terms had been regularly debated, and unanimously approved; and, in pursuance of an order of the Council, thirty elephants, some cattle, and a considerable number of horses, with a small sum of money, were delivered up to the Quæstor. The peace thus concluded, the Consul, leaving his army behind him, returned home, to preside in the Comitia for the election of Magistrates.

of

When the transactions in Africa, and the manner in which they had been carried on, were publicly known at Rome, they became the matter of common conversation in all companies, and were every where spoken of by the people with detestation. The Senate knew not what resolution to take, whether to disavow or ratify the shameful treaty made by their Consul. What chiefly hindered them from breaking it, was the great influence of Scaurus, said to have been the adviser and associate of Bestia in the late transactions. The anger and indignation of the Tribune Memmius, before spoken of, brought them to a determination. Having called the People together, he upbraided them with their servile patience under oppression from the Nobles; with having infamously suffered their protectors and defenders to perish undefended and unrevenged; and with fearing, even now, those whom they ought to make tremble, and whom they saw lying at their mercy. “I mean not to excite you to arms in order to do yourselves justice, a method our forefathers had frequent recourse to; there is no need of violence, none of seceding; the oppressors have taken infallible measures for their own destruction. When they had cut off T. Gracchus, whom they charged with aiming at the sovereignty, terrible were the prosecutions against the people of Rome. After they had slain C. Gracchus and M. Fulvius, they put great numbers of the Plebeians to death in prison; nor were they induced to end those violent proceedings, by any regard which they had to the Laws, but by their own caprice. Well; let the attempt to restore to the Commons their rights pass for a design to seize the Government; be it, that it was lawful, even by spilling the blood of Roman citizens, to revenge an offence which could not otherwise be revenged. Let us grant these things. But have you not seen with indignation, though you winked at it, and said nothing, the public treasury robbed, Kings and Republics paying taxes to a few of the Nobility, who ingrossed to themselves all the honours, and all the riches of the state? Nor were they content to commit these iniquities with impunity; but at length our Laws, the majesty of the Roman People, all things divine and human, were betrayed by them to a foreign enemy. Nor do the guilty feel any shame or sorrow for what they have done; they stalk magnificent before your eyes, boasting of their sacerdotal and consular dignities, and some, of their triumphs; as if they really prized these things for the honour, not the lucre, which they brought. Slaves, purchased with money, obey not the unjust commands of their masters; and will you, Romans, who are born to empire, tamely endure to be enslaved? But who are they that have thus possessed themselves of the Commonwealth? The most flagitious of men, with hands embrued in blood, insatiably covetous,

VOL. III. E “men

“ men of matchless wickedness, and matchless arrogance, who make “ a traffic of faith, honour, religion, disregarding all distinction of right “ and wrong. Some have provided for their own safety by murder“ ing your Tribunes, others by unjust prosecutions, the greater part by “ massacres of the Commons; and thus the more loaded any man is “ with crimes, the more secure he is from punishment. Yet, instead of “ fearing you, after so many crimes, they take advantage of your want of “ spirit to make you fear them. As they have, all, the same objects of “ hate, desire, and fear, they are thence united. And this union among “ good men is friendship; among bad men faction. — But will not you “ exert your endeavours to throw off the yoke of these men, and to “ maintain that liberty which your forefathers procured to themselves “ by their virtue, and delivered down to you? You will ask me, per“ haps, what measures I would advise? My answer is, I would have you “ prosecute the betrayers of the Republic; not in the way of venge“ ful violence, not by acts of power, but by the method of legal pro“ cess, and by the evidence of Jugurtha, who, if he has in good ear“ nest made a surrendry of himself and his kingdom to the Roman People, “ will be obedient to your orders. If he slight them, you may thereby “ judge what sort of peace and surrendry that is, by virtue of which “ Jugurtha reaps impunity for his crimes, a few great men immense “ riches, and the Republic nothing but loss and disgrace. But perhaps “ you are not yet weary of their domination, and, rather than do as I “ advise, chuse to have kingdoms, provinces, laws, rights, tribunals, war “ and peace, in short, every thing divine and human, depend on the will “ of a few men; while you, the Roman People, victorious over all your “ enemies abroad, and giving laws to other nations, are content with “ barely living and breathing. For who among you has had the resolu“ tion to refuse the yoke of servitude? But, though I think it very disho“ nourable to have suffered an injury without revenging it, I could well “ enough bear that you should pardon these guilty men, because they are “ your fellow-citizens, if it were not that your mercy to them would be “ destruction to yourselves; for so obstinately bent are they upon evil, “ that they would think it nothing to have escaped punishment for the “ mischief they have done, unless they might thence be authorized to con“ tinue their wicked courses; and you will find yourselves under a neces“ sity of submitting to perpetual servitude, or of defending your liberty
 “ by force of arms.—

“ I advise you therefore once more, and exhort you, not to let so great “ iniquity escape unpunished. The matter in question, at present, is, not “ any embezzlement of the public money, any oppression of our allies “ by extortion; those crimes, though of a very heinous nature, are “ grown so customary as to be overlooked. The authority of the Se“ nate, the empire of the Roman People, the Commonwealth itself, has “ been “ been set to sale both at home and abroad ; and unless strict enquiry be “ made into this misconduct, and the guilty be punished, what remains for “ us but to live in bondage under their tyranny ? For to do with impunity “ whatever a man pleases, is to be a King.

“ After all, my intention, Romans, is not to raise in your minds a “ wish that your fellow-citizens may be found guilty rather than innocent, “ but only to exhort you not to pardon the guilty to the ruin of the in“ nocent. Consider, that, in the affair of government, it is not of so ill “ consequence to forget a benefit done to the public, as to forget an in“ jury. A good man, if he be neglected, will only be the less active in “ doing good ; but a bad man more active in doing evil. Besides, if the “ State suffers no injury from bad men, it seldom wants any assistance “ from the good.”

Memmius, by frequently haranguing the People in this strain, persuaded them to send L. Cassius (at this time Prætor) into Africa, to bring Jugurtha thence to Rome, upon the public faith ; that, by the evidence of the King himself, Scaurus, and the rest, who were accused of taking the King's money, might be convicted.

While these things were doing at Rome, those who were left by Besbia to command the army in Numidia, following the example of their General, became guilty of the most scandalous practices. Some, corrupted by Jugurtha's gold, restored to him his elephants ; others sold him his deserters ; others again plundered countries with which the Romans were not at war. To so excessive a degree had a spirit of covetousness prevailed, and, like a plague, infected them all !

Cassius had not much difficulty in persuading the King to make trial of the clemency of the Roman People, rather than of their power ; and the Prætor's character of integrity was such, that, having privately engaged his own faith for Jugurtha's safe return, this Prince considered it as a security equal to that of the public faith.

The Numidian, when he came to Rome with Cassius, appeared not in the magnificence of a King, but in the garb and with the behaviour of a person in distress. Memmius assembled the People. Their rage against Jugurtha was such, that some of them were for laying him in irons, others for putting him to death without delay, unless he discovered his associates in wickedness. Yet the Tribune, more studious to maintain the dignity of the Roman People, than to gratify their anger, declared, that, for himself, he would have no part in violating the public faith. After which, having ordered silence, and Jugurtha being brought forth, the Tribune rehearsed all his foul deeds in Numidia, and (by his agents at Rome) giving him to understand, that though the Roman People knew by whose advice and assistance he had perpetrated all his crimes against that Father who adopted him, and against the two sons of that Father ; yet they were desirous to have a more distinct information from himself ; which information, if he faithfully gave, he might hope much from the honour and clemency of the Roman People; but if he suppressed the truth, he would not thereby save his accomplices, but ruin himself and all his hopes. When Memmius had ended these words, and the Assembly were all attention to hear what the King would answer, Laebius, another of the Tribunes, instantly called out, forbidding the King to speak. The multitude expressed their indignation by clamour, menacing looks and gestures, and, in short, all the ways by which violent anger is used to express itself, in order to deter him from his purpose. Nevertheless, as he had received an ample bribe, impudence carried it. The People, thus fooled, broke up the assembly, and separated. There was at this time, at Rome, a certain Numidian, named Massiva, the son of Gulussa, and grandson of Masinissa, who, upon the surrendry of Cirta, and the murder of Adherbal, had fled from Africa, because he had been against Jugurtha in that quarrel. Sp. Albinus, who, with Q. Minucius Rufus, succeeded Bestia in the Consulship, and to whom the conduct of the war in Numidia had fallen by lot, persuaded Massiva to sue the Senate for the kingdom of Numidia, since he was descended from Masinissa, and since Jugurtha, by his atrocious deeds, had made himself both feared and detested. Massiva, readily listening to the advice, made and pressed his suit to the Senate. Jugurtha finding his friends begin to fail him, some of them being restrained by a consciousness of guilt, others by the ill repute they were already in, and the fear of encreasing their infamy, ordered Bomilcar, his most intimate and most trusty confident, to hire assassins to take off Massiva, secretly, if possible; if not, in any way that it could be done. The Confident quickly found persons qualified for such work: these informed themselves of all Massiva's daily motions and haunts; and, when the business could be no longer deferred, one of the ruffians, who had waylaid him, did it effectually, but with so little caution, that he was seized in the very fact; and being urged by many, and especially by the Consul Albinus, confessed who had employed him. Bomilcar was arraigned for the murder, but more agreeably to natural justice, than to the law of nations, he being one of Jugurtha's retinue, who had come to Rome upon the public faith. Jugurtha, though manifestly guilty of the murder, spared no pains to bear down the truth, till he perceived that the odium of the fact was not to be stifled by favour or money; and then, though he had engaged fifty of his friends to be sureties for Bomilcar's appearance; yet, being more concerned for the preservation of his kingdom than the safety of the sureties, and fearing lest the rest of his subjects would not dare to obey him, if Bomilcar, for his obedience, should be punished, he sent him off privately into Numidia. And, in a few days after, he himself departed, being ordered by the Senate to leave Italy. It is reported of him, that when he was got out of Rome, he frequently looked back upon the city without saying a word; but at length broke out — “O venal city, ripe for destruction, and ready to sell thyself, whenever there shall be found a purchaser!”

And

And now the Consul Albinus, with the utmost diligence, prepared all necessaries for the army, and soon appeared there himself, eagerly bent on putting a speedy issue to the war, either by treaty or victory, before the new elections, which were not far off, could give him a successor. On the other hand, Jugurtha endeavoured, by all means, to gain time. One while, he would promise to surrender himself; and, presently after, pretend distrust; now, he would retire before the Romans, and then, in his turn, press hard upon them, that he might not discourage his own men. The war being thus protracted till near the time for the election of Consuls, Albinus left his brother Aulus, in quality of Proprætor, to command the army, and returned to Rome, without having done any thing either in the way of arms, or by negotiation; which made many conjecture, that he had secret intelligence with the King; for they could not believe that, after such diligent preparations for war, it could be so easily protracted by indolence alone, without fraud.

The elections at Rome happened to be retarded by quarrels among the Tribunes; two of whom endeavoured to get themselves continued in their office for another year. Aulus imagined that these domestic broils would give him time to finish the war by a victory; or, at least, by the terror of his arms, to draw a good sum from Jugurtha. In the month of January, therefore, he drew his forces out of their winter quarters, and, by long marches, in very bad weather, led them to a town called Sutbul, where the King had deposited his treasures. It was surrounded with a strong wall, and stood on the top of a steep hill, and, at the foot of this hill, was a muddy marsh, formed by the winter floods, which made the place inaccessible; nevertheless, either really blinded by his avarice, or as a feint to terrify the King, he erected moveable galleries, threw up trenches, and made all the other preparations for a siege.

Jugurtha, perceiving the vanity and weakness of the man, artfully contrived to heighten his presumption, by sending to him frequent offers of submission, and by pretending great fear, that made him keep with his army in places difficult of access. At length, by giving Aulus hopes of a good bargain, he drew him from Sutbul, into a retired part of the country, whither the Roman followed him, as if he pursued a flying enemy; but, in reality, that their infamous traffic might be the better concealed. In the mean while the King, by his emissaries, practised with some officers of the Roman army to desert to him, or abandon their posts upon a signal given. His negotiations succeeding to his wish, he, on a sudden, in the dead of night, surrounded the camp of Aulus. A cohort of Ligurians, and two troops of Iberian horse, went over to Jugurtha; and the first Centurion of the third Legion, abandoning that part of the rampart which he had been appointed to defend, gave the enemy entrance into the camp. Most of the Romans threw down their arms, and fled to a neighbouring hill, where, when Jugurtha had the next day invested them, he signified to Aulus, in a parley, that though, both by famine and the sword, he had him and his army at mercy; yet, sensible of the instability of human affairs, he was willing, in case Aulus would conclude a treaty of peace, to grant him and his soldiers life and liberty, on condition of their passing under the yoke (a gallows) and quitting Numidia in ten days. Hard and ignominious as these terms were, death, otherwise inevitable, terrified the Romans into a submission.

It may well be imagined, that the anger of the people of Rome, and especially of the braver sort, was raised to a high pitch against Aulus, on the first news of the late scandalous treaty. The Consul, Albinus, fearing the odium which might be brought upon him, on account of his brother's ill behaviour, and fearing likewise the danger which might attend that odium, had recourse to the Senate for their judgment concerning the late treaty. The Fathers decreed, that no treaty could be binding which was made without the authority of the Senate and People of Rome. But though Albinus had raised recruits for the army, and got auxiliary forces from the allies, he was not suffered by the Tribunes of the Commons to carry with him those troops into Africa. However, he went thither himself. His army had, according to the late agreement, quitted Numidia, and were now in winter quarters in the Roman province. After his arrival, he would gladly have gone in quest of Jugurtha, in order to lessen, by some exploit, the odium occasioned by his brother's ill conduct, yet, remembering the shameful flight of the soldiers, and the licentiousness they were fallen into through a total neglect of discipline, he thought it most adviseable to attempt nothing.

In the mean while, C. Mamilius Limetanus, one of the Tribunes, preferred a bill to the People at Rome for appointing Commissioners to make enquiry after those by whose encouragement Jugurtha had slighted the decrees of the Senate; those Ambassadors or Generals who had taken the King's money; those who had delivered him up his elephants and deserters; and those who had made any conventions with him relating to peace or war; and to draw up informations against the offenders, in order to their trial. The guilty, though they durst not openly oppose this bill, used all clandestine means possible, by the agency of their friends, and especially those among the Latine and other Italian allies, to defeat the measure. But all their intrigues were ineffectual, the People being incredibly zealous on this occasion, more from hatred to the Nobles, against whom the bill was levelled, than from any concern for the Common-weal. So violent was party rage at that time! Now, while the rest of the Nobility were struck with fear, M. Scaurus, who had been Lieutenant to Bestia, as was above-mentioned, found means, in the hurry and confusion the city was in, by the stormy exultations of the Commonalty, and the flight of the Patricians, to get himself appointed one of the three Inquisitors, who, by the Mamilian Law, were to take cognisance of the matters in question. But though he had such an amazing influence as to be chosen one of the Triumvirs, it seems that he had not sufficient to screen his associates in iniquity. It is remarkable that Sallust does not mention the persons who were arraigned and condemned on this occasion ; but says, that the prosecutions were carried on with greater severity and violence, according to the then prevailing caprice of the Commons, who now grew insolent upon victory, as the Nobles had often done before.
had

On this occasion Sallust falls into a digression concerning the rise [that is, the revival] of the opposite factions at Rome. His words are observable, and are to this effect :

• “ The distinction of the People and Senate into opposite factions, with all “ the evils that followed it, arose at Rome, not many years before ; and was “ the effect of profound repose, and a full enjoyment of those things which “ are in the highest estimation among men. For, before the destruction of “ Carthage, the People and Senate proceeded with much temper and con“ cord in the administration of the State : neither was there any contention “ among the citizens for superiority and pre-eminence. The fear of their “ foreign enemies preserved good order in the whole community : but, as “ soon as they were rid of that fear, then instantly rushed in ambition and “ debauchery, excesses which prosperity delights in. Inasmuch that the “ peace and repose which they had so passionately wished for in times of “ war and public danger, proved, now they had obtained it, more destruc“ tive and calamitous than either ; for now the Nobility began to turn their “ dignity into tyranny, the People their liberty into licentiousness ; and “ each individual, considering only himself, studied nothing but to gain “ wealth by every means possible.

“ Thus, whilst the two parties were quarrelling and fighting for power, the “ Commonwealth, which lay between them, was miserably rent in pieces. It “ must be owned, that, in the efforts of faction, the Nobility proved the more “ prevalent : the authority of the populace, as it is loose and diffused, was “ found to be of inferior force in the hands of a multitude : so that war “ abroad, and all affairs at home, were wholly managed by a few men : in “ their disposal lay the treasury, the provinces, the several magistracies, “ public dignities and triumphs. The Commonalty were oppressed by po“ verty, and by serving in the armies, while the spoils of victory were en“ grossed by the Generals, and a few Grandees. Nay, the parents and chil“ dren of those very soldiers were, at the same time, driven out of their “ rightful settlements, if they chanced but to border upon a great man’s “ estate. In this manner did avarice, supported by power, insolently, and “ unmeasurably, invade, violate, and lay waste all things : utterly regard“ less of justice, and even of common prudence, till, with a blind pre“ cipitation, it ran furious to its own perdition. For from the moment
“ that, amongst the Nobility, there arose such as preferred genuine glory
“ to

“ to usurped power, the State was in an uproar, and such civil feuds ensued, as if the universe had been tumbling into a chaos.

“ For after T. Gracchus and his brother Caius, men whose ancestors had, in the Punic and other wars, done signal service to the State, began to assert the liberties of the Commons, and expose the wickedness of the Oligarchy, the Nobles, conscious of their own guilt, and thence sorely dismayed, had recourse, sometimes to the aid of our Italian allies, and to such as enjoyed the rights of Latium; sometimes to the Roman Knights, whom the hopes of a confederacy in power with the Patricians had detached from the interest of the Commons; and, thus assisted, set themselves forcibly to defeat the pursuits of the Gracchi. First, they assassinated Tiberius, while a Tribune of the People: a few years after, Caius, while a Triumvir for planting new colonies; and, with him, his colleague, Marcus Fulvius Flaccus. And, in truth, the Gracchi, from an eager desire of carrying their point, in some instances shewed a want of temper. But a good man would chuse rather to suffer an injustice, than, by unjust measures, to ward against it. The victory which [by the worst of means] the Nobles obtained against the Gracchi, they made a most insolent use of, dooming numbers of citizens to death, or to banishment; measures which rather weakened than strengthened the foundation of their own power. For it has proved the ruin of many great States, that the contending parties therein have been bent upon gaining victory at any rate, that they might wreak their vengeance on the vanquished.”

Cic. in Brut. c. 33, 34.

It is said that the Triumvirs proceeded with great severity, which, if we confide: that Scarrus was one of them, is as strange and unaccountable as that he should have been chosen to that office. L. Opimius, Sp. Albinus, Calpurnius Bestia, and C. Cato, all men of consular dignity, were condemned; as also Sulp. Galba, one of the pontifical college, the first Priest, according to Cicero, who was condemned by a public sentence. As for Opimius, the memory of his cruelties, in the affair of C. Gracchus, was so fresh, that the People had no compassion for him; and he was obliged, says Plutarch, to pass his old age in the dishonour and shame, which he had brought upon himself by his avarice and corruption. Yet Cicero laments the fate of this Opimius, calls him Præstantissimus; and says he was the only Roman that, having deserved well of the Republic, was ever condemned by the People; and complains, that he who had left so illustrious a monument in the Forum, should have his own monument, his sepulchre, totally neglected on the shore of Dyrrachium. By the monument, which Opimius left in the Forum, the Orator doubtless means the Temple which Opimius erected to Concord, in memory of his having humbled and quieted the People by a massacre of three thousand of the citizens. The same writer calls the Judges who condemned Opimius and his associates, Gracchani Judices; by which it would seem he means the Roman Knights, to whom, by a law of C. Gracchus, the right of judging had been transferred. Yet, as the Judges, whoever they were, must have formed their sentence by the report of the Commissioners, of whom Scaurus, Prince of the Senate, was the chief, a man whom Cicero calls the Guardian of the Republic, declaring that he not only admired him, but loved him; it is very strange that the report should be so little in favour of a person who had deserved so well of the Republic as the orator would have us think Opimius had done.

Q. Cæcilius Metellus, the son of Calvus, and nephew of Macedonicus, was now raised to the Consulship with M. Junius Silanus. The province of Numidia fell by lot to Metellus, who having no confidence in the old army, made new levies with great diligence, and got together vast quantities of provisions, arms, and all things necessary for a difficult war. Though Metellus, says Sallust, was of a contrary party to the People, yet on account of his good qualities, and especially because he was proof against corruption [by money], a necessary virtue at this juncture, they conceived great hopes of his success. The Consul chose G. Marius, and P. Rutilius for his Lieutenants. At his arrival in Numidia he found the troops so extremely dissolute, so unfit for action, or for enduring fatigue, that, though he knew the Roman People impatiently expected an end of the war, he would not venture to lead the army against the enemy, till he had restored the antient discipline. Even the common soldiers were grown too indolent to make their own bread, or dress their own victuals; they sold their allowance of corn, and bought bread, and victuals ready dressed; and they kept servants, and beasts of burden, to fetch wood, and do all other drudgery, which they should have done themselves. Metellus set himself to rectify these disorders; and, while he was thus employed, Jugurtha, who had intelligence of his proceedings, and knew he was not to be bribed, began now to be really afraid, and to think seriously of surrendering himself. To this end, he sent Ambassadors to the Roman General, with humble assurances that, if he might have his own life and the lives of his children granted, he was ready to yield every thing else to the pleasure of the Roman People. But Metellus, considering the Numidians as a faithless People, fickle, and fond of change, instead of hearkening in earnest to the embassy, secretly tampered with the Ambassadors, each of them separately; and, finding them fit for his purpose, engaged them by large promises, to deliver up to him Jugurtha, alive, if possible, and, if that could not be done, his dead body. In public, the Consul gave such an answer to the Ambassadors as the King had wished. Not many days after this, Metellus marched his forces into Numidia, where he found not any thing like a face of war. The country houses were full of inhabitants, the fields covered with cattle, and the husbandmen at work in their farms, as in a time of profound peace. From the towns the King's officers came out, and met the Consul, offering to furnish him with provisions, and with carriages; and, in a word, to obey all his commands. Nevertheless he marched on with the same caution as if the enemy had been near at hand, causing the country on all sides to be viewed a great way round, because he suspected those tokens of submission to be mere feints, and to be employed to cover some insidious purpose. For Jugurtha was so full of guile, and so expert a General, that it was difficult to determine whether he were more to be feared, absent or present, in peace or in war.

Not far from the route that Metellus kept, there was a Numidian city called Vacca, the most flourishing mart in the whole kingdom, and in which were settled many Italian merchants. Here the Consul placed a garrison, both for the sake of trying whether this would be quietly borne, and for the conveniency of the army, which, by the means of so many traders, might be amply supplied with every thing necessary.

In the mean while Jugurtha, by repeated Ambassies, implored peace; offering to surrender every thing to Metellus without any condition but his own life, and the lives of his children. The Consul bribed the last Ambassadors, as he had done the former, to deliver up their master to him; and then dismissed them, without either refusing or promising the King the peace he desired, expecting every hour the execution of the promises of those he had corrupted.

When Jugurtha compared the words of Metellus with his actions, and perceived that arts and devices, like his own, were employed against him; that he had only words of peace from the Consul, and war in fact, that he had lost his principal city; that the enemy became acquainted with his country, and that his people were excited to revolt; he resolved, being thus constrained by necessity, to try the fortune of arms. With this view, having learnt the route taken by the Romans, and gathering hopes of victory from the advantages of a certain spot where he could post himself, he raised as great a force as he could, and, by private ways, got before the army of Metellus.

At a few * miles distance from the river Mutbul, which ran from the South, there stood, parallel to the river, a waste uncultivated mountain.

* The usual reading is twenty miles. But this seems to be a mistake of the Transcribers. For it is evident, from the context, that the mountain was not far from the river, probably not above three miles, at most. Mr. Gordon, and other Translators of Sallust, by not sufficiently attending to the story, have bestowed admirable senses on the Romans: For, according to them, Metellus descends [without the help of glasses] the Numidians in ambush at ten miles distance, and, at the same distance, his Lieutenant Rutilius bears the shouts of the two armies when engaged in fight. That the Copyist made a mistake in the number of miles, one of the Annotators (in the Var. Edit.) thinks to be certain, for this reason: That it was impossible for Rutilius to do in one day what he is said to have done, if the mountain had been twenty miles from the river.—Nec enim fieri potuit, ut Rutilius ab hec monte præmissus a Metello ad flumen, uno eodemque die eo pervenerit, castra munierit, et — rursus redierit ad Metellum, si tantum spatium interfuisset.

URSIN.

Over this mountain the Consul must needs pass in pursuing his march. In the mid-way between the mountain and the river rose a high hill, covered with wild olives, myrtles, and such trees as delight in a dry sandy soil; the plain around it being barren and desert, except those parts that were nearest the river. Along this hill Jugurtha posted himself with all his cavalry, and a body of chosen infantry; the whole extended in a long line not deep in file. He gave the command of his elephants, and part of the foot, to Bomilcar, posting him in that part of the line which was next the river.

After this disposition, he passed through the several divisions of his troops, urging them to call to mind their former bravery and success, and to defend themselves, and his dominions, from Roman covetousness; told them, that they were going to engage with those whom they had before vanquished, and constrained to pass under the yoke, cowards who had only changed their General, not their hearts. He added, that he had taken all the precautions of a provident General to secure to them the victory; that they had the advantage of the ground, surpassed the enemy in number, and were better soldiers. While the King was thus encouraging his men, and instructing them to keep themselves ready to fall on, Metellus, who as yet knew nothing of the enemy, was coming with his legions down the mountain. When he first descried Jugurtha's army in ambush, he knew not what to make of the unusual appearance; for the objects were not distinct, yet the trees and bushes did not sufficiently conceal the Numidians and their horses. It was not long before he discovered the King's stratagem; whereupon he made a halt, and changed the disposition of his troops, strengthening that side which was next the enemy, and then marched down into the plain. Perceiving that the Numidians did not stir from their post, and fearing lest his army should be distressed by thirst, in a parched and barren soil, he sent forward Rutilius, one of his Lieutenants, with some light cohorts, and a part of the cavalry, to mark out a camp near the river; for he imagined that the Numidians would retard his march by frequent attacks, and since they durst not venture a pitched battle, attempt to weary out his men with labour and thirst. He then moved on slowly. Jugurtha no sooner perceived that the rear of the Romans had passed his front, than he detached two thousand foot to possess themselves of that part of the mountain by which the Roman army had descended, that it might not serve for a place of retreat to them; in case they were routed. This done, he sounded a charge, and, attacking them in the rear, and on both flanks, at the same instant, threw them into some disorder. The efforts of those who made the stoutest opposition were eluded by the manner in which the Numidians fought, by whose missile weapons they were wounded, while unable to bring them to a close engagement. For Jugurtha's cavalry, whenever they were pressed, did not retire in a body, or to any one place, but dispersed themselves as widely as possible, and, if the Romans did the like, in order to pursue them, the Numidians turned short upon the pursuers, and, being the more numerous, were sure to have the advantage. And when, to shun the vengeful fury of their enemies, the hill seemed to offer them a more secure retreat than the plain, their horses could easily make their way through the thickets, while the horses of the Romans, not being used to that work, were not able to follow them.

Jugurtha and Metellus shewed themselves, on this occasion, to be able Generals, and the victory was long contested between them. Metellus's soldiers were better than those of the King, but the King had the advantage in numbers, and in situation. The Romans being aware that they had no retreat, and that they could not bring the enemy to a close engagement, found it necessary, especially as the night was coming on, to force them, if possible, in their post on the hill. Exerting their utmost strength and bravery in this attempt, they succeeded; yet few of the Numidians were slain, which was owing to their swiftness, and the Romans being unacquainted with the country.

During this conflict, Bornilcar, to whom (as was before observed) the King had given the command of the elephants, and a part of the infantry, had, at a distance, followed Rutilus, whom the Consul had sent before to mark out a camp near the river: and, when the Numidian, having learnt, by his scouts, that Rutilus was encamped, heard the shouts of the two armies that were engaged, imagining that perhaps Rutilus would return to the assistance of his General, he extended his troops in such a manner as he thought was necessary to intercept him, and, in that disposition, advanced towards the Roman camp. The Romans, though surprised at his sudden appearance, drew themselves up in order so expeditiously as to be ready to receive the charge, which they did with great resolution. The battle did not last longer than while the Numidians had hope in their elephants; and finding these beasts, by reason of the trees and bushes that hampered them, become wholly unserviceable, they threw down their arms and fled, escaping by favour of the night. Four of the elephants were taken; the rest, forty in number, were killed. After this victory, the victors, uneasy because Metellus had stayed longer than they expected, advanced in good order, to seek him. He, in the mean time, was marching towards the river, and, it being dark, the two parties, on their approach, mistook each other for the enemy. A battle would have ensued, if some horsemen, detached to get intelligence, had not discovered the truth.

Metellus continued four days in the same camp, and thence sent out spies to learn what was become of Jugurtha, how he was employed, whether he was still master of an army, and how he bore his defeat.

The King had retired into places difficult of access, and was there collecting a more numerous army than he had before; but chiefly of husbandmen and peasants; for after a defeat none of the Numidians follow the King except his horse guards, but each man retires whither his inclinations tions lead him ; nor does this bring any stain upon their honour, it being the custom of the nation.

Metellus perceiving, by this account, that the King's spirit was not yet broken by his defeats, and considering that it was impossible to force him to fight but upon his own terms, and that the Romans lost more men by a victory, than the Numidians by being vanquished, resolved to change his manner of carrying on the war. He led his forces into the most fertile parts of the country, laid waste the lands, burnt many small towns and castles, put all the youth able to bear arms to the sword, and gave up every thing else as a prey to his soldiers. This proceeding spread such an universal terror, that great numbers of the inhabitants submitted to the Romans, gave hostages, and supplied the army with corn and other necessaries in abundance. Garrisons also were readily received wherever Metellus thought fit to place them. By these measures Jugurtha found himself more distressed than by the defeat he had lately suffered, being now obliged to pursue an enemy, on the avoiding of whom he had once built his whole hope of safety. However, he did not pursue with his whole force, because he would not, on any terms, hazard a general engagement ; but, causing the main strength of his army to keep together in a proper situation, he, by private roads, and in the night, attended the motions of Metellus with a chosen body of horse, and, falling suddenly on some parties of Roman soldiers that had roamed from the army, and were strolling about the country, slew a great number of them, and took many prisoners ; nor did a single man escape unhurt. After which, he, according to the African method of making war, again disappeared^a.

In the mean time, the news of the Consul's progress had caused a mighty joy at Rome ; Metellus was the great subject of popular applause. “ He “ had conducted himself and his army after the old Roman manner ; by “ resolute bravery he had gained a victory over enemies who had the advantage of the ground ; he had possessed himself of their country ; and “ had driven Jugurtha (elated by the base and dastardly behaviour of “ Aulus) to seek a refuge in wilds and deserts.” For all these favours of heaven, the Senate decreed thanksgiving to the immortal gods ; and, when the consular fasces were transferred to Serv. Sulpitius Galba and M. Aurelius Scaurus, for the new year, the Senate continued Metellus in his command of the army, with the title of Proconsul. The honours done to the merit of this General made him more eager than ever to compleat his glory by a final victory : yet all his marches and motions were with the utmost caution. That he might spread more widely the terror of the Roman arms, he divided the troops between himself and Marius ; the two leaders

Y. R. 645.
Bef. Chr.
107.
344 Conf.

^a This year M. Æmilius Scaurus and Li-vius Drusus were Censors. Livius dying, the law required that Scaurus should abdicate ; yet he refused to do it, till some of the Tribunes of the Commons threatened to put him in prison, if he did not obey. Plut. in Quest. Rom. p. 276.

marching marching and encamping separately, yet not at ^otoo great a distance to be able to succour each other on occasion.

Jugurtha, by sudden irruptions and frequent attacks, kept the Roman legions in continual alarm, and yet found means to avoid a battle : which Metellus having, for some time, experienced, he resolved to lay siege to Zama, a considerable town, and of great strength, in hopes that the King would lead his army thither to relieve it. The King, receiving early notice of the Proconsul's design, got to Zama before him, and strengthened the garrison with a body of deserters, promising the inhabitants at the same time that he would hasten to their succour. And, accordingly, while Metellus was busy in an assault upon the town, and the soldiers, whom he had appointed to guard his camp, were negligently beholding the action, the Numidian appeared on a sudden, and forced his way into the camp by one of the gates. The Consul, upon notice, dispatched all the Roman cavalry, and, soon after, Marius with the infantry of the allies, to repel the enemy ; and the King did not long abide the charge, but retired to a place of security. Next day Metellus having posted all his horse on that side of his camp which Jugurtha had assaulted, renewed his attacks on Zama. The Numidian appeared again, fell suddenly upon the Roman cavalry, and put the foremost ranks into disorder. As he had mixed some foot with his horse, his troops stood firmly to the charge, and the engagement was long and obstinate. Metellus finding, after some time, that he could neither take the town, nor force Jugurtha to a pitched battle, thought proper to raise the siege ; and, the season being far advanced, he retired into that part of the Roman province which lay nearest to Numidia, and there passed the winter. But he did not spend it in idleness ; for since the way of arms had not succeeded to his mind, he applied himself to destroy the King by the treachery of his own friends. To this end, having contrived to draw Bomilcar (Jugurtha's chief favourite before spoken of) to a private conference, he solemnly promised him that the Senate should grant him pardon, and the possession of all his effects, if he would deliver up the King either alive or dead. It is said that Bomilcar was easily prevailed upon ; because he feared, lest, if a peace with Rome were concluded, he should be given up to punishment for the murder of Masfinia. Yet it would seem that he made some scruple to assassinate his master : for, at this time, he only endeavoured to persuade him to a voluntary surrendry, exhorting him to take pity upon himself, his children, and his subjects, and to consider that he had sufficiently tried his fortune ; that his kingdom was now much weakened ; that the Numidians had long suffered all the calamities of war, and might consult their own safety, if he neglected it. At last Jugurtha consented to send Ambassadors to the Proconsul, with an offer to submit to whatever conditions of peace he should think fit to prescribe him. Metellus, by the advice of his council, first ordered him to pay 200,000 pounds weight of silver, to deliver up all his elephants, elephants, and a certain quantity of arms and horses ; all which he executed punctually. The Proconsul then demanded that he should yield up the deserters^a. Jugurtha obeyed in this also, and gave up the much greater part of them ; some few, in the beginning of the negotiation, had escaped to Bocchus King of Mauritania. But when, lastly, the Numidian was ordered to repair to Tifidium, there to receive further directions, he began to hesitate. Conscious of his crimes, and fearing lest their due punishment was approaching, he spent several days without having power to come to any resolution. At length, the terrible apprehension of being precipitated from the height of Royalty, to the low condition of a Slave, determined him to try once more the chance of war.

SALLUST reports, that, about this time, CAIUS MARIUS, being in winter-quarters at Utica, and having offered certain sacrifices to the Gods, was told by a Diviner [an Haruspex,] that great and wonderful favours to him were prognosticated in the entrails of the victims; and he might, therefore, boldly pursue whatever designs he had formed, secure of success by the protection and assistance of the heavenly powers. The historian adds, that MARIUS had, before this, been seized with an ardent desire of the Consulship^b, and that, excepting a noble birth, he had, in truth, every qualification requisite for rising to that high station ; industry, probity, great military skill; in the field, the high and daring spirit of a warrior; in the city, moderation, the disposition and deportment proper to civil life. Superior and insensible to all the allurements of riches and sensuality, he thirsted after glory alone. And so well had he behaved himself in the several offices through which he had passed, as to be always thought, by those who remarked his conduct, to deserve a higher station than what he actually filled. Yet, as worthy a man as MARIUS WAS TILL THIS TIME^c (for Ambition hurried him,

^a According to a fragment of Appian, these deserters were Tbracians and Ligurians. The same author adds, that Metellus caused the hands of some of them to be cut off ; and that, by his orders, the rest were fixed in the ground, up to the middle, then wounded and tormented by the soldiers with darts and arrows, and then burnt while they were yet alive. App. in Fragm. lib. viii.

^b It was seven years since he had been Prætor ; whereas the law required but three years interval between the Prætorship and the Consulship. Cic de Offic. l. iii. c. 20.

^c Tamen is ad id locorum talis Vir (nam postea ambitione præceps datus, est, &c.) I shall here take the liberty to offer to the Reader's consideration the following Question, which the present case suggests, Whether the practice, which some historians, of great name, have fallen into, of prefacing their account of a man's actions with giving his CHARACTER, either as drawn by former writers, or as it resulted to themselves, from a survey of all they knew of his conduct, be not an unfair practice ? Unfair, sometimes with regard to the person, whose actions they are going to relate ; always unfair with regard to the reader : Because such paintings will naturally prevent his making a free use of his own judgment, and may oftentimes mislead him ? It is a trite observation, that, in point of moral behaviour, no man is more unlike to another, than one and the same man has been to himself, in different periods of his life : And yet, if, before we read the history of a warrior or a statesman, we are impressed with a very disadvantageous opinion of the turn and disposition of his heart, we shall be apt, without any other reason, to impute him, afterwards, into strange excesses), he had not hitherto ventured to stand for the Consulship; the Nobility having for a long time, appropriated impute to unworthy motives all his public actions, in every stage of his life; in which censure it is ten to one that we err widely.

And so likewise, if the character be greatly to the advantage of the person characterised, this will incline us to overlook, or to construe favourably, or, at least, to seek some covering to palliate, his very worst actions, actions of baseness the most shameful and inexcusable.

Of each of these consequences of Character-drawing, I shall give an instance.

PLUTARCH, by introducing his account of MARIUS's life and actions, with a very odious Character of him, (such as he, indeed, deserved in his last years) has misled (as I conceive) certain * modern writers of Roman History, to apply that character to the whole conduct of MARIUS from his very first entrance into the world at 17 years of age.

* See Hist. Rom. by the Jesuits Caerou and Rouille, Tom. iv. † M. Cremona, Tom. ii. p. 177.

Il ne connut JAMAIS (says the ingrat as Continuator of Mr. Rollin's Roman History) les loix de la droiture, de la franchise, de la reconnaissance, dès que sa fortune, ou l'exécution de ses projets s'y trouva intéressée. C'est un homme qui n'eut qu'une passion, l'envie de s'agrandir, mais qui ne se fit JAMAIS un scrupule d'y tout sacrifier. C'EST CETTE AMBITION QUI LE TIRA DE LA CHARRUE pour lui faire prendre la profession des armes, par laquelle il eut pour s'élever. Il fit ses premières campagnes au siège de Narbonne sous Scipion l'Africain, &c.

† Vid. sup. p. 10. Note a. Dacier's Plat. Tom. x. p. 281. Vid. 1637. p. 11.

The Continuator has this from the Greek Biographer, whose testimony concerning MARIUS, when Tribune of the Commons, he likewise adopts a few pages after. MARIUS — SE FIT ÉGALEMENT ESTIMER DES DEUX PARTIS, COMMUNE CHERCHANT A PLAIRE NI AUX UNS, NI AUX AUTRES, MAIS ENVIÉGEANT UNIQUEMENT LE BIEN PUBLIC.

These two passages must surely appear not to be very consistent; but this, I think, they will serve to evince, That an Historian, by Character-drawing, at the entrance of his work, may, sometimes, bring even himself into inconveniences.

Plutarch, indeed, seems not to have been disposed to do justice to the character of MARIUS. Perhaps, the rough soldier's total neglect of Greek literature, and his declared contempt of the Greek language, may have biased the mind and pen of the Greek philosopher and historian more strongly than he himself was aware of.

“ If he could have been persuaded,” says Plutarch (in the introduction to his life of MARIUS) “ to pay his devotions to the Grecian Muses and Graces, he would not, after bearing so many honourable offices, and performing so many glorious exploits, have given the reins to implacable anger, ill-timed ambition, and insatiable avarice; passions which carried him to the commission of such horrible injustices and cruelties, as rendered him, in his old age, both infamous and miserable.”

[By the way; we are not bound to reckon this among the most judicious of Plutarch's reflections, seeing, by his own account, SYLLA, who did sacrifice to the Muses and Graces, had more vices than MARIUS, and surpassed him in cruelty].

Our Biographer intimates to us, that Metellus laid the foundation of MARIUS's fortune, by appointing him to be one of his Lieutenants, and that MARIUS behaved himself ingrately towards his General, from the very day they landed in Africa.

Now, in the first place, how can this Lieutenancy be said, with any propriety, to be the foundation of MARIUS's fortune, who had, already been raised to the Tribunship of the Commons, and, after that, to the Pretorship, and was, at this time, esteemed the best Soldier in the Commonwealth?

And, in the next place, though we find, that MARIUS's Lieutenancy proved an immediate step to the Consulship, Does it any where appear, that this was the intention of METELLUS? Did he mean so great a benefit to MARIUS? No, the contrary is evident: So that no gratitude was due from MARIUS to METELLUS; as to a person, to whom he owed either the foundation of his fortune, or the means of rising to the Consulship.

“ MARIUS,” says Plutarch, “ did not consider himself as obliged to the Consul for the honourable post of Lieutenant, but to Fortune only, who was now pleased to favour him with a fine opportunity of displaying his abilities, and, thereby, rising to
“ the priated the office to themselves ; just as if, by Law, they had an exclusive right to it ; handing it from one to another, and looking upon every

Y.R. 645.
Bef. Chl.
107.
New 344 Conf.

“ the highest dignities in the State. He disdained to do any thing for the glory of his GENERAL ; but, in all his actions, had a view to his own glory, and to that alone. In this view he, on every occasion, gave signal proofs of his courage ; and, as he never declined any great and important enterprise, through fear of the difficulties and dangers which attended it ; so he never, through pride, disdained to charge himself with the execution of the most inconsiderable. Surpassing all the other officers in foresight and military skill, he vied with the common soldiers in temperance and in patient enduring of hardships and fatigue ; chusing to eat and lodge no better than they ; and, whenever a camp was to be fortified, mixing among them, and putting his hand to the work : by which means he not only gained their affections, but made them content and chearful in the performance of duty. For the Roman soldiers were much better pleased, when a commander condescended to share their labours, than when he indulged them in sloth and idleness.”

How to reconcile this conduct of MARIUS with his disdaining to do any thing for the promotion of METELLUS's glory, seems to be somewhat difficult : Because certain it is, that, by whatever passions MARIUS might be secretly animated, he well knew, that he could do no exploit under the direction and auspices of his General, but what would redound to the credit of his GENERAL : and it is not to be doubted, that METELLUS's principal view, when he chose MARIUS for his Lieutenant, was the advancement of his own honour, to which he thought the exemplary behaviour of MARIUS, and his distinguished talents for military affairs, would be greatly instrumental ; and, in this, he was not disappointed.

Nor is there any shadow of proof, that MARIUS, *from the time of his landing in Africa, had malevolent * dispositions toward's his General.* If he had such dispositions, he kept them concealed from METELLUS ; or, if not, SALLUST was perfectly ignorant of this particular, when he wrote the Jugurthine War : for this Historian, having related how Jugurtha surprised the Roman camp, and forced his way into it, whilst METELLUS was employed in the attack of Zama (the siege of which place he did not undertake 'till the second year of his command, and towards the end of the campaign) tells us, that the Proconsul, when he detached MARIUS, with the auxiliaries, to recover the camp (from which the guard in their consternation had fled) “ conjured him, with tears in his eyes, by their FRIENDSHIP, and by his regard for his country, not to suffer a spot on the honour of her victorious army to remain, nor the enemy to escape with impunity.” [“ Eumque, lacrumans, per AMICITIAM, perque Rempublicam, obsecrat, ne quam contumeliam remanere in exercitu victore, neve hostes inulcas abire sinat.”

VOL. III.

It does not appear, that MARIUS, when Lieutenant to METELLUS, acted otherwise than as a brave and able officer, zealous for the service of his Country, and the honour of his General ; nor that he had a more inordinate ambition, than even the most HONEST of the Nobles, his contemporaries. He was now 48 years old, had maintained a conduct hitherto unexceptionable, and, having been Prætor seven years before, had a legal right to stand for the Consulship. SALLUST, in his account of MARIUS, has marked the first steps by which this famous Roman deviated from the path of virtue into that of the most enormous wickedness ; and has plainly told us the temptation, the provocation, by which he was seduced.

It was METELLUS's contemptuous treatment of him, that kindled those passions of resentment and revenge, with which he afterwards flamed. A brave man, and of superior lustre in that branch of merit which was most esteemed at Rome, is it any wonder that he did not easily brook the haughty injustice of a Grandee, to whose successes in war, during two years, he had remarkably contributed, and who, yet, despised, and insulted him, for not being nobly born ?

The insolence of the Nobles, and their violation of those laws of equality which had been the source of Roman greatness, may justly be considered as the occasional cause of all those mischiefs which MARIUS brought upon his country.

G

I come

* See Catrou, tom. xiv. p. 59.

Y. R. 625. New Man, how distinguished soever by his merit, as a prophane person, But now, the prevailing passion
 But C. unqualified for admission to that sacred honour. But now, the prevailing passion

I come now to give an instance of the inconvenient consequence of Ciceronian writing, when it is in the mouth of the person characterised.

Tom. ix. p. 251. The Continuator of M. Rollin's Roman History, when he first speaks of METELLUS, makes no scruple to say,—"THIS CONSUL HAD ALL THE QUALITIES THAT CAN RENDER A MAN ESTIMABLE; C. Consul avait tout ce que peut rendre un bon citoyen." Yet, not many pages after, we find that METELLUS had so little sense of honour, as to think it right at liberty to use any means by which he might acquire the glory of successfully terminating the war, committed to his conduct.—"I prit les quartiers d'hiver dans la Province Romaine, à portée de la Summe. Il ne donna pas ce temps-là à l'oisiveté et aux délices, comme il étoient souvent les autres Généraux: et ne perdant point vue de Jugurtha, il dressa de nouvelles batteries pour parvenir à finir la guerre. Il jura vraiment loüable, s'il n'eût employé que des voies d'honneur. Mais nous avons vu qu'il n'étoit pas scrupuleux sur cet article. Tout moyen lui étoit bon pour réussir."

This is said on account of the Proconsul's secretly practising with Bomilcar, the King's chief confidant, to deliver up his royal master alive or dead into the hands of his enemies: on this confidant, METELLUS promises the felon, that the Senate shall not only pardon the murder he had committed at Roma, but confirm him in the possession of his whole fortune.

When the ingenious Writer says, Nous avons vu qu'il n'étoit pas scrupuleux, &c. he refers to METELLUS's former tampering, for the same purpose, with every one of the many ambassadors, whom Jugurtha, from time to time, had sent to him, with offers of submission. "I prit les quartiers d'hiver, en les entretenant chacun en particulier; et les croissant qu'il étoit à ce qu'il pouvoit d'eux, il leur proposoit et se mettoit à leur persuader de s'engager à lui contre Jugurtha et sa mort. Constatte par ses discours, et que prouve que même les plus sages du temps ou nous en sommes, se résentoient du depe-

RISSEMENT DES MOEURS. METELLUS, par ses discours, se mettoit à leur persuader de s'engager à lui contre Jugurtha et sa mort. Constatte par ses discours, et que prouve que même les plus sages du temps ou nous en sommes, se résentoient du depe-

May we not here apply to METELLUS De Off. himself, the censure which CICERO passes l. iii. 20. on MARIUS for having calumniated METELLUS? Pessimusne MARIUM virum bonum judicare?—Explica, atque excute intelligentiam tuam, ut videris, quæ sit in ea, species, forma, et notio VIRI BONI. Cedit ergo in VIRUM BONUM nentiri emulacionis causa?—Nil profecto minus. Et ergo illa res tanti, aut communi ulli niam expandam, ut VIRI BONI et splendorem et nomen ac iustas? QUID EST, quod afferre tantum utilitas sit, qua dicitur, possit, quantum auferre, si BONI VIRI nomen eripuerit? fructus justitiamque detraxerit? Quid enim interest utraque ex parte se quis convertat in bellum, an in hominis figura immanitatem gerat bellum?

It may not perhaps be improper, on the present occasion, to add to this passage from Cicero's Offices, some few of the many things which he elsewhere speaks in commendation of MARIUS,

---Caium Marium vidimus, qui mihi secun- Paradox 2.
 cis in rebus suis ex fortissimis beneficiis: in adversis, unus ex summis viris videbatur, quod bonitas esse mortali nihil potest. Neque, infame, rebus quibus viris virtus habeat, nomen tantum virtutis, sed et quid sit, et valeat, ignorat---

---Quædam aliquam gratiorem et constantior- Orat. pro rent et præstantiorum virtute, prudentia, reli- Balb. 20.
 giorum, et patrum [C. MARIO?]

---Pacatum cum exeret militi tribunus Orat. pro militibus, in exercitu C. MARI, PROPINQUUS Mil. 3. ejus imperatoris: interfectus ab eo est, et cum esset in fine. Fuit enim prædicti edolejunt periculis, quoniam periculi insisteret malis.
 Alii, quod illi vir summus, fidele jeluca et generis liberauit.

Plutarch tells us, that MARIUS not only adopted the young man, but, with his own hands, crowned him as a victor. But what the Biographer adds is remarkable, and surely discovers an unreasonable prejudice against MARIUS, Heureux [I use M. Dacier's Translation] s'il avoit pu être ainsi par ses propres

Tom. ix.
 P. 255

passion of MARIUS being soothed and encouraged by the Diviner's prediction, he confidently requested, of his General, permission to go to Rome, there

Y. R. 645.
Bef. Chr.
107.
344 Conf.

Tom. xiv. p. 80. la vertu, et à la sagesse, et non à sa propre ambition, et à son desir d'honneur. So likewise, when the Father Cato has related how Jugurtha surprised the Roman camp while the General was making an assault upon Zama, he thus proceeds: "Metellus, tout occupé de son de son attaque, n'apprit que des fautes de son camp, que Jugurtha y avoit pénétré. A l'instant il députa Marius, avec toute la cavalerie de son armée, pour en passer l'ennemi. Ne soufflez pas," *lui dit il, les honnes aux yeux, [The good Father omits per amicitiam perque Rempublicam obsecrat ] "que le

* Vid. sup. p. 41. Numide puisse se vanter d'avoir été plus heureux à nous surprendre, que nous à forcer Zama." MARIUS EUT REGARD A SA PROPRE GLOIRE.---IL VOLE OU SON HONNEUR L'APPELLE." Thus we see, that, according to these Writers, MARIUS never did a virtuous action, never did what was right from a right motive. And this indeed is expressly said by PLUTARCH.---Si pour bien juger des plus belles actions des hommes, il ne faut les considérer ni par elles-mêmes, ni par la fin qu'ils ont eue, ni par les honneurs qu'ils ont attirés à leurs auteurs, mais seulement par les motifs qui les ont produites, il est certain que ni LES EXPLOITS de Pyrrhus ni ceux de MARIUS, NE MERITENT DES GRANDES LOUANGES, DESTITUES DE CE QUI DOIT SILL LES FAIRE LOUER, je veux dire, d'un motif juste & honnête, qui est l'ame des grandes actions. Il n'y a que les travaux entrepris pour LA JUSTICE, et pour LE BIEN D'S HOMMES qui soient véritablement louables. Or CE N'A JAMAIS ETE LE DUT de Pyrrhus, ni de MARIUS. L'un et l'autre n'ont jamais rien fait que pour satisfaire leur AMBITION PARTICULIERE, et pour remplir ce DESIR INSATIABLE DE GLOIRE QUI LES DEVOIROIT.

M. Rollin, in the Preface to his second volume of Roman History, says the same of ALL the Romans, That VAIN GLORY was le MOTIF UNIQUE de leurs plus belles actions. Whether this notion be well founded I shall examine elsewhere; at present let us suppose it an indisputable truth: and then let us ask, What advantage could Metellus have over Marius in point of Moral character? None, most certainly. Metellus, if he committed fewer crimes than Marius, was not, for that reason, more virtuous than He. They had neither of them any spark of real Virtue.

But let us suppose, as Plutarch seems to do, that it was possible for the old Romans to undertake and perform great actions, from a Love of Justice, and a regard to Public Good; or, in other words, that they were capable of Virtue: How does it appear, from any thing, recorded of Metellus, that he had more virtue than Marius?

If, in imitation of some writers, we were to begin the history of the actions of this Metellus with the Character of him, such as he seems, by his Conduct, to have really deserved, it would be to this effect.

That he was haughty and insolent, despising all merit in men, who were not of his own rank and high birth. That he was closely connected with the Honest, and employed his influence to support them in their usurpations on the rights of the people. That, though not to be corrupted himself, by money, he was a safe friend to those honest men who took bribes from a foreign enemy.

That, to acquire the glory of subduing that enemy, when he was General of the Roman army, he did not scruple to employ any means, even the basest and most odious; and that, when he had opportunities of serving his country, by weakening the enemy, he neglected his duty out of private pique and envy.

I say, How greatly would this character, previously given, diminish our admiration of those parts of his conduct, on account of which he bears a good name in history, and is, at this day, spoken of, as a man of real and distinguished merit? The particulars, I mean, are:

1. That he steadily refused the oath pressed upon the Senators by the Marian faction, an oath which all the other honest members, as well as the dishonest, meanly took.

2. That he chose to go into exile rather than commence a civil war.

Y. R. 645.
 Bc. Chr.
 107.
 344 Conf.

there to present himself a candidate for the Consular dignity. METELLUS, who, though possessed of many good qualities, had a mind tainted with the pride and haughtiness common among the Nobles, pretended, at first, to wonder at his Lieutenant's project, and advised him, as out of friendship, to be satisfied with his condition, and not entertain any views above it: and having sententiously intimated to him, That ALL things were not to be coveted by ALL men, exhorted him, carefully to avoid asking of the Roman People, what they might with good reason refuse him. But MARIUS, notwithstanding this, and a great deal more to the same effect, persevering to solicit his discharge, the Proconsul, at length, answered him sharply, "You need not be in such haste to go away; it will be time enough for you to stand for the Consulship, when my son may be your colleague." The son, at this time, served under his father, and was about twenty years of age.

Such contemptuous treatment, far from diverting MARIUS from his purpose, served only to make him more eager in the pursuit of it, and to kindle in his breast an inextinguishable anger against METELLUS. FROM THIS TIME, putting himself wholly under the guidance of the worst of counsellors, Ambition and Revenge, he said and did every thing, which those passions dictated to him. To the soldiers that were under his command, in their winter quarters, he allowed unusual liberty, relaxing the rigour of their discipline, which he had hitherto always enforced, by his own example, no less than by his authority. Amongst the Roman merchants (of whom there were great numbers at Utica) he severely censured his General's conduct, insinuating, that he was a vain man, had the pride of a King, and, being too fond of command, had protracted the war, without necessity: and he boasted, that, were he himself intrusted with only one half of the army, he would, in a few days, have Jugurtha in chains. The merchants listened to this discourse the more readily, and thought it the more reasonable, because they had suffered, in their commerce, by the continuance of the war, and because no measures seem expeditious enough to men who are in great haste to be rich.

Not to neglect any means by which his views might be promoted, he made court, even by flattery, to a poor unhappy Namidian, the faculties of whose mind were impaired by disease. His name was Gauda; he was grandson of Mastissa, and being a son of Mastanabal, was brother to Jugurtha, though by a different mother. King Micipsa, by his will, had

This was, doubtless, very laudable, especially if those who propose it to him could have supported him: but it might be the effect of mere regard for his own preservation, it not being likely that he and his friends would have got the better of Marius.

[By the way, what sort of honest men were those, who, for the sake of his personal interest, would have involved their country in a civil war? Memmius, the Tribune of the Commons, dehorted the people from ways of violence on a much more weighty occasion. Vid. supr.] named named this Gauda to be next in succession to the crown, after his three immediate heirs. The crazy man having been refused by the Proconsul, certain honours, which could not be granted him without violating the Roman customs, was grievously affronted. In the height of his discontent, MARIUS accosts him, “What? a man of regal dignity——and a man of such importance——a grandson of MASINISSA to be treated so ignominiously? Demand satisfaction at Rome, for the insult you have suffered from the General. You may depend upon my assistance. Nothing could hinder your immediate possession of the kingdom of Numidia, were Jugurtha either killed or taken prisoner; and one of these would quickly be effected, if I were Consul, and intrusted with the command of the troops.”

By these, and other such like methods, MARIUS engaged Gauda, the Roman Knights, the Soldiers, and many of the Merchants (and the hope of a speedy peace engaged still more) to write to their friends at Rome, inveighing against METELLUS for his slow procedure in the war, and expressing their earnest desires, that the conduct of it might be given to MARIUS. The concurrence of so many persons, in soliciting for his promotion, did him great honour; and the times too seemed much to favour his pretensions; the Nobles having lately suffered a terrible overthrow by the Mamilian * Law, and the Commons, in general, being now disposed to raise New Men to the highest dignities.

* Vid. supr. p. 30.

THOUGH Jugurtha, by a fraudulent treaty, had been stripped of a considerable part of his treasure, his arms and his troops, yet he now, with great diligence, assembled an army, fortified the towns in his possession, and endeavoured, by promises and threatenings, to bring over those which had revolted from him. Metellus had put a garrison into Vacca, one of the largest and richest cities of Numidia, and had given the government of the place to T. Turpilius Silanus, an Italian, his particular friend, with whom he was connected by the ties of hospitality, subsisting from father to son. The chief men of the city, being gained by Jugurtha, took the opportunity of a public festival to invite the Governor, the Tribunes, and other officers of the garrison, to feast at their houses. Each man stabbed his guest, and then the inhabitants fell upon the Roman soldiers, and put them all to the sword. Of all the Italians, Turpilius alone escaped: whether this was owing to pity in his host, to compact, or to chance, is not clear: but one thing (adds Sallust) seems to admit of no doubt, that, by whatsoever way he escaped, he was a base and detestable wretch, seeing, in so great a calamity (amidst a general massacre of his soldiers, countrymen, and friends) he could prefer an inglorious life to unsullied honour.

^b Plutarch says, the inhabitants of Vacca sent Turpilius away in safety, because of the lenity of his government. Plut. in Mar.

Metellus,

Y.R. 545.
Bef. Chr.
107.
344 Corf.

Metellus, the second day after his loss of the town, recovered it by surprise, gave it up to be plundered, and put most of the inhabitants to death.—The Governor Turpilius, being brought to a trial, and making but a weak defence, the Council of War condemned him, and, as he was a Roman citizen with only the privileges of Latium, he suffered the punishment of being first scourged, and then beheaded¹.

About the same time, Bomilcar, perceiving that Jugurtha had begun to suspect him, turned all his thoughts to prevent, by a timely murder of his master, the probable consequences of that suspicion: and, the more easily, to succeed in the enterprize, he engaged a Numidian Nobleman, named Nabdalsa, to be his associate in it. Nabdalsa was very rich and very popular, and had used to command a separate army, for performing those military operations, to which Jugurtha, when happening either to be employed in others of greater importance, or to be fatigued with business, could not, in person, attend. These two conspirators having fixed a day for the assassination, Nabdalsa repaired to the army (at that time, posted in the midst of the Roman winter-quarters, to preserve the country from being pillaged). Nevertheless, through fear, he failed to keep his appointment. Bomilcar therefore sent a letter to him, reproaching him with his neglect, and encouraging him to continue steady in the resolution they had taken; for that Jugurtha would certainly be destroyed; and the only question was, whether he should perish by the bravery of Metellus, or by theirs. When this letter arrived, Nabdalsa was lying upon his bed, to take a little rest after fatigue. Having read and considered it, he fell asleep. Soon after, a Numidian, who managed the General's private affairs, and was his favourite, and the confident of all his designs, except the last, entered the tent, and seeing a letter upon the pillow, took it up, read it, and then fled to Jugurtha. Nabdalsa, awaking, missed his letter, and, being informed of his servant's flight, sent after him in all haste, but to no purpose. He himself therefore went directly to the King, assured him that he intended to have discovered the whole affair, had he not been prevented by his servant, and, with tears, begged he might not lie under the suspicion of so great a crime. Jugurtha, disguising his real thoughts, returned a mild answer; and when he had put Bomilcar, together with many of his accomplices, to death, continued his dissimulation, fearing, should he give

¹ Appian tells us, that the Roman General put to death all the Senators of Nauca. App. in Fragm.

² According to Plutarch, Marius so irritated the Council against the accused, that Metellus, though unwilling, could not avoid pronouncing sentence of death upon him; and when, afterward, the innocence of Turpi- lius appeared, Marius every where boasted, that he had lodged in Metellus's breast, a fury that would perpetually torment him for having killed his host.

M. Dacier observes, that the innocence of Turpilius had not been discovered, when SALLUST wrote.

the reins to his revenge, he might thereby occasion an insurrection: but, after this time, he had no repose of mind by night or day. Fearing his own subjects now, as much as he feared the Romans, he could not think himself secure in any company. He had always a circumspective eye, was affrighted at every noise, and, not knowing where he could sleep in safety, was perpetually shifting his apartment, contrary to all regal decorum. Sometimes, starting out of his sleep, and snatching up his sword, he raised an alarm in the dead of night: so near to madness had the excess of his fear reduced him.

The Proconsul, having received intelligence, by deserters, of the fate of Bomilcar, applied himself to make preparations for the war, just as if it were now at its commencement: and judging, that if, by an exertion of his authority, he detained his Lieutenant, who never ceased importuning him for leave to go home, little benefit was to be expected from his presence, he at length dismissed him [about twelve days, says Plutarch, before the election of Consuls.] The letter from Utica, and the public haranges of the Tribunes, had so prepossessed the People of Rome in favour of MARIUS, that the reception he met with there fell nothing short of his sanguine hopes: for the Comitia not only raised him to the Consulship [with L. Cassius Longinus] but voted him the command of the army in Numidia, though the Senate had, already, by a decree, assigned that province to METELLUS.

MARIUS, whose chief object, now, was victory in the war against JUGURTHA, immediately demanded of the Senate, recruits for the legions; summoning, at the same time, all the bravest men of the Latin nation, to attend him: (with the most of these he was personally acquainted, by their having served with him; and of the rest there were few whose characters he had not learned by common fame.) Many even of the discharged veterans he prevailed upon, by the force of persuasion, to follow him in his African expedition: nor did he neglect to ask auxiliary troops from the Kings and States in alliance with Rome.

The recruits, which the Consul demanded, were most readily and cheerfully voted by the Senate; who bearing him no good will, and believing that the People, in general, disliked the service in Numidia, hoped that he would either be unable, through want of men, to pursue the war, or would lose the affection of the multitude, by constraining them, against their inclinations, to give in their names. But, herein, the Fathers were disappointed: for the People flocked in crowds to be enlisted; every man pleasing himself with the hope of returning home crowned with victory, and enriched with spoil. MARIUS, indeed, by an harangue to the multitude, had contributed, not a little, to raise their expectations. Ever since his election, he had made it his daily practice to insult the Nobility, sometimes particular persons, sometimes the whole body; boasting continually, that he had wrested the Consulship from them, like spoils from a

Y. R. 645.
Bef. Chr.
107.
344 Cons.

Y. R. 646.
Bef. Chr.
106.
345 Cons.

Y. R. 645.
B. Chr.
106.
345 Conf.

vanquished enemy: and, when all his demands had been complied with, and he was about to levy soldiers, he assembled the People, and spoke to them in the following manner:

“ I know, Romans, that the behaviour of those who have obtained from your favour, the high offices in the State, has, generally speaking, been very different from what it was before their promotion. While candidates, they are full of modesty, humble petitioners, attentive and active to oblige. Are they elected? instantly they become proud, and lazy for the rest of their lives. But this is not my turn of mind. The good of the Commonwealth is, to my apprehension, of much greater moment, than whether this man or that be advanced to the Consulship or Prætorship. Nor am I insensible of the weighty charge laid upon me by your very great kindness. To make preparations for the war, and, at the same time, to be frugal of the Public money; to compel to the Service those whom you are unwilling to displease; to attend to every thing that concerns the Public, both at home and abroad; and to do all this amidst a confederacy of envious, factious men, determined to oppose all your measures, is a more arduous task than you, fellow citizens, can easily imagine.

“ I consider too, that, in the discharge of high offices, if other men fail, they are protected from condemnation and censure by the antiquity and lustre of their families, the heroic actions of their ancestors, the credit of their relations and friends, and the numerous crowd of their clients and dependants: but that I have nothing of all this to trust to; that my sole hope and confidence must be in my own virtue and integrity.

“ I am likewise aware, that all eyes are upon me, and that while every honest and candid observer (pleased with my successful endeavours to serve the state) wishes well to me, the Nobles are incessantly watching for an opportunity to compass my ruin. It concerns me, therefore, to take the more care, that your Hopes be not disappointed, and that their Cabals prove ineffectual. From my early youth, I have been inured to toils and dangers. The course which I have hitherto pursued from a disinterested principle, shall I continue it now, when you have bestowed on me so noble a reward? Those who have only a semblance of virtue, a disguise which ambition has occasionally induced them to put on, find it difficult to preserve, in their conduct, even that appearance, when they are actually in power: to me, who have all my life been in the practice of virtue, the habit of well doing is become natural.

“ You have ordained, that I shall have the management of the war against JUGURTHA; an ordinance highly displeasing to the Nobles. Now, pray consider with yourselves, whether it would not be better to alter your choice, and employ, upon this, or any other like occasion,

“ some one out of that worthy body; a man of an ancient family, who “ has abundance of images, and no experience in military affairs. You will “ see the hurry, the confusion he will be in, having much to do, knowing “ nothing of the matter, and applying himself to some poor man of the “ Commons to instruct him. For this has, generally, been the case: he, “ whom you had appointed to the command, has been obliged to find some “ other commander from whom to receive directions. Nay, I myself know “ persons, who did not begin, till they were chosen Consuls, to read the “ history of our ancestors, and the military precepts of the Greeks. Pre“ posterous proceeding! For though, in the order of time, the election to “ offices be prior to the exercise of them, yet, in the order of things, qua“ lification and experience should precede election.

“ Romans, compare me, who am but a New Man, with these haughty “ Nobles. Such exploits as they are wont only to read or hear of, I “ have, partly, seen performed, by other brave men, and have, partly, my“ self performed: what they have learned from books, I have learned in “ the service. Now, whether Practice or Speculation be of the greater “ value, do you judge.

“ They despise me, for my being a New Man; I them, for their “ being slothful towards: they reproach me with my want of fortune, I “ them, with the want of virtue. And it is my opinion, that though “ all men have one common nature, those who excel most in courage “ and in fortitude, are the most noble. If the question could be put to “ the fathers of Albinus and Bestia, whether (had it been in their option)
 “ they would have chosen them for their sons, or such men as I am:
 “ what answer do you think they would make? Doubtless, that they “ should have chosen to have the most worthy men for their sons. But,
 “ if the Nobles have reason to despise me, they have the same reason “ to despise their own progenitors, whose Nobility, like mine, took its “ rise from military virtue. They envy my advancement; let them “ envy, too, my integrity, my toils, the dangers I have passed through:
 “ for by these I arrived at the Consular dignity. Blinded with pride, “ these men live in such an infamous manner, as if they slighted the “ honours you have to bestow; and yet they sue for them as confidently
 “ as if, by their course of life, they had deserved them. Ridiculous “ delusion! They propose to themselves to riot in the pleasures of a lazy “ effeminacy; and then to receive the rewards of a laborious virtue!
 “ When they make harangues before you, or in the Senate, their “ eloquence is chiefly employed in extolling their fore-fathers; from the “ relation of whose gallant actions they imagine a lustre will be derived “ to themselves. The event is quite contrary to their expectation: for “ the more illustrious the lives and exploits of the ancestors were, the “ more scandalous are the sloth and demerit of the descendants. The “ truth is, the glory of ancestors is as a light, which, shining upon their Vol. III. H “ posterity,

Y. R. 646.
 Bet. Ch.
 106.
 345 Cori.

Y. R. 645. " posterity, makes them conspicuous to the public eye, and suffers neither Bel. Chr. " their good nor their bad actions to be concealed. There is no such light,
 106. " I confess, shining upon me; but, what is far better, my actions have a 345 Cor. " lustre of their own. Mark the equity of these Nobles! The honours " which they arrogantly claim to themselves, in reward of other mens at-" chievements, they think me unworthy to receive in reward of my own.
 " And for what reason am I deemed so unworthy? Why, truly, because I " have no images, and my Nobility is recent: but, surely, the man who " acquires Nobility to his family, is a much more honourable person than " he, who, born of a noble family, becomes a disgrace to it, debases it,
 " makes it, by his infamous conduct, less noble than it was.

" I know very well, that if they were now disposed to answer to what I " have been saying, they could do it with a most copious and flowing elo" quence, and with great accuracy: nevertheless, as they have, in all places, " given a loose to their tongues against me, and against you too, ever since
 " you conferred this great dignity upon me, I was resolved to speak my " mind; lest my silence should be interpreted into a consciousness of guilt:
 " not that I imagine I can suffer any real hurt from harangues: for, if
 " what the Orator delivers be true, it must be to my praise; if false, my " life and manners confute it. But, since you are blamed, both for pro" moting me to this high station, and for intrusting me with a charge so " important as the present war, please to consider again and again, whether " it will not be prudent to revoke your decrees. I have no images,
 " as I told you before; I cannot, in order to inspire you with confidence
 " in my abilities and integrity, boast of ancestors, who have been honoured
 " with Consulships or Triumphs: but, if it be necessary, I can shew you
 " SPEARS, A BANNER, RICH HORSE-TRAPPINGS, and other military^a " rewards, which have been given me by the Generals under whom I " have served; and I can shew you, upon my body, scars of wounds; and " they are all before. These are my images; such is my nobility; not a " Nobility like theirs; not an inheritance, but an acquisition; a Nobility
 " which I have myself purchased at the price of hardships, labours, and " perils.

" That I have no eloquence, I readily confess; and the want of it gives " me very little concern: virtue needs no paint, no artificial ornament to " set it off: let our great men have recourse to the false colouring of " eloquence: for, in truth, they need it, to hide the infamy of their actions:
 " I never was instructed in Grecian literature: nor had I any inclination " to learn that, which, I found, did not, in the least, contribute to the " increase of virtue in the teachers. But I have learnt lessons which " qualify a man much better to be a useful member of the Commonwealth:
 " I have learnt to rout an enemy in the field, to force him in his strong

^a See Vol. I. B. ii. ch. 25. concerning the military rewards in use among the Romans.

holds,

“ holds, to fear nothing but infamy, to bear cold and heat, to lodge upon “ the bare ground, to endure, at the same time, both hunger and fatigue.
 “ It is by the practice of these lessons that I shall animate my troops; my “ glory shall not be the fruit of their toils only; I shall not indulge myself “ in ease, while they are suffering hardships. To keep your soldiers to strict “ discipline, while you are taking your pleasure, this is to act the part of a “ tyrant, not of a General. The other method of proceeding is the only “ one that becomes a commander of his fellow citizens; and it was by such “ conduct that our fore-fathers acquired renown, both to the Republic and “ to themselves. And yet our present Nobles, having no likeness to them, “ despise us, who endeavour after it; and demand of you all places of power “ and trust, not on account of any thing they have done to deserve those “ honours, but as due to them by inheritance. How grossly are the un“ derstandings of these men deceived by their excess of pride! Their an“ cestors left them every thing that it was in their power to leave them; “ their wealth, their images, the glory of their exploits: but they did not “ transmit their virtue to their descendants; this was impossible.

“ They call me a clownish, uncouth, ill-bred fellow: and why? because “ I do not make elegant entertainments, nor keep a buffoon, nor give a “ higher price for a slave that is to be my cook, than for one that is to “ work at my farm. Every part of this charge I readily avow. For I re“ member to have heard my father and other worthy persons often say,
 “ that delicacies and fineries belong to women; labours and rugged industry
 “ to men: that the good aspire to glory, more than to wealth, and think no “ furniture so ornamental as arms.

“ But since our Nobles are not of this opinion, let them proceed in their “ own way. Leaving sweat and dust and such things to us (who indeed “ prefer them to the costly banquets of the luxurious), let them go on as “ they begun; let them love, and drink, and pamper their bellies; let them “ spend their riper years, as they have spent their youth, in the lowest of “ sensual gratifications. To these let all their thoughts be confined.—
 “ No, not so, say our worthy Nobles: When we have made ourselves infamous “ and detestable by the practice of all the most scandalous vices, we will then “ contrive to snatch the rewards due to the virtuous and brave. And thus “ luxury and sloth, vices so fatally mischievous to the Commonwealth, are “ to be no hindrance to the ambition of men, the most shamefully stained “ with them; no obstacle in their way to the public honours, even the “ highest dignities of the state!

“ And now, having answered these Nobles so far as was necessary, not “ indeed to expose fully the base enormities of their conduct, but to vin“ dicate my own character; I shall add a word or two in relation to the “ present state of public affairs. In the first place, as to Numidia, fear “ nothing, Romans; in effect, the victory is yours; for you have now “ removed every thing that hitherto defended Jugurtha; every thing,

Y. R. 445.
Bel. Chr.
106.
345 Conf.

“ indeed, that could defend him, covetousness, ignorance, pride. Add to “ this, that you have an army there, well acquainted with the country.
 “ It is an army, I confess, not so fortunate as courageous: for, through “ the covetousness or temerity of its commanders, it has suffered a great “ diminution: and it is for this reason, I would have you, that are of an “ age to bear arms, join with me, and take upon you the care and defence “ of the Commonwealth. And do not suffer yourselves to be discouraged “ by the mishaps of others, or by the haughty behaviour of some former “ generals. Both in marches and in battles, you shall always have me “ near at hand to consult with, and to share with you every danger into “ which I lead you: I and you shall be upon an equal foot, with regard “ to the fatigues, hardships, and perils of war. Never doubt, then, but,
 “ with the help of the Gods, we shall conquer; we shall certainly and “ speedily acquire both wealth and honour. And, were these uncertain, “ or at a distance, yet surely it becomes all honest men to support the “ cause of their country: for no mortal will be made immortal by sloth; “ nor did ever any father wish that his children might never die, but that,
 “ while they lived, they might live and act like worthy men. Romans, I “ should say more, if words could put courage into cowards: to the brave,
 “ I think, I have said enough.”

Marius, perceiving that the spirits of the multitude were elated by his discourse, caused provisions, money, and other necessities for the war, to be, with all expedition, embarked; and he sent them away under the care of his Lieutenant, A. Manlius. His own diligence he applied wholly to the business of levying soldiers: nor did he, on this occasion, observe the ancient custom of admitting into the army those only, who had some estate, and belonged to one or other of the five first classes; without distinction, he accepted of all* that presented themselves; so that the greater part of his recruits were of the Capite-censi, citizens, so poor, that they paid only a small poll-tax. His conduct, in this particular, (says Sallust) was, by some, imputed to the scarcity of better men; by others, to his ambition; the most needy, those who have nothing to lose, and who think no action dishonourable that is gainful, being the properest aids to a man, whose enterprise is the acquisition of power.

During these transactions at Rome, Metellus, in Africa, had been engaged, partly in military expeditions, partly in fruitless negotiations.

After the departure of Marius, the Proconsul led his forces against Jugurtha, and obtained an easy victory over him: for the King, having put to death a great number of his old friends, and the rest having, through fear, deserted him (some flying for refuge to Bocchus King of Mauritania, others going over to the Romans), was fallen into the extremest perplexity. It was impossible for him to carry on the war without ministers and without generals; and yet, whom could he trust after so much perfidiousness as he had lately experienced? no advice, no person, nothing could please him: he marched, and countermarched; and changed his general officers every day: one while he advanced towards the enemy, and presently after turned away to the deserts; nor could he determine which he had more reason to distrust, the courage of his people, or their fidelity. Whilst he was in this wavering and distressful condition of mind, Metellus, on a sudden, came upon him. That part of the Numidian army, which the King commanded in person, maintained its ground for some time; but the rest was routed and put to flight at the very first shock. Jugurtha made his escape, through the deserts, to Thala, a large and wealthy town, the chief repository of his treasures, and the place where his sons received their education. Upon advice of these particulars, Metellus, believing he should put an end to the war, could he but take Thala, resolved to march thither, and invest it; though the river that was nearest to the town was fifty miles distant from it, and the whole space, between them, waste and without water. Leaving his baggage behind, he took with him only ten days provision, loading with water, from the river, the beasts of burthen, and commanding those of the Numidians who, after the late battle, had submitted to the Romans, to bring him water and provisions on a certain day at a certain place. It is related that, when he arrived at this place (where the Numidians punctually met him according to the orders they had received), there fell such a vast quantity of rain, as was alone more than sufficient for the army; and that the soldiers, from a superstitious turn of mind, preferred the rain-water to that of the river; persuading themselves, that the plenteous shower was an evidence of their being under the special protection of the immortal Gods: and this persuasion greatly heightened their courage. The next day, contrary to Jugurtha's expectation, the Roman army appeared before Thala. The towns-people, though astonished at so strange an event (for they had thought themselves sufficiently secured by the desert), were not the less active and diligent in taking the necessary measures for defence. But the King, imagining now, that no enterprize of war was too difficult for the Roman General, quitted the town in the night, taking with him his children, and a great quantity of his money: nor did he ever, after this, stay above one day or one night in the same place. He pretended to be upon business that required haste; but, in truth, was apprehensive of treachery, which he hoped to prevent by such continued motion, as must hinder the disaffected from having convenient leisure and opportunity to form combinations and conspiracies.

* Plutarch reports, that Marius did not refuse to enlist even slaves. Plut. in Mar.

It was forty days before the Romans could, by indefatigable labour and many sharp conflicts, make themselves masters of Thala; and even then they were disappointed of the hoped-for spoil: for the Roman deserters, so soon as they perceived the wall shaken by the battering rams, carried the gold and silver, and whatever else was deemed valuable, into the royal palace;

Y. R. 646.
Bef. Chr.
106.
345 Cons.

palace, and when they had there filled themselves with wine and good cheer, set fire to the edifice, chusing rather to perish in the flames with the palace and its treasures, than to fall into the hands of Metellus [a General noted for being *cruel, rather than justly severe to deserters.]

Jugurtha, on his leaving Tea, had retired among the Getulians, a savage people to the south of Numidia, who had never heard of the Roman name. He gathered a great multitude of these together, and taught them something of military discipline. Then, by presents and promises, he gained to his interest the favourites of his father-in-law Bocchus, King of Mauritania; and, by their means, engaged him to arm against the Romans. To this Bocchus was the more easily persuaded, because, in the beginning of the war, he had, without success, sent Ambassadors to Rome, with the offer of his friendship and alliance. (For though, at that time, nothing could be more seasonable or more advantageous to the Republic than a treaty of alliance with the Mauritanian, yet, through the avarice and influence of a few men in power, who would do nothing, right or wrong, but for money, his offer had been rejected).

When the two armies were joined, and the Kings had mutually pledged their faith to each other, Jugurtha, to raise the anger of the Mauritanians against the Romans, represented them as a people injurious, oppressive, insatiably covetous, and the common enemies of mankind. “They have just the same cause for waging war against you, and against every independent Prince and State, as against me—THEIR LUST OF DOMINATION. I am now regarded as their enemy; not long ago, the Carthaginians and King Perses were considered in the same light; and so will every King, hereafter, who shall be thought rich enough to merit that distinction.”

The combined armies, upon advice that Metellus had lodged his booty and prisoners, together with his heavy baggage, in Cirta, bent their march thither. It would amply reward the labour of the enterprize, could they possess themselves of the place; and in case they should be hindered from seizing it, by the Romans coming to its relief, yet, at least, a battle would ensue, which, at this time, was what the politic Numidian most eagerly desired; lest Bocchus, having leisure to reflect, should lay aside his hostile purposes, and entertain thoughts very different from those of war.

As the Moors were a new enemy, with whose manner of fighting the Roman General was unacquainted, he had not now the same forwardness, as heretofore, to come to an engagement at all adventures: but, fortifying a camp at a small distance from Cirta, he there waited an opportunity of giving battle with advantage.

* A great part of Getulia was subject to Jugurtha.

Salust tells us, that such ties of affinity were of little strength among the Numidians and Moors; because every man being free to take as many wives as he could maintain, the husband's heart was divided among this variety, and never so captivated and engrossed by any one of his wives, as to make her his companion and friend: he treated them all with equal contempt.

It was during this inaction he received notice, by letters from Rome, that the People had assigned the province of Numidia to Marius (their advancing him to the Consulship he had learnt before). Sallust reports, that the grief and vexation of Metellus were far beyond what either decency or virtue could allow; “ he restrained neither his tears nor his tongue; and, though, in other respects, an excellent man, wanted fortitude to maintain a character of dignity in such adverse and trying events. Some imputed his impatience to pride; others to that quick sense, which every man, conscious of worthiness, must unavoidably have of contumelious treatment; many thought, that to see a victory, which he had gained, snatched out of his hands, was the principal cause of his immoderate concern: but I have been sufficiently assured, that the advancement of Marius, not the wrong done to himself, was the insupportable torment; and that he would have borne his removal from the province with more temper, had any other than Marius been appointed to succeed him.”

Y. R. 646.
Bef. Chr.
106.
345 Conf.

Restrained, therefore, by the discontent of his mind, and thinking it a folly to purchase advantages to another with danger to himself, he attempted nothing farther in the way of arms; but dispatched deputies to King Bocchus, to admonish him, “ Not to become an enemy of the Roman People, without provocation: that he had now a fine opportunity of entering into friendship and alliance with them, which would be more for his benefit than a war. That, whatever confidence he might place in his riches or in his military force, it would be highly imprudent to change certainties for uncertainties, and blend the affairs of his kingdom, that were now in a flourishing condition, with the desperate fortune of Jugurtha.”

To this the King, with a courteous calmness, answered, “ That peace was what he earnestly desired, but that he pitied the misfortunes of Jugurtha; that if he might be included in the treaty, all other matters would, with ease, be amicably adjusted.” The Roman General sent a reply to the King’s answer; messengers from both sides went backwards and forwards; the time passed away; and, agreeably to the desire of Metellus, no progress was made in the war.

But now the Consul, Marius, who, by his diligence and popularity, had raised soldiers sufficient (and somewhat more than had been granted him) to compleat the legions, arrived with his recruits at Utica. Here the army was delivered up to him by P. Rutilius, the Lieutenant of Metellus: for this angry General, that he might not have the pain of seeing those things, which he could not even bear of with patience, carefully avoided an encounter with his hated successor; and made the best of his way to Rome. Contrary to his expectation, he was there received with the utmost demonstrations of public joy, and as a man equally dear to the Senate and to the Commons;

Commons; the envy of the latter [who had triumphantly carried their point] being now entirely subsided.

It would seem, that, after the Roman army had been strengthened by the troops which Marius brought with him into Africa, Jugurtha had not the same eagerness as before to come to a general battle. For no sooner did the two Kings hear of the Consul's arrival, than, separating their forces, they retired into places difficult of access, there to watch opportunities when they might suddenly issue out and fall with advantage upon straggling parties of the Romans, who, they hoped, would grow secure and remiss in discipline; this being commonly the case of soldiers, who have laid aside all fear of an enemy. But Marius was too active and cautious to be easily surprized. By exercising his new raised men in frequent skirmishes, and in reducing many castles and small towns (neither strong by nature, nor well garrisoned), he brought them gradually to be upon an equality with his veterans, both in courage and in the exact observance of discipline. And, in order to raise yet higher the spirits of all his soldiers by experienced prosperity, and by hope still more pleasing, having led them into a rich and fertile country, and there amassed abundance of spoil, he most graciously divided among them the whole.

On the other hand, the two Kings had no success in the method, they had chosen, of carrying on the war, for the Consul so watched their motions, as to prevent the execution of any important design they could form; and, in frequent instances, when either the Getulians or the Numidians, having pillaged the territories of the Roman allies, were going off with their booty, he intercepted, and routed them; and, once, near Cirta, he pushed Jugurtha to such extremity, that, to make his escape, he was forced to throw off his armour.

But Marius, considering that enterprizes of this kind, how fortunate soever, had more of show than of substance, and contributed little towards bringing the war to a conclusion, resolved now to invest, one after another, all those fortresses and towns of Numidia, which, by their situation, or garrisons, or numerous inhabitants, gave the enemy any advantage in the

* That Metellus, for his victories over the Numidian King, was honoured with a magnificent triumph, and the surname of Numidicus, we learn from Velleius Paterculus, l. II. c. xi. and from other writers. Nevertheless, from what A. Gellius reports to have been said by Metellus, in a speech to the People, it is concluded, that his triumph had been opposed by one of the Tribunes. Qua in re quanto universi me unum antistatis; tanto vobis quam mihi majorem injuriam atque contumeliam facit, Quirites: et quanto probi injuriam facilius accipiant quam alteri tradunt, tanto ille vobis quam mihi pejorem honorem habuit: nam me injuriam ferre, vos facere vult, Quirites: ut hac conquestio, istic vituperatio relinquatur. A. Gell. xii. 9. It is likewise reported, that an accusation of having embezzled the public money was brought against Metellus: but that, when the accuser had obliged him (according to custom) to produce his books of account, none of the Judges would look into them, lest they should seem to doubt of his integrity. Val. Max. l. II. c. x. Cic. pro. C. Balb. c. v. and Ep. ad Attic. l. I. ep. xvi.

war.

war. By this means Jugurtha, would be deprived of his strong holds, if he did not come to their relief; or, if he did, would be forced to a battle; in which (for any thing that appeared to the contrary) he must depend wholly upon his own forces. For Bocchus, either from the levity and inconstancy of his character, or with a view to deceive and surprize the Roman army, had frequently sent messengers to the Consul, with assurances, That he earnestly desired to be in friendship with the Romans; who might, therefore, (he said) lay aside all apprehension of hostilities from him.

Y. R. 646.
B. of Chr.
106.
345 Conf.

Marius, in pursuit of his resolution, began with castles, and certain inconsiderable, but well fortified, towns. Some of these he took by assault; others he terrified into a surrendry; and he reduced others by fair words and promises. But when he found that Jugurtha, instead of coming to their defence, and offering him battle, continued to keep at a great distance, wholly busied in other affairs, he thought the proper time was come for enterprizes of greater importance, and more difficult execution, than any of those in which he had hitherto employed his troops.

Capsa, a large and strong town, said to have been built by the Lybian Hercules, stood in the midst of a vast desert: and, as the inhabitants were exempted from paying taxes, and enjoyed other advantages of a gentle government, it was with reason believed, that Jugurtha might depend upon their fidelity. Against an enemy they were well fortified by bulwarks, arms, and men; and still better by the difficulty of approaching them: for, excepting the lands near the town, the whole country around was waste and barren, without water, and infested by serpents, animals always pernicious, but more so when inflamed by thirst. The Roman General conceived a strong desire to attempt this place, not only because the reduction of it would be useful with regard to the operations of the war, but because it was difficult to effect, and he remembered, that Metellus had acquired great honour by the conquest of Thala, a town for situation and strength much like Capsa: the difference was, that not far from Thala were some springs of water, whereas the Capsenses had but one spring, and that was within the town: nor had they any other supply of water, but from the heavens^a.

Marius, to conceal his purpose, sent away his Lieutenant, A. Manlius, with a detachment of light-armed soldiers to the city Laris, (where he had placed his military chest and his stores) telling him that he was going to pillage the country, and would join him in a few days. He then marched directly towards the river Tana. As corn was scarce^b and water too, the General made the best provision he could to supply both wants. He had,

^a Salust observes, that the scarcity of water in Numidia, and the other inland parts of Africa, was by the inhabitants the more easily borne, as they lived mostly upon milk and venison, without the use of salt or any other seasoning that provokes appetite or increases thirst: the purpose of eating and drinking, among them, being to satisfy a natural hunger and thirst, not to gratify a fantastic luxury.

^b The Numidians were much more solicitous about grass for their cattle, than the production of grain; and what corn the land had produced this year, had, by the King's order, been carried into places of defence.

Y R. 605 a few days before, collected a good quantity of cattle: and during his
E. C. march, he distributed, in equal proportions, among the companies of foot and troops of horse, a certain number of those beasts, directing that, as fast as they were killed, bottles should be made of their hides: so that when, after five days, he arrived at the river, the soldiers had made a considerable number of leather bottles. Here he halted, and pitched a camp; but gave orders to his men, that, after taking due refreshment, they should be ready to march at sun-set; at which time, leaving their baggage behind, they were to load themselves and their beasts of burden with water, and with nothing else.

At the hour appointed Marius led out his troops, and having marched all night, encamped again in the morning. Next night he renewed his march; and the third, long before day-break, arrived at a place full of small hills, not above two miles from Capsa: there he passed the remaining part of the night, taking all possible care to avoid being discovered. So soon as day appeared, the Capsenses, who had no apprehension of an enemy in their neighbourhood, came out of the city in great numbers; Marius perceived it, and straight commanded his whole cavalry, and likewise the swiftest of his infantry, to fly instantly to the city, and seize the gates: he himself followed with all possible expedition, nor suffered a man of his army to stray, for the sake of plunder. The inhabitants, terrified to excess, quite stunned with the suddenness of their calamity, and seeing many of their fellow-citizens already in the hands of the enemy, surrendered without resistance.
Marius, nevertheless, put to the sword all the Numidians that were able to bear arms, sold the rest for slaves, and burnt the city, when he had first given the plunder of it to his soldiers^a.

The execution of so important an enterprize without any loss of men, added greatly to the renown of Marius. His soldiers (whom he governed with a gentle hand, and enriched with spoil) extolled him to the skies; while the Numidians, on the other hand, dreaded him as a being more than human. Allies and enemies all believed him to be, at least, inspired, and to act in every thing by the direction of the Gods. After what had happened to the Capsenses, few of the towns, against which he advanced,

^a Sallust, though he confesses, that the General's proceeding, in this instance, was contrary to the laws of war, seems disposed to extenuate the iniquity, by telling us, that Marius did not act thus from a spirit of covetousness or cruelty, but because the place was very commodious to Jugurtha, and not accessible to the Romans without much difficulty; and because the people were an inconstant, perfidious race, not to be kept to duty either by kindness or by severity. But it may here be observed, that, if the historian speaks of the disposition of the Capsenses towards their own Prince, he contradicts what he told us before, viz. that they were esteemed a people whose fidelity might be depended upon, [fidelissimi habebantur]. If he means, that they were perfidious to the Romans, of this the Romans could have no experience. The truth seems to be, that Marius committed this unjustifiable, cruel act, in order to bring the war to a speedy conclusion, by terrifying the Numidians into a desertion of all their towns, without waiting till they were attacked: for we find, by the sequel of the story, that his cruelty had this effect with regard to most of them.

made any opposition ; those which did, he forced ; the greater number were deserted upon his approach ; and he gave them all to the flames : over the whole country were spread fire, slaughter, and desolation.

Y. R. 645.
Bef. Chr.
106.
345 Cont.

The Consul closed this campaign with an exploit not less difficult in prospect (if we except what regarded the march of the army) than Capsa had been.

Not far from the river Muluccha, which divided the kingdom of Jugurtha from that of Bocchus, there was, in the midst of a plain, a high and rocky hill, of considerable breadth at top ; on which stood a small fortress, or castle, well stored with men, arms, and provisions, and furnished with a spring of water. The way up to this castle was very narrow, and, on each side, bordered with a precipice : the rest of the hill nature had formed in every part, with such a declivity, as, for its steepness, might well be taken for the effect of human contrivance and industry ; mounds and turrets, and the other machinery commonly used in sieges, could not be employed here. Nevertheless, as Jugurtha had here deposited his treasures, Marius set his heart upon making the conquest. The success of his first efforts did not correspond to his hope. To get up to the castle, by the narrow way above mentioned, was repeatedly attempted in vain. The enemy, with ease, broke to pieces his covered galleries [vineæ,] or destroyed them with fire : insomuch that, after losing a considerable number of his bravest soldiers, he began to think of entirely dropping the enterprise. While his mind was in restless anxiety, fluctuating and undetermined, a Ligurian, of the auxiliary troops, going out of the camp, in search of water, observed, on the side of the hill (opposite to that side where the Romans made their attack) some snails crawling about the rocks : he picked up one, and then another, and continued climbing, in pursuit of more, till insensibly he got almost to the summit. Not meeting with any thing to check his progress, natural curiosity prompted him to proceed. In the place, where he chanced then to be, was a tall oak, which, growing out of the side of the hill, had been forced, by the rocky soil, to tend downward at first ; but, when freed from that constraint, had taken a turn, and sprung upward, as all trees naturally do. The Ligurian, availing himself, one while of the branches of this tree, and then of the prominences of the rocks, mounted, at length, so high, as to be able to take a view of the level on which the fortress stood ; nor was he, in any degree, disturbed in his survey, the attention of the Numidians being wholly engrossed by the conflict on the opposite side. When he had made such observations above, as he thought might afterwards be of use, he came down by the same way he had gone up, but with more thought and circumspection, considering carefully every step of the descent.

And now highly pleased with his important discoveries, away he speeds to the General, informs him of all, presses him to attempt the fortress on that side, and offers to be himself foremost in the danger, conductor of the troops that should be appointed to the service. The General immediately orders some of his attendants to go with the Ligurian, and examine into the truth of his report. Of these though some bring word that the thing is difficult, yet, others affirming it to be easy, Marius's hope of conquest is revived, and he resolves to make the experiment.

Out of the trumpeters belonging to the army, the Consul chose five, that were deemed the most active and nimble of the whole corps; and he gave to these, for a guard, four centurions [with their companies], commanding all to observe the directions of the Ligurian, and appointing the very next day for the execution of the design.

The soldiers of the detachment were bareheaded (that they might the better see their way,) and barefooted (that they might climb the more easily) and being wonderfully assisted by the dextrous activity of their guide (as the historian relates the adventure), made a shift, though with great difficulty, to mount to the top of the hill. Marius, in the mean time, had only kept the enemy in a continued alarm, in order to fix their attention wholly to his side; but now, having learnt how far his detachment had succeeded, he sallied out of his covered galleries, and, causing his men to form a Tortoise, that is, to cover themselves with their shields close compacted, led them on towards the fort: his archers, slingers, and engines for casting stones and darts, he employed, at the same time, to distress the enemy. The besieged, emboldened by former successes, fought now, not behind, but before the walls of their castle; and the defence they made was vigorous and resolute, till, on a sudden, they heard the sound of trumpets behind them. Consternation, flight, dispersion and despair, ensued. The Romans pushing on, over heaps of slain, quite to the castle, entered with the fugitives (or scaled the walls), and became masters of the place^a. And thus had Marius the good fortune to draw glory to himself, even from his own inexcusable temerity.

It was during the siege of this fortress, that the Consul's Quæstor, Lucius Cornelius Sylla, made his first appearance in the camp; bringing with him a considerable body of horse, which, in pursuance of orders from his General, he had raised in Latium, and among the Allies.

^a The particulars of this action, as related by Sallust, if the reader understands them, it is well; the transcriber confesses he does not. The fort seems to have been taken by surprize, much in the same manner as the English sailors took Gibraltar, in 1704: but, as to Marius's advancing his vineæ almost to the walls of the castle, and his being engaged in conflict with the Numidians under the walls of it, this seems inconsistent with the historian's account of the difficulty of ascending thither. MONS SAXEUS medietate castelle, satis patens, IN IMMENSUM EDITUS, UNO PER ANGSTO AD ITURELICTO, omnis natura, velut opere, atque consilio præceptis.—ITER castellanorum ANGUSTUM admodum, UTRINQUE PRÆCISUM; VINÆ cum ingenti periculo FRUSTRA agebantur. Nam CUM EA PAULO PROCESSERANT, IGNI, AUT, LAPIDIBUS CORRUMPEBANTUR; MILITES NEQUE PRO OPERE CONSISTERE PROPTER INIQUITATEM LOCI; neque inter vineas sine periculo administrare; optumus quisque cadere, aut fauciari; ceteris metus augeri.

Sylla was descended from Cornelius Ruffinus, whom, in the year 478, after he had been twice Consul and once Dictator, the Censors Fabricius and Æmilius expelled the Senate for having ten pounds of silver plate in his house^a: and this branch of the noble Cornelian family had made no figure in the Republic since that time, and was almost sunk into obscurity, as well as poverty, when “Sylla produced it again into light, by aspiring to the honours of the State. He had been carefully instructed in all the learning of Greece and Rome; but, from a peculiar gaiety of temper, and fondness for the company of mimics and players, was drawn, when young, into a life of luxury and pleasure; so that Marius, [if we may believe Valerius Maximus] complained, that, in so rough and desperate a service, Chance had given him so soft and delicate a Quæstor. When he arrived in Africa he knew nothing of the art of war: but, whether roused by the example, or stung by the reproach, of his General, he behaved himself in the Quæstorship with the greatest vigour and courage, suffering no man to out-do him in any part of military duty or labour.” Backward to receive favours, eager to requite, when he had received; ready to assist all who asked his assistance, and even doing kind offices to many without waiting to be asked; making himself equal and familiar to the lowest of the soldiers, and yet, in his converse with them, never seeking to wound the reputation of his General, or of any other worthy person (the common practice, says Sallust, of wicked ambition); by all this he soon acquired, not only the character of a brave and skilful officer, but the affection both of Marius and of the whole army.

Jugurtha, after the loss of Capsa, and other his best fortified and most important places, together with an immense treasure, became sensible that nothing could retrieve his affairs, but a victory in the field: he sent messengers therefore to King Bocchus to urge him to march his forces with all possible expedition into Numidia; for that now was the time to give battle to the enemy. The Mauritanian demurred; it was found necessary to bribe his Ministers; nor could these prevail till he himself was bribed with the promise from Jugurtha, of a third part of Numidia, in case the Romans should be driven out of Africa; or the Numidian King, by a treaty of Peace, be left in possession of his dominions entire. Allured by this offer, Bocchus came with a numerous army to the assistance of his ally. Marius was moving off towards his winter-quarters, when, about an hour before night, he found himself, on a sudden, encompassed on all sides by the united forces of the two Kings. They had chosen not to appear till towards the close of the day, because darkness, in case they were defeated, would be advantageous to them; and, in case they proved victorious, would be no disadvantage, they being well acquainted with the country; whereas, in both cases, to the Romans, who were strangers, the 345 Co. f.

Y. R. 646.
Bef. Chr.
106.

Middleton's Life of Cicero.

^a Plut. in Sylla. Vell. Pat. l. ii. Val. Max. VI. ix. Sallust.

night

Y. R. 645.
Bef. Chr.
155.
345 Conf.

night would unavoidably create difficulties and perplexity. The Consul's army being attacked and broken in upon in divers parts, before he could put it in any order for battle, or give out any word of command, the soldiers, both old and new (for these latter had learnt so much of the art of war, threw themselves into circular bodies, and thus, fronting every way, sustained the charge of the enemy. In this surprize, hurry, and confusion, Marius, though unable to perform all the functions of a General, yet, with a troop which constantly attended him (and which he had filled with men chosen rather for their bravery than on account of any personal regard), flew about to every quarter; one while succouring his own people in distress, then falling in amongst the thickest of the enemy, and still fighting valiantly in person; so that he both assisted his soldiers and gave them an example of courage unappalled by danger. The day was now spent, and the ardour of the barbarians did not slacken, but rather increased, from the persuasion they had, that the night would be favourable to them.

Marius, counselled by the distress of his situation, in order to secure a retreat for his men, seized upon two hills that stood very near each other; on the one, not spacious enough for an encampment, yet happily furnishing a plenteous spring of water, he directed Sylla to pass the night with the cavalry: he himself, having gradually drawn together his disordered infantry, led them up the other hill, which, for the most part being high and steep, and, therefore, requiring little fortification, was very commodious for a camp. The two Kings, though compelled to cease the fight by the difficulty of following him, did not suffer their forces to retire, but made them spread themselves round both hills: and these barbarians, having kindled many fires, spent the greater part of the night in mirth and riot, dancing and shouting; which was their customary manner on the like occasions: even the leaders, because they had not run away, were highly elated, and behaved themselves as if they had been victorious. Marius, from his hill, perceiving their folly, forbade the usual sounding of the trumpets at the watches of the night, and ordered a perfect silence to be kept throughout his camp: but, when morning approached, and the barbarians, fatigued with their sports, were fallen asleep he commanded the trumpeters of his army to sound all at once, and all the soldiers to give a shout, pouring down at the same time, upon the enemy; who, awaking suddenly at the noise, were so struck and stupified with fear, as to be incapable of attempting a defence. More of the Africans are said to have perished in this surprize, than in all the former battles.

And now the Consul renewed his purpose of retiring into winter-quarters; and, because of the plenty of provisions always to be had in the maritime towns, thither he bent his course. In this march, notwithstanding his late success, and the total disappearing of the enemy, he used the same circumspection and precaution, as if their forces had been in fight. The army advanced in the form of a square: on the right of which were the cavalry, commanded by Sylla; on the left, Manlius with the archers and slingers and the Ligurian cohorts: before the front and behind the rear of the main body marched the light-armed infantry, under the conduct of the Tribunes: the deserters, of small account as soldiers, yet useful, because acquainted with the country, were sent out to discover. At the same time, the Consul, as if he had appointed no officers under him, was himself every where, attentive to every thing, commending, and reprimanding, with just distinction. Nor was he less careful in a camp, than on a march. Going the rounds in person, he visited the watch and every quarter; not so much from any distrust of those employed to execute his orders, as from a persuasion, that the soldiers would more willingly submit to labour and fatigue, if they saw their General partake with them therein. And, indeed, during the whole time that he had the conduct of this war, he kept his men in good discipline more by the fear of shame, than of punishment. Many imputed this to ambition, and to a desire of ingratiating himself with the soldiers; while some imagined, that being inured, from his early youth, to hardships and labours, he took a real delight in what the rest of the world call distress and misery. Be that as it will, this is certain, the interest and honour of the Republic could not have been more advanced by the exercise of the utmost rigour in command, than they were by his mild and gentle methods.

After four days march, when the Roman army drew near to Cirta, the scouts, which Marius had sent out, appearing on a sudden, hastening back, all at the same time; a sure sign that the forces of the enemy were not far off. But as these scouts came from different quarters, and yet made one and the same report of the enemy's approach, the Consul could not possibly know on which side he should be attacked. To be prepared, therefore, on every side, to sustain the charge, he kept his men in the very order of their march, and halted where he then was. This measure disappointed Jugurtha: for he had divided his strength into four parts, flattering himself that some one of them would certainly have an opportunity of coming upon the backs of the Romans. The Moorish horse began the action, boldly charging the Roman cavalry, commanded by Sylla, who discovered great ability as well as resolution in sustaining the shock and repulsing the enemy. During this conflict King Bocchus, at the head of a body of foot, just brought him by his son Volux (who, loitering in his march, had not been in the former battle), attacked the rear-guard of the Roman army. Jugurtha, with the most numerous division of his troops, faced the Roman van, conducted by Marius in person: but he no sooner received advice of Bocchus's being come up, than he privately, with a few attendants, wheeled

Y. R. 649.
Bef. Chr.
106.
345 Conf.

V. R. 426 wheeled off to that King's body of Infantry, crying aloud, as he joined
 B. C. 146. them, It is in vain for the Romans to continue the fight; for I have just
 146. now killed Marius with my own hand. And this he spoke in Latin^b, that the Roman soldiers might understand him: at the same time he shewed them his sword, red with the blood of a foot soldier, whom, with his own hand, he had killed a little before. How much reason soever the Romans had to suspect the veracity of the reporter, it did not hinder the report from having, in great measure, the desired effect. They were terrified and disheartened; while, on the other hand, the barbarians, inspired with fresh courage, pushed their enemies with more vigour and fury than before: insomuch that these were on the very point of running away, when Sylla, who had routed the cavalry of the Moors, and was happily returned from the pursuit, recovered the day by falling suddenly on the flank of their infantry. King Bocchus instantly fled. Jugurtha, tenacious of the advantage gained by means of his stratagem, obstinately continued the fight, till the few horsemen that attended him were all slain, and he found himself inclosed on the right and left by the Roman cavalry: single he then broke through all opposition, escaping unhurt by a shower of darts that were thrown at him as he went off. About the same time, the Consul, who, after putting the Numidian horse to flight, received notice, that his rear-guard had given ground, was coming with all diligence to their succour. In conclusion, the Africans were totally routed on every side^c.

Marius, now unquestionably conqueror, and pursuing his march without further molestation, arrived at Cirta. Hither, about five days after the battle, came Ambassadors from King Bocchus, with this request, "That the Consul would be pleased to send to him two persons, of principal trust, with whom he might amicably confer upon matters which concerned both his interest and that of the Roman people." The Consul, without delay, dispatched Manlius and Sylla, to negotiate with the Moor.
 These deputies, though sent to the King at his desire, judged it adviseable to speak to him, before they heard what he had to say to them: to the end that, if he were inclined to war, they might, by their rhetoric, dispose him to peace, and, if desirous of peace, add more warmth to that desire.

Sylla, to whom, not as senior, but as the more eloquent, Manlius, on this occasion, yielded the precedence, addressed the King in words to the following effect.

^a Jugurtha had learnt the Latin tongue in Spain, while he served under Scipio, at the siege of Numantia.

^b According to Orosius, (lib. V. cap. xv.) the action, near Cirta lasted three days. At length, the victory fell to Marius by means of a mighty fall of rain, which, while it refreshed the Romans, faint with thirst, rendered useless the shields of the barbarians. For being covered with elephants skin, the nature of which (he says) is to suck in water like a sponge, they became too heavy for the arm.

" King

“ King Bocchus, it is a singular pleasure to us, that the Gods have “ at length disposed so great and worthy a man as you to be our friend “ rather than our foe; and have admonished you to break that unnatu“ ral union, which, to the injury of your own most excellent character, “ you had formed with Jugurtha, the very worst of men. We, to “ our inexpressible joy, are hereby freed from the odious necessity of pur“ suing, with one and the same undistinguishing sword of vengeance, him,
 “ the most criminal of offenders, and you, who have only been led into a “ mistake.”

Having thus paid the due compliment to the King's transcendent merit, the orator proceeded to inform him, “ That the Romans had always, even “ from their low beginning, made it their choice to have friends rather “ than slaves, and had thought it safer to rule over willing subjects than “ such as are compelled to obedience. [Do you want an ally?] It is im“ possible for you to have a more commodious alliance than ours: be“ cause, in the first place, we are at a great distance from you, so that “ there cannot easily happen any occasion of quarrel between us; and yet “ we can be as friendly and serviceable to you, as if we were your near “ neighbours; and, in the next place, we have vassals in abundance, “ more than enough; but neither we nor any other people ever so aboun“ ded with friends, as not to wish for more.”

After these, and some other such like empty words, they intimated to him, “ that he had now a fine opportunity of correcting his mistake, and “ that the Romans were a people who never suffered themselves to be out“ done in acts of kindness.”

Bocchus is said to have answered in very soft and gentle terms, apologi“ zing for his error, and assuring the deputies, “ That he had taken arms “ with no purpose of hostility against the Romans, but purely to defend “ his own territories, being unable patiently to see a part of Numidia, “ which, by right of war, belonged to him, as having conquered it from “ Jugurtha, laid waste by Marius. That he had formerly sent Ambassa“ dors to Rome with an offer of his friendship, and that his offer had been “ rejected: that, however, he chose to be silent on that head, and should “ willingly now, if Marius would give permission, dispatch a second Em“ bassy to the Roman Senate.”

It would seem that Manlius and Sylla expressed their approbation of this proposal: yet we find that it was not put in execution till some time after their departure. For Jugurtha, being informed of their arrival, and fearing the consequences, had, by rich bribes, gained to his interest some of the King's favourites; and, through the influence of these, the Moor fluctuated awhile in uncertainty and irresolution. At length his fear of the Romans got the ascendant in his mind; and he then appointed five of his chief confidants, men of approved fidelity and ability, to be his Ambassadors to Marius: and they were secretly empowered to conclude a peace upon any

V.R. 646. terms, in case the Consul permitted their proceeding to Rome, to negotiate
B.C. 106. that affair.

106. C. 11. Marius, after disposing his troops in winter-quarters, had, with a detachment of his cavalry and light-armed cohorts, made an excursion into a solitary part of the country, there to besiege a tower, wholly garrisoned by Roman deserters; and he was at this time engaged in that enterprise.

The Moorish Ambassadors, in their journey to the winter-quarters of the Roman army, fell into the hands of some Getulian robbers, and were by them stripped so bare, that when they appeared before Sylla, who, in the absence of Marius, commanded in chief, they made a most despicable figure. Sylla, nevertheless, received them with all the respectful civility due to their character, and not only supplied them with every thing necessary, but, over and above, made them noble presents; a liberality, which wrought on their minds with such power, as to convince them fully, that all the reports, they had heard of Roman avarice, were false; and that Sylla was sincerely their friend. For, even at that time (says the * historian) there were many persons ignorant of the practice of giving, in order to corrupt, and who imagined that no man was munificent but from good-will: that all presents were unquestionable proofs of kindness. Under the force of this persuasion, the Ambassadors of King Bocchus disclosed to their Roman friend the whole of their instructions, requesting his advice and assistance in the business committed to their care. Sylla promised every thing they asked, and counselled them in what manner to address the Consul, and, afterwards, the Senate.

Forty days they had been waiting to perform their commission to Marius, when he, having failed in his enterprise, returned to Cirta; and from thence (being there informed of their arrival) signified his pleasure, that they and Sylla should come to him from Utica: he summoned likewise the Prætor of that place, and from every quarter of the province, such of the Romans as were of Senatorian rank. Before this Council he laid the business with which the King had charged his ministers; and the result of the deliberation was, Permission to them to proceed to Rome; and a cessation of all hostilities till their return. Of the five Moors, three set out for Italy; the other two returned to the King; who, though he heard with pleasure all the particulars of their report, was with nothing so much delighted as with their account of that extraordinary warmth of friendship which Sylla had for him.

V.R. 647. About this time the consular fasces were transferred to C. Atilius Serranus, and Q. Sertorius Cæpio; but Marius, in quality of Proconsul, remained, by order, at the head of affairs in Africa.

* This Consulship was memorable for the birth of Pompey the Great and of Cicero. Vell. Pat. lib. iii. A. Gell. lib. xv. cap. 28.

The Moorish Ambassadors arrived at Rome, and had an audience of the Senate ; where, having first confessed that their master, misled by the wicked artifices of Jugurtha, had been faulty, they prayed, that he might be forgiven his fault, and be admitted into friendship and an alliance with the Roman Republic.

To which humble address they received this answer :

“ The Senate and People of Rome are not accustomed to forget either services or injuries. Since Bocchus repents of his fault, they grant him pardon. Friendship and an alliance he shall obtain, when he has deserved them.”

Bocchus, on receiving advice of what had passed, requested of Marius, by letter, to send Sylla to him once more. The Proconsul complied : Sylla, escorted by a detachment of cavalry and light armed infantry, set out for Mauritania. On the fifth day of his journey, a body of horse appeared on a sudden, in a wide plain. They did not exceed 1000, yet, by the loose order of their march, were so spread as to seem much more numerous to the Romans ; who likewise imagined them to be enemies, and therefore instantly prepared to receive them as such. This apprehension of danger was, however, quickly removed by the return and report of some horsemen sent out to discover. And presently after, Volux, the son of Bocchus, riding up, and addressing himself to the Quæstor, informed him, that The troops he saw had been sent by the King to meet him, and to be his guard. After this, the two corps joined ; and they marched that day and the next without any alarm. But, in the evening, when they had pitched their camp, Volux, with a look of consternation and distress, comes hastily to Sylla, tells him, Jugurtha is not far off ; the scouts have brought this intelligence ; entreats and presses him to steal away privately in the night, and begs to be the sole companion of his flight.

Sylla disdainfully answered, That he neither feared the Numidian, who had been so often routed ; nor distrusted the courage of his own men ; but, were he sure to perish, he would stand his ground, rather than, by treacherously deserting soldiers committed to his conduct, preserve an uncertain life, which he might possibly lose in a very short time by some natural and common distemper.

Nevertheless, when Volux advised that the whole army should move off in the dark, the Quæstor approved of this measure ; and, accordingly, gave orders, that the soldiers, when they had supped and lighted many fires in the camp, should set forward at the first watch of the night.

At sun-rise, when, all being thoroughly fatigued with their nocturnal march, Sylla was marking out ground for a camp, the Moorish scouts brought tidings, that about two miles before them, directly in their way, Jugurtha had posted himself with all his forces. The Roman soldiers, in mighty consternation, presently imagined themselves betrayed by Volux ; and some were for executing vengeance upon the traitor without delay.

V. R. 547.
B. C. 105.
106 C. 105.

Sylla had the same suspicion of the young Prince, yet would not suffer him to be hurt. He exhorted his Romans to call up all their courage, putting them in mind, that, in frequent instances, a few brave men had prevailed against multitudes: he invoked Jupiter to witness the perfidious wickedness of Bocchus; and then, turning to the Prince, “Volux, you have the heart and intentions of an enemy; begone out of my camp this instant.” The Prince, with tears in his eyes, begged of the Quæstor not to harbour that suspicion, assuring him, that what had happened was wholly owing to the elegant subtilty of Jugurtha. “By his spies, he got notice of my coming to meet you, and learnt the route I was to take. However, since he has no great numbers with him, and has placed in my father all his hopes, it is not probable he will venture upon any open attempt, while I am here. So that I think the best course will be, confidently to pursue our way, and march through the very midst of his camp. I will either send my Mors forwards, or leave them here, behind, as you shall chuse, and I will, alone, accompany you.”

Nothing more adviseable occurring to Sylla’s thoughts, and his critical situation not allowing time to deliberate, he followed the Prince’s counsel; which, by the event, appeared to have been both sincere and judicious: for they passed on safe and unmolested; and, in a few days, they arrived at the place whither they had been directed to go.

[The historian accounts for the inaction of Jugurtha, on this occasion, by supposing him to be held in suspense and irresolution by surprise, as not having imagined that the Romans would come on: but, perhaps, it would be better accounted for, by saying, that the Numidian was too able a politician, to act so very foolish a part, as what they had apprehended.]

There was at this time in the court of King Bocchus, and upon a foot of freedom and familiarity with him, a certain Numidian, named Ajpar, whom Jugurtha (having received intelligence of Sylla’s being sent for) had dispatched thither, to be a spy upon the actions of the Moor, and to discover his intentions. Dabar, another Numidian, was likewise about the King, at the same time, and highly favoured by him, on account of his many excellent talents. This man, whose father was the son of Masiniſſa, by a concubine, had, in many instances, shewed himself a zealous friend to the Roman interest: for which reason the Moor fixed his choice on him as the fittest person he could employ, to be his messenger to the Roman Quæstor: and he gave him in charge, thus to say:

“Bocchus is ready to perform whatever the Roman People require of him. He refers it to you, Sylla, to appoint the place and time for your conference. Ajpar must be summoned to it; otherwise it will be impossible to avoid the insidious wiles of his master: but you need not apprehend any “inconve“inconvenience from the presence of that minister: for the settling of all “matters shall be private, between Bocchus and you alone.” Y.R. 647.

Bd. Ch.

Sylla answered, that “he would not speak fully of the business of his “commission, but to the King, when no other person was present, or, at “most, very few; and that what he purposed to say before Aspar would “be very short.” At the same time, he furnished Dabar with the answer which the King was to give to it. 105.
346 Com.

Place and time were appointed, and the parties, accordingly, met. Sylla, addressing himself to the King, “I was sent by the Roman Consul to ask “you, whether you are for peace or war.” To which Bocchus, pursuant to his instructions, “If you will come hither again ten days hence, you shall “have an answer. I am not, at present, resolved.” This said, each retired to his camp. But, when the night was far spent, the King sent privately for Sylla, who being come, and no body else present, except trusty interpreters, and Dabar, who was sworn to secrecy, Bocchus opened the conference with a speech. If the speech given us by Sallust be genuine*, it may, perhaps, for unmeaning words, vie with that, which Sylla formerly, made to the King. Vide supra,
p. 65.

What Bocchus said to the purpose was this: “That he would, “henceforward, take no part in the war between the Romans and “Jugurtha; would never stir beyond the river Mulucha, which had “been the boundary between himself and Micipsa; nor ever suffer “Jugurtha to come within that limit.” He added, “if you have any “thing further to ask, worthy of me and of the Romans, it shall not be “refused.”

To this Sylla answered, “That the Roman arms having been success“ful in the war, the Senate and People of Rome could not possibly “think themselves under any obligation to him for the offers he had “made: that, if he desired to oblige them, he must do something that “would appear to be done for their interest more than for his own;
 “and that this would not be difficult: for, as he had now Jugurtha in his “power, he might deliver him up to the Romans; who would, then “indeed, be greatly indebted to him, and then every thing he desired, “would follow of course, friendship, alliance, and that part of Numidia “which he claimed.”

Bocchus objected “His ties of affinity and consanguinity with the “Numidian, the treaty of confederacy between them, as likewise the “danger to himself, should he act so faithless a part, of thereby losing the “affections of his people, who loved Jugurtha, and hated the Romans :”
 Nevertheless, wearied out by importunate sollicitation, the Moor consented,

* Sallust pretends (seemingly without any good reason) that Bocchus was not sincere in this message; and that he was, a long time, in debate with himself, Whether he should betray Jugurtha to Sylla, or Sylla to Jugur- tha. Sed ego conperio, Bocchum magis Punica fide quam, &c.

at length, to do all that Sylla desired, and it was then agreed to deceive Jugurtha, by making him hope, he should be included in the treaty of peace between Rome and Mauritania.

Accordingly, Lucius, the day following, intimated to Aspar, that the Romans were willing to terminate the war upon conditions; that he had learnt this from Sylla by Delar, and, therefore, wished to know the disposition of the Numidian King. Away went Aspar, full of joy, to the camp of his master: and, after eight days, returned with this answer: “Jugurtha would gladly come into any measures for putting an end to the war; but having, more than once, experienced, that treaties, made with Roman Generals, are vain and ineffectual, has little reason to trust Marius. If Lucius be desirous of procuring a peace, that shall be durable and advantageous, both to himself and to his ally, let him contrive a meeting of all the parties, as if to confer about peace, and there deliver up Sylla into the hands of Jugurtha. A valid treaty, a treaty made by order of the Senate and People of Rome, will then instantly ensue: for they will never suffer to remain in the power of his enemies such a man as Sylla, a man of his importance, a Roman Noble, fallen

* Lucius seems, when he puts this words into the mouth of Jugurtha, seems to have forgot that Sylla was, at this time, a man of very little consequence. His family, though noble, had sunk into obscurity, his fortune was low, nor does either his reputation or his interest seem to have risen to any considerable height, before the Social War. He could not obtain the Prætorship till he was past the legal age; and, when he did obtain it, it was thought to be by the force of bribes.

But, perhaps, the historian by tellurion means no more than that Sylla was Quæstor of the Roman army, and homo nobilis, as he styles him in the same passage.

As to Jugurtha's attempt to persuade King Boetius, that the most effectual means to obtain from the Romans, an advantageous and durable peace, would be, to betray a Roman Quæstor (then bearing the character, too, of an Ambassador) into the hands of their most hated enemy, it only indicates, that the Numidian looked upon the Mæc as a very weak Prince, and wholly unacquainted with the temper of his enemies. For, that Jugurtha himself did not imagine, he should be enabled, by the possession of Sylla's person, to procure a peace with Rome, we may well conclude from his neglecting to seize him, when he with Volux (not long before,) in the way to the court of Bituntinus, passed through the Numidian camp. Doubtless, Jugurtha's sole view in his endeavours to engage King Boetius in so unpardonable an act of treachery, was to make the condition of the Mæc as desperate as his own; in which case he might have counted upon the steadiness of his ally, and been able to hold out some years longer against the Romans.

This, I say, from the idea given us by the historians of Jugurtha's abilities, we should naturally conjecture to have been the aim of his proceeding; Not a peace with Rome, but means to continue the war.

At the same time it must be confessed, that some parts of Jugurtha's conduct seem quite irreconcilable with common sense, and would incline one to believe, that he was really frightened out of his wits.

A late excellent writer observes, that “nothing is more common than to see men give themselves up to a PASSION---to their known prejudice and ruin, and in direct contradiction to the loudest calls of SELF-LOVE. — Every caprice of the imagination, every curiosity of the understanding, every affection of the heart, is perpetually showing its weakness [the weakness of SELF-LOVE] by prevailing over it. Men daily, hourly, * Vide scilicet, p. 68.

“ fallen into captivity, not through cowardice, or any neglect of duty, but “ through a warm zeal to serve his country.”

Y.R. 647.
Bel. Ch.
100.
346 Com.

Bocchus, when he had a good while pondered this advice, promised to follow it. But whether he, at that time, meant to perform his promise (the historian tells us) is uncertain: because, though he frequently renewed it, he as often gave the like promise to Sylla.

In the night, preceding the day appointed for the conference, the Moor gathered about him his chief confidants, changed his mind on a sudden, dismissed them, and fell into great perturbation of mind; betraying, by the frequent alterations of his countenance, the inward struggles by which he was agitated. At length, however, he sent for Sylla, and, in concert with him, laid an ambush for the Numidian King.

Next morning, upon notice brought that Jugurtha was not far off, Bocchus, as if to do him honour, went out, accompanied by a few courtiers, and by the Roman Quæstor, to meet him at a certain eminence, that was in view of the men lying in wait. To this eminence the Numidian, attended by a considerable number of his friends, came unarmed, according to agreement. The signal instantly given, the ambush rose, surrounded Jugurtha and his followers, seized him, and massacred them: he was delivered up bound into the hands of Sylla, and, by him, conducted to Marius.

Thus ended ^b the Jugurthine War, to the real dishonour of both Marius

“ hourly, sacrifice the greatest known interest
“ to fancy, inquisitiveness, love, or hatred,
“ any vagrant inclination.”

Therefore, that Jugurtha, whose greatest interest (that which his habitual SELF-LOVE called loudest for) was the undisturbed possession of the kingdom of Numidia, should, nevertheless, from his fear or jealousy, or hatred of a rival, expose himself, when at Rome, to the resentment of the Roman People, by murdering Massiva: and that in revenge of the insult put upon him by the Romans, in constraining him to appear at the bar of the people's judicature, to undergo an examination, he should compel the whole Roman army, officers, and soldiers (when fallen into his power,) to pass under the yoke, may, perhaps, be considered as not wonderful, and only as instances exemplifying the observation above mentioned: viz. that the most cunning, wicked men will, to gratify a particular passion, do actions the most foolishly impolitic with regard to the very interests they are habitually in pursuit of. But that Jugurtha, after the perpetration of that murder, and after putting that gross affront upon the Roman army, should (being in his Janus) hope to obtain from the Roman Senate and People a tolerable peace, and, from the sole motive of that hope, divest himself, in a great measure, of the means of defence, by giving up so large a part of his strength and treasure, as we are told he did, to his enemies, presents a difficulty, the solution of which I shall leave to the reader.

^b The historians have not been careful to tell us how the newly conquered country was disposed of. Sextus Rufus says, that Numidia, from the time of Jugurtha's captivity, belonged to Rome: yet Piutarch [in Mario] speaks of a King of Numidia, whom he calls Himpsal, to whom young Marius, when driven out of Italy by Sylla, fled for protection. The same king, under the name of Mandrestal, is mentioned by Appian, [App. de Bell. Civ. lib. i. p. 388.] From Sylla's promise to Bocchus, it may with some reason be conjectured, that the third part of Numidia was yielded to that Prince.

p. 38.

p. 61.

Vid. supra,
p. 28.

p. 30.

and

and Sylla, who are said, nevertheless, to have warmly^a contended for the GLORY of that gallant exploit which brought the war to its conclusion.---
The GLORY of having engaged Jugurtha's father-in-law and confederate in arms to invite him to a friendly conference, and, under that cover, betray him into the hands of his most implacable enemies.

Marius continued in Africa the remainder of this year, and all the next, till Rome wanted the service of so able a General against the Cimbri and their allies.

C H A P. III.

The War with the CIMBRI. The Second, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Consulships of MARIUS.

WE left the Cimbri, in the year 646, plundering and laying waste Transalpine Gaul. Little more is said of them till the year 644, when they defeated the Consul Silanus^a.

The following year the Consul Aurelius had no better success than his predecessor.

And in 648, L. Cassius Longinus (the colleague of Marius in the Consulship) suffered a notable overthrow from the Tigurini^a, who were, probably, assisted by the Cimbri. They surprised him in an ambush; where both he and his Lieutenant, Calpurnius Piso, lost their lives. His other Lieutenant, Papilius, made a shameful capitulation with the barbarians: for he consented to give hostages, deliver up the half of his baggage, and pass with his army under the yoke. Being arraigned, at his return to Rome, for misconduct, he went into banishment to avoid trial.

In the present year (647) it fell by lot to the Consul Servilius Cæpio to conduct the war against the Cimbri in Gallia Narbonensis.

^a In this dispute, father Cætreu has espoused Sylla's cause with remarkable zeal—"Thus " was Sylla fortunate to a degree not to be " paralleled; no embassy was ever more " completely successful.---His stars, if I may
 " so speak, delivered him out of all dangers,
 " and accomplished his most sanguine hopes.
 " He had the HONOUR of finishing, almost " without the effusion of blood, a war, which " Marius had not been able to bring to a " conclusion, by many sieges and many " victories. --- Though a Proquestor only,
 " he, from the time of his first [second] cam" paign became equal in reputation to the General himself. --- At least he was " looked upon at Rome as the chief con" queror of Nuviana. --- It seems as if " Justice required that HEAVEN should give " Marius the mortification of seeing the " GLORY of the campaign divided between

 " a subaltern and himself." &c. &c. &c.
 tome xiv. p. 167.

^b According to Ficrus (l. iii. c. 3.) the Cimbri, before the battle, sent Ambassadors to the Consul and Senate, requesting, that lands might be assigned to them; on which condition they offered to assist the Romans in their wars.

Before his departure from Rome, he obtained a law in favour of the Senators. Caius Gracchus had transferred from them to the Knights, the administration of justice. Some of the Senators (the number uncertain) were now admitted to be of the Bench of Judges: and Cæpio, for this service, got the title of Patron of the State.

Cæpio, after his arrival in Transalpine Gaul, recovered, from the Cimbri, Tolosa, the capital of the Tectosages. The inhabitants of the place had been in alliance with Rome, and had received a Roman garrison; which they afterwards betrayed to the barbarians: but now they, by night, admitted the Consul into the town; who, nevertheless, gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers. He is said to have found in the temples an immense quantity of gold*, the greatest part of which he appropriated to his own use: nay, Orosius tells us, that the Consul, having sent away this treasure under a guard to Marseilles, treacherously caused that guard to be massacred in the way, and then made the whole his own.

It would seem that Cæpio's forces were not sufficient to oppose the Cimbri, for, after the election of P. Rutilius Rufus and Cn. Mallius Maximus to the Consulship, the latter, by order, led an army to Cæpio's assistance, who, at the same time, was continued in his command in quality of Proconsul.

On Mallius's arrival in Gaul, he and Cæpio divided the province between them, and made the Rhone their boundary. Soon after, the Cimbri fell upon a part of the Consul's army, commanded by his Lieutenant Aurelius Scaurus (who himself had been Consul three years before:) they defeated it, and took the commander prisoner.

Mallius, terrified by this disaster, thought it proper to call Cæpio to his succour. The Proconsul, at first, haughtily answered, that each ought to take care of his own province: yet, presently after, fearing

* For the same reason doubtless it is that Cicero (in Brut. c. 35.) commends him; whilst other writers give him an odious character. Crassus, the famous orator, spoke in favour of Cæpio's law (Cic. in Brut. c. 42, and 44.) and his speech on that occasion served Cicero for a model by which to form his own eloquence. It would seem that a part of the speech was to the following effect: "Deliver us (said the orator, addressing himself, in the name of the Senate, to the People) "from our miseries. Rescue us from the jaws of those, whose cruelty cannot be satisfied without blood. Rescue us from slavery, do not suffer us to be held in bondage to any but ourselves, to whom we can and ought to be slaves." Cic. de Orat. l. i. c. 52. & Parad. v. c. 3.

* Authors differ about the value of this treasure, but all their accounts seem extravagant. Pofidonius, as quoted by Strabo (l. iv. p. 188,) reckons it at 15,000 talents. Orosius makes it 100,000 pounds weight of gold, and 110,000 pounds of silver; and Justin (l. xxxii. c. 3.) raises it to a much higher sum. It happened, that every one who had a hand in seizing this gold came to some miserable end; whence it became a common proverb, to say of a man reduced to extreme misery, he has got some of the gold of Toulouse. A. Gell. l. iii. c. 9.

¹ Cicero (pro Planc. c. 5.) calls Mallius an obscure man, without virtue, without sense, of manners vulgar and contemptible; and complains of the Roman People for preferring him, at this election, before his competitor Q. Catulus.

Y. R. 647.
Cic. in
Brut. c. 44.
Jul. Obsequ.
c. 39.
Val. Mix.
l. vi. c. 9.
Dio. Cass.
ap. 630.

L. v. c. 15.

Y. R. 648.
Bet. Chi.
104.
347 Conf.

Oros. l. v.
c. 16.

Liv. Epit.
l. lxvii.

Dio. Cass.
ap. Vales.
p. 630.

Y. R. 648. left Mallius should obtain a victory over the enemy without him, he passed
 B. C. 100. the Rhone; but would neither encamp his forces with those of the Consul, nor consult with him. Confident of success, and bent upon having the whole glory of it, he encamped his troops between those of Mallius and the Cimbri.

The barbarians had been informed of the misunderstanding between the two Roman Generals; but, from Cassius's motions, imagining now that they were reconciled, sent deputies to the Consul to treat of an accommodation.
Cassius, into whose camp, as nearer to them than the other, they naturally came, finding that it was not to him, but to the Consul, they had orders to address themselves, far from treating them in the manner due to their character, was once, in his rage, upon the point of putting them to death.
 His proceeding did by no means please either the soldiers, or the officers of his own army; who, apprehending fatal consequences from such intemperate passion, forced him, in a manner, to repair to the Consul's camp, there to deliberate upon the measures proper to be taken. Nothing was concluded; the whole time passed in dispute, mutual reproaches, and affronts: and the two Generals parted more exasperated than ever against each other.

In this ill humour they had the folly to come to a battle with the enemy, in which they were totally defeated; they lost 80,000 men, beside servants, sutlers, and other followers of the camp, to the number of forty thousand.
 It is said, that scarce ten of the whole army escaped with the two commanders to carry the news of the defeat to Rome. Of this number was the famous Sertorius, who, though wounded, yet, according to Plutarch, swam across the Rhone in his armour.

The conquerors^a, pursuant to a vow they had made, reserved to themselves nothing of the spoil: they threw the gold and silver into the river, cut to pieces the arms and clothes of the dead, drowned the horses, and hanged up their prisoners upon trees. And it being now unanimously determined, in council, to invade Italy, they sent for their prisoner Aurelius, probably with a view to learn something from him that might be of use to them in their intended expedition: Aurelius endeavouring to persuade them not to pass the Alps, because the Romans were (he said) invincible, Bojorix, one of the Cimbrian chiefs, killed him upon the spot.

The alarm and consternation, which the loss of the army occasioned at Rome, exceeded all imagination. The People, who imputed it wholly to Cassius, were so enraged against him, that they deposed him^b from his command,

^a Extolius and Orosius mention four nations who shared, in this victory, the Cim-bri, Teutoni, Tigurini, and Ambrones. Plu-tarch ascribes the principal glory of it to the last, who appear to have been a people of Switzerland: he speaks of them as the bravest and most terrible of the whole allied army; they were thirty thousand in number.

^b The next year, L. Cassius, Tribune of
 the

mand, and confiscated his estate : a proceeding of which there had been no example ; no General, how culpable soever, having received the like affront.

Rutilius, the colleague of Mallius, had direction to raise new forces to oppose the barbarians. He performed his commission with an extraordinary care, being the first who introduced the custom of teaching the soldiers the use of their weapons by masters taken from the schools of the gladiators : a practice adopted by the succeeding Generals ; and, in later times, mention is made of these masters for the soldiery, under the name of Campidoctores°.

At the next election of Consuls, Marius, then absent, and who had been Consul but three years before, was, by the voice of the whole Roman People, named for one, though the laws forbade any man, who had held that station, to be placed in it again without an interval of ten years, and likewise forbade the choosing any man to it who did not stand candidate in person. Neither Metellus, vainly boasted of by his party as the conqueror of Numidia, nor any other of the Nobles, had the confidence to stand in competition with him in this time of real danger. Gallia Narbonensis was the province assigned to him ; Italy to his colleague C. Flavius Fimbria.

Marius, on his return to Rome, had a triumph for his conquest of Numidia. The principal ornaments of the procession were Jugurtha and his sons in chains. It is said, that the King appeared like a man out of his senses. The ceremony over, he was thrown into a dungeon, being condemned to be there starved to death. The gaolers, in their haste to strip him, tore off the tips of his ears to get the pendants he wore in them. Six whole days he passed in the dungeon struggling with famine, and retaining to the last moment an ardent desire of life^p.

Marius, through absence of thought, went into the Senate, after the ceremony, in his triumphal robe, which was unprecedented. Perceiving the People, passed a law, ordaining, that no person, who had been condemned and deprived of his command by the People, should sit in the Senate. Cæpio's name was not inserted, but he was the only person affected by this law. Ten years after his first condemnation, he was accused a second time before the People, by the Tribune Narbanus, on account of his sacrilege in seizing the gold of Toulouse. The orator Craſſus undertook his defence. Scaurus, President of the Senate, espoused his cause, and two of the Tribunes opposed their colleague's proceeding ; but violence, which was then grown common at Rome, decided the affair. In a tumult that ensued, Scaurus received a blow with a stone, and, together with the opposing Tribunes, was put to flight ; and Cæpio was condemned. It is not certain what became of him afterwards. According to Strabo, l. iv. p. 138. he was banished, and retired to Syracusa ; but Valerius Maximus (inconsistently with what he relates, l. iv. c. 7.) tells us, (l. vi. c. 9.) that Cæpio was strangled in prison, and his carcase ignominiously dragged with a hook to the Gemoniæ.

° This year the Lusitanians defeated a Roman army in Spain. Jal. Obseq. c. xl.

^p It is thought that Jugurtha's two sons passed their days in captivity at Venusia. App. de Bell. Civ. l. i. p. 376.

V. R. 643.
Bel. Civ.
103.
347 Cons.

V. R. 644.
Bel. Civ.
103.
348 Cons.

V. R. 645.
Bel. Civ.
103.
348 Cons.

Sall. Bell.
Jugurth.
in fin.
Liv. Post.
l. lxxv.
Plut. in Mari.

Y. R. 649. the whole assembly surprised and shocked at the novelty, he instantly left
 Bo. C. 1. the house, and, in a very short time, returned in the usual habit.

177.
 345 C. 1. So well had Rutilius disciplined the new raised troops, that Marius, having his choice, preferred them, for the expedition against the Cimbri, to the army which he himself had commanded in Africa. He chose Sylla for his Lieutenant, as thinking him (says Plutarch) a man of too little consequence to give him jealousy.
 Plutarch.
 Syll. 1. 2.
 L. 1. 1. 2.
 § 2.

And

§ We have here an instance (and there are many such) of Plutarch's want of memory, or, perhaps, of his little concern to make his stories either probable or consistent with one another.

In his Life of Marius, after relating how Bocchus betrayed Jugurtha into the hands of Sylla, he immediately adds the following account.

“ This gave the first rise to that sad and “ deplorable civil war which almost ruined
 “ the whole Roman empire: for many that “ envied Marius, ascribed the success “ entirely to Sylla: and Sylla himself “ made a seal, whereon was engraven Boc- “ chus delivering up Jugurtha to him:
 “ and this he constantly used, whereby he “ highly provoked Marius, a man extremely “ ambitious and jealous of a rival for glory,”
 &c.

We have again, in the biographer's Life of Sylla, the successful negotiation of the Quæstor, his vanity, his seal, and the consequent anger and jealousy of Marius.

“ For this success Marius triumphed:
 “ but being conscious that the GLORY of the At“ tainment was due to Sylla, envy made “ him grieve inwardly: and Sylla being “ himself naturally vain, and this being the “ first time that, from a low and private “ condition, he had risen to be in some con“ sideration with his fellow-citizens, his am“ bition carried him to such a degree of “ ostentation, that he caused a SEAL to be “ made, whereon was represented Bocchus de- “ livering up, and Sylla receiving Jugurtha; “ which SEAL he made use of ever after.
 “ This touched Marius to the quick; ne“ vertheless, in his second Consulship, think“ ing Sylla too far beneath him to be “ feared as a rival, he appointed him
 “ to be his Lieutenant: and, in his third “ Consulship employed him as a Legionary
 “ Tribune.”

In this account (though it be adopted by M. Verrius, the Jesuits, M. Rollin, and others,) it seems difficult to discern the least air of truth. Is it, in any degree, probable, that Sylla, who (as Plutarch observes) had but just started out of obscurity, and was very ambitious of rising to the highest honours, would be so impolitic, as immediately to provide himself with such a Seal as is described, and from this time constantly wear it; that is, coolly and deliberately contrive to make Marius, who was then the People's chief favourite, his enemy, and set him at defiance, by appropriating wholly to himself a glory, which naturally belonged to the commander in chief?

Or, is it propable, that, if Sylla had such folly and arrogance, and if Marius was thereby touched to the quick, and so highly provoked, as the historian reports him to have been, he would have chosen this enemy and rival for glory to be his Lieutenant in his second Consulship?

Marius was jealous of Sylla as of a rival for glory: nevertheless, Marius appointed Sylla to be his Lieutenant, looking upon him as a man of too little consequence to be his rival for glory. This is Plutarch's account.

The truth seems to be, that the SEAL in question was never thought of till many years after the end of the Numidian war, when King Bocchus, to whom an alliance with Rome had been granted, made a glittering golden present to the Roman People. And this might be gathered from another passage in Plutarch's Life of Marius, where, speaking of him after his return from Asia, he says, that he was neglected like a weapon of war in time of peace; and adds, “ that among all those, whose lustre eclipsed
 “ the glory of Marius, he was the most “ exasperated against Sylla, who owed his “ RISE to the hatred which the NOBLES bore

“ to

And now, instead of being too gentle and remiss in point of discipline, which Sallust imputes to him, with regard to the troops in Numidia, he was, on the contrary (by the report of Plutarch,) “severe in command, and exact even to rigour. Nevertheless, his impetuous spirit, stern look, and thundering voice, were considered by the soldiers, when grown familiar with them, not as terrible to themselves, but only to their enemies.”

Y. R. 649.
Bef. Chr.
103.
348 C. C. C.

A notable act of impartial justice helped much to conciliate to him the affections of the army. His nephew, who served in the post of a Legionary Tribune, having several times solicited a young soldier, under his command, to unworthy compliances, and finding him always inflexible, had, at length, recourse to violence. The soldier, being determined to expose himself to any danger rather than yield, drew his sword, and ran the Tribune through the body. Being cited before Marius to receive sentence for having killed his commander; the General, when he had informed himself fully of the facts, not only acquitted the accused, but, with his own hands, crowned him as a conqueror.

Plut. in
Mar.
Cic. pro
Mil. c. 4.
Vid. supra
p. 42.

When Marius arrived in Gaul, he learnt that the Cimbri, after ravaging all the country, from the Rhone to the Pyrenees, had, by those mountains, entered *Spain*¹. This gave the Consul leisure to perfect his troops in military discipline: and (according to Plutarch) the Romans, notwithstanding the departure of the Cimbri, found enemies in Gaul: for he tells us, that Sylla, this year, took prisoner Copillus, the General of the *Tectosages*².

Liv. Epit.
67.
Plut. in
Mar.
Jul. Obseq.
c. xli.

Plut. in Sylla.

When

“to himself.” And then he proceeds in the following manner. “When Bocchus, King of Numidia, dedicated in the Capitol, some golden victories bearing trophies, and, with them, a sculpture in gold, representing himself, delivering up Jugurtha to Sylla, Marius was thereupon almost distracted with rage; not able to endure that Sylla should arrogate that honour to himself.

“Marius attempted by violence to pull down those figures; and Sylla strenuously opposed his attempt: but the war of the confederates, THEN, on a sudden, threatening the city, put a stop to the sedition, that, ON THIS OCCASION, was just ready to break out.” [The war of the confederates was kindled in 662.]

By this date we see, that the dispute between Marius and Sylla for the glory of putting a fortunate end to the Jugurthine war (which ended in 647) was not till fifteen years after its conclusion, when Marius's interest was on the decline, and Sylla had made great progress in the road to the highest honours: for he had been already Prætor: and two years after this time (viz. in 664) was chosen to the Consulship. And it would seem that the SEAL was a copy of King Bocchus's present, and not the original; though it is very possible that Sylla, to pique Marius (whom he then did not fear) and to raise his own credit with the People, might, when Bocchus (with whom he had formed a sort of friendship) determined to make a present to the Romans, of a sculpture in gold, suggest to him the device.

¹ Florus places this irruption of the Cimbri into Spain before the Consulship of Silanus, l. iii. c. 3.

² About this time, M. Scaurus, President

Y. R. 659.
Bel. Chr.
102.
349 Cons.

When the time came for electing the chief Magistrates at Rome, the Comitia chose Marius (in his absence) a third time to the Consulship, and continued

Ascen. in Scav.

dent of the Senate, and who had been Consul and Censor, was accused by Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, Tribune of the People, of having profaned several sacred rites of the Romans, and particularly those of the Dii Penates celebrated at Lavinium. The crime seems to have been a heavy one, but it is described in too vague a manner to be accurately understood at this time. The real source of the prosecutor's enmity to Scavrus was, that another person, assisted by Scavrus's interest, had succeeded Domitius's father in an Augur's place, to the exclusion of Domitius himself. But, though animated by personal hatred, Domitius had the generosity to reject the information that was secretly offered him by one of Scavrus's slaves, and to deliver up the traitor to his master. For want, perhaps, of this intelligence, Scavrus was acquitted, though with some difficulty; but Domitius grew such a favourite with the People, that he was afterwards chosen Consul, Censor, and Pontifex Maximus.

Val. Max.
vi. 3.

His generosity in the affair of Scavrus undoubtedly contributed something to his popularity; but his chief merit was a law which he made, to substitute a popular election of priests of every denomination, to the old method of co-optation by their colleagues: or, rather, to unite both these methods, as had always been practised in the election of a Pontifex Maximus. Seventeen tribes, taken by lot, were to be assembled, and the person who had the suffrages of the majority was to be co-opted, without a power of refusal, by the College in which the vacancy happened.

Cic. de
Leg. A-
g. 2. 7.

Domitius, in his Tribuneship, accused also Junius Silanus, for misconduct in the war against the Cimbri, by whom he had been defeated, when Consul, five years before. He was acquitted by the People: two tribes only condemned him. Cic. pro Corn. 2. in Fragm. and Ascen. in loc.

C. Servilius Glaucia, another of the Tribunes, got a law passed, the import of which seems to have been a repeal of that which Cornelius enacted in the year 647, and a restoring to the Roman Knights all the privileges they had formerly enjoyed. Cic. in Brut. c. lxxii.

It is not certain, what was the import of Cornelius's law, or of Glaucia's: the first, according to Jul. Obsequens (c. 39), divided the right of judicature between the Senators and the Knights; and Cicero (in de Invent. l. 1. c. 49.) treats of it as favourable to the Senate; whereas he tells us, that Glaucia, by his law, gained over the Knights to his interest (in Brut. c. 62.) Cicero (in Divinat. in Cael. c. 3.) speaks favourable of the judgments passed by the Roman Knights; and Ascenius (in loc.) says, that the Roman Knights continued to be Judges for forty years after the time of C. Gracchus, and that they judged uprightly: that Sylla then transferred the right of judging to the Senators, and these judged iniquitously. And Cicero (Ad. i. in Verr. c. 13.) says, that for near fifty years together, during which time the right of judging was in the Equestrian order, there was not the least suspicion of any Judge's taking money, though the Senators, when they were Judges, became infamous for that crime.

Yet this account cannot be strictly true; for according to the same Ascenius (in Orat. pro Corn. 1.) Plebeius, in the year 664, got a law enacted, that fifteen men out of each of the thirty-five tribes should be appointed Judges, by which means some Senators came to be nominated. And Cicero (pro Corn.) tell us, that, by the Plebeian law, the Senators were first admitted to judge among the Knights. Livius Drusus in the year 662 obtained a law, that the Judges should be one half Senators and the other Knights; but this law being abrogated the same year in which it was enacted, Cicero, in the passage above cited, takes no notice of it.

It would seem, upon the whole, that C. Gracchus's law continued in force till the year 664, when the Plebeian law took place; and that this latter was superseded by Sylla's law, which, in 672, gave the right of judicature entirely to the Senators.

Glaucia obtained likewise a law, which granted the freedom of the city to whoever of the Latin allies should bring an accusation against a Roman Senator, and prove his charge. Cic. pro Balb. c. 24.

continued him in his command. It was expected that the barbarians would return from Spain the next spring; and the Roman soldiers declared they would not march, against so dreadful an enemy, under any other General. The other Consul was L. Aurelius Orestes.

Y. R. 650.
Bef. Chr.
506.
349 Conf.

The Cimbri remained this year also in Spain, nor do we hear of any thing considerable performed, during the course of it, by the Romans in Gaul; excepting, that a numerous and warlike people, called the Marfi, are said to have been brought, by Sylla's means, into an alliance with Rome. Id. Ibid.

Towards the end of the year, Aurelius dying, Marius left the command of the army with his Lieutenant Aquilius, and returned to

Plut. in
Mar.

It was about this time, that the scandalous debaucheries of two of the Fabii gave great offence at Rome, and were punished in the most exemplary manner.

One of them, who was the son of Fabius Servilianus, felt the indignation of his own father, who first banished him into the country, and, upon his continuing unreclaimed, ordered two slaves to put him to death. To screen the slaves from being examined by torture, old Fabius immediately manumitted them; and he himself, upon an accusation's being lodged against him for this stretch of the paternal authority, chose to decline a trial, and went into exile to Nuceria in Campania. Val. Max. vi. 1. 5. Oros. v. 16.

Allobrogicus, the father of the other Fabius, was dead; but Q. Pompeius, the Prætor, supplied his place, decreed young Fabius unfit to manage his own fortune, and appointed him a guardian. Val. Max. iii. 5. 2.

The famous Scævola, the Augur, upon his return from the government of Asia, in the year 579, was tried for mal-administration and extortion in his province. His accuser was T. Albucius, a man of a singular character, who was possessed with such a fondness for every thing that was Greek, that he resided generally at Athens, and seemed willing to forget both his native country and his mother-tongue. Scævola, in his way to his government, passed through Athens, where Albucius coming to pay him a visit, the Governor, by way of ridicule on his silly affectation, addressed him, after the Grecian manner, with the word χαίρε [hail] and his whole train of attendants, officers of the army, domestics, and even Lictors, did the same. Albucius was so nettled at this affront, that, upon Scævola's return to Rome, he brought against him the accusation above mentioned; but the conduct of the accused was found to be irreproachable, and the trial served only to make Albucius still more ridiculous.

Lucil. ap.
Cic. de
Fin. l. i.
c. 3. &
Cic. de O-
rat. l. ii.

Not long after, he was accused of the same crime with which he had charged Scævola, and was not equally fortunate in clearing his character: Albucius had been Prætor in the year 647 or 648, and at the expiration of his office, was appointed Governor of Sardinia, where having extirpated a few gangs of robbers, he sent to Rome to demand a solemn thanksgiving for this important exploit; and in the mean time paraded about the island with all the triumphal pomp. The Senate, to mortify his vanity, refused his request, though it was known to be a thing of course, and had never before been denied to any Governor. To complete his disgrace, the people of the island accused him of extortion, and he was found guilty. Stung with these repeated insults from his ungrateful country, Albucius retired to his favourite Athens, where he is said to have died more like a philosopher than he had lived.

70.
Cic. de Provinc.
Conf. c. 7.

This year M. Fulvius Nobilior is said to have gained some advantage against the Cimbri in Spain (Front. Stras. l. xi. c. 5. § 8.) Calpurnius Piso defeated the Tbra-cians, and penetrated as far as Rhodes and Caucasus (Jul. Obseq. c. 41. Flor. lib. xxxvi. 4.) and M. Antonius, the orator, now Proconsul in Asia, with the assistance of the Byzantines, destroyed the Gilician pirates, for which he had a triumph. Cic. de Orat. l. i. c. 18. Liv. Epit. l. lxxviii. Tacit. Annal. l. xii. c. 62.

Cic. Tusc.
v. 37.

Rome,

Rome, to preside at the election of new Consuls. On his arrival, he gained over to his interests L. Apuleius Saturninus, one of the Tribunes, who was in greatest favour with the People.

To Saturninus, when Quæstor, had been committed the care of supplying the City with corn; and because he did not discharge the office well, the Senate appointed Scæurus to execute it in his stead. Provoked at this affront, he became a violent enemy to the Nobles, and was therefore easily engaged to employ his influence on the People to chuse Marius a fourth time to the Consulship. Marius himself affected to decline the office: whereupon Saturninus called him traitor to his Country, as refusing to assist her in so dangerous a war. The stratagem was too gross not to be discerned, yet the people, sensible of the need they still had of so able and fortunate a General as Marius, continued him in the Consulship; appointing for his colleague, Q. Lutatius Catulus, a man honoured by the Nobles, and esteemed by the Multitude.

Marius, soon after, set out for Transalpine Gaul; and Catulus, accompanied by Sylla as his Lieutenant, led an army to the foot of the Alps.

The barbarians, being defeated by the Celtiberians in Spain, had left that country, and returned into Gaul. And they now resolved to divide their forces, and to enter Italy on different sides: the Cimbræ were to march through Noricum; the Teutoni and Ambrones through Gallia Narbonensis. Marius posted his army between two branches of the Rhône. In order to have provisions the more easily conveyed from the sea to his camp, by means of the river, the mouths of which were choked up with mud and sand, he caused his soldiers to dig a canal from the river to the sea; a work which still subsisted in Plutarch's time, and had the name of Fossa Mariana.

At length the enormous multitude of the Teutoni and Ambrones approached the Roman army, and with terrible cries, defied them to battle. Marius declined the challenge. To accustom his troops to the fierce countenances and hideous noises of the barbarians, he posted his men successively, in different corps, upon the ramparts of the camp, from whence they might have a full view of the enemy; who not only ravaged the country round about, but frequently insulted the Romans in their intrenchments. Provoked at this insolence, the soldiers murmured in private, and complained that their General had no confidence in them, since he would not lead them against the barbarians. Marius, being informed of the complaints, was pleased with the ardour of his troops, and signified to them, that he had no distrust of their courage, but only waited, by the admonition of oracles, for a favourable time and place in which to give battle. These oracles were two vultures and a Syrian woman named Martba. The vultures he had tamed, and he used to let them loose about the camp, at proper times, their appearance being being deemed a good omen. Martha, whom his wife had sent to him from Rome, was esteemed a prophetess; because, at a combat of gladiators, she had luckily guessed which of them would have the victory. She wore a large purple mantle fastened with clasps, and bore in her hand a spear wrapped round with bunches of flowers, and was carried about the camp in a litter. Great honours and respect was paid her, and Marius never sacrificed but by her orders.

It is reported, that an officer of the Teutoni, remarkable for the greatness of his stature, challenged the Roman General to single combat. Marius answered—If the fellow is in such haste to die, let him go hang himself. Then, pointing to an old gladiator of a very low stature, he added, Let him first vanquish this little man, and then I will fight the conqueror.

The Barbarians, having in vain attempted to force Marius's camp, at the expence of a great number of their men, resolved, without regarding any more the Consul, to march directly forward to Italy. They passed* very near the Roman intrenchments, and, with insolent raillery, asked the soldiers, whether they had any messages to send to their wives? Marius followed the enemy, kept always near them, and at night intrenched himself on the most advantageous spot he could find. When they were got to *Aquæ * Sextiæ*, they encamped in a vast extent of ground along the banks of a small river, (probably the Arce), and the Consul on an eminence: an advantageous post, only it wanted water. This (says Plutarch) he did on purpose, and when his soldiers complained of his having encamped them in a place where they must die with thirst, he shewed them the river; saying, Ionder is water; but you must purchase it at the price of your blood: they answered, Why do not you lead us thither, while we have any blood in our veins? Marius replied, You must first fortify your Camp. The soldiers obeyed, though with reluctance; but the sutlers and servants, impatient to have drink for themselves and their beasts, snatching up what weapons they could find, went in a body to fetch water from the river. It would seem that the Teutoni were a good way up the river on the same side with the Roman camp: the Ambrones on the other side, lower down; and over-against the enemy. When the Roman sutlers had reached the river, they were at first attacked by only a small number of the Barbarians, the rest being at dinner, or bathing; but on hearing the noise made in the skirmish, the whole body of the Ambrones, amounting to above thirty thousand men, issued out, most of them flushed with wine: yet they did not approach in disorder, or with confused cries, but regulated their march by a kind of musick which they made by beating upon their armour; and they frequently repeated their

* Plutarch says, it is reported, that the Barbarians were six days in passing by the Roman intrenchments in a continued march.

Y. R. 457.
B. C. 107.
330 B. C.

own name, Ambrones, Ambrores. It happened, that the Ligurians marched at the head of the Roman army: and the same name having been that of their nation, they too immediately began to cry out, Ambrones, so that the field resounded with this word from every quarter. The Ambrones had the river to pass; and in passing it broke their order; and, before they could form again, the Ligurians charged them, and the Romans advancing at the same time to sustain their allies, the enemy quickly turned their backs. Many of them perished in the river, which the Romans crossing, pursued the runaways even to their camp.

Here a new kind of enemies presented themselves against both the pursued and the pursuers. The wives of the Ambrones, armed with swords and hatchets, and gnashing their teeth with rage, discharged their fury equally upon their husbands (whom they called traitors) and upon the enemy. The night coming on, the Romans retired, but spent that night in great anxiety and terror; for their camp was not yet fortified, and, though the greater part of the Ambrones had been cut to pieces, an immense multitude remained of the Barbarians, by whom they expected every moment to be attacked. That night, however, and all the following day, passed without any action; early the next morning the Consul drew up his foot in order of battle, upon an eminence before his camp, making his cavalry descend into the plain. He had before detached three thousand of his infantry under the conduct of Claudius Marcellus to lie in ambush, and at a proper time, to fall upon the enemy in the rear. The Teutoni, seeing the Romans drawn up for battle, had not patience to wait till they should come down into the plain, but advanced furiously up the hill to attack them. Marius ordered his men not to stir, till the Barbarians were near: then, having first thrown their darts, to fall upon them sword in hand, and push them down the hill with their bucklers. The Teutoni were soon driven into the plain; and the foremost had scarce begun to rally, when Marcellus, on a sudden, charged them behind. Being thus attacked, at once, both in front and rear, they made but a short resistance. More than a hundred thousand of them (according to Plutarch) were killed or taken prisoners^a.

D. d. E-
c. 107.
XXVII.
Plut. in
Mar.

According to some authors, the Roman army unanimously made a present to their General of the whole spoil. Marius caused it to be sold

^a In the Epitome of Livy (l. lxxviii) it is said, that 200,000 of the Barbarians perished in this and the former battle; and that 90,000 were taken prisoners.

The report of Valerius Paternulus (l. ii. c. 12.) is, that above 150,000 were killed in both actions, and that the whole nation of the Teutons was extinguished.

Valerius Maximus (l. vi. c. 1. § 3. exterr.)

tells us, that, after the battle, the young women of the Teutoni requested of Marius that they might be given to the Vestal virgins, promising perpetual chastity: but this being denied them, they hanged themselves the night following. Flerus (iii. 3.) relates nearly the same story of the Cimbrian women.

at

at a very low price to the soldiers, chusing rather to act in that manner, than to make a pure donation of it; and this, probably, to avoid the appearance of setting too small a value on their present. This proceeding acquired him universal esteem: the great united with the multitude in applauding him.

As to the arms taken from the Barbarians, Marius set apart, for the ornaments of his triumph, all the richest and most glittering: the rest he ordered to be heaped together, that he might make a sacrifice of them to the Gods. Crowned with laurel, and clothed in a robe of state, he was going, with his own hands (according to the Roman custom) to set fire to the pile, when certain horsemen, riding full-speed, appeared on a sudden. Coming up to him, they dismounted, accosted him with the news of his being Consul for the fifth time, and delivered him letters that notified his election; a new subject of joy to the whole army: Marius finished his sacrifice, amidst their universal acclamations.

The colleague appointed to Marius was Manius Aquillius, commissioned afterwards to conduct a war against the revolted slaves in Sicily; of which more hereafter.

Catulus continued at the head of the army, which he had led to the foot of the Alps. That he might not be obliged to weaken his forces by such a division of them as would be necessary to defend the passes of the mountains, he had retired over the *Atbesis. After he had pitched his camp, he caused forts to be raised on each bank of the river to defend the pass, and a wooden bridge to be built, by which he might have a communication with the guard on the farther side. In the mean time the Cimbri came down the Alps that were yet covered with snow^b, and, advancing to the Atbesis, encamped within sight of the enemy. This done, they threw into the channel earth, trees, and vast pieces of rocks, and, when the stream, by being straitened, became rapid, they cast into it things of great weight, which, being carried down by the current with violence against the piles of the bridge, so shook it, that it seemed in danger of being carried away. The Roman soldiers did not wait for the event, but being seized with terror, abandoned their camp. Catulus finding it impossible to stop his men, put himself at their head, that the army might seem to have only obeyed the command of their General, and not run away through fear of the enemy: an instance of the most noble and disinterested conduct, according to Plutarch; the General sacrificing his private glory to the good of his country: yet certainly this noble action, so highly praised by the historian^c, is capable of a construction not much

^b Plutarch reports, that the Barbarians, out of a sort of bravado, climbed up naked over heaps of ice and snow to the tops of the hills, and then, upon their large shields, let themselves slide down to the bottom.

^c “ I do not believe (says Monsieur Crevier very judiciously), that Marius, on the like occasion, would have been willing

Y. R. 651.
B. C. Cn.
101.
350 C. C.

Y. R. 652.
B. C. Chr.
100.
351 Conf.

* The A. dige.

M. R. 400 to the advantage of Carulus, [or of Sylla, whom the same historian represents as the chief councillor of this General, and his right-hand for execution.]

The guard of the fort on the other side of the river defended themselves with resolution against the attacks of the Cimbri; who, admiring their bravery, granted them at length an honourable capitulation, and swore to it upon a brazen bull.

After taking the fort, the Cimbri spread themselves over the country and pillaged it. In this situation of things, Marius was sent for to Rome: on his arrival, the Senate offered him a triumph, but he deferred his acceptance of that honour, till the war should be terminated by another victory, which he spoke of as a thing certain: and presently setting out for the camp of his late colleague, he at the same time ordered thither his own army from Gaul.

The two Generals, having joined their forces, passed the Po. The Cimbri were at no great distance, but deferred offering battle, till their friends, the Teutoni, should come to their assistance, according to agreement. In the mean time they sent Ambassadors to the Consul, demanding that lands and towns might be assigned them, sufficient both for themselves and for their brethren. What brethren do you speak of? (said Marius to the Ambassadors): They answered, THE TEUTONI. To which the Consul replied, Do not trouble yourselves about providing for your brethren; we have already given them land, and they will always keep possession of it. The Ambassadors, finding themselves insulted, broke out into passion, threatening to make him repent his behaviour so soon as the Teutoni should arrive. They are here already (said Marius), and it would not be kind in you to go away without saluting your brethren. After these words, he caused the kings (or leaders) of the Teutoni, whom he had taken prisoners, to be brought forth in chains.

The Cimbri, on the return and report of their Ambassadors, advanced without losing a moment; and having encamped not far from the Consul, their King Bojorix, at the head of a small body of cavalry, came forward, and defied Marius to battle, bidding him name the day and place. The Consul answered, that it was not the custom of the Romans to take counsel of their enemies about giving battle; nevertheless, he would have that complaisance for him, to do what he had desired. It was thereupon agreed, that the time should be the third day from thence,

“ to deserve the like praise: and, indeed, Pisarch (in Sylla) tells us, that Carulus was no great warrior.” Hist. Rom. tom. IX. l. xxx.

Scorpus (President of the Senate) had a son, who served in the cavalry: he fled full speed to Rome. His father, on notice of his arrival, forbad him ever to appear before him; whereupon the young man killed himself. Front. Strat. l. iv. c. 1. § 13. Aur. Vict. in Scor.

* Flerus tells us, that the Cimbri, after the action upon the Arbesis, were enervated, by living luxuriously.

and

and that the field of battle should be the plain of Vercelle; a plain commodious for the Roman cavalry, and large enough for the Barbarians to draw up their numerous forces. Thither the Romans and Cimbri repaired punctually at the day appointed. Catulus's army consisted of 20,300 foot; Marius had 32,000. The number of the Roman cavalry is not mentioned. Plutarch is the only writer who gives us any particulars of this battle, and his account is very unsatisfactory; the memoirs of Sylla, who became Marius's greatest enemy, and was now Lieutenant to Catulus, being his chief and almost only authority*. [Once he quotes the memoirs of Catulus.] Plutarch relates, that the Consul posted Catulus, and his troops in the center, and, having divided his own forces into two bodies, placed them on the wings, a little advanced towards the enemy, that he might have the glory of defeating them before the Proconsul's troops could engage. The Romans had the advantages of the sun and wind.

The Cimbri drew up their infantry in a square body, each side thirty furlongs in length. Their cavalry, amounting to 15,000, seem to have been at first posted on the right of their infantry, from whence they wheeled off by degrees, in order to come upon the rear of the enemy. This stratagem the Roman Generals perceived; but their soldiers thought it a flight, and therefore advanced as to the pursuit, without waiting for orders. The whole body of the Cimbrian infantry moved forward (says Plutarch) like the waters of a vast sea. Marius and Catulus lifting up their hands towards heaven, vowed, the one to sacrifice a hecatomb to the Gods, the other to dedicate a temple to the fortune of this day. A mighty cloud of dust arose, and covered both armies. Marius, according to Sylla's memoirs, was so unfortunate as to lose himself in this cloud. Though the Cimbrian phalanx was three miles deep, he passed it by, and wandered up and down the plains a good while without being able to find the enemy. But Catulus and Sylla had the good fortune to find them; and, with only about 20,000 men, stood the whole brunt of this battle. The excessive heat (for it was in the end of July) greatly incommoded the Cimbri, accustomed to a cold climate; and they had the farther disadvantage of the sun's shining full in their faces. It is said, that their foremost ranks had somehow linked themselves together, to hinder their order from being broken. These therefore were cut to pieces, the rest being put to flight, and driven to their camp. There the women, mounted upon the waggons, furiously assaulted those that fled, whether husbands, brothers, or fathers. They sent deputies to Marius, to demand of him, either liberty, or a slavery, which

* The same memoirs relate, that Sylla, by his industry, in a time of scarcity, supplied the troops of Marius with provisions in abundance; a service which greatly displeased

Marius, because of his extreme jealousy of Sylla, who, regarding him as an enemy to his advancement, had left him, and attached himself to Catulus.

Y. P. 400. fated their sex and virtue, offering to become slaves to the vestals, and to
B. C. 100. bind themselves to the observance of perpetual chastity like them. This grace being refused, they murdered their children and themselves. To this romantic account it is added, that the men, for want of trees, upon which to hang themselves, made running knots upon their necks with cords, the ends of which they fastened to the horns, or feet of their cattle, and, driving the beasts forward with goads, made a shift to get themselves strangled, or trodden to death. Nevertheless, 60,000 of them were taken prisoners.

We are told (says Plutarch) that Marius's soldiers, though they carried off all the baggage, had taken only two standards, while Catulus's men brought thirty into their camp; and that, as a farther proof that this part of the army had the greater share in the victory, upon almost all the darts by which the Cimbri had fallen, was found inscribed the name of Catulus. Notwithstanding all this, the whole honour of the victory was, in after times, and is still, given to Marius.
And, even when the event was recent, Catulus was thought sufficiently honoured, by being adorned (as Juvenal expresses it) with the second laurel-branch.

At Rome, the People, on the night they received the news of the victory, began their suppers with libations to Marius as to a Divinity.
They stiled him the Third Founder of Rome, and would have had him triumph, without the Proconsul's sharing with him in that honour. This however, he refused; and the two Generals, after their return home, triumphed together.

It is said, that, from this time, Marius never drank but out of a goblet, such as Bacchus was imagined to have used after his conquest of Italy. He likewise built a temple to Honour and Virtue; Catulus another, not to Fortune in general, but (in discharge of his vow) to the Thus Plutarch: but J. A. P. A. (l. ii. c. 2.) says, the number of the prisoners and the dead amounted to about 100,000; and he adds, that by this victory, Marius, notwithstanding the mischiefs he afterwards did, hindered his country from wishing that he had never been born. Strabo (l. v. c. i.) tells us, that, in this important action, the Romans lost no more than 300 men. According to him, and the Epitome of Livy (l. lviii.) 120,000 of the enemy were killed in this battle, and 60,000 taken prisoners.

It is reported, that Marius gave the freedom of Rome to 1000 men of the Cimbri, a people of Umbria, in reward of their bravery in this war; and when it was afterwards remonstrated to him, that what he had done was illegal, he answered, that the din of arms had hindered him from hearing the voice of the laws. Plut. in Apollonem. and in Mari.

Hic tamen & Cimbros, & summa pe-ricula rerum
Excipit, & sibi trepidantem protegit urbem.
Atque ideo, postquam ad Cimbros, stragem-que vocabant,
Qui nunquam attigerant maiora cadavera, coram,
Nobilis ornatur lauro collega secundâ
Juv. Sat. viii.

* Marius.

Fortune

Fortune of this day (Fortunæ huiusce diei), meaning the day on which the Cimbri were vanquished: but the inscription was applicable to every day in the year^a.

Y. R. 652.
Cic de
Leg. l. ii.
c. 11.

C H A P. IV.

The second SERVILE WAR in Sicily.

DURING the war against the Cimbri and their allies, the Republic had another war to maintain against the Slaves in Sicily^b. In the year 649 Marius, having obtained leave of the Senate to ask, from foreign states, assistance against the Cimbri, had sent to Nicomedes, King of Bitthynia, for recruits. The King excused himself, alledging, that a great number of his subjects had been forcibly carried away into slavery, by those who farmed the revenues of the Republic in the East. The complaint appearing to the Senate to be well grounded, they passed a Diod. Sic.

l. xxxvi.
ap. Phot.

^a This year one Publicius Malleolus, for having murdered his mother, was sewed up in a sack with a dog, a cock, a viper, and an ape, and thrown into the river. Vid. Aul. ad Herenn. l. i. c. 13. Cic. Orat. c. 30. Orat. l. v. c. 16. This is the second instance, mentioned in history, of Parricide among the Romans. Romulus (says Plutarch) decreed no punishment for this crime, as being a wickedness he had never heard of; nor was there any example of it, till after the second Punic war: and, according to the Epitome of Livy (l. lxxviii.) if the reading be right, Malleolus was the first who was punished in the above manner. Hence some have thought, that the law against Parricide was enacted upon this occasion. But Cicero (pro Rosc. Amer. c. xxv.) commends the old Romans, as being wiser than SOLON; who had provided no punishment for Parricide. He calls those old Romans our ancestors (maiores nostri), which he would hardly have done, had they lived in his own time; and he was five years old, when Malleolus was condemned. Nor was that kind of punishment unknown to the Romans of the early times. Plautus mentions it in Aulular. and Val. Max. (l. i. c. 1. § 13.) tells us, that Tarquin ordered M. Tullius one of the Duumvirs who had the care of the Sibylline books, to be sewed in a sack, and thrown into the sea, for giving a copy of a book, containing the Secreta Civium Sacerorum, to one P. trenius Sabinus.

^b Some commotions (soon suppressed) of the Slaves in Italy, had been the prelude to this Sicilian war. The most considerable of them had a Roman Knight, named Vettius, for its author. He had fallen desperately in love with a young slave, and bought her for seven talents, which he promised to pay at a certain time. The term elapsed, and he had not the money; for, though his father had been extremely rich, he himself had squandered away the inheritance by his extravagance; yet the bad state of his affairs, was not publicly known. He requested, and obtained of his creditor, farther time; but at the expiration of it, being still insolvent, and his creditor urgent, he took a mad and desperate resolution. He bought, upon credit, a great many suits of armour, armed his own slaves to the number of four hundred, assumed the diadem, the purple robe, all the marks of sovereignty, and proclaimed himself king. His first exploit was to seize and murder his importunate creditor. His forces increasing to seven hundred men, he fortified a camp to serve as an asylum for all that would join him. His army amounted to three thousand five hundred men, when L. Lucullus, then Prætor, with four thousand foot, and three hundred horse, came to an engagement with him, in which Vettius gained some advantage. But the Prætor, having afterwards found means to gain over Appolonius, whom Vettius had made his principal officer, the new King was betrayed, and reduced to kill himself. Diod. Eclog. book xxxvi.

decree,

Y R 6m. decree, that no freemen of the Roman allies should in any province be B 1000. treated as slaves, and that the Præ consuls and Præ tors should take care that 3500m. all such as had been injuriously forced into slavery, should be set free: in ——— obedience to this decree, Licinius Nerva, Præ tor in Sicily, gave liberty, in a few days, to above eight hundred slaves. The chief men of the island, foreseeing how much they should be losers, by the execution of this decree, addressed themselves to the Præ tor, and begged of him to man-nage no more of the slaves. Licinius, either prevailed upon by bribes, or desiring to ingratiate himself with the rich, would no longer listen to the complaints of such of the slaves as, having been forced into slavery, had recourse to him for redress. On the contrary, he gave them rough language, and sent them home to their masters. The slaves hereupon had recourse to arms. About 200 of them, having posted themselves upon a rock, fortified it, and defended themselves for some time against all the efforts of Licinius. At length he sent for one C. Titinius, who had been, some years before, condemned to death; but having escaped from punishment, now practised robbery. To this man Licinius promised pardon and protection, if by his means, the slaves should be reduced.
Titinius with a body of his associates, went over to the rebels, as if to spirit them against their enemies. Being well received by them, and, for his bravery, declared their General, he, soon after, betrayed them into the hands of the Romans. This insurrection, thus suppressed, was immediately followed by another. In a few days, the rebels amounted to 1000 men and, after a victory which they obtained over a Roman detachment, their number increased to above 6000. They then chose themselves a King, one Salvius, a pretender to the art of divination by inspecting the entrails of animals. After some time spent in plundering the country, Salvius laid siege to Mergantia; and Licinius advanced with a view to relieve the place. But the rebels turned upon him, and, having the advantage of the ground, defeated him. Only 600 men of the Roman army fell in this action, but 4000 were taken prisoners: for Salvius had prudently proclaimed Quarter to all who should throw down their arms.

On the report of this victory, such multitudes flocked in to the rebels from all parts, that their army was doubled, and they renewed their attacks upon Mergantia, at the same time promising liberty to the slaves within the town. But, their masters making them the same promise, in case of victory, the slaves fought so bravely, that they forced the rebels to raise the siege. Nevertheless, Licinius annulled the promise made to those slaves, who thereupon went over to the enemy.

The contagion of rebellion spread itself to the territories of Ægysa and Libæum. Athenis, a Cicilian, a pretender to divination by the stars, got together about 1000 of his fellow-slaves; and he too, assumed, the title of King. His army increasing to 10,000 able bodied men (for he would not, like King Salvius, receive promiscuously all that came to him)

him) he laid siege to Lilybæum, a place that was deemed impregnable. Athenio, after some time, became sensible of his error, and then, that he might quit his enterprize without dishonour, pretended, that the Gods had foretold him, by the stars, that if the army continued the siege, some sudden misfortune would certainly befall it. A fleet from Mauritania, with succours sent by King Bocchus to the Romans, happened to arrive at Lilybæum, just at the time when Athenio began to decamp; and those Africans landed soon enough to fall upon the rear of the rebel army, which suffered a considerable loss: but this loss was more than compensated to Athenio by the increase of credit which his astrological prediction gained him.

Y. R. 652.
Bef Chr.
100.
351 Conf.

In the mean time Salvius, who had assumed the name of Tryphon, a name formerly borne by one of the Kings of Syria, chose Triocala^a for his palace of residence. There he built a palace, fortified the castle (which was before very strong,) and enlarged the town. From hence he sent, as King, a command to Athenio to come and join him with the forces he had collected. Contrary to all men's expectations, Athenio obeyed, and marched to Triocala with 3000 men: the remainder of his army he had dispersed over the country to pillage it, and to engage as many of the slaves as they could to take part with him. The two Generals, for some time, lived amicably together, but, at length, Tryphon, suspecting Athenio of a design to supplant him, caused him to be seized, and put under confinement.

The next year [650] Licinius Lucullus^b, who succeeded Licinius Nerva, in the Prætorship of Sicily, landed in the island with 17,000 men. On the news of their arrival, Tryphon, released Athenio, and marched with him, at the head of 40,000 men, to meet Lucullus. The battle was long doubtful. Athenio fought with great bravery, but, having received three wounds, by two of which his legs were lamed, he at length fell among the dead. Hereupon the slaves lost courage, and took to their heels. Twenty thousand of them were slain; the rest, by favour of the night, escaped, with their King, to Triocala. Athenio, though grievously wounded, was not killed; in the dark, he made a shift to creep away, and join his companions. The rebels, much disheartened by their loss, held a counsel to deliberate upon the state of their affairs. Some proposed submission to their masters at discretion; but the prevailing opinion was to fight it out to the last. Lucullus gave them time to recover themselves; for it was nine days after the battle, before he invested Triocala: and then the rebels made so resolute a defence, that they obliged him to quit the enterprize. Nor did the Roman General take any further measures to crush the rebellion^c: his only care was to enrich ^a Triocala (quasi τρια καλα) was so called, on account of three sorts of beauty which were there united: the strength of its situation (for it was built upon a high rock), springs of excellent water, and fruitful fields below.

^b Father of him who afterwards conducted the war against Mithridates.

^c According to Florus (l. iii. c. 19.) Athenio took Lucullus's camp; nor does the historian mention any victory obtained, this year, over the slaves.

Y. R. 652. himself at the expence of his province. Of this, at his return to Rome, he Bel. Chr. was accused before the people, and found guilty.

100.
 351 Cons. The Prætor Servilius, who (in 651) succeeded Lucullus^{*}, had no success E. R. loc. against the rebels. Tryphon was now dead: his successor, Athenio, always
 c. 19. brave and enterprising, forced the Roman camp, took towns, and ravaged Diod. Sic. the country at pleasure.

l. xxviii.
 op. Phot. In the present year (652) the fifth consulship of Marius, the Senate thought proper to commission his colleague Aquilius to conduct that war, in which three Prætors had been foiled. This new General applied himself chiefly to cut off the enemies provisions; nor does he seem to have offered them battle till the next year, when their number was considerably diminished. He then entirely defeated them in a general engagement, wherein, it is said, he fought hand to hand with Athenio, and killed him, after being wounded by him in the head. About 10,000 of the rebels escaped to their strong holds, where Aquilius afterwards destroyed them, chiefly by famine¹. A thousand still remained under a leader, named Satyrus, and these surrendered themselves. The Proconsul promised them pardon; but when he had transported them to Rome, he condemned them to fight with wild beasts. This they refused to do, and chose rather to fall by the hands of one another: Satyrus alone remaining, he ran upon his own sword, and was the last that perished on account of this rebellion, which had lasted four years. We are told, that in this, and the former Servile Athen. l. vi. c. 12. War in Sicily, a million of slaves were destroyed.

C H A P. V.

The sixth Consulship of Marius, Year of Rome 653. The violences of Saturninus, Tribune of the Commons. Metellus Numidicus banished. Saturninus and his associates in sedition are crushed. Metellus is recalled by a decree made in 654, and returns in 655. Marius makes a voyage into Asia; has a conference there with Mithridates; and returns to Rome in 656.

The condemnation of Servilius Cœpio to banishment, in 658.

The trial and acquittal of his prosecutor, Norbanus, in 659.

Rutilius Rufus is maliciously prosecuted, and unjustly condemned to banishment, in 660.

Y. R. 653. AT Rome Marius had put up for a sixth Consulship, with more Bel. Chr. eagerness than was common in suing for a first. It is said, that 99.
 352 Cons. on this occasion he bribed the People, and by the same means prevailed

^{*} It would seem from Flerus, that Lucullus was successor of Servilius.

¹ Flerus reports, that all those of the slaves who escaped from the battle, killed one another: only Athenio was by the Romans torn to pieces, through their eagerness to seize him.

to have L. Valerius Flaccus chosen for his colleague, in opposition to Y. R. 653.
Metellus Numidicus.

Saturninus was now Tribune of the Commons a second time. A. Nonius had been his competitor for that office, and had carried the election; but, in returning home, was murdered by him. Early the next morning, one of the Prætors, named Glaucia, whom Cicero calls the most wicked man that ever lived, assembled the Tribes in a furtive manner, and Saturninus was there declared Tribune. Supported by Marius and Glaucia, he proposed a law, enacting, that the lands in Gaul, which the Cimlri had seized, should belong to the jurisdiction of Rome, and be divided among the People: that the Senate, within five days after the Law's being past, should give it the sanction of their authority, and swear solemnly to the observance of it; and that whatever Senator should refuse to take this oath, should be expelled the Senate, and pay a fine of twenty talents. We are told that the view of Marius, Saturninus, and Glaucia, who all joined their interest to promote the passing of this law, was to ruin Metellus Numidicus, who, they knew, would not take the oath proposed^a.

Saturninus, to carry his point, sent into the country to solicit the votes of the rustic Tribes, upon whom he chiefly depended; because many belonging to those Tribes had served in the war under Marius. On the day when the Comitia met to determine concerning the Law, the Nobles and the Citizens opposed it with great vehemence, while the People from the country as zealously contended for it. The Citizens, finding their party the weaker, cried out, It thunders (an evil omen, which made it illegal to determine any thing in that Assembly.) Saturninus answered with anger, It will hail by and by, if you are not quiet. A skirmish presently followed, in which, the country people having the advantage, the law, of course, was carried.

Then Marius, who had acted underhand in all this affair, assembled the Senate, and declared to them, that, for his part, he would never take ^a The Consul had long hated Metellus; and the Prætor and Tribune bore him no less enmity, because, in his Censorship (Year of Rom. 650) he would have turned them both out of the Senate, for irregularity of conduct, if his colleague and cousin german, Metellus Caprarius, son of Metellus Calvus, had not hindered it.

It was about the same time (according to Died. Sic. apud Fulv. Ursin.) that Saturninus insulted certain Ambassadors, whom Mithridates had sent to Rome, to engage to him the friendship of the principal Senators, that he might meet with no opposition from the Romans in the ambitious designs which he had formed against his neighbours. The crime was heinous, and the criminal, being prosecuted, was in danger of being delivered up to the King of Pontus. Nevertheless, by his abject supplications to the Populace, with tears, and protestations, that what he had done was from zeal for the People's interests, which required that no attention should be giving to the Ambassadors, but rather a war declared against Mithridates, he procured such a numerous rabble to appear for him, that the Judges durst not condemn him.

Plut. in
Mar.
Rutil. ap.
Plut.
Liv. Epit.
l. lxx.
App. de
Bell. Civ.
l. i. p. 367.
In Brut. c.
lvii.
Plut. in
Mar.
App. loc.
cit.

App. p.
368.

Aud. de
Vir. Illust.
in Saturn.
App. loc.
cit.

Y. R. 631. so unjust an oath; and that he did not think any wise man would:
 E. C. 1. that, even supposing the law to be a good law, it was yet an affront to
 99. the Senate to compel them to give their approbation of it. This he said
 335 Conf. to entrap Metellus, who, he knew, would keep steady to whatever Plut. in he should once deliver as his opinion. Metellus declared, he would never Mar. swear to observe the law in question, and the Senators, in general, made the same declaration.

App. loc. On the last day allowed for taking the oath, the Consul, in the morning, cu. having hastily convened the Senate, told them, that he was afraid of the People, who were zealous for the law; that, therefore, he had thought, of an expedient; which was, to swear to maintain, and observe the law, so far as it was a law; and that afterwards it might easily be made appear, that a law which had been carried by force, and when it thundered, could be no law. This said, without waiting to hear the opinion of the Fathers, he went to the temple of Saturn, and, together with his friends, took the oath*. All the rest of the Senators, through fear, App. p. swore in their turns, except Metellus, who resolutely persisted in his
 369. opinion.

Plut. in “To do ill (he said) in any circumstances, is the effect of a corrupt
 Mar. heart. To do well, when there is nothing to fear, is the merit of a “common man: but to do well, when a man exposes himself thereby to
 “the greatest dangers, is peculiar to the truly virtuous.”

App. loc. Next day, an officer having, by Saturninus's order, arrested Metel-
 cu. lus, and brought him from the Senate-house before the People; and the Tribune having represented to the Assembly, that they must never hope for the execution of the law in question^c, so long as that Senator remained in the city, they, by a decree, condemned him to banishment.

By

* Plutarch says nothing of the Consul's assembling the Senate a second time. The historian tells us, that when Saturninus summoned the Senators before the People to take the appointed oath, Marius said, that he had not the presumption to depend upon one deliberation in an affair of such consequence; that therefore he would swear, and would obey the law, if it was a law.

^c Saturninus obtained likewise another law, for allotting 100 acres of land in Africa to each of Marius's veteran soldiers. Aul. de Vir. Illust. in Saturn. [This writer, however, seems to refer the law in question to the first Tribuneships of Saturninus.] One of the Tribunes, named Bæbius, opposed the passing this Law, but the People drove him with stones from the Rostra. Another law of Saturninus enacted, that Roman colonies should be planted where the People pleased in Sicily, Acbaia, and Mac-don: that the gold, which Cæpio had brought from Toulouse, should be laid out in the purchase of lands, and that Marius should have the privilege to make three Roman citizens in each colony; but these colonies were never planted. Cic. pro Balb. c. 21.

The Tribune likewise proposed to make a distribution of corn amongst the People at a low price. Cæpio, who had been formerly Consul, and condemned for his misconduct in the Cimbrian war, was now Quæstor Urbanus. [He, probably, sued for public

By the same decree the Consuls were ordered to make an edict, forbidding all the subjects of the Republic to receive him; and one day's time only was allowed to the Senate, for coming to a determination. Many persons flocked to him, and offered to defend him by force; but he would not consent that his Country should be involved in a civil war on his account. He chose to leave the City: Affairs, said he, will change, and I shall be recalled: or, if they continue in their present state, it is more desirable to be absent. The safety of his country (says Cicero) was dearer to him than the sight of it; and he chose rather to depart from the City, than from his opinion. Wherever he went, he received great marks of respect and esteem, and, at length, fixed his residence at Rhodes, where he applied himself to the study of philosophy.

Y. R. 653.
Bef. Chr.
99.
352 Conf.
Plut. in
Mar.

Pro Balb.
c. 5.
Liv. Epit.
l. lxx.

Saturninus now aimed at a third Tribuneship, and Glaucia to be Consul for the next year, though the laws required two years interval between bearing the office of Prætor and that of Consul. Marius, to make his court to both parties, pretended to each to be in their interest, privately incensing one against the other, that he might bring them both into a dependance upon himself. It is said, that, the principal men of the Senate having applied themselves to him to persuade him to defend the State against the enterprises of Saturninus, he, at the same time, received Saturninus into his house, by another door: and, pretending an indisposition, that obliged him to go frequently out, he went to and fro from one apartment to the other.

Plut. in
Mar.

Non content with pursuing his own ambition, Saturninus had the insolence to present, as a candidate for the Tribuneship, Equitius^d, who called himself Gracchus, and pretended to be a son of the famous Tiberius Gracchus; but was indeed of the dregs of the People.

Auct. de
Vir. Illust.
in Saturn.
App. p.
369.

public offices, that he might be raised again to his former rank and privileges.] Upon his representing to the Senate, that the treasury could not bear the expence of purchasing the corn required, the Conscrip Fathers decreed, that Saturninus would act contrary to the good of the state, if he brought the law in question before the People. The Tribune, nevertheless, proposed the law, and, though some of his colleagues interceded, he ordered the urns for balloting to be brought out. Hereupon Cæpio, with a croud of people attending him, broke down the bridges, overset the urns, and, by force, hindered the law from passing. Auct. ad Heren. l. i. c. 12.

^d He had before attempted to get this Equitius acknowledged for the son of Tiberius, and, as such, put upon the register of the Roman citizens. Metelius Numidicus, who was then one of the Censors, refused to receive him, affirming, that all the sons of Tiberius Gracchus (who had but three) were dead. Sempronia, the sister of Tiberius, when brought into an assembly of the People, by one of the Tribunes, that she might own the impostor for her nephew, had absolutely disowned all relation to him, and expressed a contempt of him. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 7. § 2. Id. l. iii. c. 8. § 6. Auct. de Vir. Illust. in Saturn.

Y. R. 555.

V. M. c.

L. M. c. 7.

§ 11.

App. de

Bell. Civ.

l. i. p. 359.

C. M. l. v.

c. 17.

App. de

Bell. Civ.

l. i. p. 359.

C. M. c. C.

Rabir. c. 2.

L. M. Ep. 1.

l. ix.

C. M. loc.

c. 11. & 12.

Cat. orat.

l. c. 2.

Plut. in

Mar.

App. loc.

c. 1.

C. M. c. C.

Rabir. c.

10.

Oros. l. v.

c. 17.

Dio. Cass.

2p. Val.

p. 538.

App. de

Bell. Civ.

l. i. p. 370.

On this occasion Marius thought proper to interpose his authority, and to send the candidate to prison: notwithstanding which, the faction of Saturninus prevailed. They broke open the prison doors, carried Equitius upon their shoulders to the voting place, and declared him Tribune, together with Saturninus.

On the day of election of Consuls for the new year, M. Antonius, the famous orator, was chosen without difficulty or opposition. Glaucia had for his competitor C. Memmius, a man of distinction, and probably the same who, in his Tribuneship, had caused Jugurtha to be brought from Africa to Rome. The Prætor and Saturninus, apprehending a defeat, employed their assassins to dispatch Memmius: and they knocked him on the head in the Forum, in the presence of all the people. Upon this outrage, the assembly broke up tumultuously, and Saturninus went to his own house, attended by Glaucia, the Quæstor Sausseius, the false Gracchus, and a multitude of the rabble. It is reported (by Florus) that these saluted him King. The Senate met and passed a decree, that the Consuls should take care that the Republic received no detriment. This invested those Magistrates with an absolute power; and Marius, who could now no longer protect his old friend, besieged him in the Capitol, whither he and his followers had retired in arms. The Consuls were supported by all the Prætors except Glaucia, all the Tribunes except Saturninus, the whole Senate, the whole order of Knights, and the best men of the People. The more easily to quell the sedition, they cut the pipes which conveyed water into the Capitol. In this extremity, the Quæstor Sausseius proposed setting fire to the place; but Saturninus and Glaucia, depending upon Marius's friendship, surrendered themselves on the public faith, which Marius pledged to them for their safety. This, according to Cicero, the Consul had no right to do, without a decree of the Senate. Be that as it will, all the leaders of the sedition were massacred* by the enraged multitude that same day, the 5th of December, which was the very day the Tribunes entered upon their office.

It would seem that, immediately after suppressing this sedition, Cato and Pompeius, two of the Tribunes, presented a petition to the People for the repeal of Metellus's banishment: one of their colleagues, P. Furius, the son of a freedman, and whom Metellus, in his Censorship, had

* According to F. D. P. c. (l. ii. c. 12.) Marius shut up the chiefs of the party in the Senate-house, and there had them put to death. Appian (l. i. p. 370.) tells us, that the People, thinking that Marius intended to screen them from punishment, got upon the top of the building, pulled off the tiles, and with these knocked the prisoners on the head. Orosius (l. v. c. 17.) says, the Roman Knights broke open the Senate-house, and killed them. Others affirm, that Saturninus was killed by Rabirius, a Roman Knight; but Cicero (pro Rabir. c. 2.) defending him, when arraigned for this very crime, says, that Scæva, a slave of one Q. Cræto, killed Saturninus. The same author tells us, that Marius put to death the Prætor Glaucia, though he was not named in the decree of the Senate. Cic. 3 in Cat. c. 6.

degraded from the rank of a Roman Knight, opposed the request: nor would he be prevailed upon to desist from his opposition, though the son of Metellus, in presence of all the People, fell down upon his knees, and begged it of him with tears; a behaviour which occasioned his bearing afterwards the surname of Pius.

In the magistracy^b of M. Antonius and A. Posthumus Albinus, Consuls for the year 654, Sex. Titius, one of the Tribunes, proposed a law for dividing some lands amongst the People, and, on this occasion, had no regard to the intercession of his colleagues: nevertheless he was obliged to desist from his enterprise, because two crows, flying over the Comitia, had fought with their beaks and claws; and the Augurs had thereupon declared that the law must be dropt, and sacrifices be offered to Apollo.

This Titius, when out of his office, was prosecuted before the Roman Knights, and condemned to banishment, for having in his house a picture of Saturninus; an act of rigour justified by Cicero.

Furius, likewise, who had opposed Metellus's return, was, after the expiration of his office, accused of treason by Canuleius and Decianus, two of the Tribunes. The enraged People, without so much as hearing his defence, tore him in pieces. And because Decianus, in a speech on that occasion, lamented the death of Saturninus, he was, next year, brought to a trial and banished, though a very worthy man, according to Valerius Maximus.

The times now favoured Metellus Numidicus. At the motion of the Tribune Calidius, he was, with the universal consent of the People, recalled from banishment^c. At his return to Rome, the whole city went out to meet him, and the day was not sufficient for receiving the congratulations of the Senate and the rest of the Citizens.

Plutarch reports, that Marius, to avoid seeing the return of Metellus, set out, before that time, on a voyage to Asia, under pretence of discharging a vow he had made to Cybele, the mother of the Gods. If so, Metellus did not arrive in Italy till the year 655, for we find Marius at Rome in that year, being the Consulship of Q. Cæcilius Metellus Nepos, ^b In this Consulship was born, at Rome, Julius Cæsar, on the fourth of the Ides, i. e. the twelfth of the month Quintilis, afterwards, from him, called July.

^c Metellus, at this time, resided at Tralles in Lydia: letters to inform him of his recall, were brought to him, while present at the celebration of some games: he deferred reading them till the shew was over. No emotions were discovered by his looks. "Banished, or recalled (says Val. Max.) he had the same serenity of countenance;

"the same firmness and steadiness of soul in both fortunes:" Eundem constat pari vultu & exulem fuisse & restitutum: adeo moderationis beneficio, medius semper inter secundas & adversas res animi firmitate versatus est. Val. Max. l. iv. c. 1. § 13.

N. B. This does not very well accord with what Sallust reports of his temper and behaviour, on occasion of Marius's being appointed to succeed him, in the conduct of the Numidian war. See above, p. 55.

Y. R. 653.
Bet. Chr.
99.
352 Conf.

Y. R. 654.
Bet. Chr.
98.
353 Conf.
Jul. Obseq.
l. xlv.

Cic. pro
Rabir. c. 9.

App. loc.
cit.

Dio. Cass.
ap. Val. p.
637.
Cic. pro
Rabir.

c. 9.
Val. Max.
l. viii.

c. 1.
Cic. pro
Planc.
xxviii.

App. de
Bell. Civ.
l. i. p. 370.
Plut. in
Mar.

Y. R. 655.
Bet. Chr.

97.
354 Conf.

and

Y. R. 655. and T. Didius. These Consuls, in the beginning of their administration, obtained the enacting of two laws; the first, to revive an old custom now fallen into neglect, viz. That of notifying to the People three market-days (that is, twenty-seven days) before hand, the purport of any law that was to be proposed to the Comitia. The second, that if the law consisted of several articles, the People might be free to separate them, and reject those which they did not approve, while the sanction of their authority was given to the rest.

Cic. de O. Aquilius, who had been colleague to Marius in his fifth Consulship, and had compleated the reduction of the rebel slaves in Sicily, was now brought to trial, on the charge of grievous extortion in that province. Antonius, Consul of the last year, undertook the defence of the accused, and, because the facts were too clear against him to be disputed, confined himself wholly to move compassion in the Judges. That the orator was a perfect master of the pathetic, may be thought sufficiently proved by this, that he drew tears even from Marius, who was one of the bench.

Val. Max. A certain Tribune of the People, named Duronius, repealed, this year, one of the sumptuary laws; [legem de coercendis conviviorum sumptibus latam.] On this occasion, Duronius made a speech of a very extraordinary tenour, to the People, from the Rostra. "Restraints have been imposed upon us, Romans, which are not to be endured: we are fast bound in the galling chains of servitude: a law was enacted, nay, is still in force, to confine the expences of our tables. What a twang of antique rusticity! we abrogate, we annul that law: for what is a man's liberty, who is not free to ruin his fortune by costly entertainments, if it be his pleasure so to do?"

App. in During the wars with the Cimbri, and with the Slaves of Sicily, the Romans sent no forces into Spain: they only sent Ambassadors thither, from time to time, to prevent, if possible, all matter of quarrel. But now they ordered the Consul Didius into that country with an army. Sertorius accompanied him thither, in quality of Legionary Tribune. The Consul fought a battle, successfully, with the Vaccæi^s; and, afterwards, forced the People of Terminum to abandon their town, which was strongly situated, and live in a plain, where they had neither walls, nor fortifications. He then reduced Celenda, after a siege of nine months, and sold the inhabitants for slaves. Not far from this town, was a

^s Frontinus (Stratag. l. ii. c. 10. § i.) tells us, that Didius fought a great battle in Spain; that night having put an end to it, the Roman General then caused the greatest part of his dead soldiers to be buried; and that the Spaniards, the next day, seeing more of their own people slain, than of the enemy, they concluded themselves vanquished; and submitted to the conditions of peace imposed by Didius. According to the Epitome of Livy (l. lxx.) Didius, when Proconsul, fought successfully against the Celtiberians. Whether these battles are the same, or different from what are related in the text, on the authority of Appian, is uncertain.

colony of Celtiberians, to whom, for their services against the Lusitanians, Marius, by authority from the Roman Senate, had granted some lands for a possession. It is pretended, that these Celtiberians, being poor, lived by robbery; and, for this, Didius, under pretence of dividing the territory of Colenda among them, decoyed them to his camp, and there caused them all to be massacred, men, women, and children. For these exploits he had a triumph.

In the winter, Sertorius being quartered at Castulo, a city upon the Betis, the debauchery and licentiousness of his soldiers, provoked the inhabitants to conspire with their neighbours, the Gyrifani, to surprize the Romans, and put them to the sword. The Gyrifani were accordingly admitted in the night. Sertorius made his escape, and rallying those of his men, who had likewise escaped, fetched a compass, re-entered the city, by the same gate, whereat the Gyrifani had been admitted, and where the inhabitants had neglected to post a guard. Townsmen and strangers he put all to the sword, and then, making his soldiers cloath themselves in the habits of the Castulonians, and Gyrifani, led them straight to the city of the latter, where, being mistaken for Spaniards, and admitted as such, they slew a great number of the inhabitants, and sold the rest for slaves.

It appears by the Capitoline tables, that the Roman arms prospered this year in Further Spain, under the conduct of C. Cornelius Dolabella, and that he had a triumph for his exploits ^a.

In the following Consulship of C. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Licinius Crassus (father of the Triumvir,) the Senate, by a decree, prohibited human sacrifices, which, according to Pliny, had, till that time, been openly practised: nor was the practice yet totally abolished at Rome, if we may believe Dio Cassius, who mentions two men being sacrificed in the Campus Martius, in the times of Julius Cæsar.

Marius was now returned from Asia. Though he had made the performance of a vow to Cybele the pretence for his voyage thither, his real design (according to Plutarch) had been to kindle a war in Asia, and particularly with Mithridates, King of Pontus, who, of all the potentates there, seemed the most disposed thereto.

As Marius had not the talents necessary to make a considerable figure in time of peace, his reputation among the people declined daily, and he therefore wanted to be again at the head of an army, that he might fill Rome with the fame of his achievements, and his house with the spoils of Pontus. He arrived at the court of Mithridates, and was treated by him with great civility and marks of esteem; yet was not thereby induced

^a All the barbarous nations bordering upon Macedon (except a people called the Dentileti) seem to have been up in arms, about this time, against Rome: but the particulars of this war are not transmitted to us. Cic. in Pis. c. 34.

Y. R. 655.
Bel. Chr.
97.
354 Conf.

Plut. in Sertor.

Y. R. 656.
Bel. Chr.
96.
355 Conf.
Plin.
l. xxx. c. 31.
Dio. Cass.
l. iv.
p. 226.
Plut. in
Mar.

It is uncertain what province fell to Scævola, but, it is probable, there was nothing to do in it, seeing he gave it up, that he might not put the public to expence.

His colleague Crassus, less frugal and more ambitious, searched the Alps (says Cicero) to find a triumph where no enemies were to be found. At length he met with a gang of robbers, who had no certain leader; and who, neither by their reputation, nor their numbers, were worthy to be called enemies of the Roman people. Those robbers he reduced, and for this exploit he demanded a triumph at his return to Rome. The Senate, out of regard to his dignity and authority, were going to grant his request, when his colleague interposed, and forbade the decree to pass.

Under the following administration of L. Domitius Ænobarbus and C. Cæcilius Calvus, P. Sulpicius, a young man famous for his eloquence, accused Norbanus before the Roman Knights, for a tumult he had raised the last year, when Tribune, on occasion of the trial of Cappio; the same Cappio who, in 648, had been deposed from the Proconsulship, for his misconduct in the Cimbrian war. One of the crimes, now laid to Cappio's charge, was his riotous opposition to a law of Saturninus, for distributing corn to the people at a low price. The chief men of the Senate interested themselves for the accused; the Consul Crassus pleaded his cause, and two Tribunes of the Commons interposed their authority: but Norbanus, having inflamed the multitude, they drove away his opponents with stones, wounded Æmilius Scaurus, President of the Senate, and condemned Cappio to banishment. Norbanus's crime was heinous, the proofs clear, the parties against him strong, but nothing could resist the eloquence of M. Antonius, who undertook his defence. He gave such colours to actions, truly unjustifiable, that the Judges, men of great probity, according to Cicero, absolved the criminal, without thinking they dishonoured themselves.

In the following Consulship of C. Valerius Flaccus and M. Herennius, Sylla, who, the last year, had, without success, stood for the Prætorship, now, partly by a popular behaviour, and partly by the help of money, got himself chosen to that office, though he had not passed through the Ædileship. We are told that Cæsar Strabo, a man of a facetious wit, to whom the new Prætor, on occasion of some quarrel, had said, in a threatening manner, I shall use the power of my office; answered him, laughing, Right; it is your office indeed; for you bought it, and paid for it.

P. Rutilius Rufus^a, who had assisted Scævola in correcting the abuses

^a Rutilius had formerly stood competitor for the Consulship which M. Æmilius Scaurus, the President of the Senate; and Scaurus having carried the election, Rutilius accused him of having bribed the voters. Scaurus, being acquitted, accused Rutilius of the same crime, with as little success. Cit. in B. ut. c. 30. and de Orat. l. ii. c. 69.

Y.R. 658.
Bel. Chr.
94.
357 Conf.

Æcon. in Orat. in Pif.
C. in P. l.
c. 26.
B. de Invent. l. ii.
c. 37.
A. 60, loc.
cit.

Y.R. 659.
Bel. Chr.
93.
358 Conf.

Cic. de O-
rat. l. ii.
c. 47, 48.

Y.R. 660.
Bel. Chr.
92.
359 Conf.

Plut. in
Sylla.

been driven thence by Mithridates, surnamed Eupator, King of Pontus ^b.

Y.R. 661.
Bef. Chr.

This Mithridates (who struggled long with the Romans for the empire of Asia) had ascended the throne at eleven or twelve years of age. It is said, that, during his minority, his tutors attempted to destroy him, by mounting him on a fiery horse unbroken; a danger he escaped by his address: that they afterwards plotted to poison him, but that he, aware of their design, guarded himself against it by excellent antidotes: and it is added, that the frequent use of these gave him a constitution proof against the most deadly poison. He applied himself to the study of physic, and grew fond of being thought skilful in that art; insomuch, that his courtiers, to humour his vanity by a servile complaisance, used to slash, or burn themselves, in some part of their bodies, on purpose to give him an opportunity of shewing his skill in the cure. To secure himself from assassination, he pretended to be extremely fond of hunting, and (if we may believe Justin) was seven years without sleeping a night in any house; he lay in the mountains, and seldom in the same place. This manner of life rendered him robust, hardened his body against the changes and inclemency of the seasons, and prepared him to sustain all the fatigues of war. During his nonage, the Romans took from him the Greater Phrygia, which they had assigned to his father, as the reward of his services in the war with Aristonicus, and to which he had pretensions of an earlier date, it having been given to his great grandfather Seleucus Calinicus.

91.
360 Conf.

Strab.
l. x. p. 472.
Just.
l. lxxvii.
c. 2.

Plut. de Adulat. et Amic. discrim.
Justin.
l. xxxviii.
c. 3.

Vid. Vol.
II. p. 544.

Just.
l. xxxviii.
cit.
App. in Mithridat.
p. 180.

Among the first acts of his reign, he put to death not only his guardians, but his mother and his brother. After this, he formed vast projects for enlarging his dominions^c. He subdued a great part of Scythia, all

^b He was descended from a long series of Kings, who had reigned in Pontus before him. The first of them was one of those seven Princes, that slew the Magians, and settled the kingdom of Persia on Darius Hystaspes, and, having obtained the sovereignty of this country, transmitted it to his posterity, through sixteen generations; Mithridates Eupator being reckoned the sixteenth from him. Polyb. l. v. p. 388. Florus. Diod. Sic. Aurel. Vict. Appian.

1. The first of these, of whom we find a name in history, is that Mithridates, who, dying in the year before Christ 363, was succeeded by his son. [Diod. Sic. l. xv.]

2. Ariobarzanes (then Governor of Phrygia for Artaxerxes Mnemon, King of Persia,) who, having reigned twenty-six years, was succeeded by his son.

3. Mithridates, the second, in the year

(before Christ) 337. — On his death he was succeeded by his son.

4. Mithridates, the third, who, having very much enlarged the kingdom of Pontus, by new acquisitions, was reckoned as the founder of it, and therefore is, by historians, called Kistes (i. e. the Founder.) He reigned in Pontus thirty-six years, and on his death, which happened in the year 266, left his kingdom to his son, Ariobarzanes.

From this Mithridates the Founder, Mithridates Eupator was the eighth: but of these history furnisheth us with the names only of six, and these are; 1. Mithridates Kistes. 2. Ariobarzanes. 3. Mithridates. 4. Pharnaces. 5. Mithridates Evergetes. 6. Mithridates Eupator.

Plut. in Demetr.
Appian.
Diod. Sic.
l. xx.
Vid. Pri-deaux.

^c The state of Asia, at this time, is thus represented by M. Crevier.

The Romans possessed Asia, properly so called, all Colchis, and the adjoining countries, and obliged the Thracians, the Esperians, the Armenians, and all the nations of the Tanais, the Palus Meotis, and at the mouth of the Danube, to enter into alliance with him, and assist him with their forces.

It is said, that, elated with his victories, he proposed to himself nothing less than the conquest of all Asia; and that, with this view, he privately left his court, and, attended by a few of his friends, went over all that continent, in order to know the strength of the towns and fortresses. But, perhaps, this story was invented to make the king appear, in some sort, the aggressor in the war, which he afterwards sustained against the Romans.

At his return home, his wife Laudice, who, in his absence, had been unfaithful to him, conspired with her lovers to take him off by poison: both crimes being discovered by a slave, the King put her, and her accomplices, to death.

After this, he leagued himself with Nicomedes, King of Bitynia, and son of Prusias; in consequence of which they made themselves masters of Paphlagonia. Pylamenes, King of that country, having complained at Rome, the Senate, by their Ambassador, ordered the two Kings to restore what they had usurped. Mithridates (says Justin) thinking himself a match for the Romans, returned for answer, that Paphlagonia had fallen to his father by inheritance, who having never been blamed for claiming it, it was wonderful, that the same claim should be considered as a crime in the son. But the historian, afterwards, tells us, that the King obeyed the decree of the Senate.

The Bitynian promised to restore his share of Paphlagonia to Pylamenes, the lawful King; and, by way of fulfilling his promise, proclaimed his own son King of that country, by the name of Pylamenes.

called, that is, the kingdom of Pergamus, which had been left them by the will of Attalus Philometor, and conquered them from Aristonicus.

Nicomedes Philopater, son of Prusias, reigned in Bytynia.

Paphlagonia had long had its Kings, whose common name was Pylamenes. As it was situated between the dominions of the Kings of Pontus and Bitynia, it had suffered much from those two powerful neighbours; and its ancient Kings seemed to have been reduced very low, from the time of Mithridates Euphrates.

Next to Paphlagonia, along the coast of the Euxine sea, was the kingdom of Pontus.

Cappadocia was under Ariarathes, the son of another of that name, who died in the service of the Romans in the war with Aristonicus.

Galatia was divided between several tetrarchs.

But all these states, and the other parts of Asia Minor, without being immediately under the Roman sway, respected their greatness, and in a manner received the law from them. Especially when any troubles or quarrel arose, between the Princes, or States of those countries, the Romans did not fail to make themselves the arbitrators of them, and their opinion amounted, in effect, to a command. Crev. vol. X. book xxxii.

This affair had no important consequences : but the enterprizes of Mithridates upon Cappadocia produced an open rupture between him and the Romans.

Ariarathes, King of Cappadocia, had married Laodice, the sister of the King of Pontus, and by her had two sons. Mithridates, nevertheless, that he might possess himself of Cappadocia, not only contrived, by the means of one Gordius, to get Ariarathes assassinated, but formed the design of destroying those sons of his own sister. Before he could execute this project, Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, seized the vacant throne of Cappadocia. Hereupon Mithridates, pretending to espouse the interest of his nephews, sent succours to his sister Laodice, in order to expel the usurper : but the Queen had already married him.

The King of Pontus, much displeased with these tidings, marched an army into Cappadocia, drove out Nicomedes, and placed the elder of Laodice's sons upon the throne. Not many months after, he proposed to his nephew, that he should recal Gordius, the assassin, from banishment. In this proposal, his view was to have a pretence for war, in case his nephew denied his request, and, in case he granted it, to get rid of him by the same hand which had murdered his father. The young King refused, and both sides prepared for war. Mithridates brought into the field 80,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and 600 armed chariots ; and the Cappadocian, assisted by the neighbouring Kings, had an army no less numerous. The King of Pontus, doubtful concerning the event of the war, invited his nephew to an amicable conference, and there stabbed him with his own hand, in sight of both armies. He then placed his own son, a child of eight years old, upon the throne of Cappadocia, gave him the name of Ariarathes, and assigned him Gordius for his tutor.

The Cappadocians, oppressed by their governors, sent into Asia for the younger brother of their late King, and put him at their head. But this Prince, being defeated in battle by Mithridates, fled out of the country, and soon after died.

Nicomedes, fearing lest the King of Pontus, now in possession of Cappadocia, should from thence invade Bithynia, which bordered upon it, suborned a young man, of great beauty, to call himself a son of the late Ariarathes, and petition the Roman Senate for the crown of Cappadocia. Queen Laodice joined in the fraud, and went to Rome with the impostor, there to own him for her son by her former husband. Mithridates, with equal impudence, sent Gordius to the Senate to assure them, that the boy, who actually reigned in Cappadocia, was a son of the late King Ariarathes *. The Conscrip^t Fathers took Cappadocia from Mithridates, and

Paplagonia

* Justin, from whom we have this story, says, that Mithridates pretended the boy was son of that Ariarathes, who lost his life in fighting for the Romans against Aristonicus. But this cannot be true, if what the historian had said before be true, that the boy Paphlagonia from Nicomedia, and declared both countries free. But the Cappadocians, accustomed to monarchical government, desired they might have a King. Their request being granted, their choice fell upon Ariobarzanes, a Cappadocian noble. Mitridates did not openly oppose the execution of this decree, but, we are told, that he, underhand, stirred up the Armenians against the Cappadocians; and we find that Sylla had a commission to restore Ariobarzanes to his dominions, and that he effected it, after having driven from thence Gordius and the Armenians.

According to Plutarch, Sylla made a progress as far as to the Euphrates, and, while he was encamped on the banks of that river, Asaces, King of the Parthians, sent Ambassadors to him, desiring an alliance with the Roman Republic: Though the Parthians were a nation the greatest for extent of dominion, the most warlike, and the richest in Asia, they were little known at Rome. Sylla reckoned among the most fortunate of his adventures that of being the first Roman to whom the Parthians had sent a solemn embassy. At the audience which he gave to the Ambassador, he placed himself in the middle between him and the King of Cappadocia; and the Parthian minister, for having suffered this, paid afterwards the forfeit of his head.

Sylla, at his return to Rome, was accused of having plundered the allies of the Republic, during his administration in Asia: but his accuser dropt the prosecution*.

was but eight years old: for the Consul Perperna finished the war with Aristonicus in the year 623. Mitridates therefore, it is probable, pretended, that the boy in question, was the grandson of that Ariarathes, who had six sons by his wife Laudice, the five eldest of which the mother poisoned, that she might not be deprived of the administration of the kingdom. The sixth, who was preserved by his relations, afterwards married Laudice, sister of Mitridates, and was assassinated by his order. Of the two sons of this marriage, Mitridates killed one with his own hand, and dethroned the other, who, soon afterwards, died with grief.

* A sort of professors had been introduced into Rome, who called themselves Latin Rhe- toricians, and pretended, by certain rules and definitions, to teach the Roman youth the art of eloquence. Crassus, the orator, now in the Censorship with Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus, thought there was nothing to be learnt of these masters, but impudence; in conjunction, therefore, with his colleague, he, by edict, obliged them to shut up their schools. Cic. de Orat. l. iii. c. 24.

The magistracy of these two Censors passed almost intirely in disputes between themselves; the source of which was, perhaps, their difference of character: Domitius being frugal, Crassus given to expence. Their quarrels were too ridiculous to deserve a place in history.

C H A P. VII.

Livius Drusus, Tribune of the People, undertakes, without success, to procure to the Italian allies the privileges of Roman citizenship.

IN the Consulship of L. Marcius Philippus and Sex. Julius Cæsar, great commotions were raised at Rome, on account of some laws proposed by a Tribune of the People, M. Livius Drusus^a, the son of that Drusus, whom the Senate had spirited up to defeat the projects of Caius Gracchus.

The historians have left us a very unsatisfactory account of the Tribuneship of this Drusus; they are not agreed among themselves in relation to his character, or to his views, or to the subject of his laws: nor are the facts they relate altogether consistent with what they say of him.

According to Appian^{*}, the Tribune chiefly aimed at procuring the right of Roman citizenship for the Italian allies: but most authors affirm, that his main design was to assert the authority of the Senate. The men, who opposed him with the greatest vehemence, were the Consul Marcius Philippus and a Senator named Q. Servilius Cæpio, who had formerly been in such intimate friendship with the Tribune, that they had exchanged wives; which, Strabo says, was an antient custom amongst the Romans: yet these friends quarrelled afterwards about a ring that was sold at an auction, and were reconciled.

To bring the People to favour his projects, Drusus proposed several laws for giving lands, and distributing corn to the poorer citizens; and these laws he is said to have carried by force^b, and by the assistance of the allies, to whom he promised the freedom of Rome. He also planted in Italy and Sicily many colonies of Roman citizens, not indeed by virtue of new laws, but in consequence of such as had been already enacted. If we may believe some authors, he was so profuse in his grants, that he himself said, he had left nothing for any body to give away, unless it were dirt and air. It was, probably, at this time, and to the end

^a This Drusus was uncle to the younger Cato, and great uncle to the famous M. Brutus. Cic. pro Mil. c. 7. & in Brut. c. 62.

^b In some contest upon occasion of these laws, Drusus ordered one of his clients to seize the Consul Philippus. The man grasped him by the throat with such violence, that the blood started out at his nose:

The Tribune made a jest of this: It is not blood, says he, it is the gravy of thrushes: for, it seems, Philippus loved good eating. After this, the Consul, by order of Drusus, was dragged to prison. Val. Max. l. ix. c. 5. § 2. Auct. de Vir. Ill. &c. The last cited author also relates, that Drusus threatened to have Cæpio thrown from the Tarpeian rock.

Y. R. 667.
Bel. Chi.
90.
361 Conf.
* App. de
Bell. Civ.
l. i. p. 371.
Cic. de O-
rat. l. i.
c. 7.
Vell. Pat.
l. ii. c. 19.
Liv. Epit.
l. lxx, lxxi.
Auct. in Orat. pro.
C. Corn.
Flor. l. iii.
c. 17.
Sallust.
Ep. 2. de
Rep. Or-dinand.
Dio. Cass.
ap. Vellei.
p. 638.
Strab. l.
xi. p. 515.
Plin. l.
xxxiii.
c. 1.
Liv. Epit.
l. lxxi.
App. loc.
cit.
Flor. l. iii.
c. 17.
Auct. de
Vir. Illust.

Y. R. 662. that the Public might be the more able to bear the expence of his largesses, that he ordered one eighth part of alloy to be mixed with the silver coin^a.

Plin. l. xxxiii. c. 3. Liv. Ep. t. l. lxxi. Aſcon. in Orat. pro Scaur. Liv. Ep. t. l. lxxi. Cic. pro Rab. Post. c. 7. App. p. 372. Cic. loc. cit. & pro Cluent. c. 56.

The Senate, and especially Æmilius Scaurus, pushed on Drusus to take away the right of judging from the Knights. He either could not, or would not, execute this scheme. But he proposed a law^b, ordaining, that the right of judging should be equally divided between the Senators and the Knights; and that all Judges, who should be charged with taking money for giving judgment, should be brought to trial^c; for hitherto the Knights were not liable to be called to account for any sentence they had passed, nor were they affected by several laws to which the Senators were subject. The Equestrian order strenuously opposed this last cause of the law, as well as the former part of it. “Not that they imagined (says Cicero) that it was no crime to take money for giving judgment; but they thought it unjust that their body should be subject to the same laws as the Senate. They said, the Senators have no reason to complain. They have rank, authority, interest, ^a According to the text of Pliny (l. xxxiii. c. 3.) as explained by Harduin, there was at this time in the treasury of Rome 1,920,829 pounds of gold, which, by Arbutnot's calculation, amounts to 52,102,486 l. 12 s. 6 d. sterling, but he thinks the sum too extravagant, and that, perhaps, Pliny's numbers are not correct. Arbutnot's Tables, p. 191.

^b Vell. Paternulus says, this law transferred the right of judging to the Senate. Florus seems to be of the same opinion. According to Appian, it ordained, that the number of Senators, which did not then amount to quite 300, should be doubled, that the new members should be of the Equestrian order, and that from the whole body of the Senate, thus constituted, the Judges should for the future be elected. The author of the lives of illustrious men seems to agree with Appian. But the accounts given by these authors are not consistent with the arguments which Cicero puts into the mouths of the Roman Knights, upon this occasion.

^c Appian reports (p. 372) that the Roman Knights, conniving at one another, it was grown very common for the Judges to take bribes. But Ajconius says, the Knights were Judges for forty years, and judged without reproach. Then Sylla transferred the right of judicature to the Senators, and they judged ignominiously for ten years. After this Aurelius Cotta procured a law, that the Judges should be chosen from among the Senators, the Knights, and the Tribuni Ærarii. And Cicero (1 Act. in Verr. c. 13.) tells us, that for near fifty years (he means from the time of C. Gracchus to Sylla) during which the Roman Knights were the Judges, there never was the least suspicion that any of them took money for giving judgment: whereas he brings many instances to prove, that the Senators were notoriously guilty of that crime, when the right of judging came to be in them. Speaking of his own time, he says, foreign nations, I imagine, will send Ambassadors to Rome, to request of the People to abrogate the law concerning extortion and embezzling the public money. For then the Governors of provinces will only plunder them of so much money as they want for themselves and their children; whereas now they must have enough to purchase patrons and advocates, and to bribe the Prætors and Judges. The famous Q. Catulus, in a speech made on occasion of Pompey's proposing a law for restoring to the Tribunes some of their ancient privileges, says, that the corruption of the Senatorial Judges was the reason why the Roman People so earnestly desired the re-establishment of the Tribunician power. Pompey also complained of this iniquity of the Senators, and promised, in his Consulship, to find a remedy for it.

“magistracies, “ magistracies, priesthoods, triumphs, the command of armies, and “ provinces; and when they began their pursuits of these honours, they “ knew the conditions annexed to them. We, too, by the favour of the “ Roman People, had we coveted high offices, might have been raised “ to the dignity of Senators: but, contented with our own order, and “ the rank of our forefathers, we preferred a quiet life without glory,

 “ to the storms of envy, and the perplexity of such trials, as this law “ would involve us in. If it be objected, that we are as much Judges “ as they are Senators, it is true, but they voluntarily sought that “ dignity: we, by being Knights, are forced to become Judges. Where“ fore, either restore to us our youth, that we may sue for offices, or, “ since this cannot be, suffer us to continue in that condition of life, “ for the sake of which, we have renounced all pretensions to offices and “ honours.” This plea was urged without effect. Drusus got his law passed, in spite of all opposition.

Y. R. 662.
 B. C. Chr.
 90.
 361 Conf.

But now the allies solicited the Tribune to perform his promise, and procure them the freedom of Rome. As the Senate and the People equally disliked this project, he found himself greatly at a loss, how to put it in execution. It is said, that, in order thereto, the Italians laid a plot to murder the Consul Philippus at the Ferie Latine, but Drusus gave him notice of the danger. It seems Philippus opposed the Senate with no less vehemence, than he did the Tribune. In a speech to the People during the Ferie, he made a sharp invective against the Conscript Fathers, and said, he must find a way to have another Council: For with the Senate, such as it was, he could not carry on the Public business. On the Ides of September, Drusus convened the Fathers; and, after complaining heavily of Philippus, proposed to them to deliberate on the offensive words uttered by him against the Senate in the late assembly of the People. Crassus, the orator, warmly espoused the cause of the Senate, and it was thought (says Cicero) that as, on former occasions, he had surpassed all other men in eloquence, so, on this, he surpassed himself. The Consul, a man of great spirit and resolution, and the next in eloquence to Crassus and Antonius, though by far unequal to either, answered with much heat; and by way of punishing the orator for having failed in respect to him, imposed a fine upon him, and demanded sureties for the payment of the money. Crassus replied, that he would never acknowledge the authority of a Consul, who would not respect him as a Senator; that he was not to be terrified by a demand of sureties; that his tongue must be cut out, before he would be silent, and that, even then, his breath should oppose the insolence of the Consul. After haranguing long with great vehemence, acuteness, and strength, he gave his opinion in words weighty and eloquent, says Cicero; that it should be made appear to the Roman People, that the Senate had never been wanting to the Republic,

Auct. de
 Vir. Illust.

Cic. de O-
 rat. l. iii.
 c. 1.

The 13th.

Y. R. 652. either in wisdom or in fidelity. This, adds, the writer, was the last ora-
Ref. C. 11. tion of this divine man, for, in the vehemence of his action and discourse, 92.
361. Conf. he was seized with a pain in his side, and then fell into a violent sweat, which was succeeded by a shivering fit: but as the Senate had with unanimity gone into his opinion, he would not leave the house, till he had seen the decree registered: after which he went home ill of a fever, and died in seven days.

L. E. 1. The Italians, seeing no probability of their obtaining the freedom of
App. 1. Rome by a law, began to hold consultations*, how to procure it by force
B. C. 1. of arms: and then Drusus, being looked upon as the author, or at least the 113. 172.
Aug. 1. occasional cause, of these cabals, became odious to the Senate. Shortly
H. 1. after, he was stabbed in a gallery of his own house: and though the house
 113. 172.
S. 1. was, at that time, crowded with people, the assassin escaped unknown. The
Aug. 1. suspicion (according to some writers) fell upon Philippus and Capio; ac-
V. 1. 1. cording to others, upon Q. Varius, Tribune of the Commons. No enquiry,
C. 1. however, was made concerning the murder^b. And the Senate, at the mo-
Nat. D. 1. tion of the Consul Philippus, abrogated all the laws of Drusus by one de-
1. 1. 1. cree, declaring, that they had been carried contrary to the Auspices, and
Id. pro that the People were not bound by them: Cicero tells us, that the Senate
M. 1. 1. frequently assumed this power.
Id. de Leg.

1. 1. 1. As to the character of Drusus, authors differ extremely. Vell. Pater- Crat. 1. culus commends him highly; perhaps, in flattery, to the Emperor Tibe- pro C. rius; for this Prince, (in whose time Paterculus wrote) was, by the mother's
C. 1. 1. side, descended from the family of Drusus. The greater number of writers
Al. 1. 1. represent the Tribune, as ambitious, proud, and violent. Cicero is of Senec. de both opinions; for sometimes he speaks honourably of him, and, at other Brev. Vit. times, with contempt.
c. 6.

Val. Max.
1. 1. 1.
1. 1. 1.
Dio Cass.
ap. Val. 1.
p. 618.
Flor. 1. 1.

C H A P. VIII.

Aug. 1. The war called the MARSIC, the SOCIAL, the ITALIC war; being the
V. 1. 1. war of ROME with her ITALIAN ALLIES.

C. 1. IT has been already observed, that the Italians had begun to concert
Nat. D. measures for supporting, by arms, their claim of the freedom of Deor. 1. 1. Rome. The murder of Drusus confirmed them in this resolution: for
c. 1. now they totally despaired of obtaining, by treaty, those privileges, to
In Val. 1. which they had so just a pretension.—The rights of a city sustained chiefly

* According to Plutarch, it was about this time, that King Bacchus dedicated to the Gods, in the Capitol, a calyx in gold, representing himself delivering up Jugurtha into the hands of Sylla: at which Marius was highly offended, &c. Vid. supra, p. 76, in the note.

^b Seneca (de Brevit. Vit. c. 6.) tells us, that some people thought Drusus killed himself; but that nobody thought he died too soon.

by their arms, they having, in all its wars, furnished two thirds of the troops. Y. R. 662.

By the Italians were anciently meant, all the nations within the Rubicon (which falls into the Adriatic, not far from Ariminium) and the Arnus, which discharges itself into the Tuscan (or Hetrurian) sea, near Pisa, the first town of Hetruria. The country between these rivers and the Alps had the name of Cisalpine Gaul, and was reduced to the form of a province. The Italians were not called subjects, but allies; and, as they had been subdued (most of them after many defections) at different times, the conditions of their alliance were different. The Latines^a, properly so called, enjoyed the greatest privileges: what these were is uncertain; but they were less^b than those of Roman citizens, and greater than those of the other Italians. That these had not the right of suffrage, is manifest

Sigon. de Jure Ital.
Polyb. l.
ii. c. 16.

^a The boundaries of Latium were anciently the Tiber to the West; the Anio and the Sabines to the North; the Velci and the river Ufens to the East; and the Tyrrhenian, or Tuscan, sea to the South. This country, in the time of the Social War, extended to the Liris on the East, and to the country of the Marsi on the North. The nations of Old Latium, were the Albani, Rutuli, Velci, and Æqui: of New Latium, the Osii, Ausones, and Hernici. And all these Sigonius thinks had, in process of time, the full rights of Latium. Sigon. de Antiq. Jur. Ital. l. i.

^b By the Roman law no one, who had the full rights of citizenship, could belong to another city. Duarum civitatum civis esse nostro jure civili nemo potest: non esse hujus civitatis civis, qui se alii civitati dicarit, potest. Cic. pro Balb. c. 11. Nor was any man obliged against his will to change his city. Itaque & ex Latio multi, & Tusculani & Lanuvini, & ex cæteris generibus gentes universæ in civitatem sunt receptæ; ut Sabinorum, Velcorum, Hernicorum: quibus ex civitatibus nec coacti essent civitatem mutare, si qui noluissent, &c. Cic. pro Balb. c. 13. None therefore could be Roman citizens, but such as lived in Rome, or in its proper territory; and, though many among the Latines, and even whole nations, as the Sabines, Velci, and Hernici, were made free of Rome; yet the full privilege of citizenship extended only to those of them, who, accepting it, removed from their own cities to Rome, which none of them were compelled to do. Sigo-

nias [de Antiq. Jur. Ital. l. i. c. 4.] thinks, that all the Latines had the right of suffrage, but that the Consuls had a power to order them to depart from Rome, at the time of holding the Comitia. And this he endeavours to prove by several examples. Spurius Cassius, Consul in the year of Rome 267, having called as many as he could of the Latines and Hernici to vote in an Agrarian law, his colleague, Virginius, by edict, commanded every one, who had not a habitation in Rome, to quit the city. And the Consul Fannius, in a like case, commanded the Latines to leave the city, though they had been invited thither by Caius Gracchus, to give their suffrages. And Cicero (pro Sext. 10.) tells us, that the Latines took nothing more leniently, than their being ordered by the Consuls to leave Rome, which seldom happened. Sallust says, that when Mumilius, the Tribune, proposed a law for prosecuting those, by whose fault Ingurthæ had disobeyed the orders of the Senate, the guilty prepared to defeat the law, chiefly by means of the Latines, and the Italian allies. In the trial of Publius Pyrgensis, in the year of Rome 541, Livy mentions a Tribune's calling for the urns to determine by lot where the Latines should vote. Sic lingue allata est, ut sortirentur, ubi Latini suffragium ferrent. Liv. xiv. 3. Grænovius is so much offended with the notion of the Latines having the right of suffrage, that he would have Livy's text altered in this place. Cujatius thinks, the historian

Y. R. 652. fest from their entering into the present war to obtain it. And it would
 B. Chr. seem likewise, from the Latines adhering firmly to Rome, in this quarrel, that 90 they had much greater privileges than the other allies. The Sabines like-551 Conf. wise steadily supported the cause of Rome; but these (according to Vell.
Paterc.) had the right of suffrage.

The allies, in general, were subject to tribute, and obliged to furnish soldiers for the Roman armies, commonly in the proportion of two to one. Yet the auxiliaries were never admitted among the legions, but served in separate cohorts under Prefects, who received their orders from the Roman Generals.

The detail of the actions in this great and difficult war, and the order of time in which they happened, are indistinctly related by the historians.
 At first, the Italians concerted their scheme in secret, entered into a confederacy, and gave hostages to one another. The Romans, however, had notice, that a conspiracy was forming, and they sent spies up and down the country to procure further intelligence. One of these happening to see a young man of Asculum (in Picenum) carried as a hostage to a neighbouring town, gave notice of it to Servilius, who, in quality of Proconsul^a or Prætor, watched that part of the country. Servilius hastened to Asculum, and reprimanded the inhabitants with great severity and many threatenings, which so exasperated them, that they fell upon him, and slew him, together with his Lieutenant Fonteius, and massacred the Romans they found in the place. Instantly, as if this had been the signal for a general revolt, the Marfi, Peligni, Vestini, and Marrucini, took arms; and their example was soon followed by the Picentes, Ferentani, Hirpini, Pompeiani, Venusini, Apuli, Lucani, and Samnites, and, in a word, by all the nations between the two seas, from the Liris eastward to the extremity of ancient Italy. The Marfi, a people renowned for bravery, and over whom, or without whom, it is said, the Romans never triumphed, gave their name to this war, because they were the first in the revolt; though it is called also the Social and the Italian war.

historian does not speak of the Latines in general, but of those citizens of Latium who had the freedom of Rome; and many such there were.

Sigonius argues, that Cassius and Gracchus would not have called the Latines to vote, unless these had had a right of suffrage; nor unless their privilege of voting had depended on the Consuls, would these magistrates have forbid them to remain in the city.

But as it is hard to conceive, that all the Latines had a title to vote in the Comitia; because in that case the electing of magistrates and the making of laws would have been chiefly in their hands (they being seldom ordered to depart the city,) it is most probable, that the right of suffrage belonged only to some particular men, or cantons, among them.

^a Appian says, that from hence it appears, that in ancient times the several countries of Italy were subject to Proconsuls: but Sigonius blames this conjecture, for there is no instance of a Roman Proconsul or Prætor presiding among the Italians, except on occasion of a war in Italy. Sigon. de Antiq. Jur. Ital. l. i. c. 21.

Before

Before the confederates proceeded to acts of hostility, they sent an embassy to Rome, to represent, that they had served the Republic in all her wars, and had every year furnished a double proportion of troops; and to demand that, since by their means the City had been raised to her present height of power, they might be acknowledged as citizens. The Senate answered haughtily, that, if the Italians were sensible of their error, their Ambassadors would be received, otherwise not. Upon the report of this answer, the Allies chose Corfinium (the chief town of the Peligni) for their principal place of arms, and destined it to be the capital of Italy, instead of Rome: they then constituted a Senate, composed of 500 members, and, out of these, elected two Consuls, and twelve Generals, or Prætors. Their first Consuls were Q. Pompedius Silo, the chief of the Marfi, and C. Aponius Mutilus (called by some historians C. Papias), a Samnite. To Pompedius, and six of the Prætors, they allotted the North and West parts of the revolted country, and to Aponius, and the other six Prætors, the South and East parts.

At Rome, the Nobles became odious to the People, who looked upon them as the authors of the war, by their having rejected the request of the Italians. Q. Varius, the same who had been suspected of murdering Drusus, laid hold of this opportunity, and, notwithstanding the intercession of the Tribunes, his colleagues, obtained a law for enquiring by whose fault it had happened, that the Allies had taken arms^a. In consequence of this law, many of the Senators and Nobles were summoned to their trials. Bestia and Cotta (the nephew of Rutilius) to avoid a sentence, went into voluntary exile. Mummius Acbaicus is said to have been banished to the island Delos; but, if he were living at this time, he could not be less than a hundred years old. Antonius, the orator, saved himself by his eloquence; and Æmilius Scaurus, who, on different accounts, had been often accused, and as often acquitted, found means to escape once more^b. Q. Varius himself, when out of office, was condemned by his own law, and was banished. [He afterwards suffered death by torture, but at whose command is not known.]

^a Appian says, the purport of the law was to bring into judgment all who had openly, or secretly, favoured the pretensions of the Italians: that the Roman Knights put the Tribune upon this project, that they might have an opportunity to revenge themselves on their enemies, and that they guarded him with drawn daggers, till he had carried his law. App. de Bell. Civ. l. i. p. 373.

^b Whatever difficulties Scaurus might have found to escape in former trials, he got rid of this with great ease. To all the declamations of his adversaries, he made only this laconic reply: Q. Varius, a Spaniard of Sucro, accuses M. Scaurus, Prince of the Roman Senate, of having excited the Allies to take up arms. M. Scaurus, Prince of the Senate, denies the charge: no witness is produced: which of the two will you believe, Romans? This kind of defence had such an effect on the assembly, that the Tribune thought it the safest way to desist, and declared that he would give him no farther trouble. Ascon. in Cic. pro Scaur. Quintil. v. 12.

Y. R. 662.
Bef. Chr.
90.
361 Conf.

Vell. Pat.
l. ii. c. 16.

Ascon. in Orat. pro
Scaur.

Id. loc. cit.
Val. Max.
l. viii. c.
6. § 4.
App. p.
373.

Cic. Tusc.
Quæst. l.
ii. c. 24.
Id. pro
Scaur. & Ascon. in loc.
Id. in Brut. c.

89.
Id. de Nat.
Deor. l.
iii. c. 33.

But

Y.R. 662.

Liv. Fam.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Y.R. 662.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

Liv. 10.

But now the Senate made diligent preparation for war. The Latines, Sabinians, Hebrurians, and Umbrians, and even some places in the revolted provinces, continued faithful to the Republic, and furnished their contingents of men. Foreign nations sent auxiliaries to her, and Servilius, then Quæstor in Cisalpine Gaul, brought her a reinforcement of Gauls. The conduct of the war was committed to the Consuls L. Julius Cæsar, and P. Rutilius Lupus. It is thought, that Cæsar had Samnium allotted to him for his province, and Rutilus the country of the Marfi. And, in order to stop all prosecutions, on account of Varus's law, and thereby free the city from intestine dissensions, the Senate ordered the courts of justice to be shut up, during the Italian war. To each of the Consuls were assigned five Lieutenants, who, under their direction, commanded separate armies with Proconsular authority. The Lieutenants of Rutilus were C. Marius, Cn. Pompeius, father of Pompey the Great, Q. Cæpio, C. Perperna, and Valerius Messala. Cæsar's chief officers were Cornelius Sylla, P. Lentulus, T. Didius, P. Licinius Crassus, and M. Marcellus. These Generals, leaving a sufficient garrison in Rome, set out with 100,000 men, divided into several armies: nor were the forces of the Italians less numerous.

App. p. 373.

Oros. l. v. c. 13.

Dio Cass. 47. Valer. p. 641. App. loc. cit.

App. p. 373.

Prognatus, one of the Generals of the allies, defeated a considerable body of troops under Perperna, and slew 4000 of his men. Whereupon, the Consul Rutilus deprived Perperna of his command, and joined the remains of his routed troops to those of Marius. The two Generals encamped on the banks of the Liris, near each other: Vettius Cato, who had already vanquished in battle the Consul Cæsar, and taken Aesernia, a Roman colony on the Volturnus, now advanced to hinder Rutilus and Marius from passing the Liris. Marius advised the Consul not to hazard a battle, till his raw soldiers were disciplined; but Rutilus neglected the advice, thinking that his Lieutenant envied him, and wanted a seventh Consulship, that he might have the glory of finishing the war. His suspicions, if we may believe Dis Cassius, were not ill-founded. Be that as it will, Rutilus passed the river, and fell into an ambush, lost 8000 of his men, and was himself mortally wounded. Marius knowing, by the number of dead bodies that floated down the stream, that the armies were engaged, drew out his forces, passed the river, and easily made himself master of the enemies camp: so that Vettius was obliged to pass the night on the field of battle, and to march off next morning for want of provisions.

When the bodies of the Consul, and of the other officers that had fallen in the battle, were brought to Rome to be interred, the consternation among the People was so excessive, as to induce the Senate to make a decree, that thenceforward the bodies of the slain should be buried on the spot where they died: and this, as a prudent example, was followed by the enemy.

* Orosius says, it was the Telenius, in the country of the Marfi.

Q. Capio having obtained some small advantage over the allies, the Senate ordered, that Marius and he should share between them the forces which Rutillius had commanded. This honour greatly raised the presumption of Capio; of which the Italian Consul Pompedius, found means to make advantage for his cause. Leaving his army, he went to the Roman camp, and, together with two slaves, sumptuously dressed, who, he said, were his sons, surrendered himself to the General. To gain the more credit, he had brought with him large pieces of lead covered with gold and silver, which, as his treasure, he deposited in the hands of Capio. At the same time, he urged him to fall upon the Italian army, while without a leader, and offered himself to be his guide. Capio gladly listened to the proposal; and when he had brought his army near the place, where an ambush was laid for him, Pompedius, under pretence of reconnoitring the enemy, rode up to an eminence, and from thence gave the appointed signal to his men, who instantly rushed out upon the Romans, made a great slaughter of them, and killed Capio himself. What remained of his army joined that of Marius, by order of the Senate.

During these transactions, the confederates had great success in other parts of Italy. In Campania, Lucania, and Apulia, they had possessed themselves of several important towns, which had refused to join with them in the war. And M. Lamponius had routed a Roman army, commanded by Licinius Crassus, Lieutenant to the Consul Cæsar. The Consul himself, after his defeat by Vettius Cato, had recruited his army with a considerable body of Gauls and Numidians, and marched to the relief of Acerræ, then besieged by Aponius. Hereupon the Italian General brought Oxinta, the son of Jugurtha, from Venusia, where he was kept in confinement, and gave him the title of King. The Numidians deserted in such numbers to their sovereign, that the Consul, fearing they would all leave him, sent what yet remained with him into Africa. After this, Aponius attempted to force the Roman entrenchments, but lost 6000 men in the action. Yet Cæsar, it is said, left Acerræ, and we do not find that Aponius raised the siege of it. However, at this time, the Citizens of Rome laid aside the military habit which they had worn from the beginning of the war.

The next account we have of Cæsar, is, that his forces, consisting of 30,000 foot and 5000 horse, were attacked, on a march, by Marius Egnatius, who cut off the greater part of them. Nevertheless, the Consul recruited his army, and marched once more to the relief of Acerræ: But it is not said that he attempted any thing against Aponius; or Aponius against him.

In the mean time, three of the Italian Generals, Afranius, Judacilius, and Ventidius, had routed the army of Cn. Pompeius, and driven him to take refuge in Firmum, a city of Picenum. After this victory, Judacilius and Ventidius turned their arms another way, leaving Afranius to besiege Firmum. To the relief of this place, Sulpius advanced by unfre-

Y. R. 66. quented roads, and while the besieged, in concert with him, made a
B. C. 100. fully upon the besiegers, he attacked their camp on the other side, and set 362 C. 100. fire to it. This disaster terrified the Italian soldiers, that they fled in disorder to Arulum; but their General, disdaining to fly, fell in the engagement. Pompeius, soon after, invested Arulum, the siege of which lasted a long time.

The Marsi, under what General is uncertain, attacked Marius in his camp: He repulsed them, and drove them into some vineyards, whither he did not think it advisable to follow them. But Sylla, who lay encamped on the other side of those vineyards, fell upon the enemy, and made great havock of them. Above 6000 of the Italians fell in the two actions. The Marsi, however, soon recruited their forces, and frequently offered battle to Marius, which he constantly declined. He was, during this war, if we may believe Plutarch, extremely slow, irresolute, and inactive; which, the historian says, might be owing to his being advanced in years (for he was then sixty-five,) or to his being troubled with nervous disorders. The enemy surrounded him with entrenchments, and insulted him daily^p: But of this he took little notice, and, at length, laid down his command, under pretence of wanting health.

The ill success of the Romans in this campaign encouraged the Umbrians and Hebrurians to think of revolting from the Republic. In so great an extremity, the Senate not only ordered the freedmen to be enlisted in the legions, but even began to yield the point they had so obstinately refused. The Consul L. Julius Cæsar obtained a Law^q (which from his name was ever after called Lex Julia;) ordaining that the freedom of the city should be given to the Latines, and to those of the other Italians, who

^p Plutarch reports that Pompeius Silo went up one day to Marius's entrenchments and called out to him: Marius, if you are a great general, come down into the plain and fight us: to which Marius answered, If you, Silo, are a great general, force me to a battle against my will.

^q According to Appian, the Julian Law gave the Freedom of Rome only to those of the Italians, who had not entered into this war against the Republic. Cicero, in the place above quoted, says, in general, that by this Law the Allies and Latines obtained the Freedom of the City. It is probable, the Law included all who would take the benefit of it: For Appian himself, p. 382, says, that privilege was given to all the allies;
to each nation as they laid down their arms.
Strabo likewise tells us, that the Italians continued this war for two years, until they had procured themselves the Freedom of the City, for which they had taken up arms.

Strabo, lcc. supra cit. In the Epitome of Livy
l. xxx. it is said, that the Senate gave the Freedom of Rome to the nations of Italy.
And Vell. Paterculus, after mentioning the ill success of the Romans in this war, adds, that they recovered strength by granting the Freedom of the City by degrees to those who had not taken up arms, and to those who laid them down in time. Now as we find no Law, during the course of this war, which gave the privilege of Citizenship to the allies in general, except the Julian Law, it is probable, that it extended to all who chose to be included in it. This likewise helps us to account the more easily for the ill success of the Italians, the next campaign, notwithstanding the great advantages they gained in the present year.

had had not taken up arms against the Republic, and to those who should lay them down. According to Appian, this Law, being sent into the several towns of Hetruria, kept the people of that country steady to the interest of Rome. Some authors, however, mention a victory over the Hetrurians and Umbrians, but it is uncertain, whether this victory was obtained before the passing of that Law, or after it.

In the following Consulship of Cn. Pompeius Strabo^{*}, and L. Portius Cato, new Censors were elected a year before the usual time: And therefore Sigonius conjectures they were chosen to assign to the allies their proper tribes. That the allies might have little sway in the Comitia, the Senate would not distribute them into the old thirty-five tribes, but created for them eight new tribes; ordering, that these should give their suffrages the last, so that they seldom came to vote at all: an affair, which afterwards occasioned great disturbances in the Republic.

Another Law, which was at this time obtained by C. Papirius Carbo, and M. Plautius Silvanus, two Tribunes of the Commons, imported, that all foreigners, who were free of the cities allied to the Republic by league, should likewise have the Freedom of Rome, provided they had at that time an habitation in Italy, and gave their names in to the Roman Prætor, within sixty days after the promulgation of the Law.

This Plautius, by the assistance of the Nobles, procured a Law, which deprived the Roman Knights of the sole right of judicature. It ordained, that each tribe should, out of their own body, annually elect fifteen persons to act as Judges; an honour now made common to all the three orders in the state[†].

At this time, great numbers of Citizens being plunged in debt, and their creditors demanding payment, not only of the principal, but of the interest; which last, though allowed by custom, was prohibited by law, the debtors not only refused to pay, but some of them even threatened to prosecute their creditors for usury. A. Sempronius Asellio, then Prætor Urbanus, after endeavouring in vain to reconcile the parties, gave permission to the debtors to plead the Law; which so enraged the creditors,

^{*} Cicero tells us, that he was present at a conference between Pompeius the Consul, and Vettius the General of the Marfi, who had given the Romans a cruel defeat the year before, in which the Consul Rutilus was killed: It was held in sight of the two camps, and managed with great decency: The Consul's brother, Sextus, being an old acquaintance of Vettius, came from Rome on purpose to assist at it; and at the first sight of each other, after lamenting the unhappy circumstance of their meeting at the head of opposite armies, he asked Vettius, by what title he should now salute him, of friend or enemy; to which Vettius replied, "Call me friend by inclination, enemy by necessity." Quem te appellem, inquit? at ille: Voluntate hospitem, Necessitate hostem. Phil. xii. xi. which shews, that these old Warriors had not less politeness in their civil, than fierceness in their hostile encounters. Midd. Life of Cic. vol. I. p. 18.

[†] Some think, that the same Tribune was author of the Law de vi, which may be rendered concerning assault and battery: But others are of opinion, that this Law was not enacted till the year 675.

Y. R. 663.
App. d.
B. d. C. v.
l. i. p. 379.
Liv. Ep. c.
l. lxxiv.
Oros. l. v.
c. xviii.
Y. R. 664.
Bef. Chu.
89.
363 Conf.
Sigon. de
Antiq.
Jur. Ital.
l. iii. c. i.
App. loc.
cit.
Vell. Pat.
l. xi. c. xx.
Cic. pro
Arch. c. iv.

Cic. Or. 1.
pro C.
Corn. & Ascon. in loc.

Liv. Epit.
l. lxxiv.
Val. Max.
l. ix. c. 4.
§ 4.
App. p.
382.

N. R. 664.
Bel. C. 17.
83
163 Conf.

that they fell upon him, and murdered him, while he was performing the sacrifice in the Forum. In this riot they were assisted by L. Cissius, one of the Tribunes of the People; and though the Senate offered a reward to whoever should discover the authors of the murder, effectual care was taken by the uturcs to prevent the appearing of any informer.

L. Epit.
l. lxxv.

L. Epit.
l. lxxv.
l. lxxv.
App. p.
500.

During the broils in the City, war was carried on with vigour abroad. The Consul Pompeius continued the siege of *Ajculum*¹, while his colleague Portius Cato successfully fought several battles with the Marfi: but in an attempt to force their camp, he was slain², and his army routed. It would seem that, after this, Pompeius turned the siege of Ajculum into a blockade; for it is said, that he routed the Marfi and Marrucini, and reduced the Vestini to surrender themselves. The Prætor Cosconius took Salapia and Canne, and besieged Canusium, but the Samnites defeated him in battle, and obliged him to raise the siege: yet, in a second action, he, and the Prætor Luceius, obtained a victory over them, and slew 15,000 of their men, together with one of their leaders, Marius Egnatius.

Plin. l. 14.
c. 5.

Oros. l. v.
c. 13.
l. v. in
Sylla.

In the beginning of the campaign, Sylla made himself master of Stabiae, and razed it to the ground. He then joined to his own forces a Roman army, which had just slain their General Posthumus Albinus, for treating them haughtily³. Sylla made no enquiry concerning the criminals, alleging, that to make the crime be forgotten, the soldiers would fight with greater bravery.

App. p.
70.

The historians have left us such romantic accounts of some of the remaining exploits of Sylla, during this war, that it may reasonably be suspected, they took them from his own Memoirs. We are told, that while he lay encamped near Pompeii in Campania, L. Cluentius came and pitched his camp within three furlongs of him. This Sylla looked upon as so great an affront, that though he had sent out some part of his army to forage, he immediately gave battle to the enemy, in which he was vanquished, and put to flight. Nevertheless, the foragers having joined him, he again attacked Cluentius, defeated him, and forced him to remove his camp to a greater distance: the latter, however, got succours from the Gauls, and then offered battle to Sylla. When the two armies were drawn out, a huge Gaul came forward, and challenged the bravest of the Romans to fight him: this gigantic hero being slain by a little Numidian, the Gauls were terrified, and instantly took to flight. The Italians, seeing their army broken, fled likewise. Sylla pursued them, and, before they could reach Nola, whither they bent their course, slew 30,000 of ¹ Val. Pat. reports, that an army of 75,000 Samnites fought a battle before Ajculum with 40,000 Romans; but he neither tells us at what time, nor who were the Generals, nor which side gained the victory.

² As we may believe Oros. l. v. c. xviii.

Cato had boasted, that by his exploits he had equalled Marius; and, for this boasting, the son of Marius killed him, during a battle with the Marfi.

³ The Epitome of Livy says, Albinus was meditating treason.

them :

them: and as the people of Nola would open but one of their gates, lest the enemy should enter with their friends, Sylla cut off 20,000 more of Cluentius's army round the walls of that place, and, among the rest, Cluentius himself, who died fighting valiantly. Yet this hero, it seems, slew nobody; for we are told, that Sylla did not lose * a single man, or, at most, but one. What follows has less of the marvellous.

Y. R. 664.
Bef. Chr.
88.
36; Conf.

* Eutrop.
l. v. c. 2.

The Roman General marched to Æculanum, a town of the Hirpini, and summoned the inhabitants to surrender.—These, expecting the Lucanians to come to their assistance that very day, desired time to deliberate. Sylla granted them only an hour, and employed that time in laying faggots to the walls, which were of wood. When the hour expired, he set fire to the faggots; and though the Æculani surrendered themselves, yet as fear had determined them to make this surrendry, Sylla plundered the town, as if he had taken it by force. The rest of the towns belonging to the Hirpini voluntarily submitted.

App. loc.
cit.

After these achievements, Sylla turned his arms against the Samnites. Near Æsernia, Aponius surprised him in a pass, out of which it was not easy to escape. The Roman, to deceive the enemy, pretended a desire to capitulate; and having obtained a truce, took advantage of it, while the Samnites were negligent, to march off in the night, leaving a trumpeter in his camp to sound the watches. Returning suddenly by a way which Aponius did not think of, he fell upon him, and routed his army. In this action, Aponius was wounded, and few of his men escaped. Sylla plundered the enemies camp, and then marched to Bovianum, which he took after an assault of three hours.

Frontin.
Strat. l. i.
c. v. § xvii.

App. p.
381.

In the mean time, A. Gabinius, after some successful engagements with the Lucanians, and reducing several of their towns, was slain in an attempt to possess himself of the enemies camp.

Liv. Epit.
l. lxxvi.

Sulpicius defeated the Marrucini, and forced them to submit to the Republic.

The Marfi also, being frequently vanquished by Muræna and Metellus Pius, at length sued for peace.

To Pompeius, the Vestini and Peligni made their submission. The latter having seized their General Vettius Cato, in order to deliver him up to the Romans, one of his slaves snatched up a sword and killed him. Now, said he, that I have set my master at liberty, it is time to provide for myself; and in that instant ran the sword through his own body.

Senec. de Benef. l.
iii. c. xxiii.
Macroh.
Saturn. l. i.
c. ii.

Corfinium, the capital of the Peligni, being now in the hands of the Romans, the allies made Æsernia, in Samnium, their principal town, and chose themselves five Generals, of whom the chief was Pompedius Silo.

Dio l. Sic.
in Eclog. l.
xxxvii.

Asculum still held out against Pompeius. Judacilius, one of the Italian commanders, and an Asculan by birth, advanced to the relief of the place, but had only eight cohorts with him. To facilitate his enterprize, he

App. p.
378.
Oros. l. vi.
c. 18.

he gave notice to the Atilians of his approach, desiring them to make a sally upon the besiegers, as soon as he should come in sight. Judacilius had personal enemies in the place; and either by their influence, or through fear, the Atilians kept close within their walls. Nevertheless, sword in hand, he forced his way over the Roman entrenchments, and marching with his men up to the gates of the town, was then received by the inhabitants: but despairing of the preservation of the place, when he had first massacred all his enemies, he gave a great feast to his friends; at the close of which, he drank off a cup of poison, that he might not survive the ruin of his native city¹.

Pompeius, after this, entered Asculum. He put to death all who had any command in the place, and all the principal citizens, dismissing the rest of the inhabitants, after he had stripped them of their effects. The slaves, with all the plunder, (which he sold;) in short, the whole prey he converted to his own use, though the treasury, as Orosius tells us, was so much exhausted, that the houses about the Capitol, which had been assigned to the several orders of priests and augurs, were sold to raise money for the exigencies of the state.

The conqueror had the honour of a triumph; and, among the rest of the captives led in the procession, were P. Ventidius and his wife; she bearing in her arms a son, who afterwards became Consul of Rome, and, in the time of the second Triumvirate, had himself a triumph for his victories over the Parthians.

In the end of the campaign, Sylla went to Rome to sue for the Consulship. He was forty-nine years of age, or, according to Plutarch, fifty; and few men had done greater exploits than he, before their arrival at that dignity². But, probably, the credit and influence of Marius had stood in the way of his ambition. He now obtained the Consular Fasces, and the People gave him for his colleague Q. Pompeius Rufus.

The

V. Pat.
L. C. 17.
P. in
M. R.
L. Ep.
L. C. 17.
V. R. 465.
B. C. 17.
87.
364 Cons.

¹ The writers [Appian and Orosius] who mention this story, place it in the beginning of the siege of Asculum; but it is not probable, that Judacilius would have killed himself so soon, had he seen the town in a condition to hold out a long siege. Crevier.

² Dr. Middleton observes, that "Marius in this war performed nothing answerable to his great name and former glory: his advanced age had increased his caution, and after so many triumphs and Consulships, he was jealous of a reverse of fortune: so that he kept himself wholly on the defensive, and, like old Fabius, chose " to tire out the enemy by declining a battle;

" content with snatching some little advantages, that opportunity threw into his hands, without suffering them however to gain any against him.

" Sylla, on the other hand, was ever active and enterprising; he had not yet obtained the Consulship, and was now fighting for it, as it were, in the sight of the Citizens; so that he was constantly urging the enemy to a battle, and glad of every opportunity to signalize his military talents, and eclipse the fame of Marius; in which he succeeded to his wish, gained

" many

The affairs of the allies continuing to decline, they sent an embassy to Mitridates king of Pontus, requesting succours from him. The king answered, that he would pass into Italy as soon as he had subdued Asia.

Y. R. 665.
Diod. Sic.
in Eclog.
l. xxxvii.

Pompedius, if Diodorus is to be credited, raised an army of above 50,000 men, 21,000 of which were slaves. With these forces he retook Corvianum, but was defeated in battle by Mamercus, and afterwards lost his life in an engagement with Metellus Pius.

Jul Obi.
c. lv.
App. p.
382

The Samnites and Lucanians still continued in arms; by we hear of no more warlike exploits performed by them, or against them: The Romans, sufficiently employed by their civil broils, and their war abroad with Mitridates, had little leisure to attend to the total reduction of the revolted Italians. But, in conclusion, each nation of these allies obtained the Freedom of Rome successively, upon laying down their arms. Even to the Samnites and Lucanians, was at length granted the same privilege^b. And though some Roman historians would disguise it, it seems plain that the Republic granted the Freedom of the City, not generously to each nation subduing it, but by treaty, and as a condition of Peace.

App. loc.
cit.
Vell. Pat.
l. ii.
Strab. l. v.
p. 241.

In this war perished 300,000 men, Romans and Italians.

Vell. Pat.
l. ii. c. 15.

“ many considerable victories, and took several of their cities by storm, particularly Stabiae, a town of Campania, which he utterly demolished. Cicero, who seems to have followed his camp, as the chief scene of the war, and the best school for a young volunteer, gives an account of one action, of which he was eye-witness, executed with great vigour and success: That as Sylla was sacrificing before his tent in the fields of Nola, a snake happened to creep out from under the bottom of the altar, upon which Posthumius, the Haruspex, who attended the sacrifice, proclaiming it to be a fortunate omen, called out upon him to lead his army immediately against the enemy; Sylla took the benefit of the admonition, and drawing out his troops without delay, attacked and took the strong camp of the Samnites under the walls of Nola. This action was thought so glorious, that Sylla got the story of it painted afterwards in his Tusculan villa.”

^b M. Montesquieu observes, that the grant which the Romans made to the Italian allies of the rights of the city, though considered at first as the foundation of a perpetual peace, was one of the causes that hastened the ruin of the state: “ for the enormous bulk, to which the city was swelled by it, gave birth to many new disorders, that gradually corrupted, and at last destroyed it; and the discipline of the Laws calculated for a People, whom the same walls would contain, was too weak to keep in order the vast body of Italy: So that from this time chiefly all affairs were decided by faction and violence, and by the influence of the great; who could bring whole towns into the Forum from the remote parts of Italy; or pour in a number of slaves and foreigners under the form of Citizens; for, when the names and persons of real Citizens could no longer be distinguished, it was not possible to know, whether any act had passed regularly, by the genuine suffrage of the People.” De la Grandeur des Romains, c. ix.

This observation is doubtless very just, but it were to be wished, that the ingenious writer, or his ingenious admirer, Dr. Middleton, had told us, how it was possible for the Romans to avoid making that concession, without exposing themselves to inevitable ruin.

Midd. Life of Cic. p.
21.

C H A P. IX.

The occasion of the FIRST Mithridatic War. It commences under the conduct of THREE Roman Generals.

Y. R. 665.
V. C. 1075.
P. 152. TO check the progress of Mithridates, was now the great affair of the Republic: He had made no opposition to Sylla's replacing Ariobarzanes on the throne of Cappadocia (in 661;) yet, not long after, had contrived to have him driven from thence a second time.

Y. R. 665.
V. C. 1075.
P. 152. Tigranes, king of Armenia, by his conquests, had very much extended the dominions left him by his ancestors, and had formed a mighty empire. In order to draw him into a war with the Romans, Mithridates first engaged him to marry his daughter Cleopatra, and then, by the agency of Gordius, prevailed with him to undertake the dethroning of Ariobarzanes; the Armenian not imagining, that he should thereby give offence to the Roman Republic. The Cappadocian king, inactive by nature, and unable to withstand so powerful an invader, retired out of the country upon the first approach of Tigranes, and carried off his substance.

Nicomedes Philopater, King of Bitynia, dying about this time, his son Nicomedes succeeded him, and was confirmed on the throne by a decree of the Roman Senate. He had a brother, Socrates, surnamed Chrestus, who, it seems, made pretensions to the kingdom. This man, with the assistance of some forces lent him by Mithridates, drove out Nicomedes, and took his place.

V. C. 1075.
P. 152. The two dethroned kings repaired to Rome, and there made their complaints to the Senate, who ordered some commissioners, at the head of whom was that Manius Aquilius, who terminated the war of the slaves in Sicily, to go into Asia, and, in conjunction with Cassius, then Proconsul of Asia, and even with Mithridates himself, reinstate Ariobarzanes and Nicomedes in their respective kingdoms. Mithridates would not give assistance to these commissioners; yet he quietly suffered them to restore the dethroned kings; and he put to death Socrates Chrestus, who had taken refuge in his dominions.

Y. R. 665.
V. C. 1075.
P. 152. During this seeming inaction of the king of Pontus, he took measures to strengthen himself, by an offensive treaty of alliance, which he made with Tigranes: it was agreed between them, that, of the conquests they should make, the cities and countries should belong to Mithridates, and all the men and plunder to Tigranes; who, in this article, had a view to the peopling of Tigranocerta, which he was then building, and which he intended to make one of the greatest cities in the world. The king of Pontus gained likewise to the interest of his cause the Gallo-Greeks, the Sarmatæ, the Bastarnæ, and the Scythians; in a word, he armed almost all Upper Asia against against the Romans. Nevertheless, to preserve the appearance of justice, he forbore all acts of hostility against them, and confined himself to observing their motions. It was in these circumstances, that he received an embassy from the Italian states to invite him to join his forces with theirs; but, at that time, the affairs of Asia were too much embroiled to permit his absence.

The occasion he wanted and wished for, to enter upon action, was soon furnished him by the Roman generals; who, for the sake of enriching themselves, had meditated the kindling a war in Asia; with this view they endeavoured to persuade Nicomedes and Aricharzanes to invade the dominion of the king of Pontus; promising to lend them assistance. Neither of the kings was willing to provoke so powerful a neighbour: But, at length, the Bithynian, who owed a great sum of money to the Roman generals, and commissioners, for his restoration, besides what he had borrowed at interest from the Asiatic Roman, entered the territories of Mithridates in a hostile manner, and ravaged the country, as far as Amasiris. The king of Pontus had a considerable army on foot, yet suffered, without resistance, these depredations, that he might have many and just causes for the war: and though he knew that the Roman commissioners had incited the Bithynian to make this incursion, he dissembled his knowledge of it, and sent one Pelopidas, to represent to them, that Mithridates was the friend and ally of Rome, and to desire that they would assist him against Nicomedes, or, at least, oblige that prince to give him satisfaction for the injuries he had already suffered from him. The Bithynian Ambassadors, on the other hand, accused the king of Pontus of ill designs against the Roman Republic; designs, which, they said, he had sufficiently discovered, by assisting Socrates to dethrone their master, whom the Senate and People of Rome had declared king of Bithynia; by having seized upon many places in the Thracian Chersonesus, though the Romans had forbidden all the Asiatic kings to hold any possessions in Europe; and by the great preparations he had made for war, and the numerous alliances he had formed. Pelopidas replied, that there was no occasion for long disputes, the commissioners seeing very well the state of affairs, and therefore he again desired they would restrain Nicomedes, or grant aid to Mithridates, or suffer him to defend himself. As the king of Pontus had not yet violated the league with Rome, the commissioners were at a loss what answer to return. At length they pronounced, that it was not their pleasure Nicomedes should molest Mithridates, nor would they allow the king of Pontus to make war upon the king of Bithynia, it being contrary to the interest of the Roman Republic, that the Bithynian should suffer any detriment. Pelopidas would have objected to this declaration, but they would not hear him.

Mithridates, on his return home, thinking himself openly injured by the Romans, sent his son Arichathes with an army into Cappadocia, to seize the kingdom; which he did without great difficulty. After this expedition,

Y. R. 665. dition, the king of Pontus dispatched Pelopidas, a second time, to the App. 1. commissioners. The Ambassador told them, that what had been done in Mithr. 1st. Cappadocia, contrary to their inclinations, was intirely owing to the iniqui-
 1. 122. ty of their conduct, and the prevarication of their answers; that his master had sent to Rome a complaint against them, and that he summoned them to appear there, and defend their cause. He then admonished them not to enter upon a war, without being authorized by a decree from the Roman Senate and People, and boasted of the greatness of Mithridates, reckoning up the nations that were subject to him, and the number of his allies; and concluded, with asking them, either to restrain Nicomedes from making war upon Pontus (in which case he promised them his master's assistance to reduce the Italians) or renounce that specious league, which had nothing of friendship in it, but the name. Provoked at this discourse, the commissioners ordered Mithridates totally to quit Cappadocia, and to forbear all hostilities against Nicomedes; adding, that they would take effectual care, that Ariobarzanes should be immediately restored to his dominions. They then commanded the Ambassador to leave their presence, and forbad him to return, unless the king obeyed the Romans.

Without waiting for orders from the Senate, the commissioners hastened to form a mighty army. Bitbynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Gallo-Greece, furnished them with troops, which, added to the Roman forces, made up 120,000 men. These they divided into three equal bodies, commanded by three generals; L. Cæsius, Proconsul of Asia, M. Aquilius, and Q. Oppius. The Proconsul encamped on the confines of Bitbynia and Gallo-Greece; Aquilius seized the passes by which the king of Pontus might enter Bitbynia; and Oppius posted himself on the borders of Cappadocia. They had also a fleet, which, under the command of Minucius Rufus, and C. Popillius, guarded the streights of the Euxine sea. Besides these forces, Nicomedes brought into the field an army of 50,000 foot and 6000 horse.

On the other hand, Mithridates made it appear, that Pelopidas had not exaggerated, when he boasted of his master's strength. The king's army consisted of 250,000 foot, and 40,000 horse. He had besides 130 armed chariots, and 400 ships of war. His son-in-law, Tigranes of Armenia, assisted him in this war; and the kings of Parthia, Syria, and Egypt favoured his cause. His chief generals were Neoptolemus and Archelaus, two brothers, Cappadocians; but he frequently commanded in person.

87. 1. Near the river Armnias in Paphlagonia, Neoptolemus and Archelaus, with
 87. 2. the light-armed infantry, 10,000 Arminian horse, and some chariots, attacked
 1. 122. Nicomedes, though greatly superior in numbers, and totally overthrew
 App. 1st. him. The king of Pontus treated all the prisoners kindly, and sent them
 1. 122. home without ransom. This victory, obtained without the assistance of the phalanx, and without the advantage of ground, over superior numbers,
 122. by the skill of the generals, and the bravery of the soldiers, made the *Ro-
 1. 122. man* commissioners perceive, that they had been more hasty, than wise,

to

to kindle a war of such consequence, before they were authorized by a public decree.

On the approach of Mitbridates, Aquilius retreated; Neoptolemus pursued him, forced him to an engagement, and defeated him. He fled to the river Sangar, crossed it in the night, and continued his flight to Pergamus. Cassius, on this news, retired to Leontocephale, a strong castle in Phrygia; but soon quitted that place, and shut himself up in Apamea. Nicomachus took refuge in Pergamus; Oppius in Laodicea. The land forces of the Romans being thus dispersed, their fleet deserted the entrance of the Euxine sea, and left the Bitthynian ships a prey to Mitbridates's Admiral. In a short time, all submitted to the King of Pontus. He treated the inhabitants with great clemency, forgave the debts they owed to the crown, and remitted the customary tribute for five years.

After this, he over-ran Phrygia, Mysia, Asia Propria, Lycia, and Pamphylia. Few places made any resistance, and he possessed himself of all the towns and islands of Asia Minor, except Rhodes. The Laodiceans having, on the King's summons, delivered up to him Q. Oppius, the Roman General, he spared his life, but led him about as a spectacle. Aquilius, the author of the war, whom the people of Mitylene in Lesbos had delivered up, was treated with extreme rigour. Mitbridates made him go along with the army, mounted upon an ass, and forced him frequently to proclaim, that he was Manius Aquilius, the Roman Proconsul. At last he caused him to be put to death at Pergamus, by pouring melted gold down his throat, in reproach of the Roman avidity.

C H A P. X.

Civil commotions raised by MARIUS and SYLLA (now Consul, Year of Rome 665.) SYLLA procures the banishment of his rival. The distresses and adventures of MARIUS. He passes into Africa. He returns into Italy on the invitation of CINNA, Consul in 666. The violence and cruelties of MARIUS and CINNA. MARIUS dies in his seventh Consulship, Year of Rome 667.

AS the Republic had resolved to send an army against Mitbridates, the Consul Sylla, among many competitors, shewed an extreme eagerness to have the command of it; and, either by lot, or by appointment, it fell to him. Marius had long set his heart upon this commission; for, notwithstanding his years and infirmities, he was still tormented with ambition and the thirst of glory, passions (says Plutarch) which never grow old in man. His avarice likewise sided with his ambition: Asia abounded with riches, and a war in that country he thought would

Y.R. 465. be more lucrative than difficult. Nevertheless, he pretended that his sole Ben. Cui. reason for desiring this province, was to have an opportunity of teaching
 57. his son the art of war. To persuade the People, that he had yet a con-
 74. Cui. stitution fit to endure the fatigues of a military life, he daily went into the ——— Campus Martius, and there, though seventy years of age, and extremely corpulent, performed his exercises among the Roman youth, contending with them in horsemanship, &c.

The better to succeed in his project, he joined himself with P. Sulpicius, then Tribune of the People. This man, says Paterculus, was rich and eloquent, had great talents, great spirits, and great interest; and whereas formerly he had endeavoured to establish to himself a name, by honourable methods, yet now, as if he repented of his virtues, he, all on a sudden, ran headlong into wickedness. When very young, he had signalized himself, by accusing of treason the famous C. Norbanus, whom Anto- nius, the orator, defended. He is mentioned in several parts of Cicero's works^a, and with great commendation of his eloquence. His entrance into public life, according to that author, was very promising: but his eagerness, when Tribune, to hinder C. Caesar Strabo from being Consul before he had passed through the Prætorship, and the applauses he met with from the People, on that occasion, carried him farther than he at first intended. Plutarch tells us, that in Sulpicius were united cruelty, impudence, avarice, and all sorts of vice: so that it was needless to enquire wherein his wickedness exceeded that of other men, but wherein it surpassed itself. It seems, he proposed Saturninus for his model, and, as the only thing which he blamed in that model, was his not being daring and quick enough in his enterprizes, he himself immediately appeared attended with a guard of 3000 men, among whom were 600 knights.
 This guard he called the Anti-senate. He also publicly sold the freedom of the City to strangers and freedmen^b, and received the money at a table placed in the Forum. One of his colleagues had proposed a law for recalling those exiles^c, who had been sent into banishment without being heard; but Sulpicius would not suffer the Law to pass. Afterwards, nevertheless, he himself proposed the same Law, without allowing it to be the same, because he had changed the word exiles into the words those who had been ejected by force. He then proposed several other Laws, among which one prohibited the Senators from contracting debts^d above the value of 2000 denarii. Another ordered, that the new Citizens (mean-

A. G. ad
 Heron.
 1. 1. c. 23.

P. 1. 1.
 S. 1.
 6. 1. 1. 1.
 6. 1. 1. 1.
 6. 1. 1. 1.

^a De Hor. R. 2. c. 10. In Brut. c. 19. 55.
Cicero makes him one of the speakers in the three Dialogues he composed de Oratore.

^b The Roman freedmen had not a title to all the rights of Citizenship.

^c It would seem, that by the exiles are meant those who had been banished by the Lex Julia, mentioned above, p. 111.

^d Yet, after the death of Sulpicius, it was found, that he himself had contracted debts to the amount of three millions of denarii, that is, about 96,875 pounds sterling.

ing the Italians) and the freedmen should not, in voting, be confined to certain tribes, but be dispersed through the whole : a third was for transferring from Sylla to Marius the conduct of the Asiatic expedition.

To defeat these projects, the Consuls proclaimed holidays, which lasted a long time, during which, it was not lawful to assemble the Comitia : but the Tribune, having gathered about him a multitude, went to the Senate-house, and commanded the Consuls, Pompeius and Sylla, to revoke their edict concerning the holidays, that the People might give their votes with regard to the Laws in question. The Consuls refused : Sulpicius's party drew their daggers ; Pompeius made his escape, his son was killed, and Sylla, being closely pursued, took refuge in Marius's house. Some say, that Marius let him out at a back-door : but Sylla, in his own Memoirs, quoted by Plutarch, denied that he took refuge in Marius's house, and affirmed, that Sulpicius's followers forced him thither, and then obliged him to return to the Forum, and revoke the edict in question ^a. Be that as it will, it is certain, he revoked the edict, for which reason Sulpicius left him in possession of the Consulship, degrading only his colleague Pompeius. Sylla, immediately after the tumult, left the City, and joined his army, then employed in the siege of Nola, which still held out against the Republic. The Tribune, having obtained the Laws he proposed ^b, sent two officers to Nola, to receive the army from Sylla ; but the soldiers fell upon them, and murdered them. Marius, in revenge, put to death many of Sylla's friends in the City, and confiscated their effects. In the mean time Sylla marched his troops, consisting of 30,000 foot, and 5000 horse, towards Rome. Appian tells us, that they followed him very readily, because they hoped, that under his conduct they should enrich themselves by the plunder of Asia, and feared lest Marius would make use of another army in the Mithridatic war. All things were in confusion at Rome. Some (among whom was the Consul Pompeius) fled to the camp of Sylla, while others, deserting Sylla ^c, took refuge in the City. The Senate found themselves obliged to obey the orders of Sulpicius and Marius. These, on Sylla's approach, sent to him two of the Prætors, Servilius and Brutus ^d, forbidding him to proceed.

^a Vell. Pat. and Eutropius say, that Sylla was with an army in Campania, during this tumult, contrary to what Plutarch, Appian, and Sylla's own Memoirs affirm. [If those Memoirs of Sylla were genuine, it may reasonably be asked, why did not Paterculus follow them ?]

^b According to Appian, Sulpicius concealed his design of giving the conduct of the Mithridatic war to Marius, till after the tumult above mentioned, and his obtaining the Law, authorizing the new citizens and the freedmen to vote in all the tribes : nor did Sylla suspect any thing of the matter till he joined his army at Nola.

^c The same writer tells us, that none of Sylla's principal officers staid with him, except his Quæstor.

^d Ambassadors were sent several times to Sylla to enquire, why he approached the City

Y.R. 665.

Liv. Epit.

l. lxxvii.

Ascon. in

Orat. in proCorn.

App. de

Bell. Civ.

l. i. p. 583.

App.

p. 584.

Plut. in

Sylla & in

Mar.

Y. R. 665.
B. C. Chr.
87.
344 Conf.

proceed any farther on his march. The soldiers insulted those Magistrates, pulled off their robes, and broke the Fasces of their Lictors. Hereupon the Senate dispatched new Ambassadors to Sylla, intreating him not to come nearer the City, and promising to satisfy him. He answered, that he would stay where he was; and, as if he intended so to do, ordered a camp to be marked out: but the Ambassadors were no sooner gone, than he detached two of his officers, with a body of men, to seize one of the gates of Rome, and the wall near the Esquiline hill. The detachment entered the City, but the inhabitants drove them back to the foot of the walls. In that instant, Sylla arriving, commanded his men to set fire to the houses, and he himself gave the example. Marius, Sulpicius, and their followers, made what resistance they could; and promised freedom to all slaves that would arm in their cause. Few or none, daring to join them, they fled out of the City. Sylla marched on to the Capitol, where he assembled the Senate; and proposed to them the banishment of Sulpicius, Marius, and the son of Marius, together with nine more of their principal adherents. Of all the Senators, Q. Mucius Scaevola was the only man who refused to concur in this vote; and when Sylla endeavoured to terrify him by menaces, he boldly answered, “Al“ though you should threaten me with death, and give me up to those sol“ diers, with whom you have surrounded the Senate-house, you shall never “ persuade me, for the sake of a life, now exhausted to the dregs, to pro“ nounce Marius an enemy, who has saved Italy and Rome.” The decree passed; and it would seem that Sylla, by edict, set a price upon the heads of the exiles, and confiscated their estates.

Y. R. 665.
B. C. Chr.
87.
344 Conf.

App. de
Bell. Civ.
l. 1. p. 386.

Sulpicius, being taken through the treachery of his slave, was put to death, and his head fixed upon the Rostra. To reward the slave, Sylla gave him his freedom; and, to punish his treachery, caused him to be thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock. The two Consuls, after their victory, took great care that the City should not be pillaged by the soldiers. The next day, having convened the general assembly, they notified, that, for the future, the People should not be assembled by tribes, but by centuries, and that nothing should be brought before the Comitia, till it had been first approved by the Senate. They likewise annulled all those acts of Sulpicius, which had been passed since the proclamation of the holidays: and, to have a Senate at their devotion, they created (if we may believe Appian) three hundred new Senators. To the Consul Pompeius was assigned the command of an army, which then served under his kinsman Cn. Pompeius Strabo, who had reduced Asculum.

City in arms? to which he always answered, that his design was to rescue it from tyranny. At last Marius and Sulpicius sent orders to him, in the name of the Senate, not to come within five miles of Rome.

Appian.

Affairs being thus regulated, Sylla sent his troops before him to Capua, intending soon to set out for Asia. The Marian faction, in the mean time, laid a snare (as it is said) for his life, and the People were so exasperated against him, that, at the election of certain Magistrates, they not only passed by his nephew and his friend, but chose two of the candidates, whom they thought the most disagreeable to him. On this occasion he affected to say, that he was pleased to see the People make use of the liberty he had procured them.

When the Consul Pompeius came to take the command of the army appointed him, Strabo gave it up to him, without any seeming reluctance: But the next day, the soldiers, suborned by their old general, fell upon the Consul, while he was sacrificing, and killed him. Strabo pretended to be in great wrath for this murder, yet he resumed his former command.

At Rome, Sylla, to ingratiate himself with the People, suffered them to give the Consular Fasces to L. Cornelius Cinna, a Patrician of their own party; but had the precaution to make him solemnly swear, he would support his interest. The other Consul was Cn. Octavius, a peaceable man, and a strict observer of the laws.

Cinna, rash in counsel (says Paterculus) but a man in action, dared what no man of virtue would dare, and performed what none but a man of the greatest resolution could have performed. No sooner did he enter upon his office, than he began to entertain projects for overturning all that Sylla had done; and even excited Virginus, a Tribune of the People, to accuse him of a capital crime: but Sylla neglecting the accusation, set out for his province. According to Appian, the friends of the exiles, depending upon Cinna, began to revive Marius's proposal of dispersing the new Citizens among all the tribes; and Cinna, had been gained to favour this project, by a bribe of 300 talents: His colleague Octavius undertook the cause of the old Citizens. On the day when the Comitia met to determine concerning to this affair, the two parties, each headed by a Consul, came to a battle in the Forum: victory declared for Octavius, and, if one may believe Plutarch, near 10,000 of the new Citizens were slain^a.

^a Appian relates the affair thus: Cinna and his party, armed with daggers under their gowns, took possession of the Forum. Octavius, attended by the honest part of the people, armed likewise with daggers, kept at home, till he was informed, that the majority of the Tribunes, having forbid proceeding to pass the Law, the new Citizens had driven them from the Rostra; then he, and his followers, broke like a torrent into the Forum, pushed through the midst of the croud, and having frighted away the rioters, retired to the temple of Castor; for out of regard to his colleague he forbore to attack him. Nevertheless, the followers of Octavius fell upon the new Citizens, killed many of them, and drove the rest out of the city.

Cinna,

Y. R. 665.
Plut. in Sylla.

App.
P. 388.

Vell. Pat.
l. ii. c. 23.
Val. Max.
l. ix. c. 7.
§ 6.

Y. R. 666.
Bef. Chi.
86.
365 Conf.

Plut. in
Sylla.
Vell. Pat.
l. ii. c. 24.
Plut. in Sylla.

App.
P. 389.

58125 l.
Arb.

Plut. in Sertor.

VI. R. 446.
B. C. 87.
C. 100.

Cinna, who had depended upon his superiority in number, seeing his party, contrary to his expectation, defeated, ran up and down, inviting the slaves, by a promise of liberty, to take arms. This stratagem not succeeding, he left Rome, and made a progress through several towns of the allies, soliciting them every where to revolt, and raised money for the expences of the war. While he was thus employed, C. Marius Gratidianus, C. M'ellius, and *Q. Sertorius*² joined him, but the Senate passed a decree against him to this effect: Because Cinna has deserted the Republic in her danger, and called the slaves to arms, we declare him fallen from his right of Citizenship, and depose him from the office of Consul. In his place was substituted L. Cornelius Merula, then Flamen Dialis. Hereupon Cinna hastened to Capua, where was quartered a Roman army, and having gained the officers who commanded it, and, by their means, got the troops convened, he entered the Assembly without the Fasces, and in the habit of a private man. Then, with tears, addressing himself to the soldiers: From you, Citizens, I received the honour of the Consulship: what you gave me by your suffrages, the Senate, without consulting you, has taken from me. This injury I do not lament so much for my own sake, as for yours. What occasion will there be hereafter to court the favour of the tribes? What occasion for Assemblies and Comitia? And wherein can you be useful, if you suffer your determinations to be so easily annulled? After complaining much of his own misfortunes, he rent his garment, and coming down from the place where he had harangued, threw himself upon the ground, before the Assembly. The soldiers, moved with compassion, raised him up, gave him back his Fasces, and desired him to take courage, and lead them wherever his affairs should require. That this opportunity might not be lost, both officers and soldiers immediately took an oath of fidelity to Cinna.

In the mean time, Ostilius and Merula made diligent preparation for the defence of Rome, and sent to make levies of soldiers, not only among the allies, but among the Gauls. They, moreover, ordered Cn. Pompeius Strabo to come instantly with his army to the assistance of the Republic. He had continued at the head of this army ever since the murder of his kinsman (Sylla's colleague in the Consulship) who had been appointed to command it, as we have before observed. Some say, that Sertius first offered his service to Cinna, who rejected it: Others, that, by encouraging both parties, he fomented a war which he could easily have suppressed in the beginning. Be that as it will, he marched to Rome, and joined Ostilius, but acted in such a manner, as made

VI. R. 446.
B. C. 87.
C. 100.

² Sertorius, according to Plutarch, was present at the late conflict in the Forum, and was slain there together with Cinna. He had, not long before, stood for the Tribuneship; but though he was so great a favourite of the People, that, one day, when he entered the Theatre, they broke out into a shout of applause, yet he lost his election through the influence of Sylla's party. Plut. in Sertor.

it visible he had nothing in view, but his own interest. Cinna, on the other hand, to give credit to his party, sent to recall Marius and his son from banishment.

We have already seen, that Sylla drove Marius from Rome, and set a price upon his head. In the evening of that day, on which he made his escape, he arrived at a villa of his own, called Salonium, and from thence sent his son to some neighbouring farms belonging to his father-in-law Mucius, there to provide necessaries for their voyage. He himself went, in the mean time, to Ostia, where his friend Numerius, having prepared him a ship, he, without staying for his son, but taking with him Granius, his wife's son by a former husband, weighed anchor. Passing along the coast of Italy with a favourable wind, he was in no small apprehension of one Geminus, a man of great interest at Tarracina, and his enemy. He therefore bade the sailors keep off from that place, and they were willing to obey, but the wind changing, and blowing hard from the sea, and their vessel being scarce able to resist the waves, Marius too being indisposed, and sea-sick, it was with great difficulty they could get so far as Circeti, on this side of Tarracina.

The storm now increasing, and their provisions failing, they went on shore, and wandered up and down they knew not whither; avoiding, as it usually happens in great dangers, the present evil, and relying on uncertain hopes. The land and the sea were both perilous: they feared to meet with people, and yet, wanting food, feared more to meet with nobody. Towards night they lit upon a few poor herdsmen, who, unhappily, had nothing to give them: but, knowing Marius, they advised him to get away, as soon as possible, for they had seen a party of horse in search of him. Marius seeing that his attendants, spent with long fasting, were unable to go farther, turned aside out of the road, and hid himself in a thick wood, where he passed the night in great distress. The next day, though pinched with hunger, yet willing to make use of the little strength he had left, he travelled by the sea-side, encouraging his companions by prophecies, upon which, he said, he depended. He told them, that, when he was a child, he brought home an eagle's nest, in which were seven young ones, and that his parents, much astonished at the accident (for it is said, that an eagle never hatches more than two,) having consulted the diviners, these had declared, that he would be the greatest amongst men, and be seven times possessed of the highest magistracy in his country.

When he and his company were now about two miles and a half from Minturnæ, they espied a troop of horse making towards them with all speed, and, at the same time, two ships pretty near the shore. Hereupon they ran as fast as they could to the sea, and plunging themselves into it, swam to the ships. Granius, and those that were with him, got into one of them, and passed over to the opposite island, called Ænaria.

Y R 666.
Bef. Chr.
86.
363 Conf.

Marius, heavy and unwieldy, was, with much difficulty, borne above the water by two slaves, and put aboard the other ship. In this instant the soldiers arrived at the sea side, and from thence called out to the mariners, to bring their vessel to shore, or else to throw out Marius. He, on the other hand, besought them with tears, not to deliver him up to his enemies. The mariners, after a consultation, wherein they inclined sometimes to the one side, sometimes to the other, at length answered positively, that they would not deliver up Marius. But soon after the soldiers were gone away, and out of sight, the sailors brought the vessel to an anchor, at the mouth of the Liris, where it makes a great marsh; and then they advised Marius to go on shore, and refresh himself, till the wind should come fair, which, they said, would soon happen; for that when the sea breeze fell, there generally arose a fresh gale from the marsh. Marius listened to their advice, and, when they had set him on shore, he laid himself down in a place not far from the sea, not in the least suspecting what was to befall him: for the mariners, presently after, weighed anchor, and sailed away, not thinking it excusable to deliver Marius into the hands of those who sought to destroy him, nor consistent with their own safety to protect him. Deserted thus by all, he lay a good while silent on the ground: at length, collecting the remains of his strength, he got up, and travelled along most disconsolately. After wading through bogs, and ditches full of water and mud, he at last stumbled upon an old man's cottage, who worked in the fens. Falling at his feet, he besought him to give assistance to a perion, who, if he escaped the present danger, would make him returns beyond his expectation. The poor man, whether he had formerly known Marius, or was then moved, says Plutarch, with the majesty of his countenance, answered, If you want only rest, you may repose yourself conveniently in my cottage; but if you are flying from an enemy, I will bide you in a more retired and secret place. Marius having desired he would do him that good office, the old man led him to a cave, by the river side, and there covered him with reeds, and other light things which would conceal, but not burden him. Scarce had he laid himself down, when he was disturbed by a great noise from the cottage. His enemy, Geminus, had sent horsemen from Tarracina in pursuit of him, and some of them happening to come that way, most severely menaced the poor old man, as one who had entertained and concealed an enemy of Rome. Marius, thinking himself in imminent danger, stripped off his clothes, and, leaving his concealment, plunged himself into a great pool of water. From thence his pursuers dragged him naked, and all covered with mud, and in that condition carried him away to Minerva, where they delivered him into the hands of the magistrates. There had been published throughout all the towns of Italy, a decree of the Senate, importing, that search should be made for him, and that he should be put to death, if he were found. The magistrates, therefore, in obedience to this decree, cast him into prison, and sent a slave, belonging to the Public, a Cimbrian by birth, to cut off his head: for none of their own citizens would undertake the office.

Several authors have reported, that Marius, seeing the slave enter the prison, said to him with a strong voice, Hast thou the audaciousness to kill Marius? and that, at these words, the Cimbrian instantly ran away into the town, and, throwing down his sword before the people, cried out, I have not the power to kill Marius: nevertheless, it would seem, from certain passages in Cicero, that this story is an invention of some of the later writers. Be that as it will, the Minturnenses furnished Marius with a ship and provisions; he sailed first to Ænaria, where having found Granius, and the rest of his company, that had escaped thither, he, together with them, steered his course towards Africa. Want of water forced him to put in near Eryx in Sicily. A Roman Quæstor, who guarded that coast, fell upon Marius at his landing, slew sixteen of his men, and was near taking him prisoner. The illustrious fugitive, however, at length arrived in Africa, and went on shore near Carthage, in the hope that Sextilius, the Prætor of that province, a man to whom he had done neither good nor harm, would, out of mere compassion, assist him in his distress. But scarce was he landed, when an officer from Sextilius forbade him to set foot in that country, and declared to him, that if he did not obey, he would be treated, conformably to the decree of the Senate, as an enemy of Rome. Marius, struck with astonishment at this message, remained a considerable time without speaking a word, his eyes fixed upon the messenger. The man, at length, asked him, what answer he should carry back to the Prætor: Go tell him (said Marius,) that you have seen Marius, an exile from his country, and sitting among the ruins of Carthage: meaning by this (says Plutarch) to propose the fortune of that city, and his own fortune, as instructive lessons to the Prætor. He went again on board, and wandered about in those seas, a great part of the winter. His son Marius, who had taken refuge in the court of Mandrestal (or, as Plutarch calls him, Hiempsal,) King of Numidia, came from thence, and joined his father.

We left the younger Marius in Italy, at some farms belonging to Mucius, whither he had been sent to get necessaries for his father's voyage, the very day his father set sail from that country. While the son was busy in executing his commission, he had like to have been surprised by some troopers, who were in search of his father; but, by the care of Mucius's steward, who had notice of their approach, he was put into a cart covered over with beans, and conveyed to his wife at Rome. From thence, together with Cetbegus, and some others, he made his escape in the night, went on board a ship, passed into Africa, and there implored the protection of the King of Numidia. Hiempsal treated him, and his

Y R. 566.
Bet. Chr.
96.
365 Conf.

J. E. Epit.
i. lxxvii.
Vell. P. 1.
7-1. Mar.
Pist. App.
& alii.
Cic. pro.
Plan. c. 10.
pro Sext.
c. 22.
Plut. in
Mar.

Y. R. 66. companions, with great civility; but whenever they expressed an intention
B. 1. C. 1. to depart, found some pretext or other to detain them, and it was manifest he made those delays with no good design. An accident contributed greatly to their preservation. The hard fortune of young Marius, who was very handsome, nearly touched one of the King's concubines; and this her pity was the beginning of her love, and a veil to cover it. At first, he avoided all engagements with her; but, finding he had no other probable way of making his escape from Numidia, and that her passion was no less generous, than violent, he returned it with kindness; and she, in requital, procured him, and his friends, the means of escaping.
Having joined his father, they left Africa, and sailed for Italy, whither Marius, as was before mentioned, had been invited by Cinna. As soon as they landed, they set about raising soldiers. Marius proclaimed liberty to all slaves that would arm in his quarrel, and, in a short time, got together a considerable body of troops; which was soon after strengthened by 500 of his party from Rome. He then sent a deputation in form to Cinna, offering to serve under him, and obey his orders as Consul. All Cinna's officers, except Sertorius, were of opinion, that Marius should be received.
Sertorius, a great warrior, but prudent and moderate, and who dreaded the revengeful temper of Marius, remonstrated to Cinna, that, without the assistance of Marius, he was powerful enough to triumph over his enemies; that Marius, if received, would rob him of the glory and advantage of the war, and prove a troublesome and unfaithful partner in the government. Cinna owned all this to be very just and solid; but he added, What face can I reject a man, whom I myself have invited to join with me in the war? To which Sertorius replied, I thought Marius had come into Italy of his own accord, and therefore I only considered what, in that case, was expedient to be done. But since he is here by your invitation, you ought not to have even deliberated, whether you are to receive and employ him. Your promise given precludes all consultation and uncertainty.

Cinna hereupon wrote immediately to Marius, gave him the title of Proconsul, and sent him the Fasces, and other badges of that dignity.
Marius would not accept of these honours: he said, they did not suit with his present misfortunes. From the day that he fled from Rome, he had worn an old robe, and neglected his hair and beard; and he walked slowly, like a man oppressed with calamities: but, through the disguise of that doleful countenance, something was discerned so fierce, that he rather created terror, than moved compassion. After he had joined Cinna, they marched together, and encamped on the Tiber: Cinna and Carbo over-against Rome; Sertorius above it; and Marius lower down towards the sea. The last applied himself to cut off all provisions, that were sent up the river to supply the city; and he possessed himself of several of the maritime towns; and, among the rest, of Ostia, which, having

Pl. in Sertor.

Plin. in
M. 1.

App. de
Bell. Civ.
p. 391.
Plin. in
M. 1.
L. 1. c. 1.
App. de
Bell. Civ.
c. 1.

having reduced it by force, he plundered, and massacred the greatest part of the inhabitants. Cinna sent a party of soldiers to take possession of Ariminum, that no assistance might be sent to Rome from Gaul. Appianus Claudius, to whom the guard of Janiculum had been intrusted, received Marius and Cinna into the place; but they were driven out again by Pompeius Strabo, and the Consul Octavius. Strabo being soon after killed by a flash of lightning^{*}, the sole command of the army devolved to Octavius. The incapacity (says Plutarch) of this Consul, was not so detrimental to the public affairs, as was his too scrupulous attachment to the laws: for when they advised him to set the slaves at liberty [in order to make soldiers of them, and prevent their going over to the enemy,] he answered, that he could never give to slaves the privileges of that city, the gates of which he had, in obedience to the laws, shut against Caius Marius.

Y. R. 666.
Bel. Cir.
86.
365 Conf.

Plut. in
Mar.

About this time, Metellus Pius, the son of Numidicus, arrived at Rome. He had lately commanded an army in Samnium, where the Social War was not totally extinguished; and the Senate had desired him to make peace with the Samnites upon any honourable terms, and lead his forces to the defence of his country; but while he hesitated about granting the conditions insisted upon by the enemy, Marius yielded to all their demands, and they joined themselves to his party.

App. loc.
cit.

At Rome, the soldiers of Octavius deserted him, and offered their service to Metellus, who was much the better General; but, upon his reproving them roughly, and ordering them back to the Consul, they went over to Cinna.

Plut. in
Mar.

Marius, in the mean time, reduced Antium, Aricia, Lanuvium, and several other towns, where the Romans had magazines of provisions. After this, the confederate Generals drawing nearer to Rome, Octavius, Crassus, and Metellus, marched out to oppose them, but did not think it advisable to trust the safety of their country to the hazard of a battle. Cinna having proclaimed liberty to all the slaves in the city, who should join him, they flocked to him from thence in crowds. The Senate terrified hereby, and fearing the discontent of the people, who suffered greatly through want of provisions, sent deputies to Cinna to negotiate a peace. His first question to them was, whether they had a commission to treat with him as Consul, or as a private person: and they not giving him a satisfactory answer, could effect nothing. After their return to the city, Cinna advanced and encamped under the walls. Multitudes went over to him, some through fear of famine, others because they favoured his cause, and his nearness gave them an opportunity to escape. The Senate, unwilling to depose Merula, who had been appointed Consul in the room of Cinna, were in great per-

Appian.
P. 392.

^{*} Vell. Pct. reports, that the plague raged in both armies. He adds, that the joy for the death of Perseus was almost balanced by the grief for the loss of so many citizens as died by the sword, or the pestilence.

plexity. But Merula, that he might be no hindrance to the public tranquillity, voluntarily laid down his office; and the Senate immediately dispatched new deputies to Cinna, with orders to acknowledge him as Consul¹. They required no other condition of peace, but his taking an oath, not to put to death any of the citizens. He refused to swear², but gave them his promise, that none should be slain with his knowledge, or consent; and even desired, that the Consul Octavius might leave Rome, lest some misfortune should befall him. Marius was standing next to Cinna's Tribunal. He did not speak a word, but the gloominess of his countenance, and the malice that appeared in his eyes, sufficiently prognosticated, that he would soon fill the city with slaughter.

Shortly after this conference, Cinna entered Rome, surrounded with soldiers, but Marius stopped at the gate, saying angrily, That he was an exile, and forbidden by the laws to enter the City: if therefore they wanted his presence, they must reverse the decree of his banishment. The people accordingly were assembled; but scarce had three or four of the Tribes given their votes, when he, throwing off the mask, entered the city with his guards: a band of about 4000 of the stoutest slaves, whom he had chosen to be ministers of his cruelty. Instantly the gates were shut, that none might escape, and a slaughter ensued, as in a town taken by assault. C. and L. Julius, with many other considerable Senators, were murdered, and, among the rest, Antonius the orator, whose head Marius caused to be fixed upon the Rostra. The Consul Octavius was slain on his tribunal. Ancharius, a man of Prætorian rank, coming to pay his compliments to Marius, was murdered by the guards, because their General took no notice of him; and from that time those slaves made it their practice to murder every man whose salutation Marius did not return: so that even his friends never approached him, but with terror.

In the midst of these murders, Marius assembled the People, and made a speech to them (Cicero tells us, he was himself present, and observed, that the old soldier, far from being dispirited by his adversities, seemed to have the strength of his mind renewed.) When he had recounted the series of his late sufferings, he told the People, that, being now restored to his dignity, and having recovered all that he had lost, it should still be his principal care to preserve that courage and virtue which he had never lost.

After the first fury of slaughter, the tyrants resolved to proceed against some of their enemies, by way of trial. Merula, to avoid an unjust

¹ According to the Epitome of Livy, l. lxxv. the Nobles, forced by the incapacity and treachery of the Generals and Soldiers, who, corrupted by money, either would not fight, or went over to the enemy, received Cinna and Marius into the city ² Appian says, that both Cinna and Marius took an oath not to kill Octavius.

sentence, sentence, caused his veins to be opened. As he was priest of Jupiter, it was not lawful for him to die with the mitre on his head: he therefore left a writing behind him, signifying that, before his death, he had put off that sacred ornament.

Y. R. 666.
Bet. Chr.
86.
365 Conf.

Catulus, the colleague of Marius in the Cimbrian war, smothered himself with the vapour of charcoal. It is reported, that Marius, when the friends of Catulus interceded for him, made no answer but, he must die, he must die.

Some authors say, that Cinna began to cease his cruelties; but that Marius, growing daily more thirsty of blood, proceeded to destroy every man of whom he had the least suspicion; till at length Cinna and Sertorius, having surprised, and surrounded with soldiers, the murderous guards of Marius, put every man of them to death.

Plut. in
Mar. & in Sertor.

Many of the Nobles fled to Sylla, then in Greece: his wife and children likewise, with some difficulty, escaped to him, and he learnt from them, that his enemies had burnt his house, and ravaged his lands.

When the time came for chusing supreme magistrates, Marius and Cinna declared themselves CONSULS, without so much as the form of assembling the Comitia. On the day of their inauguration, Marius caused a Senator, named Sex. Licinius, to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock. His own death soon after put a stop to his cruelties. He died, according to the most probable account, of a pleuritic fever, on the 13th of January, about the seventy-first year of his age.

Y. R. 667.
Bet. Chr.
85.
366 Conf.
Liv. Epit.
l. lxxx.
Vell. Pat.
l. ii. c. 23.

To grace his funeral, C. Fimbria (at this time Quæstor Urbanus) ordered Q. Scævola (the Pontifex Maximus) to be put to death; and hearing afterwards, that he might recover of the wound he had received, summoned him to take his trial before the People. When somebody asked Fimbria, Of what crime he could accuse so good a man? he answered, Of not having received in his body the whole of the weapon with which he was stabbed.

Cic. pro S.
Ros. c. 12.
Val. Max.
l. ix. c. 11.
§ 2.
Vid. Pigh.
ad Ann.
667.

C H A P. XI.

VALERIUS FLACCUS, associated by Cinna in the Consulship for the remainder of the year 667, is likewise appointed by him to succeed to SYLLA's command in Asia.

An account of the progress of Mithridates, after his defeating the three Roman Generals in 665. The arrival of Sylla in Greece in 666. He there vanquishes the armies of Mithridates.

SYLLA passes in Asia, and concludes a peace with the King of Pontus (in 668;) returns into Greece in 669; (being the 4th Consulship of CINNA, and the 3d year of his holding that magistracy by usurpation.) From Athens SYLLA writes a menacing letter to the SENATE, who had suffered him to be declared an exile, and to be loaded with other injuries and indignities.

dignities. In 670, he lands in Italy, totally subdues the Marian faction; and proscribes those of his enemies, who had escaped his sword; and, in 671, he is constituted PERPETUAL DICTATOR.

V. R. 657.

App. P.
195.

Vit. Supr.

P. 123.

H. L. II. c.

18.

Cic. pro.

L. Manil.

c. 3.

App. in Mithridat.

P. 183.

Val. Max.

I. II. c. 2.

App. in Mithridat.

P. 186.

Cic. 2. in

V. T. c.

65.

App. in Mithridat.

P. 186. &

Eq.

Plut. in

Sylla.

Posidon.

ap. Athen.

S. 13.

ON the death of Marius, Cinna chose L. Valerius Flaccus to be his colleague in the Consulship, appointing him to succeed Sylla in the conduct of the war against Mithridates^{*}, and giving him Fimbria for his lieutenant.

We left Mithridates, in 665, victorious over the Roman armies in Asia Propria, and master of all that country, and the islands adjacent, except Rhodes. This prince, a second Hannibal in his hatred to the Romans, dispatched circular letters throughout Asia, directing, that the people, on a certain day, should massacre all the Italians that were in that country; men, women, and children, freemen, and slaves: and that the effects of the slain should be disposed of, part to his own treasury, and part to the assassins; and he forbade the people, under pain of death, to spare the life of any Italian, or to bury him, when dead. Fourscore thousand[†] of that nation perished in this massacre; and the cruelty, with which the Asiatics executed the vengeance of Mithridates, shewed plainly (says Appian) that they were actuated more by hatred to the Romans, than fear of the King.

After this he attacked Rhodes, by sea and land, with all his forces; but miscarried in the enterprize[‡]. To hinder the Romans from entering Asia, he resolved to transport the war into Europe. With this view he sent his youngest son (called by some Arctasias, by others, Ariarathes) with a powerful army, through Thrace into Macedon. Arbelaus, the ablest of his Generals, he commissioned to go with a fleet to Greece, in order to bring over to his party, the people of that country, either by persuasion or force; and dispatched Metropbanes, another of his Generals, into Eubœa, and to the sea-coast of Thessaly.

The Athenians (we are not told for what cause) had been condemned to a fine by the Romans, and their magistrates forbidden to exercise their functions: and Aristion, an Epicurean philosopher, whom they had sent on an embassy to Mithridates, being gained by that monarch, had exhorted them to side with the King; assuring them, that the popular government should be restored, and that not only the public would be benefited, sited, but private persons would reap great advantages from the alliance of so powerful, and so generous a Prince. The people, dazzled with these prospects, gave a favourable answer, and the chief men of the city, finding themselves unable to restrain the madness of the multitude, passed into Italy, and took refuge in Rome.

^{*} The King of Pontus, by seizing the effects of the Publicans, and of all other Italians in Asia, had occasioned an almost universal bankruptcy in Rome. Valerius, before he set out upon his expedition, published a law, importing, that the debtors should not be obliged to pay to their creditors, more than one quarter of the principal sums they owed. Cic. pro L. Manil. c. 7. Fell. Pat. l. II. c. 23.

[†] Plut. (in Sylla) makes the number amount to 150,000.

[‡] Cic. (loc. cit.) tells us, that notwithstanding the Rhodians were besieged by Mithridates, and that they particularly hated him; yet they did not demolish a statue, which they had formerly erected to him in the most conspicuous part of their town.

Archelaus subdued the island Delos, which had revolted from the Atbenians, slew there 20,000 men, most of them Italians, and plundered the temple of Apollo^b. The island he restored to the Atbenians, and deposited in their city the booty he had taken. But under pretence of guarding it, he sent along with it 2000 soldiers, by whose assistance Aristion assumed to himself the chief power in Atbens, and put to death, or delivered up to Mithridates, all the citizens that adhered to the Romans. Archelaus likewise brought over to his master's interest, the Acbeans, the Lacedemonians, and the Bæotians, and reduced the Cyclades, and all the other islands, as far as the promontory of Malea. At the same time Metrophanes landed in Eubæa, and, soon after, pillaged the territories of Demetrius and Magnesia. Some say, that Bruttius Sura, the lieutenant of Sentius, Prætor of Macedon, not only attacked Metrophanes, and drove him out of the country but gained three victories over Archelaus (or, according to some, fought with him three days successively with equal advantage) and forced him to confine himself to his fleet.

Sylla [in the year of Rome 666] arrived in Greece with five legions and some Italian cohorts. Having received supplies of men and money from Ætolia and Thessaly, he marched into Attica against Archelaus. In his way, almost all the Bæotians submitted to him, with the same readiness they had declared for Mithridates. Soon after, the other towns of Greece, except Atbens, dispatched deputies to him, offering to put themselves under his protection. Lucullus, whom he had sent before him, obliged Sentius to retire into Macedon; and the General, on his arrival, left part of his forces to besiege Atbens; while he himself went to attack the Piræus (the port of that city) where Archelaus had shut himself up.

Atbens was divided into two parts; the one called Cecropia, from its founder Cecrops; the other Atbens, from the Greek * name of Minerva, its protectress. They were separated only by a wall, and one common rampart enclosed them. On the west side of the city ran the Cephisus; on the east the Ilissus. Phalerum had been anciently the port of Atbens, till the time of Themistocles, who, finding a bay near the Cephisus, more large and commodious, built there the port Piræus. Pericles raised walls about it forty cubits high, and of a very extraordinary thickness; and on each side the road, five miles in length, between it and the city, he ^b Pausanias (in Lacon. c. 23.) ascribes these actions to another of Mithridates's Generals, named Meatbanes.

Y. R. 667.
Bef. Chr.
85.
366 Conf.

Cic. in
Brut. c.
89.
App. Mi-
thrid. p.
188.
Id. p. 139.

Plut. in Sylla.

App. p.
190.

Plut. in
Sylla.

Plin. lvi.
c. 56.
* Ἀθήνη.

Cor. Nep.
in Them.
App. Mi-
thrid. p.
190.

built a strong wall. Athens had also another port, called Munychia, less than the Piræus: it was nearer the town, encompassed with the sea, and well fortified.

Sylla, at first, thought to carry the Piræus by assault: but being repulsed by Archelaus, he retired to Eleusis and Megara, between Athens and Ceræra, in order to build towers and engines for carrying on the siege in form. For this work he cut down the sacred woods about Athens, and the trees of the fine walks belonging to the academy*, and the Lyceum. He demolished the long walls that joined the Piræus to the city, and turned them into ramparts, upon which he erected his engines. So great were his preparations, that, for the service of the engines alone, he kept 20,000 mules constantly employed. And, as he wanted large sums of money for carrying on the war, he sent to the council of the Amphictyons, or deputies, from the states of Greece, then assembled at Delphi, and desired they would send him the riches of Apollo's temple in that place; adding, that the treasure would be safer with him, or, if he should be obliged to make use of it, he would take care to return the value. To receive this treasure by weight, he sent one of his friends, named Caphis, who, being unwilling to violate the holy place, wrote to Sylla, that, on his arrival at Delphi, the sound of Apollo's lyre had been heard from the sanctuary: thinking to terrify the General with an apprehension of the anger of the God. The Proconsul returned answer, that he much wondered Caphis had not made the just reflection on what had happened: that music was a sign of joy and not of anger: that therefore he might boldly take away the treasure, and be well assured that the God was kind, and offered it. It was accordingly delivered up to Caphis, nor did the inhabitants of Olympia and Epidaureus dare to refuse him the consecrated treasures in the temples of Jupiter and Æsculapius.

App. P.
151.

Frontin.
Strabon. l.
1. c. 1. §
57.

Sylla, having finished his works, renewed the siege of the Piræus. Archelaus neglected nothing that could conduce to the defence of the place, or to the annoyance of the besiegers. Upon the walls he erected moveable towers, equal in height to those used by Sylla; sent for a reinforcement of troops from Chalcis, and the Greek islands; armed the mariners of his fleet; and, in a general sally by night, repulsed the Romans, and burnt one of their galleries (they had but two) with all its appurtenances. Sylla punished some of the cohorts, which had given ground, by obliging them, in the next engagement, to fight in the van, without shoes, and with their clothes ungirt; and, as for the damage done to the

* The academy was a part of the Ceræra which was at the city, from which it was distant about six furlongs. It was the place where Plato and his followers held their lectures. Hipparchus, the son of Pisistratus, surrounded it with a wall. The Lyceum was situate on the banks of the Ilissus, and sacred to Apollo Lycæus, from whence it had its name. There Aristotle and the Peripateticks taught.

engines, engines, it was repaired in ten days time. Archelaus therefore made a second eruption upon the works. The attack was brisk, but, by the obstinate resistance of those cohorts, which had recoiled in the last action, and by the singular bravery of Muræna, a Legionary Tribune, the Asiatics were at length forced to retire, after a loss of near 2000 men. Their General staid so long without the gates, endeavouring to stop the run-aways, that he was shut out, and had been taken prisoner, if the besieged had not expeditiously drawn him up by a cord to the top of the wall.

Winter now came on, which obliged Sylla to abate somewhat of his ardour, and retire to Eleusis. The siege, however, was continued, and frequent skirmishes happened between the Romans and the Asiatics.

All this while, Athens was so closely shut up, that it could receive no supplies of provisions, and there was a great scarcity in the town. Ariston, nevertheless, spent his time in debauchery and feasting with his companions, and is said to have railed from the walls at the Proconsul and his beloved wife Metella. Archelaus had plenty of every thing in the Piræus, because he commanded the harbour; and Mithridates's fleet, commanding the seas frequently cut off Sylla's provisions. To remedy this evil, the Roman sent his Quæstor Lucullus with five ships, in the middle of winter, to Rhodes, and the east, to get together a fleet. The Rhodians durst not put to sea, for fear of meeting with the ships of Mithridates: the Quæstor therefore sailed to Egypt, to ask assistance of Ptolemy; but the King would enter into no alliance with Sylla, lest he should thereby draw the war into his own country. Lucullus, however, was furnished with a considerable number of ships from the maritime towns of Syria.

It has been already mentioned, that Mithridates sent his youngest son with an army through Thrace into Macedon. The young prince, joined by a multitude of Thracians, drove out of the last mentioned country, the few Romans he found there, subdued it totally, and then marched to oppose Sylla; but died on the way, at Tidæum. The approach of this army made the Proconsul redouble his efforts to reduce Athens and the Piræus. Archelaus made repeated attempts to supply the city with provisions; but the Romans never failed to disappoint him: for they had always timely notice of his designs. Two slaves in the Piræus, either out of inclination for the Romans, or from a view to their own safety, wrote the resolutions of the besieged on balls of lead, which they threw by slings into the enemies camp. The Asiatic General, finding the Romans always ready, concluded he was betrayed. To draw the best advantage, therefore, from the treachery, he caused a sally to be made upon the besiegers, at the same time that he sent out a convoy of provisions for Athens. The success answered his expectation; Sylla became master of the convoy: but the garrison burnt several of the Roman engines. The rest of the Roman works Archelaus endeavoured to destroy by sap, but his purpose being

Y. R. 167. discovered by the tottering of one of the engines, the Romans immediately withdrew it, and filled up the hollow. After this example, they fell to digging in their turn, and the pioneers of the two parties frequently met, and fought under ground. At length the besiegers found means to undermine the wall in several places; but supported it with timbers, from which timbers, to the entrance of the mine, they laid a train of sulphur, pitch, and other combustible matter. After this, when they had made a breach above with their battering rams, Sylla led his men to the assault, ordering fire to be put to the combustible matter in the mine. Very soon the wall came tumbling down in several places; and, during the consternation of the besieged, the Romans lodged themselves in the breaches, and burnt one of Archelaus's towers. But he, encouraging his soldiers, and bringing fresh men to succeed those who had given way, made so obstinate a defence, that all the bravery and skill of Sylla proved ineffectual to get possession of the place. The Roman, after a long attack, sounded a retreat, in order to give his weary troops some repose. The garrison, in the night, built up another wall, not exactly on the foundations of the old one, but in the form of several crescents; the horns projecting towards the enemy. Next day Sylla attempted, with all his forces, to destroy this work; imagining it might easily be done, while new and unsettled. However, he met with so warm a reception from the garrison, especially that part of it which defended the horns of the crescents, and galled his flank, that he was forced to give over his enterprize. And being, doubtless, convinced, that it was impracticable to take the Piræus with the troops he then had before it, he contented himself with keeping it blocked up on the land-side, and turned his chief efforts against Athens; purposing, when he should be master of the city, to bring more forces to the attack of the port.

Plut. in Sylla.

Dio Cass.
47. V. 16.

Plut. in
Sylla.

The city was already in the utmost distress for want of provisions. Aristion alone, and the companions of his tyranny, enjoyed plenty, while the citizens were reduced to feed upon horses, dogs, boiled leather, and the herbs that grew on old walls. The tyrant had even the inhumanity to insult the people in this extremity, to which he himself had brought them. He refused to give a little oil, to supply the sacred lamp which fed the perpetual fire in Minerva's temple; and when the high priestess desired of him, in her great indigence, half a bushel of barley, he sent her, in derision, that quantity of pepper. The excessive misery of the Athenians constrained them to petition their tyrant, that he would come to an accommodation with the Romans. Their Priests and Senators, in a body, went to him with this request, but he insolently caused them to be driven from his presence with blows. However, when at length Sylla appeared before the town, Aristion seeing no way to escape, was prevailed upon to send a deputation to him. The men he chose for that commission, were two or three of the companions of his debauchery.

These,

These, when admitted by the Proconsul to an audience, instead of making any proposal tending to the preservation of the city, began a pompous harangue in praise of Theseus and Eumolpus, and the exploits of the Athenians against the Persians. Sylla, tired with their impertinence, bad them be gone with their rhetoric; adding, the Roman People have not sent me hither to school, but to punish Rebels.

V. R. 657.
Bel. Cnr.
85.
366 Conf.

During this conference, some old men of the Athenians were overheard, in the Ceramicus without the city, blaming the tyrant for neglecting to guard a weak part of the wall, opposite to a place, called the Heptachalchos. The Roman General, being informed of this, went to view the wall; and finding the place accessible in that part, made an assault in the night of the first of March, and succeeded.

No sooner was he master of the town, than, by his order, the soldiers put to the sword all the inhabitants that fell in their way; without distinction of sex or age. Such a quantity of blood was spilt in the streets, that it flowed out of the gates. Many of the Athenians, believing their native city was going to be destroyed, killed themselves, that they might not survive its ruin. Aristion with some of his adherents, retired into the citadel, but it was not long before want of water constrained him to surrender at discretion. The first fury against the Athenians being now abated, Sylla, at the request of Midias and Calliphon, two Athenian exiles, and of all the Roman Senators in his camp, spared the rest of the citizens, saying, that he pardoned the living for the sake of the dead; meaning the great men which Athens had produced. Nevertheless, he deprived the Athenians of the privileges of chusing their own magistrates, and making laws. He also condemned to death Aristion, together with his counsellors, his generals, and all the ministers of his tyranny; but the execution of the tyrant was deferred till another time.

App. Mithrid.
p. 195.
Plut. in Sylla.

The Piræus still remained to be reduced. Sylla led all his forces against it, and Archelaus defended it with his wonted courage, and ability. According to Florus, Sylla beat down the wall six times, and Archelaus as often restored it. Necessity, however, at length, compelled the brave Asiatic to abandon the place: and he then retired to the port of Munychia. The Romans demolished the fortifications of the Piræus, and burnt the store-houses, together with the magnificent arsenal built by Philo.

App. Mithrid.
p. 196.
Florus, l. iii. c. 5.

Archelaus soon quitted Munychia, and went into Boeotia, and from thence into Theffaly. There he assembled all the Asiatic troops that were in Greece, and sent for the army of Archatbius, now under Taxiles, to come and join him. Taxiles obeyed, and Archelaus took upon him the chief command of all the forces, which consisted of 100,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and 90 chariots of war. Sylla, from Attica, marched into Boeotia, to meet the enemy. This he was blamed for, because the vast plains of Boeotia were much more convenient for the cavalry and chariots of the barbarians, App. loc. cit.

Plut. in Sylla.

barbarians, in which their chief strength consisted, than the rough and rocky country about Athens. But Sylla wanted provisions; and Attica, naturally barren, and now ruined by war, could not subsist his army. Besides, he was in anxiety for a body of troops, which, by his order, Hortensius was bringing to him from Thessaly. Hortensius, under the guidance of Cephis, escaped the enemy, who endeavoured to intercept him; and, passing over mount Parnassus, joined Sylla at the foot of it. Plutarch says, the proconsular army consisted of no more than 15,000 foot, and 1500 horse. According to Appian, it did not amount (auxiliaries included) to a third part of the Asiatics. Sylla posted himself on an eminence in the middle of the plains of Elatea, and in sight of the enemy. Archelaus, notwithstanding his superiority of numbers, did not think it prudent to hazard a general action; nevertheless, being prevailed upon by the pressing instances of his officers, he drew out his forces, and offered battle. The Roman General would have accepted the challenge; but could neither by remonstrances, nor intreaties, spirit up his men to fight; they were so terrified at the sight of the enormous multitude of the barbarians*. These, on the other hand, despising their enemies, quitted their camp in large companies, without leave of their commander, and went roaming about the country to pillage. Sylla, in the mean time, employed his soldiers in the most laborious and difficult works; that he might bring them to demand the fight, rather than submit to such drudgery. After three days, they called out to be led to battle. Sylla answered, You are only weary of labour. If you really desire to fight, arm yourselves immediately, and seize that post; pointing to a steep rock at the confluence of the Cephisus and Ajissus. Archelaus had already detached a body of his troops to take possession of that rock. The Romans obeyed their General, and, by their diligence, prevented the enemy. On this disappointment the Asiatics decamped, and marched to Chæronea, thinking to surprize it: But Sylla again prevented them, and threw into the town a Roman Legion, under the command of Gabinus. Archelaus encamped in the neighbourhood of Chæronea, in a place difficult of access, and overlooked by a steep hill, called Tburium; where he posted a large detachment. The Roman General followed him, and soon after sent off a party of soldiers under the guidance of some Chæroneans, to dislodge the enemy from Tburium. In the mean time, he drew up his forces in order of battle, and Archelaus did the like. While the two armies stood fronting each other, the Roman detachment, which by a private road, had mounted unseen to the top of the hill, drove from it the Asiatics, who, in their flight, falling in among their own men, put them into disorder. Instantly Sylla advanced, and with so much diligence, that he allowed no opportunity, no space, for their chariots to act. Their efforts were so weak, that, according to Plutarch, the Romans, who had easily repelled them, called out for more, as they used to do at the chariot races in the Circus. The historians have left us a very confused description of this battle: the victory they unanimously ascribe to Sylla. Of the numerous forces of Archelaus, we are told, that only about 10,000 escaped with their General to Chalcis; but what is yet more incredible, Plutarch, Appian, and Eutropius, makes the loss on the side of the Romans to amount, the first to twelve, the second to thirteen, and the last to fourteen men. It would seem, that Sylla invented this fable himself: for in some Memoirs of his, quoted by Plutarch, he wrote, that, after the battle, he missed only fourteen of his men, two of whom returned to the camp before night.

* According to Appian, Archelaus, so soon as the two armies came near enough to each other, offered battle, and Sylla declined it.

In honour of this victory, he celebrated musical games at Thebes, and sent to the neighbouring towns for judges to determine to whom the prizes should be given: for such was his hatred to the Thebans, that he would admit none of them to be judges; and what doubtless they felt more severely, he took from them half their lands, and allotted the produce to the payment of the money, of which he had robbed the temples of Jupiter and Apollo.

Scarce were the games over, when he received intelligence, that the Consul Valerius Flaccus was crossing the Ionian sea with an army, in order to divest him of his authority, and assume the conduct of the war against Mitridates. The Proconsul marched directly to oppose him, and in Thessaly was joined by some troops, which Valerius had sent before him to take possession of that country. Hearing of this defection, the Consul sailed to the Hellespont, with a view to pass that way into Asia. At the same time Sylla turned his arms against Dorylaeus, one of Mitridates's Generals, who had just entered Greece at the head of 80,000 men, and was ravaging Boeotia in conjunction with Archelaus. The latter endeavoured to dissuade Dorylaeus from hazarding a pitched battle with the Romans, but with little effect, till some unsuccessful skirmishes convinced him, that his colleague judged rightly. They then retired before the enemy, and encamped near Orchomenos, in a vast plain watered by the river Melas, which, at a little distance, spreads itself in several muddy marshes covered with reeds. So advantageous a situation induced the Asiatics to venture a battle. Sylla took measures to render this advantage useless to them. That he might not be surrounded, and that he might secure his wings, he caused several broad trenches^a to be dug in the plain, and at the extremities of these trenches raised little forts to defend the approaches.

^a According to Plutarch, Sylla drew those trenches to enclose the enemy between him and the marshes, so that they might not have room to employ their numerous cavalry; and their endeavour to hinder the works brought on the battle.

Y. R. 667.
Bef. Chr.
85
366 Conf.

Plut. App.
Lib. Ep.
Lucop.

Plut. in Sylla.

App. Mi-
thrid.
p. 204.

Plut. in Sylla.

Frontin.
Stratag. l.
ii. c. 3. § 17.
App. Mi-
thrid.
p. 202.

Y. R. 685. On the day of battle, the Assians ranged their chariots in the front; their phalanxes in the second line; the auxiliaries and Lithian deserters all armed after the Roman manner in the third line; and their light troops in the rear: their numerous cavalry were placed on the wings.

Sylla drew up his infantry in three lines, leaving spaces between the battalions, that the cavalry, which he posted in the rear, might have room to advance to the charge. Before the second line, he caused a great number of stakes to be fixed in the ground, to stop the progress of the chariots; and gave orders to the soldiers of the first line to retire behind those stakes, when the chariots approached. Victory declared for Sylla. Having killed 15,000 of the enemy, he pursued them to their camp, and forced it. We hear no more of Dorylaus. As for Archelaus, we are told, that he hid himself two days, in the marshes, and then found a bark which carried him to Eubœa, where he assembled all the Asiatic troops, that remained in Greece.

Mithridates, in the mean time, by his cruelties in Asia, had occasioned Ephesus, Tralles, and several other cities to revolt from him. Those which he reduced by force, he punished with great severity; but fearing a general defection, he proclaimed liberty to the Greek cities, remitted to the debtors the payment of what they owed to their creditors, and gave to all slaves and strangers the freedom of the cities, in which they lived. Hearing of the defeat of his army at Orchomenos, he sent orders to Archelaus to make peace with Sylla, on the best conditions he could obtain. Archelaus immediately dispatched a messenger to propose a treaty. Sylla very willingly consented; for he had neither ships nor money to carry on the war, and longed impatiently to be in Italy, that he might revenge himself upon his enemies, who tyrannized in that country.

Y. R. 685. Cinna, without the formality of holding the Comitia, had declared himself Consul for the third time, and appointed Cn. Papirius Carbo to be his colleague in that office.

The Asiatic General knowing these things, proposed, in a conference which ensued, that Sylla should leave Mithridates in possession of Asia and Pontus, and return to Italy, there to put an end to the civil war, to which end, the king, he said, would supply him with men, money and ships.

On the other hand, Sylla advised Archelaus to desert Mithridates, deliver up his fleet to the Romans, and declare himself king in his stead: On which condition he offered him the title of Friend and Ally of the Senate and People of Rome. Archelaus expressing his detestation of such treachery, Sylla replied, If you, a Capitegian, and the slave, or, if you will, the friend of a barbarian King, refuse, for so great a reward, to commit a base action, how dare you make treasonable proposals to a Roman General—to Sylla? Have you forgot, that you are the same Archelaus who fled from Chæronœa with a handful of men, the remains of 120,000 soldiers? That you afterwards hid yourself two days in the marshes of Orchomenos,
and

and that Bœotia is now rendered inaccessible by the heaps of your slaughtered troops with which its plains are covered? Archelaus, then changing tone, begged of the Roman to grant peace to Mitbridates. Sylla consenting, these terms were agreed upon.

Y.R. 652.
Bef. Chr.
84.
367 Cons.

The King was to relinquish Asia and Papblagonia; give up Bithynia to Nicomedes, and Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes; pay the Romans 2000 talents for the expences of the war, and deliver to them 70 gallies with all their rigging.

On the other hand, Sylla was to confirm Mitbridates in the possession of his other dominions, and procure him the title of Friend and Ally of Rome.

These articles were sent, without delay to the King of Pontus, to be by him ratified. Then Sylla set out for Macedon, in his way to the Hellespont, and took with him Archelaus, who falling sick at Larissa, he stopped the march of the army to wait his recovery, expressing the same tender regard for him, as if he had been his colleague, or his intimate friend. He also gave him 10,000 acres of land in Eubœa, and honoured him with the title of the Friend and Ally of Rome; and though the Proconsul set at liberty all the other prisoners that were friends of Mitbridates, yet he put to death Aristion, because he was at enmity with Archelaus. Such extraordinary kindness to this General raised a suspicion, that he had betrayed the Asiatics at the battle of Chæronea. Mitbridates himself, in a letter to Arfaces, king of the Parthians, speaking of these times, says expressly, that Archelaus, the most unworthy of his servants, had ruined his affairs, by betraying his army. The easy victory which the lust. l. v.

Frag. Sal-

* Appian gives a different account of this conference. According to him, Archelaus thus addressed Sylla: "King Mitbridates, who inherits his father's friendship for Rome, was compelled to make war against her by the covetousness of other Generals, whom she employed; but now having had experience of your virtue, he sues to you for peace, provided you require nothing but what is equitable."

Sylla answered:

"Mitbridates ought first to have sent ambassadors to complain of injuries; but, instead of that, he injuriously invaded the territories of other powers, slaughtered multitudes of people, plundered the public treasuries and the temples, and seized the possessions of the slain. Nor has he acted with more fidelity or moderation, with regard to his own friends, than to us. Many of those he has put to death without cause. And he discovered an in-

"veterate hatred to us, not any necessity of making war, when he exercised all manner of cruelties upon the Italians of Asia, without distinction of sex or age. Such was the hatred of this hereditary friend of Rome to the Roman name: nor did he think of that friendship, till I had destroyed 160,000 of his men. Equity, therefore, does not demand that we should receive him into an alliance; yet, for your sake, I promise that the Romans shall forgive him, if he sincerely repents. But, if he still dissembles, I advise you, Archelaus, to reflect upon the present situation of his affairs, and of your own; and to consider, how he uses to treat his friends, and how we acted towards Eumenes and Masinissa."

Archelaus, offended at this intimation, replied with heat, "Peace may be concluded upon reasonable terms; I will never betray the forces intrusted to me."

Y.R. 668.
Bef. Chr.
84.
35- Conf

Romans obtained, at Cbaronea, over the numerous forces of Archelaus, who had fought so bravely in Asia, and so stoutly defended the Piræus; his giving battle in a place where his troops had not room to act; and Sylla's dexterity in corrupting his adversaries with money (an art to which his success in war seems to have been chiefly owing) make the story of Archelaus's treachery not improbable^a.

Pto. in
Sylla.

Whilst the Proconsul stayed at Larissa, ambassadors from Mitridates arrived there, and informed him, that their master approved of all the other articles of the treaty, but would by no means part with Paphlagonia, or the seventy galleys demanded. To this Sylla, in great anger, What! Mithridates refuses to give up Paphlagonia and the ships! He, who I thought would have fallen at my feet, and thanked me for leaving him that right-hand, with which he has massacred so many Roman citizens! He'll speak in another tone, when I am in Asia. At present let him sit at Pergamus, and form projects for a war which he has not seen^b.

The ambassadors, confounded, did not answer a word; but Archelaus, taking Sylla by the hand, begged of him to moderate his anger. At length he obtained leave to go to the King, promising to return with the ratification of the treaty, or to kill himself in his master's presence.

App. Mi-
thridat.
p. 207.
Pto. in
Sylla.

In the mean time, Sylla, to keep the troops in exercise, and enrich them with spoil, turned his arms against the Medi and Dardani, nations bordering upon Macedon: and pillaged their country.

Archelaus, at his return, acquainted the Proconsul, that the peace would be concluded on the terms he had proposed, but that Mitridates earnestly desired a conference with him. The reason why the King desired this conference, was to procure the assistance of Sylla against Fimbria, who made war upon him with great vigour.

App. loc.
cit.
Liv. Epit.
l. lxxxiii.
Dio. Cass.
ap. Val.

Fimbria, a good soldier, but an execrable villain, had (as was before mentioned) been by Cinna appointed lieutenant to Valerius Flaccus, a man extremely covetous, and disagreeable to the soldiers. The last year, when the army arrived in Asia, Fimbria, on occasion of a quarrel between him and the Quæstor, was displaced by Valerius, and his office given to the Quæstor. Fimbria resenting this, stirred up the soldiers to sedition, murdered the General, and put himself at the head of ^a According to Appian (Mitbrid. p. 214.) the King growing jealous of Archelaus, as if, in the treaty of peace, he had yielded too much to Sylla, the Cappadocian, thereupon, deserted to Marene (whom Sylla had left at the head of the Roman forces in Asia) and persuaded him to renew the war against the King of Pontus. Plutarch likewise (in Lucull.) says, that Archelaus deserted to the Romans.

^b The report of the ambassadors, according to Appian, was, that Mitridates consented to every thing but the cession of Paphlagonia; and they added, "That the King could have obtained better terms from Fimbria" [then at the head of the forces, which the Marian faction had sent into Asia under Valerius Flaccus.] Sylla, angry at the comparison, answered; "Fimbria shall be punished; and when I come into Asia, I shall see whether Mitridates chuses peace or war." App. Mitbrid. p. 207.

the forces. He afterwards defeated in battle one of Mithridates's sons, forced the King himself to quit Pergamus, and then besieged him in Pitanes, a maritime town, whither he had fled. At this time, Lucullus, Sylla's Quæstor, returning from Syria with a fleet, Fimbria sent to him, desiring he would block up Pitanes by sea, and share the glory of finishing the war, by taking the King of Pontus prisoner; a glory which, he said, would far outshine the boasted victories of Sylla at Chæronea and Orchomenos. It is said, that Lucullus, either unwilling to act without authority from his General, or to enter into a confederacy with so infamous a man as Fimbria, refused to join in the enterprize, and gave the King time to make his escape. Be that as it will, Mithridates got safe to Mitylene in Lesbos.

Y.R. 668.
App. Mithridat.
p. 205.
Plut. in Lucull.

After the King's flight, Fimbria ravaged the country at pleasure, committing every where excessive cruelties*. The inhabitants of Ilium, fearing the same treatment with their neighbours, surrendered themselves to Sylla, by deputies whom they sent to him: whereupon he sent to Fimbria not to attempt any thing against that town. Fimbria, nevertheless, having, by force or fraud, got admission into the place, put all the inhabitants he met with to the sword, demolished the walls, and burnt the houses. Next day he went round it, to see that nothing was left standing^b. It is also said that he put to death, by torture, the messengers whom Sylla had sent to him.

Dio. Cass.
ap. Vales.
App. loc.
cit.
Liv. Epit.
l. lxxxiii.

To reduce this violent outrageous enemy, and to plunder Asia, Sylla hastened into that country, having first ordered Lucullus to sail to the Hellepont, thereby to secure the passage of the army. When he had reached Dardanus, Mithridates arrived there with 200 galleys, and an army of 26,000 men. At the conference which ensued, the King, approaching the Roman Proconsul, held out his hand to him, as a token of friendship. Sylla, before he made any return to that civility, asked him, whether he accepted of the peace, on the conditions to which Archelaus had agreed. The King making no answer, Sylla continued: It belongs to suppliants to speak; conquerors may be silent, if they please. Then the King began to justify his own conduct, laying the blame of the war upon the avarice of the Roman Generals, who had deprived him of Phrygia, and stirred up Nicomedes against him. Sylla, at length, interrupting him, said, I have often heard, Mithridates, that you are very eloquent, but now I am convinced

Plut. in Sylla.

App. Mithridat.
p. 208.

Plut. in Sylla.

* Dio. Cass. (ap. Vales. 653.) reports, that Fimbria having ordered some wretches to be whipped to death, and having observed, on the day of execution, that there were more posts fixed in the ground, than persons condemned, caused some of the spectators to be seized, and whipt at those supernumerary posts, that they might not seem to have been set up to no purpose.

^b The Palladium (says Appian) it is thought was found entire among the rubbish. Some chuse rather to believe, that Diomedes and Ulysses took it away in the time of the Trojan war. The historian calls the Palladium, the shrine of Minerva.

Y.R. 668. of it by my own experience, since you can give such plausible colours to the App. in loc. cit. most unjust and enormous actions. And when he had put the King in mind, that the Roman Senate had annulled the bargain made between his father and Aquilius about Pbrugia: that Nicomedes complained of his having assisted Socrates to invade Bitbynia, and therefore had a right to make reprisals; and that Mitbridates should have carried his complaints to the Senate, and waited for their answer before he began hostilities: he added, App. p. 209. "but, granting you had a right to defend yourself against Nicomedes, what "injury had Ariobarzanes done you, that you should divest him of his "kingdom? your opposing his restoration, brought upon you this war;
 "a war which you had long before meditated; for you hoped, that,
 "when you had conquered the Romans, you should make yourself master "of the whole world, and therefore sought an occasion of quarrel with "them. This is undeniably clear from hence, that, before the war "began, you made alliances with the Thracians, Scythians, and Sarma"tians, solicited the neighbouring Kings, built a fleet, and provided "yourself with pilots and masters of ships; but your designs are dis"covered, chiefly by the time in which they broke out; for when "you found that our allies in Italy had revolted from us, you laid hold "of that opportunity, attacked Ariobarzanes and Nicomedes, the Gallo-"greeks, and Papblagonia, and even our province of Asia. Not content "with this, you carried your arms into Europe, though, by the decrees
 "of the Senate, the Asiatic Kings were forbid to hold any thing there.
 "You over-ran Macedon, and deprived the Greeks of their liberty: nor "did you repent of these actions, till I had delivered Greece and Macedon "from your violences, and cut off many thousands of your men. I won"der you now attempt to excuse, what you before asked pardon for, by App. p. 210. "Archelaus. Perhaps, you were afraid of me when at a distance, but "now, when I am present, imagine I am come to hear a trial, a cause "pleaded. The time for trials and pleadings is over: the affair is sub"jected to the determination of war: a war, in which you are the aggres-
 "sor, and we upon the defensive; and, as we have strenuously defended "ourselves hitherto, we shall continue to do so to the end." The King, terrified at this angry speech, declared, that he ratified the PEACE^b

ON

Confid. sur les Causes, &c. c. 7. ^b Concerning Mitbridates, the ingenious and judicious M. Montesquieu writes thus:
 "Of the many Kings whom the Romans "attacked, Mitbridates was the only one "who made a courageous defence, and "brought them into danger.
 "His dominions were situated most ad"vantageously for a war with Rome, they "reached to the inaccessible country of "Mount Caucasus, inhabited by a fierce and "savage people, whom that prince could "call to his assistance: from thence they "extended along the sea of Pontus, which "was covered with his ships, and he was "incessantly purchasing new armies of Scy-"thians; Asia lay open to his invasions, and

 "he was rich, because the inhabitants of his "maritime cities carried on an advantage"ous traffic with nations less industrious than "they.

" Pro-

on the conditions settled by Archelaus. Hereupon Sylla embraced him, and made a reconciliation between him and the two kings, Ariobarzanes and Nicomedes. Y.R. 668.

How advantageous soever this treaty was to the Roman General, his soldiers complained, that he had suffered the greatest enemy of the Roman name to depart in peace, loaded with the spoils of Asia. Sylla, to justify his conduct, represented to them, that he should not have been strong enough to resist Mitbridates and Fimbria, had they joined against him. Some days after he marched towards Fimbria, who lay encamped under the walls of Tbyatira in Lydia; and on his arrival in the neighbourhood, sent him a summons to deliver up the command of an army which he held contrary to Law. Fimbria answered him sharply, that his own authority was not very legal; but his soldiers deserting in great numbers to Sylla, and those who remained with him refusing to take the military oath, he hired a slave to murder Sylla; and this attempt

Plut. in
Sylla.

App. Mi-
thridat.
p. 210.

“ Proscriptions, the custom of which began at this time, had forced several Romans to leave their country. These were received by Mitbridates with open arms, and he formed Legions, into which he incorporated those exiles, who proved the best soldiers in his army.

[“ The cities of Greece and Asia, finding the Roman yoke grow more intolerable every day, reposed their whole confidence in this barbarian king, who invited them to liberty.]

“ On the other side, the Romans, distressed by intestine divisions, and threatened with more imminent dangers, neglected the affairs of Asia, and suffered Mitbridates to pursue his victories, or take breath after his defeats.

“ Nothing had contributed more to the ruin of most kings, than the manifest desire they shewed for PEACE: by this, they had prevented all other nations from sharing with them in a danger, from which they were so anxious to extricate themselves. But Mitbridates immediately made the whole world sensible, that he was an enemy to the Romans, and would be so eternally.” The author, when he penned these last words, had probably in his mind the massacre of the Italians in Asia.

Dr. Middleton speaks to the same effect in his Life of Cicero.

“ The Italian war was no sooner ended, than another broke out, which, though

“ at a great distance from Rome, was one of the most difficult and desperate, in which it ever was engaged, against Mitbridates, king of Pontus; a martial and powerful prince, of a restless spirit and ambition, with a capacity equal to the greatest designs; who disdaining to see all his hopes blasted by the overbearing power of Rome, and confined to the narrow boundary of his hereditary dominion, broke through his barrier at once, and over-ran the Lesser Asia, like a torrent, and, in one day, caused eighty thousand Roman Citizens to be massacred in cold blood. His forces were answerable to the vastness of his attempt, and the INEXPIABLE WAR, that he had now declared against the Republic.” Midd. Life of Cicero, vol. i. p. 21.

What is here said, by these two excellent writers, concerning the purpose of Mitbridates, in massacring so many thousand Italians in cool blood, seems very well founded; that is to say, it was probably the king's intention at the time of his committing that massacre, that the neighbouring states, and all the world, should understand it as his declaration of an INEXPIABLE WAR against the Romans. However, from the ignominious terms of peace to which he submitted by his treaty with Sylla, he soon forfeited all the benefit he could possibly have promised himself from such a declaration.

Y. R. 663. not succeeding, he at last desired an interview with him. The Proconsul sent to him one of his officers, named Rutilius. Fimbria resented it extremely, that Sylla should refuse him a conference, which it was not usual to refuse even to an enemy: however, he asked pardon for what he had done, and made his youth his excuse. Rutilius answered, that if he would quit Asia, Sylla would allow him a safe passage to the sea. To this Fimbria replied, that he knew a better way; and then, retiring into a temple in the town, ran himself through with his sword. The wound not proving mortal, he commanded one of his slaves to dispatch him. The slave immediately obeyed, and then killed himself upon his master's body. What soldiers had remained with him, now listed in Sylla's army.

Plut. in
Sylla.
App. loc.
cit.

Idem,
p. 212.

Idem,
p. 213.

The Proconsul staid sometime in Asia, to settle the government, plunder the inhabitants, amass money for the Italian war, and enrich his soldiers. The Ilienses, the Cbians, the Rhodians, the Lycians, the people of Magnesia, who had all suffered great losses and hardships by Mitbridates, were re-established in their liberty, and declared the friends and allies of Rome. Sylla then published an edict, commanding all the slaves who had been set free by the king of Pontus to return to their masters. This edict occasioning great tumults, and some cities revolting, the Romans made a prodigious slaughter of the people, both slaves and free, demolished the walls of many towns, and sold all the effects belonging to the inhabitants of many others. Those of Mitbridates's party were every where severely punished, especially the Ephesians, who had taken from their temples the presents which the Romans had dedicated to the Gods. After this, the Proconsul convened at Ephesus an assembly of deputies from all the cities of Asia. There he represented to them, the kindness of the Roman People to the Asiatics, in delivering them from the yoke of Antiochus the Great, and in declaring them all free, except some nations which they had given to Eumenes and the Rhodians, rather as allies than subjects; and he reproached them with their readiness to join Mitbridates, and execute his cruel orders. He added, you have been in part punished for these crimes by the king of Pontus himself, who exhausted you by rapine and slaughter, deprived you of your lands, cancelled the debts due to you, set your slaves at liberty, placed tyrants in some towns, and gave all sort of encouragement, both by sea and land, to pirates and robbers (from whence you may know, by experience, what patrons you chose to yourselves, in the room of those you renounced) and the authors of these mischiefs have been in part punished by us. Nevertheless, a public punishment must be inflicted for your demerits. But far be it from Roman clemency to command impious murders, unmerited confiscations, and to deprive masters of their slaves; barbarous practices, of which my mind abhors the very thought. Regard shall be had to the Grecian name, the glory of Asia, and our ancient friendship. I shall therefore (and may the Gods prosper it) only fine you you in a sum to the value of five years tribute, which I now order to be paid, over and above the expences I have been at in this war, and the usual taxes due from the province. I shall settle in just proportions what each city is to advance, and fix a time for payment. All who disobey I shall look upon as enemies.

After this most gracious speech, he sent parties of soldiers into all the towns to collect the several sums required. The people were obliged to borrow money at high interest, and to mortgage their theatres, their gymnasiums, the fortifications of their towns, their walls, and whatever belonged to the public. According to Plutarch, the public fine, imposed upon Asia, amounted to twenty thousand talents. Besides this, Sylla gave up the people to the insolence and covetousness of his soldiers, obliging their hosts to pay to each of them sixteen drachmas a day, and to entertain them and as many of their friends as they should please to invite. Every centurion had fifty drachmas a day allowed him, and two suits of apparel^a.

Nor did the Proconsul defend the Asiatics from the pirates, to whom Mitbridates had given such encouragement, that they not only infested the seas, but were become terrible to the towns. Sylla quietly suffered them, while he was in Asia, to take Jassus, Samos, Clazomenæ, Samothrace, and to plunder the temple in the last-mentioned place of ornaments to the value of a thousand talents. At length he prepared for his Italian expedition; and leaving Murena in Asia, at the head of that army, which Fimbria had lately commanded, he set sail from Ephesus, and, the third day, arrived at Athens, where he was initiated in the Eleusinian mysteries.

At Rome, Cinna and Carbo had continued themselves in the Consulship for the new year, and the former had married his daughter to the famous Julius Cæsar. On the news of the approach of Sylla with a victorious army, a great fleet, and an immense treasure, the Consuls levied soldiers all over Italy to a prodigious number, fitted out ships, and collected money and provisions for the impending war. The Proconsul, not daunted at these preparations, wrote a letter to the Senate, wherein he reckoned up all his exploits, from the time of his Quæstorship to that of his Consulship, against the Numidians, the Cimbri, and the Italians; exaggerated his victories over Mitbridates, and boasted of the number of nations he had reduced to the obedience of Rome: But he gloried in nothing so much, as that his camp had been a sanctuary for the Roman Citizens, whom the cruelty of Cinna had driven into banishment. He added, that, for a reward of these services to the state, his enemies had prevailed to have him declared an exile, his house demolished, his friends murdered, ^a According to Salust, Sylla, to gain the affections of his soldiers, first introduced debauchery and drinking among them, and taught them to admire statues and pictures, and to rifle private houses, plunder temples, &c. Bell. Cat. c. xi.

and

Y. R. 669.
Bef. Chr.
83.
368 Cons.

Liv. Epit. lxxxiii.

App. de
Bell. Civ.
l. i. p. 398.

* Plutarch says,
the mutiny was occasioned by a suspicion, that Cinna had murdered Pompey (afterwards surnamed the Great;) that Cinna, in his flight, was overtaken by a Cen-turi-on; that when this man was going to run him through, he fell on his knees, and offered him, if he would spare his life, a seal ring, which was of great value. I do not come, said the officer, to seal a contract, but to punish a wicked, and a cruel tyrant; and, at and his wife and children forced to fly from Rome to save their lives: but that he would soon return, and take vengeance, both on his private enemies, and those of the public. The rest of the Citizens, the new as well as the old, he promised not to hurt. The Senate, terrified at this letter, immediately dispatched commissioners, with an earnest request to him to be reconciled to his adversaries, offering him the security of the public faith for the performance of whatever he should demand. At the same time, they forbade the Consuls to make any more levies till an answer could be obtained from him. Cinna promised to obey; but no sooner were the commissioners set out for Rome, than the Consuls made a progress through Italy, enlisted soldiers, and forming different armies to oppose their enemy. Their design was, that the seat of the war should be abroad; and, with this view, they ordered forces to be transported into Dalmatia. The first detachment had a safe passage, but the next, meeting with a storm, returned home, and dispersed themselves, giving out every where, that they would not fight against their countrymen. The rest of the army, encouraged by this example, refused to embark for Dalmatia. Whereupon Cinna assembled them, and by menaces would have compelled them to obey, but they mutinied, and slew him*.

Carbo, by the death of his colleague, remained sole master of the administration, found various pretences to put off the election of a new Consul to the next year. In the mean time, the commissioners who had been sent to Sylla returned with an answer to this effect (according to Appian) that he would never have any friendship with the actors of such crimes; that if the Roman People had an inclination to pardon them, he would not oppose it; but that those would be in the safest condition, who took refuge with him, as he had an army so much at his devotion^b. By which [last] words, says Appian, it was plain, he designed to retain his command, and to possess himself of the government*.

Carbo, to keep the Italians steady to his cause, would have obliged all the towns and colonies of Italy to give hostages for their fidelity. But the Senate hindered the execution of this project. However, by the interest of his party, he got a Law passed, for distributing the freedmen among all the five and thirty tribes, and obtained a decree of the Senate, ordaining that all armies every where should be disbanded.

* Plutarch says, the mutiny was occasioned by a suspicion, that Cinna had murdered Pompey (afterwards surnamed the Great;) that Cinna, in his flight, was overtaken by a Centurion; that when this man was going to run him through, he fell on his knees, and offered him, if he would spare his life, a seal ring, which was of great value. I do not come, said the officer, to seal a contract, but to punish a wicked, and a cruel tyrant; and, at these words, plunged his sword in the Consul's body. Plut. in Pomp.

^b The Epitome of Livy, l. lxxxiv. (with which Vell. Pat. seems to agree) tells us, that Sylla offered to submit to the authority of the Senate, on condition, that all who had been banished by the Marian faction, and had fled to him, should be restored: and that Carbo, and his party, hindered these terms from being accepted.

Sylla paid no regard to this decree. Leaving Athens, he marched to Dyrrachium, in order to embark there on board a fleet of twelve hundred ship, (1600, according to Appian.) Before he set sail, he began, it is said, to fear lest his troops should, on their arrival in Italy, disband themselves, and return to their respective homes. But they soon freed him from his apprehensions; for, of their own accord, they took a new oath of fidelity to him; nay, thinking that he wanted money, they made a contribution among themselves, and offered it to him: but he declined their present.

It was in the Consulship of L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Junius Norbanus, that Sylla landed at Brundisium, with an army of five Roman legions, and six thousand horse, beside the Macedonian and Peloponnesian auxiliaries, in all 60,000 men^d. By Sylla's account, as given by Plutarch, the Marian faction had on foot 450^e cohorts of good troops, commanded by fifteen Generals. Appian says, their forces, at this time, amounted to 200 cohorts of 500 men each, but that afterwards they were increased. He adds, that the People favoured the Consuls much more than Sylla, because he seemed the aggressor, invading his country in a hostile manner; whereas the Consuls, though they had in reality only their own interest at heart, yet pretended a view to the public good. Besides, the People, conscious of being themselves equally transgressors, took up arms out of fear, knowing, that Sylla would not be satisfied with chastising them, but was meditating ravages, slaughter, and destruction. Thus far Appian. But if we may believe Vell. Paternulus, all the best men flocked to Sylla's army. Among these, it seems, was Cethegus, who had been a great enemy to the Proconsul, and had by him been driven out of Rome, when Cinna was expelled. Verres also, so well known by Cicero's pleadings against him, quitted Carbo, to whom he had been Quæstor in Gaul the last year, carried off the public money with him, and took refuge with Sylla, that he might not be obliged to pass his accounts. The Proconsul, says Cicero, would not trust him as a friend, but removed him from the army, and placed him at Beneventum, where he could do no hurt, being narrowly watched by persons steady to the cause: yet Sylla, afterwards, rewarded him, as a traitor, liberally with the estates of some of the inhabitants of that town, whom he proscribed. Metellus Pius, Crassus, and Pompey (the son of Pompeius Strabo formerly mentioned,) likewise repaired to Sylla's camp. Metellus, since his flight from Rome, when Marius and Cinna entered the city, had endeavoured to kindle a war in Africa, but had been driven from thence by Fabius, Prætor of that province. Crassus, on the death of Cinna, had raised some forces in Spain, transported them into Africa, ^d Vell. Pat. (l. ii. c. 24.) says, that Sylla's army amounted to no more than 30,000 men.

^e Vell. Pat. (loc. cit.) tells us, that the Marian army consisted of above 200,000 men.

Y. R. 669.

App. de. Bell. Civ. l. i. p. 393. Plut. in Sylla.

Y. R. 670. Bef. Chr. 82. 369 Conf.

App. loc. cit.

App. p. 400.

App. p. 399.

Cic. in Ver. l. c. 12, & seq.

Liv. Epit. l. lxxxiv. Plut. in Crass.

Y.R. 670.

Vell. Pat.

l. ii. c. 29.

Liv. Epit.

l. lxxxv.

Plut. in

Pomp.

App. p.

399.

Plut. in Sylla.App. P.
402.

Vell. Pat.

l. ii. c. 25.

Plut. in Sylla.App. loc.
ciii.

and joined Metellus: but, soon quarrelling with him, he left that country, and went to Sylla. Pompey (afterwards surnamed the Great) was, at this time, about twenty-three years of age. Having, by his credit in the country of Picenum, raised three legions, he led them to Sylla, and, in his march, defeated Brutus, one of the chiefs of the Marian faction, who opposed his passage. On his arrival, Sylla rose up to receive him (a civility which he paid to none of the other Generals,) and saluted him by the title of Imperator.

Sylla, advancing into the country, fought a battle with the Consul Norbanus, at Canusium, vanquished him, and slew seven thousand of his men⁵. The Proconsul lost only seventy soldiers on this occasion, or as some say, an hundred and twenty-four; and, if we believe Plutarch, he obtained this victory merely by the courage of his troops, for he led them to the attack without forming them into any order. Norbanus shut himself up in Capua; and the other Consul, L. Scipio, marched to oppose the enemy. As he was more solicitous to bring about a peace than to carry on the war, Sylla, who knew his disposition, sent him some overtures, which he very willingly listened to: but the Proconsul found various pretences to put off the conclusion of the affair. During this negociation, his soldiers, long practised in wiles and cunning, under so artful a master, corrupted many in Scipio's army by bribes, promises and flattery. At length, all the Consul's troops deserted him, and went over in a body to *Sylla*⁶. Scipio was taken prisoner in his tent, together with his son; but the Proconsul, after having in vain endeavoured to engage them into his party, set them both at liberty: so different, says Velleius, was Sylla, when carrying on the war, from the same Sylla, when he had finished it. On the news of this desertion, Norbanus is reported to have said, that, in Sylla, he had to fight against a Lion and a Fox; but that the Fox was the most dangerous enemy. To him likewise the Proconsul sent deputies to treat of peace; but Norbanus, dreading the fate of his colleague, would not so much as return an answer. Hereupon, Sylla decamped, and drew nearer to Rome, ravaging the country in his march. Norbanus directed his course to the same city, ⁵ According to Plutarch, Sylla advanced to meet Pompey, and alighted from his horse, as soon as he came up to him.

⁶ In the Epitome of Livy, we are told, that, before this battle, Sylla sent deputies to Norbanus to treat of peace; and that the latter offered violence to them. Appian says, that Sylla sent deputies to Norbanus some time after the battle. Both stories can hardly be true.

⁷ Appian reports, that, during the truce,

Sertorius, who had been sent by Scipio to consult with Norbanus about the articles of peace, seized upon Suessa in his way: that, Sylla looking upon this step as an infraction of the truce, Scipio, either conscious of the fact, or not knowing what answer to make, restored to the Proconsul the hostages he had given in the beginning of the treaty; and that the Consul's army, offended both at the taking of Suessa, and the returning of the hostages, deserted to Sylla.

but but by a different route. Carbo, the last year's Consul, entered it before either of them, and obtained of the Senate and People a decree, declaring Metellus, and all the Senators who had joined Sylla, enemies to the State.

Y. R. 670.
Bef. Chr.
82.
369 Conf.

About this time, the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was burnt down in the night. Some said, it was set on fire by Carbo's order: some suspecting the Consul; others Sylla. This last, in his Memoirs, wrote, that a slave had told him, that if he did not hasten to Rome, the Capitol would be burnt, and had named the day when it should happen, which was the sixth of July.

Plut. in
Sylla.

The rest of the summer was spent by both parties in recruiting their armies. Multitudes flocked daily to the Consuls, from all parts of Italy and Cisalpine Gaul. Sylla, on the other hand, dispersed emissaries up and down the country, to bring over people to his interest by bribes, promises, and threats; and, that the Italians might have no reason to fear him, he entered into a league with them, promising to continue to them their right of Roman citizenship. Sertorius, seeing the incapacity of the leaders of the Marian faction, and losing all hope of preserving Italy, after the desertion of Scipio's army, had passed into Spain; there to assemble troops, and maintain the war against Sylla and his adherents.

Liv. Epit.
l. lxxxvi.
Plut. in Sertor.

At the next election of Consuls, Cn. Papirius Carbo, for the third time, and C. Marius, the son of the great Marius, were appointed to that office.

Y. R. 671.
Bef. Chr.
81.
370 Conf.

Marius, at the head of eighty-five cohorts, fought an obstinate battle with Sylla, at Sacriportus, not far from Præneste: but five cohorts of foot, and two troops of horse, in the heat of the action, going over to the Proconsul, the Marrians were routed with great slaughter. Sylla's Memoirs, so often mentioned, say, that he killed 20,000 of the enemy, and took 8000 prisoners, with the loss of only twenty-three of his own men^k. Of the prisoners, all that were Samnites he ordered to be slain,

Plut. in Sylla.
App. de
Bell. Civ.
p. 403.

as

ⁱ Appian calls this Marius, the nephew of the other Marius. Florus (b. iii. c. 21.) says, he was the brother of Marius, meaning Marcus, or, according to Pliny, (l. xxxiv. c. 6.) Caius Marius Gratidianus, whom Catiline, by Sylla's order, murdered at the tomb of Catulus; and whose father (says Cicero in Brut. c. 45.) was M. Gratidius, the sister of whom was Cicero's grandmother. Cic. de Leg. l. iii. c. 16. Pighius (vol. III. p. 191, and 252.) thinks, that both Marcus and Caius were not adopted sons of the great Marius, a thing the very probable. That M. Marius Gratidianus, the son of M. Gratidius, was adopted by some Marius or other, seems plain from his name: but the Capitoline Tables, the Epitome of Livy, Pliny (l. xxxiii. c. 1.) Valleius Paterculus, Dio Cassius, Plutarch, Auct. de Vir. Illust. and Entropius, call the Consul of this year, C. Marius, the son of Marius, without mentioning adoption. The Consul, according to the Epitome of Livy, was at this time but twenty years of age; the author de Vir. Illust. says twenty-five; Vell. Pat. twenty-six; and Appian twenty-seven.

^k If we believe Plutarch, a dream, which Sylla had, made him very eager to fight this battle; but his men were so fatigued with endeavouring

Y. R. 671.
Bef. Chr.
81.
170 Conf.

App. p.
404-
Cic. Ep.
Fam. l. ix.
Ep. 21.

Dio Caff.
ap. Valcf.
p. 654-

App. p.
404-

Idem, p.
405-

as perpetual enemies to the Romans. Marius escaped with the remains of his army to Præneste, which Sylla soon after blocked up.

About the same time Metellus defeated another army of the Marians, the victory being facilitated by the desertion of some of their cohorts during the battle. Young Marius, seeing his affairs desperate, and being eager to revenge himself upon his enemies, sent orders to Brutus Damasippus, the Prætor of Rome, to assemble the Senate upon some pretence, and put to death L. Domitius, P. Antistius (Pompey's father-in-law,) Mucius Scævola, the Pontifex Maximus, and C. Carbo, a relation of the Consul, and, according to Cicero, the only good man of the family. This cruel^k order was punctually executed, and, according to the custom then established at Rome, the bodies of the slain were thrown into the river.

Sylla, proposing to march to Rome, left the blockade of Præneste to the care of Lucretius Ofella, an obscure man: for the Proconsul, if we may credit Dio Cassius, being now almost sure of the victory, began to neglect the Nobles, who had hitherto done him singular service, and to put his chief confidence in men of low birth and no virtue, as knowing, that these would be ready instruments of his wicked purposes, and that they would not arrogate to themselves the glory of any exploit by him performed. On his approach towards the Capitol, those of the Marian faction fled from it. The inhabitants, famished with hunger, immediately opened their gates to him, and he, as soon as he was master of the city, confiscated the effects of Marius's followers. Then, assembling the People, he told them, that the wickedness of his enemies had forced him upon those measures, and exhorted the citizens to take courage, for that, in a short time, they would see an end of their miseries, and the commonwealth settled upon a good footing. Having ordered all matters in the city, according to the present exigence, and left a guard there, he marched to Clusium, where he fought a battle with the Consul Carbo: it lasted the whole day, and night put an end to it before victory had declared on either side^l. After this, Carbo having sent eight legions under the command of Marcus to relieve Præneste, Pompey laid an ambuscade for those troops, and with great slaughter forced them to retire to an eminence, where he surrounded them: and, though Marcus brought them off in the night, yet, they thinking they endeavouring to favour the junction of a part of their forces with the main army, that they lay down upon the ground to rest themselves; and Sylla was prevailed upon not to offer battle. But Marius marching up boldly to the entrenchments, Sylla's soldiers, in a passion, sallied out upon their enemies, and routed them at the first shock. Festus, and some other authors, wrote, that Marius, exhausted with fatigue, fell so fast asleep under a tree, that he did not hear the noise of the battle, and could scarce be waked by the flight of his troops.

^k The Epitome of Livy (l. lxxxvi.) places this order before the battle of Præneste, and adds, that the Prætor murdered all the Nobles that were in Rome.

^l The Epitome of Livy, l. lxxxviii. gives the victory to Sylla.

had had been defeated through his fault, the greater part of them disbanded themselves, so that he returned to Carbo with only seven cohorts. Y. R. 671.

About the same time, this Consul, in conjunction with Norbanus, attacked Metellus's camp at Faventia, in the evening, but without success. App. p. 406. Ten thousand of their men were killed, 6000 surrendered themselves to the enemy, and the rest were dispersed in such a manner, that only a thousand men retired, with their commanders, to Arretium. On the news of this defeat, a legion of Lucanians, under Albinovanus, deserted their leader, and went over to Metellus. Albinovanus returned to his General Norbanus at Arretium, but it was only, the more infamously, to betray him. For, soon after, being bribed by Sylla, he invited to an entertainment Norbanus, his lieutenants Apustius and Fimbria (brother of that Fimbria who had killed himself in Asia,) and all the chiefs of the Marian party then in the town, and caused every one of them to be murdered, except Norbanus, who did not come to the entertainment. The assassin made his escape to Sylla, to whom Ariminum, about this time, revolted, and some Marian armies, in that neighbourhood, deserted. After so many misfortunes, Norbanus, apprehending that none of his people would be steady to him, embarked on board a small vessel, and sailed to Rhodes. Sylla sent to demand him, and, while the Rhodians were deliberating, whether they should give him up, he killed himself in the middle of the Forum.

Carbo, notwithstanding these disasters, made several attempts to relieve Præneste, but without success. A detachment of his army was routed at Placentia, by Lucullus, one of Sylla's lieutenants; and all Cisalpine Gaul submitted to Metellus. Hereupon, Carbo, though he had 30,000 men at Clusium, two legions under Damasippus, and two more, commanded by Marcus and Carinas, besides a powerful army of Samnites and Lucanians, yet abandoned Italy, and passed into Africa. After his departure, his troops at Clusium were entirely defeated by Pompey, and 20,000 of them cut off. Idem, p. 407.

Some time before this, Pontius Telesinus, a Samnite, and M. Lamponius, a Lucanian, had levied 40,000 men in those countries, and attempted to raise the blockade of Præneste. According to Appian, they were now joined by Damasippus, Marcus, and Carinas, with the troops under their command. But, fearing to be hemmed in between the armies of Sylla and Pompey, who were advancing, with great expedition, to attack them in front and rear, Telesinus, an able general, and a brave man, disappointed their purpose; he decamped in the night, and marched directly to Rome. On his arrival there, the terror was no less than when Hannibal appeared before the gates. Yet the Roman youth marched out boldly, and attacked the enemy, but were repulsed with loss. In the mean time, a body of horse, detached by Sylla, came opportunely to Plut. in Sylla. Vell. Pat. l. iii. c. 27. App. loc. cit.

^a Vell. Pat. and Plutarch make no mention of the Samnites being joined by any Roman troops.

Y. R. 671.
Bef. Chr.
81.
370 Conf.

the assistance of the citizens, and the General himself, with all his army, approached soon after. His troops were fatigued with their march, which some of his officers observing, and considering, that they were to fight with Samnites and Lucanians, endeavoured to persuade him to defer the engagement. He, nevertheless, ordered the trumpets to sound a charge. On the other hand, Pontius Telestinus, an implacable enemy of the Roman name, walking through the ranks of his army, cried out, "The last day of Rome is come. The city must be razed to the ground. Wolves will never be wanting to prey upon the liberties of Italy, till the wood in which they shelter themselves is cut down." The day was far spent before the battle began, which, it would seem, lasted the whole night, with great obstinacy on both sides. Sylla's left wing, in which he commanded in person against Telestinus, was entirely routed; and he himself was in imminent danger of being killed by two men, who, at the same instant, threw their darts at him; he escaped by his groom's opportunely striking his horse. It is said, that when he saw his men give ground, he took out of his bosom a little image of Apollo, which he had stolen from the temple of Delpbi, and had ever since carried about him when engaged in war. Kissing it with great devotion, he expostulated with the God for having brought him to perish dishonourably with his countrymen, at the gates of his native city, after having raised him, by many victories, to such a height of glory and greatness. Then throwing himself among his troops, he endeavoured, by intreaties and threats, to make them face the enemy. All was to no purpose. They were routed with great slaughter, and, in their flight* to the camp, hurried him along with them. There, when it was very late in the night, messengers came to him from Crassus (who had commanded the right wing,) with the good news, that he had defeated the left wing of the enemy, and pursued them to Antenna, where he kept them blocked up.

Most of the Samnites and Lucanians fell that night in battle, and, among the rest, Pontius Telestinus, who was found the next day with a countenance, says Velleius, which more resembled that of a conqueror, than of a dead man.

As soon as it was light, Sylla marched to join the forces at Antenna. Three thousand of the enemy sent deputies to him, asking pardon, and offering to submit. He answered, that he would spare their lives, if they would do some signal mischief to the rest of his enemies. Whereupon,

* According to Appian, they fled to Rome with the Samnites at their heels, and the Romans, fearing lest the enemy should enter the town, let fall the Portcullus; so that Sylla's men, urged by fear and necessity, returned to the fight, and obtained the victory. But since Sylla came last before the city, we must suppose, that the enemy was between it and him, and, consequently, that his troops could not fly thither. By the same author's account, the loss on both sides amounted to 50,000 men, and 8000 were taken prisoners.

those wretches turned their swords against their companions, killed a great number of them, and then surrendered themselves to the Proconsul. Y. R. 671.

The enemy being entirely dispersed, Sylla sent the heads of Pontius App. p. 408. Telefinus, Marcus, and Carinas, (the two last having been taken in their flight) to Lucretius Ofella, at Præneste, with orders to have them carried round the walls of the town. On the news of Sylla's victory, and of the flight of Norbanus and Carbo, and of the conqueror's being master in Rome, the inhabitants of Præneste, in despair of relief, opened their gates to Lucretius. Marius, in attempting to make his escape through some subterraneous passages, was slain by those who guarded him. Some say, he fell by his own hand: others, that he and the younger brother of Pontius Telefinus fought together, and that Telefinus being killed, and Marius wounded, the latter caused his slave to dispatch him. Lucretius Liv. Epit. l. xxxviii. App. p. 408. sent his head to the Proconsul, who, on seeing it, is reported to have said, that the young man ought to have learned to use the oar, before he attempted to manage the helm. Yet Velleius thinks, that Sylla had a high opinion of Marius's talents, because, upon his death, he immediately assumed the name of Felix, or the Fortunate, a name which, in the opinion of the same author, he would have been most justly entitled to, had his life ended with his victories. Plutarch seems to doubt, whether Sylla's prosperity and power did really change his disposition, or only discover his natural wickedness. It is, however, agreed, that no man ever made a more cruel use of victory. The Romans soon had an instance of the coolness with which he could perpetrate murders. The 3000 men, formerly mentioned, who, after massacring many of their companions, had surrendered themselves to him upon promise of their lives, he caused to be shut up in a public place, together with some other prisoners, (the whole number amounting to 6 or 8000) on pretence of enlisting them in the Legions. He then assembled the Senate in the Temple of Bellona, which was hard by; and while he was making a speech to the Conscrip- Plut. in Sylla. Fathers, his soldiers, according to their instructions, began to massacre the wretches he had shut up. Their cries and lamentations greatly terrified the Senators. Sylla, without altering his countenance, said to them "Mind what I am saying, Conscrip Fathers; 'tis nothing but a few seditious men whom I have ordered to be punished." Plut. loc. cit. Liv. Epit. l. lxxxviii. Dio Cass. ap. Val. p. 657.

After this, he filled Rome with slaughter, sparing none of the adverse party; nay, his friends, without regard to party, murdered, with his connivance, their own private enemies; and all were such, whose birth or fortunes they envied. In the general consternation caused by these murders, Q. Catulus had the courage to say to the Proconsul, "With whom do we propose to live, if, in war, we kill all who are in arms, and, in peace, all who are unarmed?" and C. Metellus asked him in the Senate-house, "What end there was to be to these calamities?" He added, "We do not petition you to spare such as you have determined to destroy, but to " quiet

Senec. de Clement. l. i. c. 12. Plut. in Sylla. Oros. l. v. c. 21. Plut. in Sylla.

Y. R. 671. "quiet the apprehensions of those whom you intend to save." Sylla answered, "That he was not yet certain, whom he should leave alive." Then Metellus (or, according to others, one Aufidius) desired him to let them know, who they were whom he had determined to punish. Sylla promised he would, and, on the morrow, caused to be fixed up in a public place an edict with a list of the names of eighty* persons, whom he doomed to death. This method of condemnation was called PROSCRIPTION; a method of which Sylla was the inventor. By the edict, it was made capital to entertain or save any of the proscribed. A reward of two talents was offered for each head; even a slave was entitled to it for killing his master, and a son for murdering his father. The estates and effects of the condemned were confiscated, and their children and grandchildren declared incapable of holding any office in the state. Sylla, says Sallust, was the first among men, who appointed punishment for people yet unborn, and prepared injuries for those whose life was yet uncertain.

The day after the first Proscription, Sylla published a new list of 220 Persons whom he condemned, and the next day a like number. In an assembly of the People, he told them he had proscribed all he could think of, and that those whom he had now forgot, he would proscribe hereafter; and concluded with saying, that if the People were obedient to him, he would change their condition for the better; but as to his enemies, he would spare none of them. After this speech, he proscribed, according to Appian, forty Senators and 1600 Knights. The whole number of the Proscribed amounted, according to Val. Max. to 4700; he adds, that Sylla, as if he gloried in his cruelty, caused their names to be entered in the public registers; but, probably, this was done, that it might be known, in future times, whose descendants stood excluded from offices. Whatever was the number of the proscribed, that of the slain seems much to have exceeded Valerius's account. And (if we may believe Dio Cassius) when Mithridates ordered all the Italians in Asia to be murdered, there did not perish near so many of that nation, nor by such cruel deaths, as in consequence of Sylla's edicts. Nor did the tyrant confine his cruelty to Rome. His assassins roamed over all Italy, every where searching out the favourers of the Marian faction. It was a crime, not only to have borne arms against Sylla, but to have given even the least assistance to his enemies, to have been in friendship with them, to have lent them money, nay, to have travelled in company with any of them. The weight of the storm fell chiefly upon the rich, more people being murdered for their estates, than on account of party, or private revenge. Nor did Sylla cease his Proscriptions, till he had enriched all his friends and followers. He became

* According to Orosius, this first Proscription was before the surrendry of Præneste, or the death of Norbatus: for Marinus and Norbatus, Carbo, and Scipio, were among the proscribed.

the protector of all villains. Among these were Oppiancius and Catiline. The former, a Roman knight of Larinum in Apulia, having privately caused his wife's brother to be assassinated, that his own son might inherit the whole of his grandmother's estate, and being threatened with a prosecution by the relations of the deceased, he first took refuge in the camp of Metellus; and when afterwards he had procured a commission from Sylla, he returned to Larinum with a party of soldiers, and under cover of the proscription murdered all who had threatened to bring him to trial. Catiline had formerly murdered his own brother, and now obtained of the Proconsul, that his brother's name should be inserted among the proscribed, as if he had been still living. In return for this favour, Catiline undertook the punishment of M. Marius Gratidianus, a man who had been twice Prætor, and so great a favourite with the Roman People, for his having promulgated a Law against the adulteration of the coin, that they erected statues to him in all quarters of the City, and offered incense before them. Catiline caused Gratidianus to be whipped through the town, then dragged to the tomb of Q. Lutatius Catulus, where his legs and arms were broke, his eyes put out, and his hands and ears cut off; and when he had been tortured in every member, Catiline himself cut off his head, while he was yet alive, and, having carried it to Sylla in the Forum, went and washed his bloody hands in the lustral water, that was at the door of Apollo's temple. M. Platorius, a Senator, was put to death for fainting away at the execution of Gratidianus.

In the great danger of the proscribed was C. Julius Cæsar. His aunt had been married to the elder Marius, and he himself was son-in-law to Cinna. All Sylla's authority could not prevail with him to divorce his wife; he was therefore degraded from the office of Flamen Dialis, deprived of his patrimony, and forced to abscond to save his life. At length, the vestal virgins, and several of the chief men of Rome, earnestly intreating, that he might be spared, Sylla answered, "You have prevailed; but know that he, whom you so eagerly wish to save, will one day prove the ruin of the party, which you and I have been defending. You have no penetration, if, in that boy, you do not see many Marius's."

The tyrant not contented with proscribing particular persons, extended his revenge to whole towns and nations. Spoletum, Interamna, Florentia, Sulmo, and Præneste, were razed to the ground, most of the inhabitants massacred, and their effects sold. All the Samnites he put to death, or banished Italy, alledging that, while they remained united, the Romans would never have peace; so that, in Strabo's days, all their towns were either in ruins, or dwindled into villages.

All Italy now submitted to the conqueror, except Nola and Volaterræ; but the Marian faction had still leaders in the provinces. Sertorius had assembled an army in Spain; Perperna prepared to defend Sicily, and the

Y. R. 671.
Bef. Chr.
81.
370 Conf.

Cic. pro
Cluent.
vii. & viii.

Ascon. in
Tog. cand.
Cic. de
Offic. l. iii.

c. 20.
Plin.
l. xxxiii.

c. 9.
Liv. Epit.
l. lxxxviii.

Senec. de
Ira, l. iii.
c. 18.

Flor. l. iii.
c. 21.

Plut. in
Sylla.
Cic. de Pet.

Consul.
Val. Max.
l. ix. c. 2.

§ 1.
Vell. Pat.
l. ii. c. 41.

Sueton. in
Jul. c. i.

App.
P. 410.
Flor. iii.
21.

Strab. l. v.
P. 249.

Y. R. 671. Consul Carbo and Domitius (Cinna's son-in-law) were in Africa. Pompey, in virtue of a commission from Sylla, passed with an army into Sicily, whereupon Perperna abandoned the island. Soon after Carbo, who had left Africa to go into Sicily, stopped at Cossura, and from thence sent M. Brutus to Lilybæum, to learn whether Pompey was there. Brutus's vessel being surrounded by some of the enemy's ships, he slew himself, that he might not fall into the enemy's hands; and Pompey, having dispatched some vessels in pursuit of Carbo, took him prisoner, with all his attendants. These he caused to be slain, without suffering them to come into his presence, but the Consul to be brought in chains before his Tribunal; and when from thence he had reproached him in a long and bitter invective, commanded him to be led to execution. [Pompey has been censured, with some severity, for his treatment of Carbo, a man who had been thrice Consul, and had warmly patronized him, when all the effects of his father, Pompeius Strabo, were, after his death, going to be confiscated, for his having embezzled the public money.]

Plut. in Pom.

Liv. Epit.
l. lxxxix.

App.
p. 410.

Val. Max.
l. v. c. 3.
§ 5.
App. de
Bell. Civ.
p. 411,
412.

Both the Consuls being dead, and the time for the election of new Magistrates approaching, Sylla left Rome, and went to his camp, from whence, by a message to the Senate, he signified his desire, that they would name an Inter-rex. The Fathers pitched upon Valerius Flaccus, hoping that he would hold the Comitia for an election of Consuls: but Sylla wrote to Valerius, advising him to propose to the PEOPLE the creating a DICTATOR, who should hold that office, not for any fixed term, but till the affairs of Rome, Italy, and the whole empire, that were in great disorder through the late wars, should be entirely settled. At the bottom of the letter he added, that, with their approbation, he would burden himself with the care of doing the Republic that service.

Plut. in
Sylla.
Cic. 3. in
Rul. c. 2.

Valerius, having convened the People, proposed and passed a Law, which not only constituted Sylla DICTATOR for an unlimited time^a, but likewise ratified every thing he had hitherto done, and gave him a full and uncontrollable power^b over the lives and fortunes of his Fellow-citizens: "A Law (says Cicero) the most iniquitous that ever was made, and the most unlike a Law:" and indeed it is harder to conceive how a Law, so contrary to the very essence of civil society, should ever be proposed, than that it should pass, at this juncture, without opposition.

^a There had been no DICTATOR in the Republic during the last 120 years: and this is the first instance of a DICTATOR created by the PEOPLE, or for an indeterminate time: The People had once, indeed, in a time of great distress, during the second Punic War, created a PRO-DICTATOR, but without giving him the power of naming his General of the force. See Vol. II.

^b Legem interrex noster tulit, ut Dictator quem vellet civium, indicâ causâ, impune posset occidere. 1 de Leg. 3287. Omnium legum iniquissimam dissimillimamque legis esse arbitror eam, quam Lucius Flaccus interrex de Sylla tulit, ut omnia quæcunque ille fecisset essent rata. Nam cum cæteris in civitatibus, Tyrannis institutis, Leges omnes extinguantur atque tollantur, hic Reip. Tyrannum Leges constituit. Cic. in Rul. iii. 2.

T H E

Roman History.

E I G H T H B O O K.

From the Year 671, when SYLLA was created Perpetual
DICTATOR, to the Commencement of the FIRST TRIUMVIRATE, formed in the end of 693.

C H A P. I.

The Laws and Institutions of SYLLA, when DICTATOR. POMPEY's successes in Africa : For which he obtains a Triumph at his return to Rome. SYLLA abdicates the DICTATORSHIP in 674, and dies in 675.

SYLLA, having rewarded Valerius, the Inter-rex, with the office of General of the horse, came into the Forum, attended by four and twenty Appian. Lictors; in whose Fasces, to the great terror of the City, appeared the axes, which were never seen in the Consular Fasces, within the walls of Rome. Beside these Lictors, he had for his guard, a numerous band of Ruffians, ever ready to execute his commands; and that all this was not merely in terrorem became quickly manifest.

To preserve somewhat of the old form of the Commonwealth, it was the pleasure of the Dictator, that Consuls, Prætors, and other Magistrates, Plut. in Sylla. should be elected as usual. Lucretius Ofella, who had lately reduced Præneste, Liv. E. it. l. lxxxix. presented himself a candidate for the Consulship. The Dictator Appian. forbade him to stand: Nevertheless Ofella, having interest with the People, and many friends among the Great, and having recently done the cause of Sylla's party so considerable a service, imagined he might safely disregard Y.R. 671. disregard the prohibition. He persisted therefore, to solicit the voters. The DICTATOR, from his Tribunal, observing it, sent to him a centurion, who killed him upon the spot. A tumult, an uproar^a ensued; the assassin was seized, and brought prisoner to the foot of the Tribunal; Let him go, said the DICTATOR, he has only obeyed my orders. After this, he caused M. Tullius Decula, and Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, to be elected Consuls. The government of Italy fell by lot to Decula, that of Macedonia to his colleague.

Y.R. 672.
Bel. Chr.
80.
371 Conf.

Val. Max.
l. xi. viii.

Plut. in
Sylla. 473.

Appian.
p. 414.

Plut.

After these elections, towards the end of January, the DICTATOR made his Triumphal entry into Rome, on account of his conquest in the East. The Procession, which lasted two days, was adorned with the richest spoils of^b Asia: But neither the name of any Roman citizen vanquished by him, nor the representation of any city by him taken, that belonged to the Romans, appeared there. The principal ornament of his Triumph was a long train of Senators and other eminent Citizens, who, having been protected by him from the fury of Marius and Cinna, followed his chariot, calling him their Father and preserver, and proclaiming, that they owed to him their lives, and whatever else they enjoyed that was dear to them. At the same time, some of his soldiers, agreeably to the freedom allowed on these occasions, called his Dictatorship a disguised royalty; intimating, that, though he declined the title, he was in effect a KING: Others, who were disposed to call things by their true names, termed it a manifest tyranny, that is, an usurped despotism.

The ceremony over, Sylla ascended the Rostra, and, in a studied speech, gave a pompous account of his exploits, ascribing all his success to FORTUNE, and desiring they would give him no other surname, but that of FORTUNATE, [FELIX;] which, accordingly, was given him in the Appian.

p. 410.

^a Appian tells us, that, on this occasion, Sylla spoke thus to the People. "A coun-tryman, being bitten by vermin, cleared his shirt of them once or twice; but when he found himself again teized by them, he threw his shirt into the fire. Make the application."

The same author (p. 413.) says, that Ofella was treated with this rigour, because he had the audaciousness (in violation of a Law, which the Dictator had lately published) to sue for the Consulship, though he had not yet been either Prætor or Quæstor, but was still in the order of Knights. But Vell. Pat. l. ii. c. 27. tells, that Ofella was Prætor when he left Carbo's party, and went over to Sylla: and it is not probable, that Sylla's Institutions were yet published.

^b Pliny (l. xxxiii. c. 1.) tells us, that on the first day were carried 15,000 pounds weight of gold [i. e. 960,000 l. sterl.] and 115,000 pounds weight of silver [which is 371,354 l. 3s. 4d. sterling, which he had amassed in the war against Mithridates. And that on the second day were carried 13,000 pounds weight of gold [i. e. 832,000 l. sterling] with 6000 of silver [i. e. 22,604 l. 3s. 4d.] which had been saved when the Capitol was burnt, and had been transported to Præneste by the younger Marius.

^c Sylla, in writing to the Greeks in their language, stiled himself Epaphroditus, Beloved of Venus, in that manner translating the word Felix. His trophies, that were still extant in Plutarch's time, bore this inscription, LUCIUS CORNELIUS SYLLA EPAPHRODITUS.

And

the inscription upon the pedestal of the gilt equestrian statue erected, at this time, to his honour, by a decree of the Senate^a.

Y. R. 672.
Bef. Chr.
80.
380 Conf.

THOUGH Sylla, by assuming the DICTATORSHIP, for an indeterminate time, brought the Romans, originally governed by KINGS, to be again subject (as Appian observes^b) to regal domination; yet from some of the first acts of this new King, it would seem, that he never meant to retain the sovereignty, longer than till he had satiated his revenge, and could return, secure of impunity, to the condition of a private Citizen. That he might be able to make a safe retreat from public life, he laid the foundation of an Aristocracy in the Roman state, by such ordinances as, upon his abdication of the DICTATORSHIP, would leave all authority and power in the hands of the SENATE: taking especial care, at the same time, that the SENATE should consist wholly of his own creatures. His Proscriptions had very much thinned the Assembly, and had left in it (we may presume) few or none, but such as he believed to be entirely at his devotion. To these he added 300 of the most considerable men of the Equestrian order: But in making this addition, he complimented^c the

Liv. Epit.
l. lxxxix.
App. de
Bell. Civ.
413.

PEOPLE

And when his wife Metella was delivered of twins, a boy and a girl, he gave to both the name of Happy, calling the boy Faustus, the girl Fausta. Plut. in Sylla.

The Triumph was followed (if we may believe Appian) by magnificent games; for the celebration of which Greece was exhausted of all her best performers in every kind of exercise; insomuch that, at the Olympic games, there was no contention this year, but in the exercise of running [ωλήν τὰδὲ δρόμω.] App. p. 412.

^a Οὕτω μὲν δὴ Ῥωμαῖοι βασιλευσιν. — χερσαῖοι — αὐτοὶ ἐπιτελοῦσι βασιλείας. App. de Bell. Civ. l. i. p. 412.

N. B. It appears from these words, that Appian did not think the government of Rome to have been in the time of its KINGS so democratic as Dr. Middleton and Dr. Chapman have represented it. See Observations, &c. p. 99.

^c From Sylla's remitting to the People the nomination of the 300 Knights, who were to have admission into the SENATE, Dr. Middleton would infer a probability, that the PEOPLE, in virtue of a constitutional right, had, in all times, filled up, by their elections, the vacancies which happened in that house. Middleton's treatise on the Roman Senate, p. 73. He might, with almost as good reason, have inferred, from Sylla's being named by the PEOPLE to the DICTATORSHIP, that it had ever been the custom for the PEOPLE to chuse the DICTATORS.

As Sylla, by appropriating to the Senators the honour of judicature, deprived the People of the privilege of annually chusing the persons who were to perform the office of Judges; his view, perhaps, in taking the votes of the tribes, upon the 300 Knights, whom he recommended to them for Senators, was to lessen the discontent of the multitude; this compliment carrying some appearance of remitting to them, for the present, the nomination of the greater part of the JUDGES.

Appian [de Bell. Civ. p. 386.] speaks of a prior addition of 300 members to the Senate, in the year 665, when Sylla was Consul, and says, that this lection was made from the most reputable of the Citizens, in τῶν ἀρίστων ἀνδρῶν. But Dr. Middleton, in his Treatise on the Roman Senate, takes no notice of this pretended prior addition: He says only, that “Sylla when it [the Senate] was particularly exhausted, added THREE HUNDRED to it at once from the “Equestrian Order; which might probably “ raise

Y. R. 672. PEOPLE with the choice of the Persons, gathering the votes of the TRIBES
 B. C. Car. upon every individual of the 300 Knights, proposed to them for their ap-
 80. probation; a choice, in which they were, unquestionably, just as free, as 371 C. C. F. they had been in their Election of him to be perpetual DICTATOR.

Cic. in And now he restored to the SENATE a privilege which they had many V. IT. 2. years lost [and by their misbehaviour had very justly forfeited] ordaining, that none but SENATORS should for the future be appointed to the office of JUDGES. And “ raise the whole number to about 500, and “ in this state it seems to have continued till

 “ the subversion of their liberty by J. Cæ“ sar.” For Cicero, in an account of a particular debate, in one of his letters to Atticus, mentions 415 to have been present at it, which he calls a full house. Middleton's Treatise on the Roman Senate, p. 91.

Father Carroz, the Jesuit, passes over the pretended addition of 300 members, made to the Senate by Sylla in 665, without taking the least notice of it in his text, as if he gave no credit to Appian's report: and though it be mentioned by F. Rouillé, in a note on the other's text, it is mentioned only as a report made by Appian. M. Crevier omits it entirely; and Pighius, in this particular, pays no farther regard to Appian's authority, than to say in general terms, when speaking of Sylla's Consulship in 665, ampli- avit Senatam.

But Dr. Chapman takes for granted the prior addition of 300 members reported by Appian. “ We are not however (says the “ Doctor) to suppose from this, or even the “ second Lectio made by Sylla, when raised “ to the DICTATORSHIP, that the Senate
 “ from this time amounted to six hundred:
 “ For as the house is said to have wanted “ much of its due complement in both these “ instances, it is probable it fell considerably “ short of that number, even after each of “ these two additions was actually made.
 “ What therefore the Senate's precise number “ was from henceforth, we cannot take upon “ us to determine. Only as Cicero Attic.
 “ l. i. 14.] in speaking of a debate about “ twenty years afterwards, mentions 415
 “ members being then in the house, 'tis pro“ bable, that the whole, in Sylla's time, a“ mounted to 500 at least.

As to the precise number of members, of which the SENATE, after the addition to it of 300, did immediately consist; and of which Sylla intended it should, for the future, always consist (when complete;) if we cannot ascertain it, yet, perhaps, by the help of some considerations, which the state of things at that time suggests, we may make a reasonable conjecture. Tacitus tells us (as we see above in the text) that by one of Sylla's laws twenty Quæstors were to be created annually for supplying the SENATE to which he had transferred the JUDICATURE.

Lege Syllæ viginti [Quæstores] creati SUP-
PLENDI SENATUI, CUI JUDICIA TRADI-DERAT. Tacit. Ann. xi. 22. Pighius from these words gathers, that Sylla augmented the number of the Quæstors for this end principally, that there might be a greater choice of men in the Senate, to serve occasionally as Judges, the sole right of judicature having been just transferred to the Senators, “ Ex quibus “ verbis fit verisimile, in eum maximè finem “ ampliavisse Quæstorum Collegium, uti ube- “ rior deinceps suppetere Judicium e Senatu “ selectio. Nam è Senatu dicebantur esse non “ solum Patres Conscripti vel Senatores à “ Censoribus lecti in eum ordinem, sed etiam “ populi honoribus usi, quibus in Senatum
 “ venire licebat, et sententiæ jus habebant.”
 [And he conjectures from some passages in Tacitus and Cicero, that by Sylla's Law for creating TWENTY Quæstors, one half of the number was to be chosen by the People, the other named by the Consuls.]

That Sylla, when he augmented the number of the Quæstors from eight to twenty, had the Judicature in view, can hardly be questioned; not that this augmentation would of itself be effectual for supplying the public with a competent number of persons to perform occasionally the office of judges; but would perhaps be sufficient to keep the SENATE up to its due complement of members,

And that the august assembly, thus augmented and thus honoured with Y. R. 672.
the JUDICATURE, might thereafter have the contingent vacancies in their house regularly filled up with properly qualified persons, he ordained, that, Tacit. An. instead of only EIGHT Quæstors, as before, TWENTY should be annually xi. 22. created.

But, in order to raise and establish more effectually the authority of the Vell. Pat.
 SENATE, the DICTATOR almost totally annihilated that of the Tribunes, l. ii. c. 30.
 by depriving them of the power of LEGISLATION^b; Liv. Epit.
l. lxxxix.

bers, after his introduction of the 300 Knights into it, and his consigning the Judicature wholly to the Senatorian order. To provide Judges, in sufficient number, was his object in making, at once, so large an addition of members to the SENATE: To keep the SENATE full, after that addition, was his object in augmenting the number of the Quæstors. By the Plautian [or Plotian] law [Vid. supra, ann. 664.] it had been ordained, that each TRIBE should, annually, chuse out of its own body FIFTEEN persons, to serve as JUDGES; and the honour was made common to all the three orders [Senators, Knights, and Commoners, i. e. the Plebs] according as the votes carried it in every Tribe. Cn. Pompeio Strabone, L. Porcio Catone Coss. secundo anno Belli Italici, cum Equester ordo in judiculis dominaretur, M. Plautius Silvanus legem tulit, adjuvantibus nobilibus:—Ex ea tribus singulæ quinos deos ex suo numero creabant suffragio, qui eo anno judicarent. Cic. pro Cornel, & ad Att. iv. The number of persons qualified, by this law, to sit as JUDGES, was therefore [35 times 15] 525. Now supposing the House to have had its usual complement of 300 members, at the time when Sylla proscribed 90 of them [Appian, p. 415.] if to the remaining 210 we add the 300 Knights, and the 12 additional Quæstors, the sum total of the members of the house will be 522; a number almost the very same with that of the persons, which the tribes, in conformity to the Plautian law, furnished annually by election to serve as JUDGES; and if we suppose (and surely there is reason to suppose) that the State had found it necessary or expedient (after taking the Judicature from the numerous body of the Knights) to provide so large a number as the Plautian law prescribed, of qualified persons, out of which to chuse the JUDGES, this will account both for Sylla's adding so many members at once to the Senate, and for the provision he made to keep the number always complete; and it may perhaps be thought no weak reason for our fixing the due complement of the Senate at 525.

^b Mr. Kennet says, that Sylla deprived the TRIBUNES, not only of the power of making Laws, but of interposing [intercession] of holding assemblies and receiving appeals; and for this he cites Cic. de Leg. l. iii. Cæs. Com. de Bell. Civ. Florus, Plutarch, &c. I have not been able to find all this either in the authors named, or in, &c. We have Cæsar's authority for Sylla's leaving to the TRIBUNES the power of INTERCESSION. Neque etiam extremi JURIS INTERCESSIONE retinendi, QUOD L. SYLLA RELIQUERAT facultas tribuitur. Cæs. de Bell. Civ. l. i. c. 5. And we have, seemingly, Cicero's authority for Sylla's leaving to the TRIBUNES the power of receiving appeals: unless by potestatem auxilii ferendi he means no more than the power of preventing oppressive laws, by their Veto. Quamobrem in ista quidem re vehementer Syllam probo, qui TRIBUNIS PLEB. suâ lege injuriæ faciendæ POTESTATEM ademerit, AUXILII FERENDI RELIQUERIT. Cic. de Leg. iii. 9.

M. Crevier (upon what authority I know not) writes, that, by one of Sylla's ordinances, the TRIBUNES were to be always elected out of the body of the SENATE: To Appian, it was not clear that Sylla made this regulation; though it afterwards prevailed, ἐκ τῆς σινοῦς ἀρχῆς, &c. nec constat an eam [Tribunitiam dignitatem] ut nunc est a Plebe ad Senatum transtulerit. App. de Bell. Civ. p. 413.

N. B. Whether this regulation was made by Sylla, or afterwards, it carries a proof, that the Quæstors did not always, by their office, become Senators, as Dr. Middleton will have it; or that the Tribunes did not, in their way to the Tribuneship, always pass through the Quæstorship, for which the Doctor likewise contends.

Y. R. 572.

App. de
Bell. Civ.
p. 413.

And by decreeing, that no citizen, who had served in the office of TRIBUNE, should ever be capable of holding any superior dignity : a decree which would naturally hinder all persons, whose high birth, or extraordinary talents, might render them formidable to the Aristocratic faction, from seeking, or even coveting the Tribuneship

D. Hal.
l. ii.
Diod.
l. xxxviii.

Not content with humbling the PEOPLE, by this diminution of the power of their TRIBUNES, the DICTATOR took from the Tribes the privilege, they had obtained by the Domitian law, of filling up, by their elections, the vacancies which happened in the several colleges of the PONTIFS, AUGURS, and GUARDIANS OF THE SIBYLLINE BOOKS ; and restored to these colleges the power of supplying their vacancies by CO-OPTATION : increasing, at the same time, the number of members in each college from TEN TO FIFTEEN.

App. de
Bell. Civ.
p. 413, 414.
Pigh ann.

With regard to the CIVIL MAGISTRACY, the DICTATOR enacted, that, whereas certain intervals had been required by Law between the offices of ÆDILE and PRÆTOR, and of PRÆTOR and CONSUL, it should be permitted, for the future, to sue for the higher office immediately after having held the lower. No man, however, was to stand for the Prætorship, who had not been Quæstor ; nor for the Consulship, who had not been Prætor : and he revived the Law, which forbade the conferring on any citizen a second Consulship, before ten years were elapsed from his holding that dignity ^c.

Pomp. de
Orig. Jur.

And, having first augmented the number of the PRÆTORS from SIX TO EIGHT, he decreed, that of these eight, six, at least, should continue at Rome, a whole year, to preside in the several courts of justice, and should, afterwards, have their provinces assigned them by lot.

Cic. Phil.
lip. 2.

And whereas it was the custom for the Prætors, when they entered on their office, to fix up an edict, declaring the method in which they would proceed in trying causes during their year ; which method their successors (being under no obligation to observe it) did not observe, so that the forms of process were continually changing ; Sylla, to remedy this inconvenience, ordained, that the PRÆTORS should always use one and the same method in their judicial proceedings.

Cic. in
Verr. 4.

And he further decreed, that it should no longer be permitted to reject above three of the Judges appointed to sit upon a cause : and that in criminal causes the votes might be taken, either publicly, or privately, at the option of the person accused.

^c This law had been often violated of late years, and if Sylla restored it at this time, he himself afterwards dispensed with it : For, the very next year, he caused himself to be elected Consul, though he had been in that magistracy but seven years before. M. Crevier, therefore, with reason, thinks it probable that the revival of this law was not till after the second Consulship of Sylla.

The antient penalties for bribery and corruption in trials were revived, and such precautions taken, as would be most likely to recover the honour of the Senatorian Judges, who, formerly, when in possession of the Judicature, had not behaved themselves in a manner that did them much credit.

V. R. 672.
Bct. Chr.
80.
371 Conf.

To these regulations concerning the SENATE, the PRIESTS, and the MAGISTRATES OF THE CITY, the DICTATOR added others relating to the GOVERNORS OF THE PROVINCES. He decreed, that no Governor should lead his army out of his province, or himself leave the province, without an order from the Roman people, or Senate.

That whoever was sent with any command into a province, should hold that command till he was expressly recalled; whereas, before, the office of a commander continued no longer than a set time, upon the expiration of which, if no successor came, he was put to the trouble and inconvenience of getting a new commission from the Senate.

Cic. Ep. 9.
ad. Lentul.
& ad Attic.
Ep. 6. l.
iii.

Nor was any commander to remain, after the arrival of his successor, more than thirty days in his province.

Nor, at his departure from it, to exact from the inhabitants a greater sum than was allowed by the laws.

Cic. Ep.
Fam. 6. l.
iii.

The reformation of the morals of private men^a had likewise some share of the DICTATOR's attention.

Ever since the times of the civil wars, when licentiousness universally prevailed, the crimes of perjury, forgery, robbery, rape, poisoning, and assassination, had been very common. He undertook to check the farther progress of these evils, by enforcing the penalties, which the ancient laws had denounced against the guilty. and by making the sanctions even more severe: Only, with regard to assassins, an exception was made in favour of those who had killed any of the proscribed.

Cic. pro
Cluent.

As to the rest of the proscribed, who by flight had escaped being murdered, he made a law, that, where-ever they were found, they should be put to death as enemies of the Republic; and that all who had concealed them, should be subject to the same penalty: That their estates should be sold by auction, and their children should be for ever incapable of holding any magistracy: but that such persons as had embraced his party in the late troubles should have the privilege of bearing honours before they were, legally, capable by age.

Cic. pro
Ros. Am.
Plin. l. vii.
Quintil. l.
xi. c. 1.
Cic. in Pis.

At the public sale of some of the confiscated estates he himself pre-

^a We are told, that he laid a restraint upon the disposition to make expensive entertainments; but that he did this, chiefly, with a view to lower the price of provisions: That he likewise made a law to repress the prevailing folly of making costly and pompous funerals. Macrob. Sat. l. iii. Cic. Verr. 3. Plin. l. xxxiii. A. Gell. l. ii. c. 24.

Y. R. 672.

Cic. de
Off. xi. 8.
Plut.

sided, calling them spoils, as if they had been taken from a foreign enemy : and the estates, which he gave away, he bestowed in so despotic and haughty a manner, as by this to give more offence, than even by the violence with which he had seized them. He made presents of the revenues of a whole city, a whole province, to women, to musicians, to players, and to the most worthless freedmen^a.

But the Dictator did not confine his bounties to that sort of people ; he extended them to his most illustrious partizans, and particularly to the gold-thirsty Crassus^b.

Notwithstanding the low^c price at which the estates of many persons were sold, near two millions sterling, arising from the confiscations, came into the public treasury.

While

^a Cicero, in his oration for the poet Archias, mentions one of Sylla's presents made in pleasantry. When the Dictator was presiding at the sales, a bad poet presented him with an epigram, which had no other resemblance to poetry, than that every line was longer or shorter than the line which stood next to it. To reward his zeal, Sylla gave him something of what was then exposed to sale, but upon express condition, that he should make no more verses.

^b We are told, that for the sake of seizing upon the fortune of a very rich man, Crassus ventured, of his own private authority, to proscribe him ; and that this so highly displeased Sylla, that he never after gave him any employment. Plut. in Crass.

^c The estate of Sextus Roscius, worth about 60,000 l. was sold for less than 70 l. to Cbryseogenus, a favourite freedman of Sylla.

This Roscius, one of the most considerable citizens of Ameria (now Amelia in the dutchy of Spoleto;) was assassinated in Rome ; and, though it was several months after the cessation of proscriptions, his name, in order to screen the murderers, was foisted into the list of the proscribed, by the contrivance of Cbryseogenus ; who, for the trifling sum above-mentioned, got the estate of the deceased adjudged to him : and the more effectually to secure his possession of it, he engaged Sylla to direct a prosecution against the son of Roscius, as the murderer of his father [Plut. in Sylla.]

“ and had provided evidence to convict him ;
“ so that the young man was like to be deprived, not only of his fortune, but, by a more villainous cruelty, of his honour also, and his life. All the old advocates re“ fused to defend him, fearing the power of the prosecutor, and the resentment of Sylla, “ [Cic. pro Rosc. Amer. 10, 11.] since Roscius's defence would necessarily lead them “ into many complaints on the times and the oppressions of the great : but Cicero (who was then but in his twenty-seventh year) “ readily undertook it. The popularity of his cause, and the favour of the audience, “ gave him such spirits, that he exposed the insolence and villainy of the favourite Cbryseogenus with great gaiety ; and ventured “ even to mingle several bold strokes at Sylla himself ; which he took care to palliate, by “ observing, that through the multiplicity of Sylla's affairs, who reigned as absolute on earth as Jupiter did in heaven, it was not “ possible for him to know, and necessary even to connive at many things, which his favorites did against his will [pro Rosc. 45.]

“ He would not complain, he says, in times like those, that an innocent man's estate was exposed to public sale ; for were it allowed to him to speak freely on that head, Roscius was “ not a person of such consequence, that he should make a particular complaint on his account ;
“ but he must insist upon it, that by the law of the proscription itself, whether it was Flaccus's the Inter-rex, or Sylla's the Dictator,
“ for he knew not which to call it, Roscius's estate was not forfeited, nor liable to be sold,
“ [ib. 43.] In the conclusion, he puts the Judges in mind, that nothing was so much aimed at by the prosecutors in this trial, as, by the condemnation of Roscius, to gain a precedent for destroying the children of the proscribed : he conjures them therefore by all the Gods, not to be the authors of reviving a second

While Sylla was thus employed in new-modelling the State, the war went on abroad against the remains of the Marian faction, in all parts whithersoever any of them had fled ².

Y. R. 672.
Ber. Clu.
80.
371 Conf.

In Italy, Nola and Volaterræ made a brave defence for two years, but were at length reduced and levelled with the ground.

When Pompey had established the peace of Sicily, he received orders to go into Africa, where Domitius Ænobarbus, Cinna's son-in-law, supported by Hiarbas, king of one part of Numidia, was assembling forces. Pompey left the island with six legions, 120 ships of war and 800 transports, loaded with all kinds of stores. Part of the fleet anchored at Utica, the rest at Carthage.

Plut. in
Pomp.

His march was retarded a few days by a ridiculous adventure. Some soldiers having found a treasure in the field, where the camp was pitched, the whole army became at once confidently persuaded, that the field was full of gold and silver, hid under ground by the Carthaginians in the time of their calamities. Instantly every man furnished himself with a pick-ax, and to digging they went. Pompey, not being able to divert them from their pursuit, only laughed at the sight of so many thousand men turning up the earth to so little purpose. Weary at length of their fruitless labour, they signified to their General, that they had been justly punished for their credulity, and were ready to march whithersoever he pleased to lead them. A battle ensued; victory declared for Pompey, whereupon his soldiers proclaimed him Imperator. He declined the honour, which, he said, he could not deserve, so long as the enemy's camp subsisted. Hereupon they instantly marched to attack it, though the day was far spent. Pompey, in the heat of the late battle, not giving a ready answer to one of his soldiers who asked him the word, had like to have been killed by him; for which reason, he fought in the present action bare-headed. Domitius was killed, and his camp taken: Of 20,000 men, whereof his army had consisted, scarce 3000 escaped. The whole country presently submitted, and Pompey entered Numidia: Hiarbas being killed, or taken prisoner, his dominions were given to Hiempsal, king of another part of Numidia. This expedition, so successful and glorious for Pompey, being finished in forty days, he straight returned to Utica.

"cond proscription, more barbarous and cruel
"than the first: that the Senate refused to bear
"any part in the first, lest it should be thought "to be authorized by the public council: that it "was their business, by this sentence, to put a "stop to that spirit of cruelty, which then pos"sessed the city, so pernicious to the Republic,
"and so contrary to the character and temper
"of their ancestors.——— Roscius was ac"quitted, to the great honour of Cicero."

See Midd. Life of Cicero, Vol. I. p. 37—40.

* Norbanus (the colleague of Scipio in the Consulship, year of Rome 670) who had taken refuge in Rhodes, upon the first news of a demand from Sylla to deliver him up, killed himself in the Forum of the city.

Y. R. 6-2.
B.C. Chr.
80.
371 Cons.

On his arrival there, he received orders from Sylla to send back his whole army, except one legion, with which he was to remain in the province till a successor came. Pompey, though much displeased with these orders, resolved to obey. His troops were not of that mind : They mutinied openly, and declared they would not suffer him to put himself defenceless into the hands of the Dictator, whom they made no scruple to call a tyrant. Pompey did all he could to appease them, but, notwithstanding his intreaties and even tears, they replaced him several times upon his Tribunal, nor could he quiet them till he had protested, that, if they did not cease their violence, he would instantly kill himself.

Magde.
Plut.

This commotion, in the first accounts brought of it to Rome, was related so imperfectly, that Sylla imputed it to Pompey, and, on that occasion, said, it was his destiny to be obliged in his old age to make war with children, meaning the younger Marius and Pompey. But when the matter came to be cleared up, and the public had declared in favour of the young conqueror, the Dictator resolved to do him all kinds of honour; and, accordingly, went out to meet him on his arrival at Rome, and saluted him by the title of THE GREAT *. Nevertheless, when Pompey demanded a triumph, the Dictator refused it, representing to him, “ That, by law, “ no one could have that honour, who had not been Consul or Prætor : “ For which reason, it had not been granted to the first Scipio Africanus, “ who had done very great things in Spain : that if a man, too young to “ have even a place in the Senate, should be allowed to triumph, it would “ render odious, not only him, who, contrary to law, received that ho- “ nour, but the supreme magistrate who granted it.” And he concluded with expressly declaring to him, that he would not suffer him to triumph. Pompey, in answer, desired him to consider, that the rising sun had more worshippers than the setting sun. Sylla did not hear these words, but, observing an air of astonishment upon every face, he asked the meaning of it. Then somebody repeated what Pompey had said : and the Dictator, struck with the boldness of the expression, instantly cried out, Let him triumph, Let him triumph.

Accordingly, the young General, not even a Senator, a Roman Knight only, had a triumph * for his victories over Harbas and the Numidians :

* According to Plutarch, this was the origin of that surname given to Pompey. But Livy, (l. xxx.) in fine, makes it owing to the flattery of his friends. Be that as it will, he did not himself assume the title till some years after, when he made war against Sertorius in Spain. Plut.

* We are told, that Pompey's soldiers, not being content with the money he had distributed among them, threatened to interrupt the ceremony of his triumphal procession; and that he declared, he would rather renounce his Triumph, than humour them; which made Servilius, an eminent Senator, say of him, that he now deserved the honour, and was truly GREAT. Plut.

and

and the people were highly delighted to see him, after he had received that honour, continue still in the Equestrian rank. Y.R. 672.

Sylla, though he retained the Dictatorship, did not chuse to abolish the Consulship. At the usual time for electing Consuls, he caused himself, together with Q. Cecilius Metellus Pius, to be named to that magistracy. The Dictator had a particular kindness for Metellus Pius, as being the first Roman General, who, with an army, had joined him. Y.R. 673.
B.C. Chr.
79.
372 Conf.

Though Sylla, by the methods which have been related, had secured to his interest the principal Nobles, and indeed the whole Senate, he would not neglect to make himself creatures, even among the lowest order. Of the slaves belonging to the proscribed he enfranchised 10,000 young men; who all became Roman citizens, and, from the name of their patron Cornelius, were (according to custom) called Cornelians. But the most powerful support, which he provided for himself and his party, were the military colonies which he distributed throughout all Italy. Having confiscated the lands of a great number of municipal cities, which had favoured his enemies, he divided those lands amongst the officers and soldiers of three and twenty legions. These amounted to above 100,000 fighting men, who, owing their fortunes and establishment to his decrees, would, of course, be ever ready to support both him and them.

By all these murders, proscriptions, confiscations, grants, laws, and regulations, Sylla became able, with safety, to abdicate the Dictatorship, and return to a private life; which he did soon after. His first step towards the execution of this design, was a refusal of the people's offer to continue him in the Consulship. He caused his old friend, P. Servilius Vatia (afterwards surnamed Isauricus), and App. Claudius Pulcher, to be elected Consuls. Y.R. 674.
B.C. Chr.
78.
373 Conf.

And now, to the great astonishment of the public, Sylla, in the highest fortune to which any mortal had ever attained, and in possession of the most extensive despotism, resigned, of his own mere motion, and without the least compulsion from any quarter, the reins of government to the new Consuls, and retired from public life^a.

The ceremony of his abdication passed in the calmest manner possible. Appian. He came to the Forum with his lictors and guards, mounted the

^a Metellus Numidicus, the father of Pius, had been banished by Saturninus, and restored by the Tribune Calidius. This Calidius, standing for the Prætorship, Metellus Pius not only solicited the people for him, in the most pressing manner, but, though actually Consul, and of the first class of the Nobles, condescended to stile Calidius his patron, and the protector of his family. Cic. pro Plane.

^b We are told, that Sylla was the last of the Roman Generals, who removed the bounds, and enlarged the circumference of the city. This was an honour and privilege permitted to those only, who by their exploits, had extended the empire of the Republic. Tacit. xii. 23. Sen. de Benef. v. 16.

Y. R. 674. ^{Bef. Chr.} ³⁻⁵ Conf. Ros^{tr}a, and, from thence, declared to the people assembled, that he abdicated the Dictatorship, and was ready to give an account of his administration to any person who should require it of him. He then came down, dismissed his lictors and guards, and accompanied only with a small number of his friends, walked serenely up and down the Forum, every body struck with amazement, and scarce believing the testimony of their own eyes *. He received no affront, no mark of disrespect, but from one young man: This youth not only attacked him with injurious language, while in the Forum; but with repeated insults and reproaches, followed him quite to his house. Sylla seemed undisturbed; he only said, as he entered the door, The behaviour of this young fellow will binder any man, who may hereafter be in the station which I have held, from ever entertaining the thoughts of quitting it.

Plut. in
Sylla &
Pomp.

Sylla, when he abdicated his sovereign power, did not renounce all attention to public affairs; he endeavoured to hinder Lepidus from being chosen Consul for the ensuing year, but failed of success; because Pompey with his whole credit, supported the candidate. Observing, that Pompey was much elated with this victory, he said to him; You have great reason, indeed, to triumph; it is a glorious exploit to have caused Lepidus, the most seditious of men, to be named to the Consulship, and even before Catulus, the most virtuous citizen of Rome. Be upon your guard, however; for you have been arming an enemy against yourself.

Y. R. 675.
^{77.}
³⁻⁴ Conf. ^{Bef. Chr.}

The next year, when M. Æmilius Lepidus and Q. Lutatius Catulus had the Consular Fasces, was the last of Sylla's life.

* Sylla, after his abdication, made an offering of a tenth part of his effects to Hercules. On this occasion, he feasted the people during several days; and such profusion there was in his banquets, that every day a great quantity of provisions was thrown into the Tiber. During this feast his wife Metella fell dangerously sick. Religious rejoicings were not to be profaned by any melancholy circumstances of death, or mourning. Sylla, therefore, exemplary religious, did, by order of the Pontifices, send her a bill of divorce, and caused her to be carried, while yet living, into another house. In this particular he was a strict observer of the law; but at his wife's funeral he violated a law, which he himself had made, to limit the expence of funerals, as he did likewise that which he had enacted against too expensive entertainments. To console himself for his loss, he passed his days in luxurious feasting and debauchery. Some months after, he entertained the public with a show of gladiators; and as, on those days, men and women sat promiscuously together, Valeria (the daughter of Metella, and sister of Hortensius, the famous orator) who had been, a few days before, divorced from her husband, happened to sit near Sylla; she was beautiful, gay, and lively, but virtuous, and of an unblemished reputation. She came behind him, and, resting her hand gently upon his shoulder, took away a thread of his robe, and then returned to her seat. He, turning about, looked as if surprized at her familiarity; whereupon Valeria accosted him thus, "It was not out of any want of respect, but from a desire to partake of your good fortune." Vid. supra. [p. 164.] Sylla was not displeased with this answer, and they immediately made love to each other by their eyes, and, in a short time after, he married her. His marriage, however, with the beautiful Valeria, did not prove a charm sufficient to restrain him from an infamous commerce with actresses and singing-women.

He

He had retired to his country-house at Cumæ, where he abandoned himself to pleasure. In the midst of his banquetings and debaucheries he was seized with an horrible distemper, called the Louy Disease; his entrails were corrupted, and his flesh was full of vermin, the multitude and rapid propagation of which rendered fruitless all the pains that could be taken to make him clean, by bathing and rubbing him, and continually changing his linen. In this miserable condition, to divert his thoughts as much as possible from it, he had recourse to business. Ten days before his death, being informed that the people of Puteoli, in his neighbourhood, were at variance among themselves, he drew them up a body of bye-laws for their better government.

Y. R. 675.

Appian.
Plut.

He amused himself likewise with revising, or enlarging, his Commentaries, which are frequently quoted by Plutarch. About three days before he died he made his will, in which he remembered all his friends, except Pompey, to whom he left no legacy: nor did he name him among the guardians of his son, then an infant almost in the cradle; but he expressed great affection for Lucullus, to whom he inscribed his commentaries, and whom he appointed to be one of his son's guardians. And, it is said, that this gave birth to the misunderstanding between Lucullus and Pompey, which arose afterwards to a very great height.

Appian.
Plut. in
Pom. &
Lucull.

A few days before his death he composed his own epitaph, wherein we may read, not only his true character, but a satisfactory answer to that question, How could Sylla, after so many murders, and other violences, relinquish with safety his sovereign power? The epitaph was in substance to this effect, that no man had ever outdone him, either in obliging his friends, or in avenging himself on his enemies.

Some think, that Sylla's abdication the Dictatorship infallibly proved, that ambition was not his predominant passion^a, and that he had seized the sovereign power only to make sure of his revenge. This vindictive spirit continued with him to the last, as appears by his treatment of Granius, the chief Magistrate of Puteoli. A certain tax had been imposed on all the cities for the reparation of the Capitol. Granius had received the contributions of his fellow-citizens, but deferred paying in the money, imagining he should be able to retain it for his own use, in case Sylla died soon. Sylla informed of this, and enraged at the insolence of a man who built hopes upon the prospect of his speedy death, sent for him and caused him to be strangled in his presence. The anger and violent agitation he was in, on this occasion, broke an imposthume within him: He threw up a vast quantity of black and corrupted blood, and died the night following through extremity of pain, having concluded all the acts of his life with a stroke of dear revenge.

Plut. in
Sylla.

^a Others are of opinion, that this is no proof of moderation in the ambition of Sylla; but rather of his good sense and prudence, being aware that he had made some of his creatures (Pompey in particular) too powerful to remain subject to his despotism.

Y.R. 675.

Appian.
 PAUL. in Sylla &
 Pomp.

Such was the end of the famous Cornelius Sylla. The Consuls had a warm dispute about his funeral. Lepidus was for having him privately interred in the burying-place of his ancestors; but Catulus, supported by Pompey, prevailed to have his body carried in great pomp through the streets of Rome, and burnt in the Campus Martius; Sylla being the first of the Patrician branch of the Cornelian family, whose corpse was not interred. It was feared that his bones might one day be treated as he had treated those of Marius, which he had caused to be dug up, and thrown into the river. The tomb in which the ashes of Sylla were deposited, was in Plutarch's time still to be seen in the Campus Martius, with that epitaph upon it which has been before mentioned.

C H A P. II.

LEPIDUS attempts, unsuccessfully, an imitation of SYLLA. In 676, POMPEY is sent into Spain against SERTORIUS.

THE dangerous example of a private Citizen, who had found means to raise himself to sovereignty, and maintain himself in it, made those who came after him sensible that the Romans could bear a master; a discovery which proved the source of more revolutions. SCARCE were the eyes of Sylla closed, when Lepidus formed the project of ascending to the same height of power.

* From his house at Cama, where he died, his body dressed in a triumphal robe, was carried to Rome upon a bed of state, glittering with gold; four and twenty Lictors walked before it with the rods and axes. Of those persons who had served under him, and had partaken of his favours, so great a number came to pay their last duties to their General, that they formed rather the appearance of an army, than that of a funeral procession. In the ceremony of his obsequies, the colleagues of the priests, and the vestals surrounded the corpse; then marched the Senate, with the Magistrates habited in the robes of their respective dignities: after these came the Roman Knights; and the troops, with their golden eagles and arms resplendent with silver, closed the march; the trumpets all the way sounding mournful airs.

When they came to the Forum, they stopped; and there (Sylla's son Faustus being too young for the office) the best orator of Rome

(who is not named) made the funeral panegyric: after which, (if we may believe Appian, whom M. Crevier thinks undeserving of credit, in this instance) some of the most vigorous of the younger Senators took the body upon their shoulders, and carried it to the Campus Martius, where the funeral pile was erected. The ladies signalized their respect for the deceased, by an almost incredible quantity of aromatic spices, furnished at their expence, to be consumed on this occasion. For beside 210 great baskets of perfumes, they had caused a statue of Sylla to be made to the life, and another of a Lictor bearing the Fasces before him, and both of cinnamon and other precious aromatics.

[Need we any other proof of the perfect security with which Sylla could retire from public life, when we find he had thus gained the hearts of the Roman ladies?] The Knights and principal officers of the troops set fire to the pile.

We have frequently seen, in the course of this History, that the great men of Rome, to promote the views of their ambition, had made use of one of these two pretences, the interest of the PEOPLE, or that of the SENATE. Lepidus had indeed, to accommodate himself to the circumstances of things at that time, declared for the SENATE: But as his colleague Catulus, Pompey, Metellus, and Crassus, all men of more weight and interest than himself, were the chiefs of that faction, he thought he should make a more considerable figure, if he espoused the Marian cause; most of whose champions had been destroyed in the civil war. To give new life to this faction, at this time almost extinguished, he proposed to abolish some of the Laws made by Sylla. Catulus, the other Consul, opposed his design with a steady courage and resolution. Hereupon the two factions ranged themselves under their respective leaders. Lepidus had gained the populace. He raised forces in Hebruria, where the remains of Marius's faction had made a brave defence during two years. He drew together all the proscribed who had escaped death: and when his partizans were sufficiently numerous to form an army, he took off the mask, and put himself at their head.

As his strength was not yet considerable, Catulus was of opinion, that he should be pushed to the utmost; but the majority of the SENATE inclined to gentler measures, and to negotiation; they sent deputies to Lepidus, and an accommodation was concluded; the principal conditions were, that the two Consuls should take an oath not to employ arms against each other, and that Lepidus should have the government of Gallia Narbonensis, with the command of an army.

This army he led into the Province assigned him, and there remained till the year of his Consulship was expired, without returning to Rome to hold the Assembly for electing new Consuls, which it was his function to do. We are told, that he thought his oath obliged him no longer than the year of his office; at the expiration of which he should be at liberty to employ, against his adversaries, those forces which they had imprudently put into his hands. The year expiring without the election of new magistrates, an interregnum ensued: and Lepidus, leaving in Gallia Cisalpine, a body of troops under M. Brutus, to keep that country in his interest, advanced with the greater part of his forces to demand at Rome a second Consulship.

Among the fragments of Sallust, there is an harangue, spoken on this occasion, by the orator Philippus. He reproached the Senators with their

“ When you entered into a treaty with “ Lepidus, he was only a thief, supported by “ a small number of cut-throats, always ready “ to risk their blood and their life for “ bread; he is now a Proconsul invested with “ a command, which he did not buy, but
VOL. III.

“ which you gave him. From all quarters
“ he has gathered about him the most corrupt
“ in the different orders, men whose indigence and vices made them capable of daring any thing, and who, tormented with the remembrance of their past crimes, can A a “ and

Y. R. 675.
Bef. Chr.
77.
374 Conf.

Y. R. 675.
Bef. Chr.
77.
374 Conf.

their indolence, whereby they had given a seditious man an opportunity of making himself formidable: and he concluded his speech in the following manner—"As Lepidus is marching with an army against the City, and has associated himself with the vile enemies of the Republic, in contempt of the authority of this Assembly, I am of opinion, that App. Claudius, now Inter-rex, with Q. Catulus the Proconsul, and the rest who are in command, should defend the City, and take care the Commonwealth suffer no detriment."

The Senate made a decree conformable to the opinion of Philippus, whereby they gave an almost unlimited power to those whom they appointed to withstand the enterprizes of Lepidus. And whereas Catulus excelled more in civil virtues than in military skill, they with him associated Pompey, who, though he had contributed to raise Lepidus to the Consulship, did not decline the present commission. A battle was fought under the walls of Rome, near the bridge Milvius. Lepidus, being defeated, retired into Hetruria, and was immediately declared an enemy to his country: Catulus marched in pursuit of him, whilst Pompey went into Cisalpine Gaul, which, as was before mentioned, M. Brutus held for Lepidus.

Y. R. 667.
Bef. Chr.
76.
375 Conf.

In the election of new Consuls, which was probably made about this time, the People's choice fell upon Decimus Brutus and Mamercus Æmilius^d.

Pompey, without difficulty, brought Cisalpine Gaul to obedience; only he was stopt a considerable time before Modena, which Marcus Brutus defended against him: but Brutus, at length, surrendered himself voluntarily, (so Pom-

"and no repose but in seditions; to them peace is a state of violence. These are the men who make insurrection succeed to insurrection, and civil war to civil war; adherents formerly to Saturninus, then to Sulpicius, afterwards to Marius and Damasprius, and lastly to Lepidus.—Are you moved by his proposals? he demands, that to every man should be restored what appertains to him, and is himself rich only by possessing the fortunes of others. He is for having the Laws, founded upon the rights of war, abolished, and to this he would reduce us by force of arms: For the sake of peace and concord he would have you re-establish the Tribunitial power, from which all our civil dissensions arose."

The orator then apostrophizing Lepidus as if present—"O thou the most vile and impudent of mankind, will you persuade us that you are moved by the indigence and tears of the Citizens, whilst you possess nothing that you have not acquired by arms or injustice? You ask a second Consulship, as if "you had resigned the first to the Commonwealth. You desire to restore union and concord, you, who are the only disturber of it. Traitor to the Nobles, whom you ought to defend; perfidious even to those whose interest you pretend to support; an enemy to all persons of worth; void of respect both to Gods and men, whom you have made equally your adversaries, by your perfidies and perjury. Go on then, persist in thy enterprize. The Laws, the Gods of our country raise their voice against thee, and cannot suffer thee in the number of our fellow-citizens. Continue what thou hast begun, that thou mayest quickly feel the just punishment thou hast deserved."

^d Æmilius was very rich, but very frugal; and, to spare himself the expence of the games, which was indeed excessive, he had declined the office of ÆDILE. The People remembered this, and, the first time he stood for the Consulship, rejected him; and were now very far from being unanimous for his promotion.

pey, pey wrote to the Senate) nevertheless the victor, having sent his prisoner under a guard to Reggio, dispatched thither an officer, named Geminus, to kill him: And then, in a second letter to the Senate, changed his style and calumniated Brutus. This was the father of the famous Marcus Brutus, who never forgave Pompey, till he was engaged to it by a regard to [what he called] the public interest.

Y. R. 676
Bef. Chr.
76
375 Cons.
Plut. in Brut.

Catulus, having driven Lepidus into a corner of Hetruria, reduced him to the necessity of fighting; and Pompey arriving opportunely from Cisalpine Gaul, determined the victory in favour of the Consul. Lepidus, with what remained of his troops, escaped into Sardinia. He had no success, the Prætor Triarius prevented his seizing any place. A domestic grief completed his distress. He learnt that his wife Apuleia was false to him. He divorced her; but, as he continued to love her, grief and vexation threw him into a disorder, of which he died. Perperna drew together the wreck of the army, and went with it into Spain; where Sertorius supported the remains of Marius's faction.

Plut. in
Pomp.
Plin. vii.
46.

Thus ended the commotions raised by Lepidus. The SENATE, contented with having re-established peace, granted an amnesty to those who had been concerned in the last disturbances; and their decree was supported by a decree of the PEOPLE, of which Cæsar was considered as the author: not only the general interest of the Marian faction, which he favoured, might induce him to this, but the private interest of his brother-in-law, L. Cinna, who had been engaged in the cause of Lepidus, and who obtained, by this amnesty, leave to return to Rome. The SENATE's view, in their lenity on the present occasion, was to hinder the fugitives from going (through despair) to augment the forces of Sertorius, already too formidable.

Suet. in
Cæs. v.

Against this General, under whose command were gathered all that now remained of Marius's faction, Metellus Pius conducted the war in Spain, with little success; for he was naturally slow in his motions, and by no means a match for Sertorius in military skill. His high birth, and his reputation of eminent virtue, secured him from the affront of being recalled; but it was thought expedient to send him a colleague to be his assistant. Pompey, ambitious of the employment, had, for this reason, under various pretexts, kept his troops together at a small distance from Rome, though Catulus had ordered him to dismiss them. The Senate, having more confidence in the abilities of Pompey, than of any other of their Generals, determined to send him into Spain with the title of Proconsul, notwithstanding the objection made by some of the Senators, That it would be a strange thing to see a Citizen, and of no higher rank than that of a Roman Knight, invested with Proconsular authority^d.

C H A P.

^d To this objection L. Philippus is reported to have answered: In my opinion, it is not to supply the place of one Consul, but of both Consuls, that Pompey ought to be sent into Spain.

C H A P. III.

The War of SERTORIUS in Spain.

Y. R. 676. IT has been already mentioned, that, after Sylla had, by his wonted arts of corruption, gained over to him the army of the Consul Scipio, Ser- torius^c retired into Spain; which province had fallen to him by lot, after his Prætorship. He found the passes of the Pyrenees in the possession of the Barbarians, whom only money could render tractable. Some of his officers thought it would be disgraceful for a Roman Proconsul to pay a kind of toll to the mountaineers for leave to pass: but Sertorius laughed at this unseasonable delicacy, telling them he should never make a scruple to buy TIME, which of all things is the most precious to those who have engaged in important enterprizes. He purchased his passage, entered Spain, armed with all expedition what Romans he found there (of an age to serve,) and provided himself with engines of war, and with triremes [gallies of three benches of oars.]

Vid. supra,
 p. 155.
 [Y. 670.]

The oppressive rapaciousness of the last Prætors had created in the minds of the Spaniards an aversion to the Roman government. Sertorius spared no pains to conciliate their good-will; he gained the principal persons of the several Cantons by his affability and kindness, and the multitude by lessening the taxes: But what more particularly obliged the Spaniards was, that, instead of taking up his quarters within the cities, he erected tents without the walls of them, and there made his whole army pass the winter.

No sooner had Sylla possessed himself of the sovereign power, but he ordered Annius with an army into Spain. Sertorius, to hinder his entrance, shut up the passes of the Pyrenees, with 6000 foot, under the command of Livius Salinator. The assassination of Livius, by one Cal- purnius Lanarius, opened the way to Sylla's General; and Sertorius, not being in a condition to keep the field against him, retired with 3000 men into Cartagena; where he staid no longer, than till he could get vessels,

Spain. L. Philippus dixisse dicitur, non se illum, sua sententiâ, pro Consul, sed pro Consul-libus mittere. Cic. pro Lege Manil. lxii.

^c According to Vell. Pat. l. ii. c. xrv.
Sertorius, after the army had abandoned the Consul Scipio, under whom he served, fell into Sylla's hands, who dismissed him with life; as he did Scipio, and many others.—
Consulem, ut prædiximus, exarmatumque Serto-rium (proh quanti max belli facem!) & multos alios, potitus eorum, dimisit incolumes. But Plu- tarch speaks of Sertorius, as immediately retiring to his government of Spain, upon Sci- pio's refusing to listen to his advice, when he warned him to be upon his guard against the wiles of Sylla, who pretended to be desirous of peace.

whereon

whereon to embark his troops. He cruised some time upon the coasts of Spain and Africa; and in vain attempted to make descents in different places. At length, having added a few small ships of Cilician pirates to his fleet, he passed the Streights, and landed a little beyond the mouth of the Bætis, now called the Guadalquivir. Y. R. 676.
Bef. Chr. 76.
375 Conf.

While he was there, some mariners, newly arrived from the Atlantic or Fortunate Islands, gave so charming a description of them, as made him seriously entertain the thought of retiring thither, to pass the remainder of his life in an innocent tranquillity, far from the din of war and the horrors of tyranny. He proposed this to his followers; but the scheme was not suited to the disposition of pirates. They quitted him, and sailed to Mauritania, where, having found two parties at war with each other, they offered their assistance to one of them. Sertorius, apprehensive of being abandoned by his remaining friends and troops, passed thither likewise, and joined the other party, which he easily rendered victorious; and when, by the taking of Tingis, he was become master of the country, he did not deceive those who had reposed confidence in him, but, restoring all that belonged to them, accepted only of a reasonable recompence: and this enabled him to subsist for some time the small body of troops, that was then his sole support. The Canaries.
Tangier.

His thoughts were full of anxiety about the event of things, when he very opportunely received an embassy from the Lusitanians, earnestly inviting him to put himself at their head. This people still defended their liberty against the Romans, and finding themselves hard pressed at that time, had recourse to Sertorius, as to the only General that could protect them; so great a reputation had he acquired in Spain, during his short appearance there. Nor were they mistaken in their opinion of him. No captain of his time surpassed him in personal bravery, boldness of enterprize, and execution, nor equalled him in stratagem: On which account the Spaniards called him Hannibal. He understood likewise perfectly well, how to gain the confidence and affection of his soldiers, liberally rewarding merit, and punishing faults with reluctance. Naturally full of strength and agility, he preserved those advantages by temperate meals, a plain diet, and a perfect sobriety, and was able chearfully to support the fatigue of long watchings, long marches, and all those other hardships to which an enterprizing warrior must unavoidably be exposed. He never drank to excess, even in his most vacant hours; if he had leisure, his diversion was hunting; which in time of war had its use, because he thereby acquired a perfect knowledge of the country. App. de Bell. C. 1. i. p. 421.
Plut. in Sert.

————— Arva beata
Petamus arva, divites & insulas,
 &c. &c. Hor. Epod. xvi.

Sertorius

Y. R. 676.
 Bef. Chr.
 76
 775 Conf.

Sertorius left Africa with 2600 men, whom he called Romans, and 700 Africans collected from different nations. The Lusitanians supplied him with 4000 light-armed foot and 700 horse. With these forces, he maintained the war against four Roman Generals, who had under them 120,000 foot, 6000 horse, and 2000 bowmen and slingers. They were masters likewise of innumerable cities, whereas Sertorius, at his arrival, had scarce twenty, that recognized his authority. Of the Roman Commanders who were sent against him, he vanquished Cotta in a sea-fight, routed Tidius, Governor of Hispania Bætica, in a battle, wherein he slew 2000 Romans, near the banks of the river Bætis. By his Quæstor he defeated Domitius and Lucius, and Manilius, Proconsul of the other province of Spain; and he cut in pieces the whole army of Thoranius, together with their leader, whom Metellus had detached against him. As for Metellus himself, he was at a loss what conduct to observe with an enemy, that avoided a general action, attacked him when he least expected it, then retreated with expedition, returned presently after to the charge, gave him no repose, nor any opportunity of making advantage of his superior strength. Without fighting, Metellus suffered all the evils that attend a defeat; and Sertorius, by flying, had all the advantages of those who pursue. He hindered his enemies from getting water, and harassed them in foraging: If they advanced, they found Sertorius in their way: if they halted any where, he presently attacked them: if they besieged a city, they were themselves, in a short time, besieged by famine. These things made the soldiers of Metellus weary of the war; and Sertorius having challenged him to single combat, and he declining it, they turned him into ridicule. To retrieve his credit with them, he laid siege to the city of the *Lacabriges, an important enterprize, because Sertorius received great assistance from that place. As there was but one well in the city, and the other waters, used by the inhabitants, were in the suburbs, and fell immediately into the possession of the besiegers, the conquest seemed easy. Fully persuaded, that it would be an affair but of two days, Metellus made his soldiers carry with them no more than five days provisions.

Sertorius, conjecturing his design and his hope, contrived to convey two thousand skins (Borachios) filled with water into the place. The considerable rewards, he promised to each bearer of a skin, made the soldiers, both Spaniards and Mæcres, all competitors for the employment. They had orders to turn out of the town all the useless mouths, so soon as the water was delivered. Metellus, thus disappointed, and beginning to want provisions, detached 6000 men to collect what they could find in the adjacent country. Sertorius laid an ambush for them, surprised them in their return, killed a great number of them, and seized

* This city was in the country now called Old Castile, on the North of the Douro.

the convoy; so that Metellus was constrained disgracefully to raise the siege, and to call in to his aid L. Manilius, who commanded in Gallia Narbonensis. This General, with the three legions he had brought with him, was driven out of the field, and reduced, almost alone, to take refuge in * Ilerda. By this last victory Sertorius opened himself a way into Gaul, and he pushed on quite to the Alps; in the passes of which he posted guards to stop the troops that might be sent against him.

These successes could not fail to make him much admired by the Spaniards; and to his real merit he added artifice, the better to secure their respect and confidence.

A milk-white hind, which had been given him soon after it was weaned, he tamed so well, that it knew his voice, came to him when he called it, and followed him every where. He had no other view, at first, in caressing this animal, than to amuse himself; but, when he saw it so tractable, he conceived the design of making it useful to him. He gave out, that his hind was a present from Diana, and often revealed to him the most secret things. To gain the public belief of this, he used, when he had privately received intelligence of any of the enemies motions, to conceal the bearer of it, and feign that the hind had whispered it to him. The intelligence, pretended to be thus received, always proving true, the Spaniards regarded him as a favourite of the Gods, and hearkened to him, as to a man inspired: and, that he might profit the more by their zeal to serve him, he armed them after the Roman manner, taught them discipline, and made them sensible of the advantage of it.

But nothing contributed more towards his gaining the hearts of the principal men of the nation, than the care he took of the education of their children: for he drew together all those of the highest birth, and placed them in † Osca, a considerable city in those days; and he gave them masters to instruct them in the arts of the Greeks and Romans. The children were in reality hostages; but his professed design, in this measure, was only to qualify them to hold employments in the government, so soon as their years would permit. Their parents with delight beheld them, in robes bordered with purple, walking regularly every day to the public schools: where Sertorius himself (who paid for their schooling) frequently examined into the progress they made; giving rewards to such as deserved well, with permission to wear, hanging at their breasts, the golden Bulla, the ornament worn by the children of the better sort at Rome^a.

^a It was customary with the Spaniards, as with the Gauls and Germans, for every lord to have clients or vassals, who devoted their lives to his service, and took an oath not to survive him. Other chiefs had a small number of men, who adhered to them under these conditions; but as to Sertorius, his adherents of this kind were computed by thousands; and, we are told, that, after some engagement, wherein he had been defeated and was hard pressed by the enemy, the Spaniards, solely intent upon saving him, took him upon their shoulders, and, passing him from one to another, conveyed him within the city walls (near which they then were,) not giving a thought to their own preservation, till they had seen him safe. Plut. in Sert.

Sertorius,

Y. R. 676.
Bef. Chr.
76.
375 Conf.
* Now Lerida.
Ep. Pomp. ad Sen. l. iii.
Hist. Salust.
Plut. in Sertor.

† Huesca in Arragon.

Y. R. 676.
 Bef. Chr.
 76.
 375 Conf.

App. &
 Plut.

Sertorius, notwithstanding the extraordinary affection and respect which the Spaniards expressed for him, preserved to the Romans all the superiority to which they had been accustomed. Of the proscribed Senators who had retired to him, and of the principal persons among his other partisans, he had formed a Senate, consisting of three hundred: affirming, that this was the real Roman Senate, and that the other, at Rome, was only an assembly of Sylla's slaves. Out of his own Senate he chose Quæstors, Lieutenants, and other Commanders, imitating, as much as possible, the government of the Commonwealth. No Spaniard therefore had any command in his army; for he did not propose to strengthen the Barbarians against Rome, but to make use of their assistance to deliver her from the tyranny of the usurper. He is said to have been a most sincere lover of his country, and so passionately desirous of returning to it, that, frequently, when his affairs were most prosperous (never when in a declining state,) he offered to lay down his arms, on condition he might be suffered to live, as a private subject, at home; declaring, that he should chuse rather to be the most obscure citizen of Rome, than, in banishment from thence, to command all the rest of the universe.

With a heart so truly Roman, Sertorius must, necessarily, be esteemed and beloved by the Romans who were in Spain: and of this we have a notable proof in the conduct of Perperna's soldiers. This General was very rich, and of noble birth, and had been Prætor of Rome; where he took up arms, with the Consul Lepidus, to reverse the acts of Sylla, and recal the proscribed Marians; and, after their defeat, he carried off the best part of their troops into Sardinia; and thence into Spain. Though embarked in the same cause with Sertorius, yet, being envious of his glory, he was very unwilling to contribute to its increase by joining him, wishing rather to usurp his power. And with fifty-three cohorts (about 25,000 men,) which he had under his command, he did actually continue separate from him, till advice came that Pompey was ordered into Spain. His troops then declaring to him, that if he did not lead them to Sertorius, they would go without him, he, reluctantly, complied: but his bad disposition was, in the end, more detrimental to the common cause, than the strong reinforcement he brought with him was beneficial.

Plutarch, to shew the ability of Sertorius, relates two particulars of his conduct, before the arrival of Pompey.

The Spaniards, under his command, flushed with their successes, were for marching, at all events, to battle, impatient of their General's delays, who waited for a favourable opportunity. He at first endeavoured to dissuade them by mild remonstrances, but, finding that these had no effect, and that they were eagerly bent on fighting, he determined to let them receive from the enemy a lesson that might teach them prudence, and render them more tractable. The Spaniards, as he had foreseen, were worsted in the engagement, and would have been entirely cut to pieces, if, with great skill, he had not contrived their retreat.

Discouragement, as it usually happens, was just going to succeed to presumption, when Sertorius, to avert this evil, and to give the Spanish soldiers a just sense of the reasons of his conduct, made use of the following device. He caused to be placed in the midst of them two horses, the one lean and old, the other fat and full of vigour, and which had a tail abounding with fine long hairs. By the lean horse stood a strong robust man; near the other a little puny fellow. Upon a signal given, these two men, who were each to pluck off all the hairs of his respective horse's tail, fell to work in the following manner: The strong man graspt the tail of his horse, and pulled with all his might, to bring all off at once. The weak man set himself to pluck off the hairs of his horse's tail one by one. Fatigue to himself, and much laughter from the spectators, were the only effects of the labour of the first: the other finished his enterprize in a reasonable time; not a single hair remained on the tail of his horse. Sertorius then broke silence; "You see, my good allies, how much more efficacious, than force, is perseverance. A numerous and potent army may, in separate parts, be overcome, though we can make no impression on it while it remains one undivided body. Perseverance can do any thing: Time destroys the mightiest powers, and shews itself the good ally of those who are not precipitate in their measures, but prudently wait the proper seasons for action."

Pompey, in his way to Spain, finding the passes of the Alps shut up by the troops which Sertorius had posted there, made himself a new road over those mountains, and a more commodious one than that of Hannibal: After which, continuing his march through Gallia Narbonensis, he retook all the places possessed there by the enemy; then passed the Pyrenees, and filled all Spain with great expectation. Though young, many victories had made his name famous, and prepossessed the public in his favour; inso-much, that the fidelity of those who had hitherto adhered to Sertorius began to waver. But, when the two Generals came to blows, the success did not answer the public opinion: Sertorius re-established his interest with the Spaniards, and acquired new reputation, not only in Spain, but even at Rome.

While Sertorius was besieging Laurona^c, Pompey drew near in order to succour the place; and once imagining, that he had shut up the enemy between the city and his army, vainly boasted, that the Lauronites would have the satisfaction of seeing, from their walls, the besiegers besieged. Sertorius, when informed of this, only laughed, and said, he would teach Sylla's scholar, that a General ought to look more behind than before him: And, accordingly, by means of a body of 6000 men, which he had left in his camp, he kept Pompey in awe, who could not attack him, without exposing himself to be attacked, at the same time, both in front and rear. The

Y. R. 676.
Bel. Chu.
74
375 Conf.

Ep. Pomp.
ap. Pragn.
Sall. Hist.
l. iii.

Plut. in
Pomp. &
Sertor.

^c This city is thought not to have been far from Valencia.

Y. R. 676. young General, perceiving he had been too hasty in his boast, was mortified, ashamed, and perplexed: And, what completely disconcerted him, his foragers fell into an ambush laid for them by Sertorius; and a whole legion, that came to their aid, was itself surrounded, and perished, almost entirely, with its commander. The besieged, having now lost all hope of succour, surrendered at discretion. Sertorius spared the lives of the inhabitants, but burnt their city; not out of cruelty to them, but to cover with shame both Pompey and his admirers, when it should be reported throughout Spain, that a city*, which he had undertaken to relieve, had been burnt before his eyes, and so near him, that he might, almost, have warmed himself by the fire that consumed it.

Frontin.
xi. 4.
Plut. in Sertor.

Thus ended this campaign: both armies went into winter-quarters. Pompey and Metellus passed the season under tents in the Pyrenees, and in the midst of numerous enemies, that harassed them. Sertorius, accompanied by Perperna, retired into Lusitania.

Y. R. 677. It would seem, that, when the operations of war were renewed (in the Consulship of Cn. Octavius and C. Scribonius Curio,) the two armies were each of them divided, so that Hirtuleius, the brave Quæstor of Sertorius, remained in *Betlica, to oppose Metellus; and Sertorius marched towards the country, now called the kingdom of Valencia, to make head against Pompey.

75.
376 Conf.

* Andalusia.

Oros. l. v. Hirtuleius came to an engagement with Metellus, near the city *Italica, and the conflict proved very hot and bloody; both Generals exposed their persons; Metellus's armour was pierced by a dart; Hirtuleius received a wound in his arm, and was at length constrained to quit the field, leaving 20,000 of his men upon the spot. The conqueror owed his victory to his able conduct, in not bringing his men to engage with their enemies till these, who had left their intrenchments at sun-rise, were quite spent with hunger and fatigue, having, without any refreshments, sustained all the heat of the day. Not long after, Hirtuleius, attempting, probably, to retrieve his honour, fell in battle, together with his brother. We are told, that Sertorius, with his own hand, killed the man who brought him the news of this great loss; for, as he was upon the point of giving battle, he feared, that the report, if spread at that critical time, would dishearten his soldiers. That his own courage was not abated, he well demonstrated, when Pompey, having defeated Herennius and Perperna, near Valencia, came in quest of him in the neighbourhood of Sucro†. Both Commanders were desirous of coming to a Frontin.

xi. 7.

Plut. in Sert. & in
Pomp.

* Appian reports, that, at the taking of Lauroa, Sertorius being informed, that one of his soldiers had, in a brutal manner, abused a woman his prisoner, who, to revenge herself, had even torn out his eyes, he not only ordered the criminal to be executed; but, knowing that the whole cohort was infamous for these excesses, he put them all to death, without sparing one, though they were citizens of Rome. Appian, l. i. p. 419.

† Sevilla lies upon the Guadalquivir.

* A city ruined many ages ago, which stood at the mouth of the river Sucro, now the Xucar.

battle battle before Metellus, who was marching from Bætica, should arrive; Sertorius, that he might have fewer enemies upon his hands; Pompey, that he might have no partner in the glory of the success he promised himself. The action did not begin till the evening, Sertorius waiting till then, because he knew, that to his enemies, not well acquainted with the country, the night would be disadvantageous, whether they should be obliged to fly, or have occasion to pursue.

In the beginning of the engagement, Sertorius was at the head of his right wing, and fought with success: but receiving advice that his left had given ground before Pompey, he repaired thither; and his presence changed the face of things in a very short time. Even Pompey's person was twice in the greatest danger: The second time he saved his life by quitting his horse; for it being richly caparisoned, and the Barbarians falling into contention for the spoil, this gave him opportunity to escape.

Sertorius's right wing, after his leaving it, was totally defeated by Afranius, who commanded the left of the enemy: The victorious troops pushed on to the very camp of the vanquished, and began to plunder it. Sertorius, in that instant, arrived, cut off a great number of the plunderers, and forced the rest to retire in disorder.

He prepared for another engagement the next day; but, upon receiving intelligence, that Metellus had joined Pompey, thought it prudent to retire; affecting, however, at the same time, to express an utter contempt for the latter; "If the old woman had not come", I would have sent the boy "back to Rome well chastised."

Not thinking that even the flight of his troops, in one body, would be safe, he commanded them to disperse themselves; but assigned them a rendezvous: for this was his method, and what the Barbarians were accustomed to; so that sometimes he was in the mountains almost alone; and, presently after, saw himself at the head of a numerous army. This sudden re-assembling of the dispersed soldiers into one great body Plutarch compares to the flowing and concentrating of the melted snows, so as to form one mighty torrent.

What, at this time, gave Sertorius no small concern, his hind, during the tumult of the last battle, and the plundering of his camp, was lost; and he now wanted her service more than ever for keeping the Barbarians in respect. Fortunately some of his soldiers met her in a wood, and, knowing her, brought her to him. He promised them a great reward, if they would keep the thing secret; and, having caused her to be hid for some days, one morning he put on an air of gaiety, and told the Spanish ⁿ Why old? he was but fifty-two; for when he served under his father, in Numidia, in the year 645, he was only Twenty years of age (vid. supra, p. 44.) yet Plutarch always speaks of him as, at this time, weighed down with years, almost superannuated.

Y. R. 677. chiefs, who were with him, that he had, the night before, had a dream, B. C. 1 hr. which foretold him some happy event by the favour of the Gods. After 376 C. C. 75. this, he, according to custom, gave audience to those who had business with him. The hind was on a sudden let go, and, seeing Sertorius, came skipping to him, laid her head upon his knees, and licked his right-hand, which he held out to her. Sertorius caressed her with an extreme tenderness, even to shedding some tears. The Barbarians were at first struck with astonishment, but then, recovering themselves, shouted loudly for joy, regarding him as a favourite of heaven, and as a person above the rank of mortal men.

Plut. in
 Pomp.

At the arrival of Metellus, Pompey would have lowered his Fasces before him, as before his senior and superior; but Metellus would not suffer it; indeed he always treated Pompey as his colleague and equal (with this exception only, that, when they encamped together, Metellus alone gave the word;) and to Metellus's opinion Pompey constantly paid a respectful difference.

Plut. in Sertor.

The two Generals, in this perfect concert, marched in quest of Serto-rius, and, at length, forced him to a battle. The armies met near Segontia^s; the action continued from noon till after sunset. Sertorius faced Pompey, who, in this engagement, lost his Quæstor Memmius, the bravest officer in his army, together with a great number of men: But Sertorius could not improve the advantage, which this gave him, being necessitated to go to the assistance of his left wing, which, under the conduct of Perperna, was almost entirely defeated by Metellus. A terrible slaughter of this General's troops was now made, and he himself wounded, having exposed his person with great bravery and intrepidity: but this very wound gained him the day; for his soldiers, who both loved and honoured him, seeing the hurt he had received, and the consequent danger he was in of falling into the hands of his enemies, grief and rage augmented their strength, and animated them to such vigorous efforts, as the Spaniards were utterly unable to withstand; and Sertorius failed of victory, when he imagined himself sure of it.

Urged by necessity, he had now recourse to his usual expedient in like cases: He disbanded his army, and, with a small number of brave soldiers, retired into a strong place in the mountains; and there he began to improve and increase the fortifications, as if he intended to sustain a siege. By this he effectually baffled the enemy; who, hoping to reduce the place in a short time, sat down before it, ceased their pursuit of the scattered flying Spaniards, and thereby allowed them opportunity to re-assemble themselves, strengthened with considerable recruits. He had ordered them to give him notice so soon as they were collected into a Sigüenza in Old Castile body

body sufficiently strong to keep the field. The expected notice received, he, without delay, sallied out, and, having easily forced a passage through the enemy, put himself at the head of the army, that was waiting for him. And now by marches, and counter-marches, he harraßed and quite tired out the armies of Metellus and Pompey; kept them, by frequent ambushes, in constant perplexity; cut off the provisions that were coming to them by land; prevented, by his cruizers, their receiving any supplies by sea; and at length reduced, both the one and the other, to abandon all that part of Spain which had submitted to him. Metellus retired into farther Spain; Pompey into Gallia Narbonensis.

Y. R. 677.
Bef. Chr.
75.
376 Conf.
Plut. in Sert.
Liv. Epit.
xciii.

[GREAT commotions are said to have been at Rome during the present year, on occasion of Sylla's innovations with regard to the Tribuneship. He had very much abridged (as we have seen) the powers belonging to that Magistracy: but he was no sooner dead, than the Tribunes exerted their utmost efforts to recover their ancient rights, an attempt which produced perpetual war between them and the Consuls: and the conflict was more sharp than ever this year, when the Consul Curio^d maintained against the Tribune Sicinius the changes made by Sylla. Nor were the disputes between these terminated by speeches, but by the assassination of Sicinius, Curio being suspected of the crime.

Vid. supr.
P. 167.
Sallust.
Hist. iii. in Orat. Macri.
Ficinsem.

In the same Consulship, was a deputation from the SENATE to collect from every quarter, all that could be found of the Sibylline oracles. The books which contained them had seven years before been consumed in the burning of the Capitol. From Erythæ (a city of Æolis, the supposed country of the Sibyl;) Ilium, Samos, Sicily, and several cities of Italy, the deputies made a collection of verses which went under the name of the Sibyl; but in which Varro, by the acrostics (or initial letters) discovered numerous interpolations.]

THE affairs of Sertorius were probably in the situation above-mentioned, when [during the Consulship of L. Octavius and C. Aurelius Cotta] he received an embassy from Mitbridates, king of Pontus,

Y. R. 678.
Bef. Chr.
74.
377 Conf.

^d Cicero (in Brut. 213, & seq.) tells us, that Curio was an orator of a singular cast; that he was extremely ignorant, and had nothing to entitle him to the name of Orator, but an abundant flow of words, and a florid diction: That his memory sometimes failed him entirely, insomuch, that one day, in a cause, where they were on opposite sides, Curio rising up to speak, forgot, that moment, all he had intended to say, and was reduced to complain, that the adverse party had deprived him of his memory by enchantments. As to his action, it was perfectly ridiculous; his arms, while he spoke, moving like the pendulum of a clock, which gave occasion to Sicinius, who had a good deal of humour, and more impudence, to make a smart jest upon him. The two Consuls being on the Rostra in an Assembly of the People, and Octavius being forced to keep sitting, wrapt up in cloths with cataplasms and fomentations, Curio spoke in the name of both. When he had done, Sicinius addressing himself to Octavius, — You can never sufficiently acknowledge the obligations you have to your colleague: for if he had not swung his arms about as usual, the flies would have eat you up, before this time.

offerings

V. R. 673. offering him the aid of money and ships, and demanding, in return the cession of Asia, which he had been obliged to bandon by his treaty with Sylla.

App. Mi-
thrid
Flut. in 8. r.

This prince was meditating a renewal of the war with the Romans. He had at his court two Roman fugitives, L. Fannius and L. Magius, formerly companions and friends of Fimbria. Their hatred of Sylla recommended them to Mitbridates, and they supported themselves in his favour by flattery. As they had formerly adhered to the party, of which Sertorius now protected the remains, they suggested to the king the thought of making an alliance with him: they compared the King to Pyrrbus, and Sertorius to Hannibal, and nothing was to stand before two such great Generals.

Sertorius, at the head of his Senate, gave audience to the king's Ambassadors; and when they were withdrawn, he brought the affair under deliberation. The Senators were unanimously for accepting the king's offers; for they wanted both money and ships; and they considered what the king asked in return, as only an empty title. Sertorius, however, differed from them in opinion. He said, he should not object to the king's seizing Bitbynia and Cappadocia, countries always governed by kings, and to which the Romans had no ancient title: but that as to Asia Minor, of which they were lawfully possessed, at the time when that prince endeavoured to deprive them of it, and which, after he had been driven out of it by Fimbria, he had renounced by a solemn treaty, he would never consent that it should fall under the power of Mitbridates. He added, "I ought to make my power subservient to the aggrandizing of the Commonwealth, and not aggrandize myself by its losses and decrease. A brave man, undoubtedly, desires to conquer with glory; but he will think life itself too dearly purchased, if at the price of base proceedings."

When this answer was brought to Mitbridates by his Ambassadors, it astonished him extremely. What orders then, said he, would Sertorius send, did he preside in the Senate at Rome; he who, while banished, proscribed, and driven to the coasts of the Atlantic sea, sets bounds to my dominions, and threatens me with war, if I make any attempts upon Asia? The treaty was concluded, upon the conditions prescribed by Sertorius: it imported, that Mitbridates should have Bitbynia and Cappadocia: that Sertorius should send him a General and some troops, and should receive from the king 3000 talents, and 40 ships. Sertorius dispatched one of his Senators, named M. Marius, into Asia; and to this Proconsul of Sertorius's creating, were all the honours of that office paid in the army of Mitbridates. If any city of Asia was taken, Marius entered it in pomp, preceded by his Lictors with their rods and axes, and followed by the king of Pontus, who condescended to take the second place. The Proconsul granted liberty to some of the Asiatic cities; to others immuimmunities and exemptions, all in the name of Sertorius, without permitting Mitbridates to perform any act of sovereignty.

Y. R. 678.
Bef. Chr.
74.
377 Conf.

To return to the war in Spain. Pompey, as was before mentioned, being reduced by Sertorius to take up his winter-quarters in Gallia Narbonensis, wrote thence a letter to the Senate, in very high and menacing terms, complaining that they suffered him to want every thing; that, during the three years of his command in Spain, he had scarce received the money necessary for the expence of one; and he concluded with this declaration: "I have not only exhausted my estate, but my credit: I have no resource but in you: if you fail me, I give you notice, that my army, and the war itself, will soon be in Italy."

Sallust.
Hist. l. iii.

When this letter arrived at Rome, L. Licinius Lucullus and M. Aurelius Cotta were in the Consulship. As Lucullus ardently desired to have the conduct of the war against Mitbridates, and was apprehensive that Pompey only sought a pretence for quitting the war in Spain, that he might come to Rome, and dispute with him the other employment, which was far more easy and more lucrative, he spared no pains to keep him at a distance, and with that view caused all the money he demanded to be sent to him. This supply put Pompey into a condition to return out of Gaul into Spain.

Y. R. 679.
Bef. Chr.
73.
378 Conf.
Plut. in.
Pomp. & Lucull.

Metellus, to get the better of Sertorius, took measures of another sort. He set a price upon his head, promising by proclamation, to any Roman who should kill him, 100 talents and 20,000 acres of land; and, in case the assassin were an exile, liberty to return home. Plutarch observes, that this did not suit well with that contempt of Sertorius, which Metellus always affected in his discourses, styling him Sylla's fugitive, and calling his followers the fragments of Carbo's shipwreck. How sincere and extreme a dread he had of the superior abilities of Sertorius, he manifested yet more fully (as the same historian remarks) by his frantic joy, on occasion of some small advantage he imagined he had obtained over him. He caused himself to be saluted EMPEROR [Imperator] by his soldiers: altars were erected, and sacrifices offered to him in the cities through which he passed: choirs of young men and maidens sung hymns to his praise: and little figures of Victory were made to descend (as in puppet-shows,) and, in the midst of artificial thunder and lightning, put crowns upon his head. All this was followed by the most magnificent and costly entertainments, which he gave in celebration of his mighty achievement; and, at these feasting, the ridiculous oaf, drinking and staring, sat in state, his august person being clothed in the proper robe of TRIUMPH.

Plut. in Sert.

Plut. in Sert. &
Sallust. ap.
Macrob.
Sat. iii.
13.

Sertorius had little to fear from the prowess of such an enemy, but much from a spirit of sedition which prosperity had given birth to, among the Romans of his own army. Whilst the danger was great and imminent, fear.

App. p.
421.
Plut. in Sert.

V. R. 679-
Bef. Chr.
73.
378 Conf.

fear kept all submissive to the only man who could protect them : but when that fear was removed, envy and jealousy took place. Perperna, who, from the beginning (as formerly mentioned) aspired to the chief command, was the most active in spreading whispers. "What evil genius has made us quit one unhappy state, to precipitate ourselves into a worse? Our own country, where we might have lived in peace and quiet, we forsook, because we disdained to obey Sylla, whom the whole universe obeyed; and we came hither to live in liberty. And here we are become the most abject slaves; nay, have voluntarily subjected ourselves to be the guards and satellites of a banished fugitive. He calls us the SENATE: a vain title that exposes us to ridicule. Noble Senators indeed are we, who suffer from him the same imperious and insolent treatment, as the Barbarians of Spain and Lusitania!"

Discourses of this kind had their effect; and though the discontented feared the power of Sertorius too much to hazard an open revolt, yet they contrived to ruin him with the Spaniards, by treating them harshly, and loading them with taxes, as if by his order. From hence arose commotions and revolts among those nations; and the persons whom he sent to remedy these evils, designedly made them more difficult to be cured. That Sertorius, under these disadvantages, lost ground before Metellus and Pompey, will easily be supposed; and we are told, that, exasperated by bad success, and reduced to extremities by revolts, he forsook his former character to such a degree, as to let the weight of his wrath against the parents fall upon the children whom he had caused to be educated at Osca, of whom he killed some, and sold the rest.

Among

* Appian tells us, that when Metellus and Pompey returned into Spain, after passing a winter in the Pyrenees, and when their armies approached that of Sertorius, many of his Roman soldiers deserted to him, which put him into such wrath, that he cruelly treated others who were innocent, and that this produced a general discontent among his Romans: but what most of all alienated their minds from him was, that he placed all his confidence in the Spaniards, forming of them the guard of his person: and that the Spaniards, proud of the preference, contemptuously reproached the Romans with want of fidelity. The historian adds, that Sertorius would have been entirely abandoned by them, but for the need they knew they had of so good a captain.

M. Crevier has inserted these facts into his text; though Plutarch gives not the least hint of them; and they are neither probable nor very consistent with the removal of that fear of the enemy, which, Plutarch tells us, had kept them submissive, while under its influence; nor with other particulars of Plutarch's relation, as the reader may observe.

May it not be reasonably questioned, whether Plutarch had any better authority for this story, concerning the children, than some Aristocratic party-writer? Would the Spaniards so soon have forgot these murders? Vid. infr. p. 194.

He adds, that, on account of this cruel proceeding of Sertorius, in the latter part of his life, some believed his former mildness and clemency to have been mere disguise and art, the dictate of reflection, and what the necessity of his affairs prompted him to. The historian-moralist declares himself of a different opinion: for though he holds that real

Among those whom Perperna drew into his conspiracy, was Manius,^{Y. R. 679. Bef. Chr. 73. 378 Conf.} an officer in the army, who, at that time, loved a certain youth; to whom, in order to engage his affections, he discovered the secret; boasting, that in a few days he should be a person of great power and authority: but the youth having more inclination for Aufidius, disclosed all to him, who was likewise one in the conspiracy, but knew not that Manius was engaged therein. Upon the youth's naming Perperna, Græcinus, and others, whom Aufidius knew to be conspirators, he was much surpris'd and terrified. He made slight of the matter to the youth, and bid him not regard what Manius, a vain boasting fellow, had said; and then going immediately to Perperna, gave him notice of the danger they were in of a discovery, urging him to the execution of their design without delay. To this all the conspirators having agreed, they provided a messenger, who brought to Sertorius counterfeit letters, importing notice of a victory gained by one of his lieutenants with great slaughter of the enemy. Sertorius, highly pleas'd with the news, performed a sacrifice of thanksgiving to the Gods; at the close of which, Perperna invited him, and those who assist'd at the sacrifice (who were also of the conspiracy) to an entertainment; and, being very importunate, prevail'd with him to come. At all suppers and entertainments where Sertorius was present, great decency us'd to be observ'd: for he would not endure to hear or see any thing contrary to the most perfect modesty. But at this entertainment the conspirators, pretending to be drunk, began to hold the most dissolute discourses, proceeding to actions of obscenity, with design to make Sertorius angry. He, whether because he had a natural abhorrence of such licentious deportment, or because he perceived, by certain signs they made to each other, and their unwonted failure of respect for him, something of their design, changed his posture, turning upon his bed, as if to avoid seeing any thing more of what pass'd. Perperna seized that moment for the execution of his purpose. He took a cup full of wine, and, in drinking, let the cup fall. This was the signal agreed upon; Antonius, instantly drew his sword, and, being on the same bed with Sertorius, gave him the first wound; then throwing himself upon real solid virtue, confirmed by reason and habit, will ever be uniform, whatever adversity may happen; yet he thinks, that a man of the gentlest and most virtuous disposition may be so provoked by insolent and injurious treatment, and especially by ingratitude, as to become wicked and cruel towards those, who have injured and betrayed him; and this he supposes to have been the case with Sertorius.

The same Moralist leaves it problematical, whether Sylla (the most cruel of all monsters) was not once a good-natured man, and afterwards spoil'd by prosperity and elevation.

But as for Marius, he was, it seems, without question, always wicked, and always cruel, cruel by nature; his rising to power made no change in him in that respect. [Plut. in Syll.] And this is sufficiently manifest (though there be no other evidence of it, nor shadow of evidence) from his despising the Greek language and literature. Vid. supr. p. 40.

Y.R. 679- his stomach, seized his hands, and while he thus deprived him of all
 Bef. Chr. power to make resistance, the other conspirators with many stabs dis-
 73. patched him *.
 378 Conf.

App. Plut. Perperna, so soon as he had perpetrated his crime, was for reaping the fruit of it, by taking possession of the command, but found some difficulties in the way. The death of Sertorius, so treacherously and cruelly murdered, had put an end to all hatred conceived against him by the multitude; compassion succeeded, they forgot the causes he had given them of complaint, and remembered only his virtues: the Spaniards, especially, regretted the loss of him, and looked upon the assassins with horror: many states revolted on the first news of his death, and made their submission either to Pompey or to Metellus. Nevertheless, Perperna, by the means of money, promises, threats, and even punishments, aptly employed, managed so artfully, as not only to hinder the army from disbanding itself, but engage the greater part of it to accept him for their General: with what success we shall see hereafter.

C H A P. IV.

WAR of SPARTACUS the Gladiator.

Y.R. 680. IT was during the next year (680) M. Terentius Varro Lucullus and C. Cassius being Consuls, that the war of Spartacus broke out in Italy.
 Bef. Chr. 72.
 379 Conf. In the city of Capua, one Lentulus caused a considerable number of slaves, most of them by birth Gauls or Thracians, to be trained to the science of gladiators, not on account of any crimes by them committed, but for his own profit. Of these wretches 200 entered into a plot to run away; but their design having been discovered, only seventy-eight of them could put it in execution, and these fled with no other arms than kitchen-knives and spits. Nothing in appearance could be more contemptible, or less likely to make the capital of the universe tremble: but in a government, where great numbers are discontented with their condition, the least commotions are to be feared: and it happened, that those fugitive slaves had a man at their head who was alone worth an army; a man of ability and courage, skilful to employ stratagem, or force, intrepid in dangers, fruitful of expedients in adversity, prudent and moderate in prosperity. In a word, a Hero reduced to the condition of a slave. Such was Spartacus. He had too great a spirit to reconcile himself to so infamous a profession, as that of fighting for the amusement of spectators; and he persuaded the

* It would seem, that this murder was committed in the year 680; for Sertorius was in the eighth year of his command, having been called in by the Lusitanians, in the second Consulship of Sylla.

companions

companions of his fortune to hazard their lives rather in attempting to recover their liberty. However, he was not the only leader of the band : Crixus and Oenomaus were associated with him in the command : And the difficulties occasioned by this division of authority, was not among the least of those which Spartacus experienced in the execution of his enterprize.

Y.R. 680.
Bef. Chr.
72.
379 Conf.

They had scarcely quitted Capua, when they met and seized a carriage loaded with the arms of gladiators, arms not fit for war, but better than those with which they had furnished themselves ; and these they soon after exchanged for the proper arms of soldiers ; for a body of the Capuans coming out in pursuit of them, Spartacus defeated these pursuers, killed a great number of them, and armed his little band with their spoils.

This first success augmented their number, but not sufficiently to embolden them to keep the field. Claudius Pulcher, who was sent from Rome against them, found them posted upon mount Vesuvius. He encamped at the foot of that mountain, and having possessed himself of the only practicable way leading to the summit (all the rest being steep rock and precipice) he supposed that he had so effectually shut up the rebels, as to leave them no possibility of escaping. Nevertheless, the slaves, by means of ladders made of vine-branches, of which they found abundance upon the spot, got down the rock : one only remained above till he had thrown down to his comrades their arms ; and then he likewise descended, and re-joined them. And now Spartacus, not contented with escaping from the enemy, attacked them, when they least expected it, defeating them, and took their camp.

This second victory made the slaves of all the neighbouring country flock to him, insomuch that his followers soon increased to 10,000 ; and because he wanted arms for so great a number, he forged, as well as he could, all the iron he could get, into swords and other offensive weapons, and made shields of basket-work, covered with skins of beasts newly killed. Thus armed, they ravaged all Campania, and, in some considerable cities, which they took and plundered, committed a thousand cruelties and outrages upon such as fell into their hands, though Spartacus did his utmost, by remonstrances and intreaties, to restrain his followers from these excesses. Grown insolent by success, they indulged themselves in the pleasure of gratifying their revenge by all possible indignities towards those they had formerly feared.

From Rome, it being now perceived that the affair was serious, they sent the Prætor, P. Varinius, against the rebels. Spartacus very soon defeated Furius, one of the Prætor's Lieutenants, who commanded a detachment of 2000 men ; and, some time after, Cossinius, whom Plutarch calls the counsellor and colleague of Varinius, suffered himself to be surprized in Lucania : The enemy were very near taking him in the bath, his troops were defeated, his camp forced, and he himself killed. After these successes, Spartacus vanquished the Prætor in several actions, and at length took his Y.R. 680. Fasces, which from henceforward he caused to be borne before his own Person.

Piut. in Cr. ff. Nevertheless, this glare of prosperity did not so dazzle his eyes, as to hinder him from seeing, that it was impossible for him to triumph finally over the Roman Power, and that, sooner or later, he must unavoidably sink under it. He resolved therefore to march his forces towards the Alps, and pass those mountains as soon as he could, to the end that the Gallic and Thracian soldiers, who made the far greater part of his army, might retire to their respective homes, there to enjoy in peace a liberty that had cost them so much labour, and so many perils to recover. Wise as this counsel was, the slaves, because hitherto constantly victorious, rejected it: They saw themselves 40,000 strong, and being full of a frantic confidence, and allured with the hope of becoming rich, by plundering Italy, had no inclination to look forward to more distant consequences.

Y.R. 681. B. i. Chr. 71. 380 Conf. When the consular Fasces were transferred to L. Gellius Poplicola and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Claudianus, the troops of Spartacus had increased to 70,000 men. Three armies were sent against them, two commanded by the two Consuls, and a third under the Prætor Q. Arrius. The dissension and division, which arose among the enemy, gave those armies an advantage. Spartacus could not keep the Gauls of his army in obedience; they separated from him, and, under the command of their countryman Crixus, threw themselves into Apulia, and pillaged the country; but the Consul Gellius, and the Prætor Arrius, fell upon them near mount *Garganus, and of 30,000 men, of which their body consisted, killed 20,000, Crixus himself falling in the action.

* Mount St. Angelo.

Sallust. Hist. l. iv. Spartacus, not discouraged nor disconcerted by this disaster, directed his march through the Appennines, still pursuing his design of gaining the Alps, and quitting Italy. To oppose his progress, the Consul Lentulus advanced; a General of whom Sallust doubts, whether his vanity or his folly were the greater. Spartacus put his army to the rout, and then, turning back, met Gellius, the other Consul, who was coming from Apulia to inclose him between himself and his colleague; and though Gellius was joined by the Prætor Arrius, Spartacus defeated them both in a pitched battle.

App. P. 424.

It was a custom at Rome to honour the funerals of illustrious persons with combats of gladiators. Spartacus, on occasion of this victory, caused the like honours to be paid to the manes of his late companion, Crixus. Having picked out 300 of the stoutest men among his prisoners, he compelled them to fight round the funeral pile which he had erected; thus retaliating upon the Romans the insult, which he and his companions had suffered from them. The rest of the prisoners, and such of the carriage-horses as were unfit for service, he caused to be killed. And now seeing the number of his soldiers increased, by reason of these successes, to 120,000, he entertained the bold design of marching to Rome: however, as the two Consuls, with all he dropped that project; but turning against the Proconsul C. Cassius and the Prætor Cn. Manlius, defeated them, and put them to flight. Y.R. 681.

† Marcellus the forces they could assemble, posted themselves in Picenum †, in his way, he Ancona.

The Senate were greatly dissatisfied with all their Generals of this year, who had suffered luxury to reign in their camps; so that discipline had lost its vigour^a. New Consuls were chosen, Cn. Aufidius Orestes, and P. Cornelius Lentulus^b Sura. But the chief dependance of the Republic was upon Crassus, then Prætor; and who, in Sylla's war, had given proof, both of his courage, and of his ability. He received orders to march against Spartacus, and his reputation induced many persons of the first rank to accompany him in this war. Crassus, who knew that no success was to be expected, unless strict discipline were observed by the troops, quickly shewed that he resolved to re-establish it. He had detached Mummius with two legions to observe the motions of the enemy, but with orders not to hazard a battle, or even a skirmish. Mummius, nevertheless, imagining he had found a favourable opportunity of gaining some advantage, came to an engagement with the enemy. The Roman soldiers fled in a cowardly manner, and many of them returned to the camp without their arms, which they had thrown away to run the faster. Of these run-aways, Crassus decimated 500 of the most faulty. The fifty criminals were executed ignominiously in the sight of the whole army; and nothing of the like nature having been practised, during a great length of time, this example made the deeper impression. Beside this severity, Crassus obliged those who had thrown away their arms to find sureties for the new arms he furnished them with; by which proceeding, the Roman soldiers being brought to fear the severity of their General more than the swords of their enemies, they soon retrieved their honour. Of a body of 10,000 slaves, Crassus cut in pieces two thirds, and soon after gained an advantage over Spartacus himself, whom he drove into Lucania. Y. R. 682.
Bef. Chr.
70.
381 Conf.
Plut. in Crass.

Spartacus continued retiring towards Rhegium, having formed the design of passing into Sicily, in which island, as it had already been the theatre of two wars with slaves, he hoped to rekindle a fire that was hardly yet extinguished: and, at first, fortune seemed to favour his hopes; for there happened to be in the Streight some ships belonging to pirates, with whom he treated for transporting 2000 of his men into Sicily; but the pirates, having received his money, steered a different course. And when, after this, he made an attempt to cross the Streight upon floats and rafts, the rapid current of the sea, which presently destroyed those weak transports, convinced him of the impossibility of succeeding that way. Crassus, in the mean time, having followed him in his march, he found himself shut up within the peninsula of Bruttium. The isthmus between Flor. iii.
20.

^a Military rewards were lavished (says Plutarch) without waiting till they were deserved. Cato refused, as not being his due, those that were offered him by the Consul Gellius, under whom he served at this time. Plut. in Cat.

^b This was the Lentulus concerned afterwards in Catiline's conspiracy.

Y.R. 682. the two seas is about thirty miles over : across this isthmus, Crassus caused Bet. Chr. a trench to be cut fifteen feet in depth, and as many in breadth, and for-
 70. tified it with a strong and high wall. While this work was carried on, 381 COMM. Spartacus made no attempt to disturb the workmen : His thoughts were wholly intent on arming his followers : He was near the sea on three sides, and invited merchants to bring to his camp, not gold and silver, but iron.
 Of this he amassed a great quantity, and, having caused arms to be forged, supplied all his troops abundantly. And now his great affair was to force the barrier, which the Romans had formed to shut him up. His first attempts were not successful. To make his troops resolute through despair, he caused a prisoner to be crucified at the head of his camp, that they might see with their own eyes the punishment which they must undergo, if, failing of victory, they should fall into the hands of the Prætor. At length, in a tempestuous night, when there fell abundance of snow, he found means to fill up a part of the trench with earth and fascines, and passed his whole army over it.

Crassus, who had expected to conquer without striking a blow, was in such a consternation at the escape of his prey, that, in the first emotion of his fear, he wrote to the Senate, that it was necessary to call to his aid both Varro Lucullus, then returning from the war of Tbrace, and Pompey, who, having entirely re-established the tranquillity of Spain, was on his way home. However, he soon repented his invitation of those Generals to join him : For, having learnt that the Gallie slaves, not instructed by the misfortune and death of Crixus, had again separated themselves from Spartacus, he fell upon them, put them into disorder, and would have intirely cut them off, if Spartacus had not come with expedition to their succour.

Frontin. ii. The Gauls still incamped separate from Spartacus, under the command 5- 34. of two Generals of their own nation, Gannicius and Castus. Crassus found means to deceive Spartacus, so as to make him think, that the greater part of the Roman forces were fronting him, while they were really marching against the other commander. By this stratagem, he gained a signal victory, which almost effaced the shame of the preceding defeats sustained by the Romans. He recovered five Roman eagles, twenty-six ensigns, and five Fasces with their axes. Thirty-five thousand of the enemy, Lib. xcvii. according to the Epitome of Livy, remained upon the spot. Plutarch Plut. in Crass. makes the number of the killed amount to only twelve thousand three hundred. And he observes, that those slaves fought with so much resolution, that, of so great a number, only two received their wounds behind.

Spartacus, after so considerable a loss, found it necessary to retire Plut. ibid. farther from the Prætor; and he marched towards Apulia. Crassus detached one of his Lieutenants, and his Quæstor, to pursue him. These officers, despising an enemy that fled, followed him so close and so incau-tiously,

tiously, that they gave him a favourable opportunity of turning upon them, and fighting them with advantage. The Romans fled in great disorder, and the Quæstor, being wounded, did not escape without much difficulty.

Y.R. 682.
Bef. Chr.
70.
381 Conf.

This success occasioned the ruin of Spartacus; his soldiers becoming so presumptuous thereupon, that they would not pursue the route he had directed them to take, but would have him turn back in quest of Crassus. There was another reason which determined Spartacus so to do: He had received advice that Varro Lucullus was arrived at Brundisium, and this made him apprehend being inclosed between two armies. Crassus no less desired a decisive battle, because Pompey approached; and the friends of this General, who was very popular, said publicly at Rome, that it was necessary to send him against Spartacus; for that he alone was born to put an end to the wars that were shameful to the Roman name. Crassus, therefore, being no less desirous of fighting than Spartacus, they soon came to a general action.

On this occasion Spartacus, being determined either to conquer or die, killed his horse at the head of his army, saying to his soldiers, that if he proved victorious, he should have horses enough; if vanquished, he should have no want of them. Fighting like a man in despair, he broke through the thickest battalions, killed two centurions with his own hand, in endeavouring to come at the person of Crassus: His efforts were vain, and he fell dead, covered with a multitude of wounds. Upon his fall, his soldiers all fled, and the conquerors gave no quarter: 40,000 slaves remained on the field of battle.

Nevertheless, a considerable number escaped the slaughter, and formed themselves into different bands. One of these, consisting of about 5000, who were making their way to the Alps, fell into the hands of Pompey.

Plut. in.
Crass. &
Pomp.

He happened, at this time, to be on his return from Spain; where he had, without much difficulty, put an end to the war. For though Perperna had prevailed with the army (as was before mentioned) to submit to his command, yet, not having the military talents of Sertorius, it was but sport to Pompey to subdue him. Stupidly running into a snare which Pompey had laid for him, he was entirely defeated, his army dispersed, his principal officers killed on the spot, and he himself taken prisoner.

Perperna, to save his life, signified to Pompey, that in Sertorius's papers he had found proof of secret correspondence held with him by many persons at Rome, even some Consulars and other principal Senators; that he had in his hand their original letters, by which they invited Sertorius to bring his army into Italy. Pompey is much praised for his prudence and generosity on this occasion. He knew that the best way of quieting the discontents of the city, was to free the Marrians from those fears, which a consciousness of guilt would suggest, rather than push them to the necessity of seeking their security in a change of affairs,

Plut. in Sertor.

and

Y. R. 682.
 Ref. Chr.
 70.
 381 Conf.

and the overthrow of the State. He caused therefore all Sertorius's papers to be brought to him; and he burnt them without reading them himself, or suffering any other person to read them. And, lest Perperna should divulge something of what he knew, and mention names, he would not once see him, but caused him to be instantly put to death. Of the other persons concerned in the murder of Sertorius, several were taken by Pompey's soldiers, and killed by his order: some fled into Africa, where the Moors shot them to death with arrows. One only escaped; a wretch, who, hated by all that knew him, spent the remainder of his life in beggary.

After the defeat and death of Perperna, the remainder of the party had no resource, but in the victor's clemency. The towns of Spain eagerly made their submission; two only ventured to stand out, and both these were taken and destroyed. Thus ended the war in the Consulship of Cn. Aufidius Orestes and P. Corn. Lentulus Sura (year of Rome 682,) after it had lasted ten years: and thus expired the last remains of Marius's faction.

Plin. vii.
 26.

Pompey erected, in the Pyrenees, many monuments to perpetuate the memory of his exploits. On these monuments were inscriptions, importing, that, in the country between the Alps and the extremities of Further Spain, he had subjected eight hundred and seventy-six cities.

In his return home he, accidentally, fell in with that band of fugitive slaves before mentioned, a remnant of the army of Spartacus. He put them all to the sword; and, on this foundation, and on this alone, was for ascribing to himself the glory of having terminated that war. He wrote to the Senate, that Crassus had indeed put the slaves to flight, but that he had plucked up the war by the roots. Cicero, too, from a particular dislike of Crassus, affected, in his public speeches, to give Pompey the honour of finishing that war, declaring, that the very fame of his coming had broke the force of it, and his presence extinguished it. History, however, has done Crassus justice, and has transmitted his name to us with this praise, that by his vigilance, ability, and courage, he, in the space of six months, happily terminated a war, which had alarmed the Romans, not much less than even that of Hannibal. Six thousand of the runaways, who fell alive into the hands of the Romans, were crucified along the road from Capua to Rome.

Cic. in
 Ver. v. 5.
 & pro Leg
 Manil. 30.
 pro Sext.
 31.

Oros. l. v.
 24.
 Appian.

As to quelling the revolt in Spain, no body at Rome durst venture, either in earnest or in jest, to ascribe the least portion of the merit to any other than Pompey; so great a favourite he was of the multitude. And for this achievement he was decreed a second TRIUMPH, though still a private citizen, and of the equestrian rank.

Plin. xv.

29.
 Cæ. in Plin.
 24.

Crassus, on account of the mean condition of the enemies he had vanquished, obtained only the lesser triumph or ovation. Permission, however, was given him by the Senate, at his request, to wear, in the triumphal procession, procession, instead of the crown of Myrtle, the crown of Laurel, which Y.R. 682. had hitherto been appropriated to the greater triumph.*

C H A P. V.

CRASSUS and POMPEY are chosen Consuls for the Year 683. POMPEY makes his court to the PEOPLE, by repealing some of Sylla's Laws.

THE time for the great elections drew nigh: both the victorious Generals aspired to the Consulship, and neither of them had disbanded his army. Many persons at Rome were apprehensive lest Pompey, after the example of Sylla, should make himself master of the Commonwealth: and Crassus declared, that he would not disband his troops, unless those of Pompey were likewise dismissed. The apprehensions, which these things occasioned, Pompey removed at once, by promising to dismiss his soldiers so soon as his Triumph should be over. Plut. in Pomp. & in Crass.

As to the Consulship, they were some difficulties to be surmounted with regard to Pompey. He was born in the 647th year of Rome, and therefore was not at this time full thirty-six years old, and, to be elected Consul, forty-three was the legal age. It would be strange to see a man placed in the highest Magistracy, before he was capable by Law of pretending even to the lowest! But so great and so universal was the admiration of him

* This year [682] abounded with triumphs at Rome. For, besides those of Crassus and Pompey, and Metellus (for he too had the like honour,) M. Terentius Varro Lucullus had a triumph for his conquest of Thrace. In the year 679, he had succeeded his elder brother, L. Lucullus, in the Consulship; and after the expiration of his Magistracy had Macedonia for his province. [Plut. in Lucull.] According to Florus [iii. 4.] he had pushed on his conquests as far as the Tanais, and the Palus Mæoris: he subdued likewise the whole coast of the Euxine sea, from the mouths of the Danube to the Bosphorus of Thrace, and from Apollonia, a city upon that coast, brought away a colossus of Apollo, thirty cubits high, which he placed in the Capitol. He spent only two campaigns in these expeditions. Cicero gives the epithet of TRIUMPHAL to Macedonia, because it furnished so many occasions of triumphing to the Roman Generals. Provincia ex omnibus una maximè triumphalis. Cic. in Pis. 44.

VOL. III.

Cornelius Dolabella (Consul in the year 672) had obtained a triumph for his successes in that country. And Scribonius Curio (Consul in the year 677) being sent thither the next year after his Consulship, had subdued the Dardanians to the North, and had likewise conquered Mæsia, and penetrated as far as Dacia.

^b Quid tam singulare, quam ut legibus solutus ex S. consulto consul ante fieret, quam ullum alium magistratum per leges capere licuisset. Cic. pro lege Manil. xxi. The Ædileship was the first office that was properly called a Magistracy, and what could not regularly be obtained till after an interval of five years from the Quæstorship; and the Quæstorian age (in the latter times of the Republic) was the same with the Senatorian, thirty years complete: For Cicero, who declares in some of his speeches, that he had acquired all the honours of the City, without repulse in any, and each in its proper year, or as soon as he could pretend to it, yet did not obtain the Quæstorship till

D d

he

Y. R. 682. him, that the Senate dispensed with the Laws in his favour; and Crassus (who needed no such dispensation) found it not prudent to stand candidate without asking his consent. Pompey, highly flattered by an application of that sort from so considerable a man, and having long wished for an occasion to do him a friendly office, went so far as to declare to an Assembly of the People, "That he should be no less obliged to them for giving him Crassus to be his colleague, than for their bestowing the Consulship upon himself." Both were unanimously elected: after which, both triumphed for their victories in the wars they had respectively conducted; and Pompey, the very next day after his triumph, took possession of the Consulship. As if he had been born to command, he made his first entry into the Senate in the proper post to preside in it.

Y. R. 683. M. Licinius Crassus, } Consuls.
 Bef. Chr. Cn. Pompeius Magnus, }
 69.
 382 Conf.

The misunderstanding between Crassus and Pompey revived very soon after their taking possession of the Consular Fasces, and they did nothing memorable in their Magistracy, beside making their court to the People.

Crassus, having consecrated the tenth of his estate to Hercules, gave a feast to the whole City, and to each Citizen corn for three months.

Plut. in Crass. he had passed through his thirtieth year. See Midd. Treat. on the Roman Senate, p. 93. 94.
 " Crassus's father and elder brother lost " their lives in the massacres of Marinus and
 " Cinna; but he himself escaped into Spain,
 " where he had contracted a numerous ac" quaintance, while his father was Prætor of " that country; and he lay there concealed
 " till Sylla's return to Italy, whither he pre" sently resorted to him, in hopes to revenge
 " the ruin of his fortune and family on the " opposite faction. As he was attached to
 " Sylla's cause both by interest and inclination,
 " so he was much considered in it; and being " extremely greedy and rapacious, made use
 " of all his credit to enrich himself by the " plunder of the enemy, and the purchase of " confiscated estates; which Cicero calls his " barter. By these methods he raised an " immense wealth, computed at many mil" lions, gathered from the spoils and calami" ties of his country. He used to say, that " no man could be reckoned rich, who was not " able to maintain an army out of his own rents;
 " and, if the accounts of antiquity be true,
 " the number of his slaves was scarce inferior " to that of a full army; which, instead of " being a burden, made one part of his revenue; being all trained to some useful art or " profession, which enabled them not only to " support themselves, but to bring a share of " profit to their master. Among the other " trades in his family, he is said to have had " above five hundred masons and architects

 " constantly employed in building or repairing
 " the houses of the City. He had contracted
 " an early envy to Pompey, for his superior
 " credit both with Sylla and the People;
 " which was still aggravated by Pompey's late
 " attempt to rob him of the honour of ending
 " the Servile War: But finding himself wholly " unequal to his rival in military fame, he " applied himself to the arts of peace and " eloquence; in which he obtained the cha" racter of a good speaker; and by his easy
 " and familiar address, and a readiness to " assist all who wanted either his protection,
 " or his money, acquired a great authority in " all the public affairs." Middleton's Life of Cicero, vol. I. p. 73.

⁴ As Pompey had never been a Senator before he was Consul, and was therefore wholly unacquainted with the rules of the House, the learned Varro furnished him, at his request, with a manual of instruction in relation thereto. A. Gell. xiv.

Pompey

Pompey took various measures to establish himself in the affection of the multitude. By ancient institution, the Roman Knights, when they had

Y. R. 683.

Plut. in Pomp.Plut. in
Pomp.

* From the time of Pompey's first coming into public life, the People of Rome (says Plutarch) seem to have entertained a singular affection for him: which is the more extraordinary, as he was the son of a most detestable and most detested father, Cn. Pompeius Strabo (Consul in the year 664,) a man infamous for rapaciousness, for murder, and for treachery to both the contending factions. Never did the Romans express so implacable a hatred to any of their Generals, as to this man; who being struck dead by lightening (the year of Rome 666) his body was not suffered to be carried with the usual solemnity to funeral: The populace tore it from off the bier, dragged it by a hook along the streets, and insulted it with all manner of outrages.

Vid. supr.
p. 133.
App. de.
Bell. Civ.
Jul. Ob-
seq. 54.Plut. in
Pomp.

The son, on the contrary, had rendered himself so dear to the soldiery, that, at nineteen years of age, he, by his sole influence, prevailed with the army, in which he then served under his father (the very year in which his father was struck dead,) not to execute the resolution they had taken of deserting their General; whom he had just before, in the same hour, preserved from being treacherously assassinated in his tent.

The next year an attack was made upon his fortune, and he himself personally accused: the charge imported, that, after the taking of Asculum, his father Pompeius Strabo had appropriated the spoil to his own use, instead of accounting for the produce of it to the treasury; and that the son had been a sharer in this robbery. He was called upon therefore to make satisfaction to the Public out of the effects to which he had succeeded. In his defence he set forth, that he had already made satisfaction to the Public, for his father's peculation; and that he had likewise given information to the Prætor of certain robberies committed by his father's secretary, who had thereupon been tried and condemned. As to his own share in the accusation, it appeared, that he had reserved nothing out of the spoils of Asculum, but some curious books, and some hunting-nets; and these being of little value, the prosecution was judged to be malicious. The most eminent orators of Rome, Philippus, Carbo (who was Consul the next year,) and Hortensius, defended Pompey in this cause. He himself spoke several times, and in such a manner, as to acquire great reputation. The Prætor Antistius, who presided in the court, was so taken with his behaviour, that he resolved to make him an offer of his daughter, Antistia, in marriage, and even, during the prosecution, they concluded the contract. [This bargain between the judge and the defendant, pending the cause, may, perhaps, be thought not to redound much to the honour of either.] Pompey was acquitted; the marriage presently followed: yet, about four years after, he divorced this lady, at the command, or persuasion of Sylla, who, from political views, and with the approbation of his wife Metella, engaged him to marry Æmilia, the daughter of Metella, by her former husband (Æmilius Scaurus) she being the wife of Acilius Glabrio, by whom she was then actually with child. Plutarch observes, that Pompey's divorcing Antistia, was the more cruel, as upon his account (he being deemed a favourer of Sylla's cause) her father Antistius had been murdered in the Senate-house [by order of the younger Marius.] Her mother Calpurnia was so affected with these tragic events, that she put an end to her own life. Æmilia too soon after died in child-bed.

What chiefly gained to Pompey, in early life, the public favour, was his habitual temperance, his martial disposition, his genius for war, and his strict discipline in military service; add to this, that he was generous, and, though naturally grave, affable, and agreeable in speech, and had such an appearance of candour in his air and manner, as engaged confidence.

We have already seen, That, at twenty-three years of age, he, by his own credit and interest, raised three Legions, with which he joined Sylla, against the faction of Marius and Cinna;

That the next year (671) Sylla sent him into Sicily against Perperna and Carbo;

D d 2

That

Vid. supr.
p. 154

Y. R. 683. had completed their time of service, which was ten years, presented them-
 Bef. Chr. selves before the CENSORS, to whom they gave an account of the campaigns
 69. they had made, and under what Generals. The CENSORS¹ L. Gellius 382 Conf. and Cn. Lentulus, sitting in their curule chairs, at the gate of the temple of Castor, making the review, Pompey appeared. He entered the Forum in all the state belonging to his consular dignity, but he himself leading his horse by the bridle. When he came in sight of the CENSORS, he made the Lictors, who were walking before him, stand aside, while he led his horse up to the Tribunal of those Magistrates. The People, struck with so singular a spectacle, remained in silence and admiration.
 The elder of the Censors put this question to him, Pompey, have you completed all the years of service which you owed the Commonwealth? He answered, (speaking with a loud voice) Yes, I have completed them all;
and in all, have been myself the General. At these words the whole Forum resounded with shouts of applause; the CENSORS rose up, and conducted Pompey back to his house: well knowing they should thereby please the multitude, who, transported with delight, continued clapping their hands all the way.

Cic. in Verr. Act.
 i. 1. & 15.
 Acon. in Divin.

Another thing by which Pompey greatly endeared himself to the People, was the change he made with regard to the Judicature; which Sylla had transferred wholly to the SENATORS. Corruption in the courts of justice had risen to a most prodigious height. The Judges sold their votes, without hiding their shame; and it was grown (says Cicero) to be an established maxim, that a wealthy man, how criminal soever, could not be condemned. On occasion of Cicero's prosecution of Verres, a celebrated modern, partial enough to the Aristocratical faction, writes thus:

That from Sicily he passed into Africa to conduct the war against Domitius and Hiarbas; and that, for having vanquished them, he extorted, at his return to Rome, the grant of a triumph, contrary to the inclination of the Dictator, and contrary to custom, the victor being only a Roman Knight: That he afterwards vanquished Lepidus, and totally crushed his faction: That he was afterwards sent into Spain against Sertorius, but had little success there, during the life of that able General:
 That, after the murder of Sertorius, he brought the war to a happy issue, without much difficulty; and that in his return home (year of Rome 682) he met with, and put to the sword, a body of fugitives slaves, part of the army which Craffus had routed. His election soon after to the Consulship has just been related.

¹ There had been no CENSORS in the State for fifteen years past, when Lentulus and Gellius were honoured this year with that high office. They expelled out of the Senate sixty-four members; among whom were C. Antonius (second son of M. Antonius the orator) and
P. Lentulus Sura, who had been Consul the Liv. Epit.
 year before; and whom we shall find hereafter l. xcviu.
 engaged in Catiline's conspiracy. Q. Curius another of the conspirators, was likewise one of the sixty-four.

At the closing of the Lustrum, the number of the Citizens (which had been greatly augmented by admitting the allies to the freedom of Rome) amounted to 950,000, according to Freinsheimus, who, in this particular, forsakes his text, or principal author, the Epitome of Livy, where we read 450,000.

“ The public administration was at this time, in every branch of it, Y. R. 683.
 “ most infamously corrupt: the great, exhausted by their luxury and Mid. Life “ vices, made no other use of their governments, than to enrich them- of Cic. vol.
 “ selves by the spoils of the foreign provinces: their business was to I. p. 79.
 “ extort money abroad, that they might purchase offices at home, and “ to plunder the Allies, in order to corrupt the Citizens. The oppressed, “ in the mean while, found it in vain to seek relief at Rome, where there “ was none who cared either to impeach, or to condemn a noble criminal;
 “ the decision of all trials being in the hands of men of the same condition, “ who were usually involved in the same crimes, and openly prostituted “ their judgment on these occasions for favour, or a bribe. This had “ raised a general discontent through the empire, with a particular disgust
 “ to that change made by Sylla of transferring the right of Judicature “ from the Equestrian^a to the Senatorian order, which the People were “ now impatient to get reversed: the prosecution therefore of Verres was “ both seasonable and popular, as it was likely to give some check to the “ oppressions of the NOBILITY, as well as comfort and relief to the di“ stressed subjects.—Cicero, in his speech, after opening the reasons why, P. 82.
 “ contrary to his former practice, and the rule which he had laid down “ to himself of dedicating his labours to the defence of the distressed, he “ now appeared as an Accuser, adds, the provinces are utterly undone; the “ allies and tributaries so miserable oppressed, that they have lost even the “ hopes of redress, and seek only some comfort in their ruin: Those who “ would have the trials remain in the hands of the Senate, complain, that “ there are no men of reputation to undertake impeachments, no severity in “ the Judges: The People of Rome, in the mean while, though labouring “ under many other grievances, yet desire nothing so ardently, as the ancient “ discipline, and gravity of trials, For the want of trials, the Tribuni“ cian power is called for again; for the abuse of trials, a new order of “ Judges is demanded; for the scandalous behaviour of Judges, the autho“ rity of the CENSORS, hated before as too rigid, is now desired, and grown “ popular. In this license of profligate criminals, in the daily complaints of “ the Roman People, the infamy of trials^b, the disgrace of the whole Sena-“ torian

^a This is a mistake. Sylla transferred to the Senators the right of judicature, not from the Equestrian order, but from the persons elected by the tribes out of the three orders. See above p. 115.

^b M. Crevier has selected, from a great number, two or three striking instances of the infamy here spoken of: and I choose to borrow them from him, not only to avoid trouble, but because he is so warm a partizan of the Aristocracy, as to say, speaking of Lucullus

(tom. xi. p. 13.) His fidelity to Sylla and the ARISTOCRATICAL PARTY proves him to have been a solid man, a man of sound understanding and noble sentiments. [Sa fidélité pour Sylla et pour le parti de l'Aristocratie prouve un Caractère solide et élevé.]

P. Lentulus Sura had been Prætor in Spain, and was accused at his return home of Mal-administration. He bribed the Judges (according to the common practice at that time) and was acquitted; but finding that of thirty-

“ two

Y. R. 683. " torian order, as I thought it the only remedy to these mischiefs, for men of Bcf. Cl. " abilities and integrity to undertake the cause of the Republic, and the Laws, 69. " so I was induced the more readily, out of regard to our common safety, to 183 Conf. " come two voices, he had seventeen in his favour, he complained heavily of bad management, and the unnecessary expence he had been put to by his agent's purchasing one voice more than was necessary. Q. Calpurnius having been condemned [doubtless because not so rich as his accuser] of misconduct when Prætor in Spain, reproached his judges, not for having given sentence against him, but for having done it at too low a price. You ought to have been better paid for ruining a man, who has been honoured with the office of Prætor. You have sold me for a morsel of bread.

Oppianicus, a Roman Knight, (before mentioned as a murderer, in speaking of Sylla's Proscriptions) [Vid. supr. p. 161.] was now prosecuted by his son-in-law, Cluentius, for an attempt to poison him. The two accomplices of the accused had been tried and convicted, which made his case almost desperate. In this extreme peril he applied himself to Stellus, one of his judges. This man undertook to buy, for about 3200 l. sixteen voices, the number necessary and sufficient to acquit him, the bench consisting of thirty-two judges. Stellus, having received the money, wisely considered, that it would be better for himself to retain the whole for his own use; and that certainly no one would call upon him to refund it, in case Oppianicus were condemned. The prudent part therefore would be to get him condemned. In order to this, he promised, on the part of the accused, to some of the judges about 200 l. each, to acquit him; and then, a few days before the trial, told those judges, that Oppianicus had broke his word, and had not lodged the money with him. The consequence was, that one part of the judges condemned Oppianicus, because he was manifestly guilty; the other part, because they thought he had deceived them. Cicero tells us, that Stellus had likewise received money from the accuser.

But the instance of Verres, who had been three years Prætor of Sicily, is, of all, the most astonishing proof of the corruption which prevailed among the Great. His trial was in this year, 683, (Craffus and Pompey being Consuls) which was the year before the Consulship of Hortensius. The crimes of Verres, both for weight and number, are almost incredible. " All the cities of Sicily concurred in the impeachment, excepting Syracuse and Messana; for these two being the most considerable of the province, Verres had taken care to keep up a fair correspondence with them. Syracuse was the place of his residence, and Messana the repository of his plunder, whence he exported it all to Italy: and though he would treat even these on certain occasions very arbitrarily, yet, in some flagrant instances of his rapine, that he might ease himself of a part of the envy, he used to oblige them with a share of the spoil: so that partly by fear, and partly by favour, he held them generally at his devotion; and, at the expiration of his government, procured ample testimonials from them both, in praise of his administration: All the other towns were zealous and active in the prosecution, and by a common petition to Cicero implored him to undertake the management of it; to which he consented, out of regard to the relation which he had borne to them as Quæstor, and his promise made at parting, of his protection in all their affairs. Verres, on the other hand, was supported by the most powerful families of Rome, the Scipios and the Metelli, and defended by Hortensius, who was the reigning orator at the bar, and usually stiled the king of the Forum.

" Cicero had no sooner agreed to undertake the cause, than an unexpected rival started up, one Q. Cæcilius, a Silician by birth, who had been Quæstor to Verres, and by a pretence of personal injuries received from him, and a particular knowledge of his crimes, claimed a preference to Cicero in the task of accusing him, or, at least, to bear a joint share in it. But this pretended enemy was in reality a secret friend, employed by Verres himself to get the cause into his hands in order to betray it. His pretensions, however, were to be previously decided by a kind of process called Divination, Midd. Life of Cic. vol. I. p. 80.

In Verr. 2. 18. & 3. 8. it. 11.

Ascon. Argum. in Divinat.

" come to the relief of that part of the administration, which seemed the most
 " to stand in need of it." Y.R. 683.

Hortensius

" on account of its being wholly conjectural ;
 " in which the judges, without the help of " witnesses, were to divide, as it were,
 " what was fit to be done ; but in the first " hearing Cicero easily shook off this weak
 " antagonist, rallying his character and pre" tensions with a great deal of wit and hu" mour."

Cic. in
Verr. 2.

But as to Verres's advocate Hortensius, who had received presents from Verres (a thing considered at that time as below the dignity of an orator) Cicero reproached him in very sharp terms. " Crassus and Antonius would not " have undertaken the defence of such a man as " Verres, a man lost to all sense of shame ; they " would have feared lest, for so doing, they " should be thought as shameless as he. They " did not care to bring themselves into the di" lemma of being necessitated to appear without " delicacy in the article of probity, by defend" ing a cause notoriously wicked ; or without " gratitude, by deserting a person whose libera" lity they had experienced."

Quintil.
vi. 3.

Quintilian mentions a smart saying of Cicero on this occasion. As he had attacked his adversary in an indirect ironical manner, Hortensius, pretending not to understand him, said, He was not good at expounding riddles ;
That's strange (replied Cicero) as you have the Sphinx at home ; (an ivory Sphinx, which Verres had given him.)

Verres, before he left his province, had openly said, that those ought to fear, who had robbed for themselves only ; but as for him, he had taken enough to satisfy the greediness of many ; that he had a powerful friend (meaning Hortensius) under whose protection he could pillage the people with impunity ; that he had been three years Prætor, and should be very well content with retaining one year's gains for himself ; that he intended another for his advocates and defenders ; and reserved the third, which was the richest, for the judges.

Nevertheless, he was deceived in his expectations. " The previous point being " settled in favour of Cicero, 110 days were " granted to him by Law, for preparing the " evidence ; in which he was obliged to " make a voyage to Sicily. -- On his return to " Rome, he found, what he suspected, a strong

 " cabal formed to prolong the affair by all
 " the arts of delay, which interest or money
 " could procure, with design to throw it off,
 " at least till next year, when Hortensius and
 " Metellus were to be Consuls, and Metellus's
 " brother a Prætor, by whose united autho" rity the prosecution might easily be baffled :
 " and they had already carried the matter so
 " far, that there was not time enough left " within the current year to go through the " cause in the ordinary forms. This put Ci" cero upon a new project of shortening the " method of proceeding, so as to bring it to " an issue, at any rate, before the present
 " Prætor M. Glabrio, and his assessors, who " were like to be equal judges. Instead " therefore of spending any time in speaking,
 " or employing his eloquence, as usual, in " enforcing and aggravating the several ar" ticles of the charge, he resolved to do no" thing more than to produce his witnesses,
 " and offer them to be interrogated : where
 " the novelty of the thing, and the notoriety
 " of the guilt, which appeared at once from
 " the very recital of the depositions, so con" founded Hortensius, that he had nothing to " say for his client ; who, despairing of all " defence, submitted, without expecting the " sentence, to a voluntary exile. Argum.
 Asc. in Act. i.

" From this account it appears, that of the " seven excellent orations, which now remain " on the subject of this trial, the two first only " were spoken ; the one called The Divina-
 " tion, the other The first Action, which is " nothing more than a general preface to the " whole cause ; the other five were published
 " afterwards, as they were prepared and in" tended to be spoken, if Verres had made a " regular defence ; for as this was the only " cause, in which Cicero had yet been en" gaged, as an accuser, so he was willing to " leave these orations, as a specimen of his " abilities in that way ; and the pattern of a just
 " and diligent impeachment of a great and " corrupt Magistrate.

" The

Y. R. 683. Hortensius [that distinguished, illustrious patriot, ever steady to the interest of the Republic] had a great hand in this mischief of corrupting the

"The accusation was divided into four heads: 1. Of corruption in judging causes. 2. Of extortion in selling the laws and interests of the Republic. 3. Of plundering the subjects of their estates, and brought home (which was his peculiar taste.) 4. Of illegal and tyrannical proceedings."

Of all the facts that Dr. Mead has collected from Cicero's orations against Verrus, I shall insert here the most curious only; that is, the most astonishingly wicked: they are under the last head of accusation.

Midd. Life of Cic. p. 102. "When any vessel, richly laden, happened to arrive in the ports of Sicily, it was generally seized by his spies and informers, on pretence of its coming from Spain, and being filled with Sertorius's soldiers: and when the commanders exhibited their bills of lading, with a sample of their goods, to prove themselves to be fair traders, who came from different quarters of the world, some producing Tyrian purple, others Arabian spices, some jewels and precious stones, others Greek wines and Asiatic slaves; the very proof, by which they hoped to save themselves, was their certain ruin: Verrus declared their goods to have been acquired by piracy, and seizing the ships with their cargoes to his own use, committed the whole crew to prison, though the greatest part of them perhaps were Roman Citizens. There was a famous dungeon at Syracuse, called the Latoriae, of a vast and horrible depth, dug out of a solid rock, which, having originally been a quarry of stone, was converted to a prison by Dionysius the Tyrant. Here Verrus kept great number of Roman Citizens in chains, whom he had first injured to a degree, that made it necessary to destroy them; whence few or none ever saw the light again, but were commonly strangled by his orders.

Ibid. 27. "One Gaius, however, a Roman Citizen of the town of Cesæ, happened to escape from this dreadful place, and run away to Messana; where fancying himself out of danger, and being ready to embark for Italy, he began to talk of the injuries which he had received, and of going straight to Rome, where Verrus should be sure to hear of him. But he might as well have said the words in the Prætor's palace, as at Messana; for he was presently seized and secured till Verrus's arrival, who, coming a little soon after, condemned him as a spy or the Fugitive, first to be scourged in the market-place, and then nailed to a cross, erected for that purpose, on a conspicuous part of the shore, and looking towards Italy, that the poor wretch might have the additional misery of suffering that cruel death in sight, as it were, of his home.

"The coasts of Sicily being much infested by pirates, it was the custom of all Prætors to fit out a fleet every year for the protection of its trade and navigation. This fleet was provided by a contribution of the maritime towns, each of which usually furnished a ship, with a certain number of men, and provisions: But Verrus, for a valuable consideration, sometimes remitted the ship, and always discharged as many of the men as were able to pay for it. A fleet, however, was equipped of seven ships; but for shew rather than service, without their complement either of men or stores, and wholly unfit to act against an enemy; and the command of it was given by him, not to his Quæstor, or one of his Lieutenants, as it was usual, but to Cleomenes, a Syracusan, whose wife was his mistress, that he might enjoy her company the more freely at home, while the husband was employed abroad. For, instead of spending the summer as other governors used to do, in a progress through his province, he quitted the palace of Syracuse, and retired to a little island adjoining to the City, to lodge in tents, or rich pavilions, pitched close by the fountain of Arethusa; where, forbidding the approach of men, or business, to disturb him, he passed two of the hot months in the company of his favourite women, and all the delicacy of pleasure that art and luxury could invent.

"The fleet in the mean time sailed out of Syracuse in great pomp, and saluted Verrus and his company, as it passed; when the Roman Prætor, (says Cicero) who had not been

Ibid.

Cic. in Verr. 5. 31.

the courts of justice. He governed with so kingly a sway in all trials, Y.R. 683.
that

Cic. in Verr. 3.
33.

“ been seen before for many days, shewed “ himself at last to the sailors, standing on the “ shore in slippers, with a purple cloak and “ vest flowing down to his heels, and leaning “ on the shoulder of a girl, to view this for“ midable squadron; which, instead of “ scouring the seas, sailed no farther, after “ several days, than into the port of Pa- “ chyus. Here, as they lay peaceably at an“ chor, they were surprized with an account “ of a number of pirate frigates, lying in “ another harbour very near to them; upon “ which the admiral Cleomenes cut his cables in “ a great fright, and with all the sail that he “ could make, fled away towards Pelorus,
“ and escaped to land: the rest of the ships “ followed him as fast as they could; but “ two of them which sailed the slowest, were “ taken by the pirates, and one of the cap“ tains killed: the other captains quitted “ their ships, as Cleomenes had done, and got “ safe to land. The pirates, finding the “ ships deserted, set fire to them all that “ evening, and, the next day, sailed boldly “ into the port of Syracuse, which reached “ into the very heart of the town; where “ after they had satisfied their curiosity, and “ filled the city with a general terror, they “ sailed out again at leisure, and in good “ order, in a kind of triumph over Verres
“ and the authority of Rome.

Ibid. 35.
36.

“ The news of a Roman fleet burnt, and Sy- “ racuse insulted by pirates, made a great noise “ through all Sicily. The captains, in excuse “ of themselves, were forced to tell the truth;
“ that their ships were scandalously unpro-“ vided both with men and stores, and in no “ condition to face an enemy; each of them “ relating how many of their sailors had “ been discharged by Verres's particular or“ ders, on whom the whole blame was justly “ laid. When this came to his ears, he sent “ for the captains, and after threatening them “ very severely for talking in that manner, “ forced them to declare, and to testify it also “ in writing, that every one of their ships had “ its full compliment of all things necessary:
“ but finding, after all, that there was no way “ of stifling the clamour, and that it would “ necessarily reach to Rome, he resolved, for

Vol. III.

“ the extenuation of his own crime, to sacri“ fice the poor captains, and put them all to “ death, except the admiral Cleomenes, the most “ criminal of them all; and, at his request,
“ the commander also of his ship. In conse“ quence of this resolution, the four remain“ ing captains, after fourteen days from the “ action, when they suspected no danger, “ were arrested and clapt into irons. They “ were all young men of the principal fami“ lies of Sicily, some of them the only sons “ of aged parents, who came presently, in “ great consternation, to Syracuse, to solicit
“ the Prætor for their pardon. But Verres
“ was inexorable; and, having thrown them “ into his dungeon, where nobody was suf“ fered to speak with them, condemned them
“ to lose their heads.” The fathers and mo“ thers of these innocent unfortunate young “ men, passed whole days and nights at the door “ of the prison, begging only to be allowed to “ embrace their children, and receive their “ dying breath. At the gate stood the gaoler, the “ Prætor's Lictor, raising taxes upon distress and “ misery. You must give me so much for leave to “ go in; and so much for permission to carry in “ viſuals.—But, how much will you give me to “ kill your son at one stroke, and not back him so “ as to make him die a painful death? The “ price, exacted for this favour, being paid,—
“ Well, but there is another article to be settled.—
“ Your son's carcase must be thrown to the wild “ beasts, unless you purchase leave to bury it. This “ last bargain concluded, the prisoners were “ brought forth and publicly executed; to “ the great satisfaction of Verres, who thereby “ got rid of so many witnesses of his mis“ conduct.

Cic. in
Verr. 5.
39, 40, &c.

Cic. in
Verr. v.

“ It happened, however, before this loss of “ the fleet, that a single pirate-ship was taken “ by Verres's lieutenants, and brought into “ Syracuse; which proved to be a very rich “ prize, and had on board a great number of “ handsome young fellows. There was a “ band of musicians among them, whom “ Verres sent away to Rome a present to a “ friend; and the rest, who had either youth,
“ or beauty, or skill in any art, were distri“ buted to his clerks and dependents, to be “ kept for his use; but the few, who were “ old

Midd. p.
107.

Cic. in Verr. v.
35, &c.

E e

Y. R. 653. that the sentences given were generally such as he pleased. For, in defend-
 B. C. 65. ing his client, he did not confine himself to exerting the power of his wit 592 C. 65. and eloquence: Solicitations, caresses, menaces, money, every means of gaining his point, he diligently employed. The method of passing sentence was by balloting. To each of the Judges were given three waxed tablets [little pieces of wood;] on one of which was the letter
 A. for absolvo; on another the letter C. for condemno; and on the third N. L. for non liquet, [the thing is not clear, the cause must be reheard.] Each Judge, after hearing the cause, was to put one of these tablets into a box, or urn [called Sitella.] Hortensius not only engaged some one among the Judges to be a spy upon the rest; but, when he had an affair much at heart, contrived to furnish the Judges with tablets of different colours, that so when these were taken out of the box, he might see with his own eyes, whether the Judges, by him bribed, had kept faith with him or not.

Pompey, in a speech which he made to the People before his Consul-ship, had promised to put a stop to this scandalous and mischievous corruption. It may therefore reasonably be conjectured, that Aurelius Cotta, now Prætor, who passed a law for that purpose, acted in concert with him. The law imported, that the Judges should no longer be chosen out of the Senate alone, but out of the three orders of the Commonwealth; that is to say, the SENATORS, the KNIGHTS, and the TRIBUNES or Commissioners of the Treasury; which last were of the order of the People: [their business was to remit the public money to the Quæstors for “ old and deformed, were committed to the “ dungeon, and reserved for punishment.

 “ The captain of these pirates had long been “ a terror to the Sicilians, so that they were “ all eager to see his person, and to feed their “ eyes with his execution: but, being rich,
 “ he found means to redeem his head, and
 “ was carefully kept out of sight, and con“ veyed to some private custody, till Verres
 “ could make the best market of him. The “ people, in the mean time, grew impatient
 “ and clamorous for the death of the pirates, “ whom all Prætors used to execute as soon as “ taken; and, knowing the number of them “ to be great, could not be satisfied with the “ few old and decrepid, whom Verres wil“ lingly sacrificed to their resentment. He “ took this opportunity, therefore, to clear
 “ the dungeon of those Roman Citizens, whom “ he had reserved for such an occasion, and “ now brought out to execution, as a part of “ the piratical crew: but, to prevent the im“ precations and cries which Citizens used to “ make of their being Free Romans, and to “ hinder their being known also to any other “ Citizens there present, he produced them
 “ all with their heads and faces so muffled up,
 “ that they could neither be heard nor seen;
 “ and in that cruel manner, destroyed great “ numbers of innocent men! But to finish,
 “ at last, the whole story of Verres: after he “ had lived many years in a miserable exile, “ forgotten and deserted by all his friends,
 “ he is said to have been relieved by the ge“ nerosity of Cicero; yet was proscribed and “ murdered, after all, by Marc Antony, for the “ sake of his fine statues and Corinthian ves- “ sels, which he refused to part with: Hap“ py only (as Laëtantius says,) before his “ death, to have seen the most deplorable end “ of his old enemy and accuser, Cicero.”

the

Cic. in
 Ver. v. 23.

Ibid 60.

Senec. l. vi.

Suafor. vi.

Plin. Hist.

N. lib.

xxxiv. ii.

Laëtan. ja.

4.

the payment of the troops.] This law was observed, till the Dictatorship of Cæsar. Y. R. 682
Bef. Chr.
69.
382 Conf.

But what, more than any thing, rooted Pompey in the affections of the people, was his sacrificing to them, in one important point, the interests of the Aristocracy. The attempt of Sicinius, in the year 677, to restore to the Tribunes their ancient privileges; and the destruction, he thereby drew upon himself, have been already mentioned. Notwithstanding his unfortunate end, the cause he had espoused was still supported: for, the year following, the Consul Cotta found himself obliged to consent that the clause which, in Sylla's law concerning the Tribuneship, excluded the Tribunes from the superior offices, should be repealed. And several Tribunes afterwards successively pursued the design of a total re-establishment of the Tribunician power. Nevertheless, six years had passed, and the thing was not effected. Pompey, whose ambition carried him to aim at a perpetuity of command, a design which he could no other way compass but by the favour of the People, took the present opportunity of gaining them entirely to his interest; and by exerting his consular power, brought about that change, which the multitude so passionately desired, and to which Crassus made no opposition. Cic. pro Corn. i.
& ibi.
Ascon.

The two Consuls, however, had disagreed very much during their whole administration. Pompey, notwithstanding his promise*, had kept his troops on foot near the city; and Crassus had not disbanded his army, so that Rome apprehended a new civil war like that of Marius and Sylla. Towards the close of December, when the people, being assembled, had ineffectually entreated the Consuls to put an end to their differences, a Roman Knight, named C. Aurelius, who had never intermeddled with public affairs, presented himself before them, and told them, "That in a dream he had seen Jupiter, who commanded him to declare to the People in his name, that they should not suffer the Consuls to quit their office, till they were become friends." The multitude, much affected with this dream, pressed the Consuls most earnestly to a reconciliation. Pompey nevertheless, stirred not from his curule chair; but Crassus rose up, and, approaching his colleague, said: "Romans, I think it not below me to make the first advances towards a man whom you honoured with the surname of the THE GREAT, when he was yet very young; and with two triumphs before he was a Senator." At the same time, he held out his hand to Pompey, who could not reject so obliging an invitation. Thus was the reconciliation made between them: * Vid. sup.
p. 201.
Plut. in Crass. &
Pomp.
App. de
Bell. Civ.
p. 427.

* Cicero, in justification of Pompey, affirms, that it was not possible to avoid this repeal of Sylla's law, the People were so eagerly bent upon it: And that it was better Pompey should have the merit of it with the People, than that some pernicious citizen should thereby make himself popular. De Leg. iii. 25.

Y. R. 683. but the people would not depart till the Consuls had caused edicts to be posted up for disbanding their armies.

Yell. Pat. Pompey, who had begun to apprehend lest such a perpetuity of power, as he wished, should draw envy to a dangerous degree upon him, took an oath, that, on quitting the Consulship (which was to expire the last of December,) he would not accept of any government: he kept his word; and his example was followed by his colleague.

This year VIRGIL was born.

CHAP. VI.

The Capitol consecrated. War declared against the CRETANS. The GABINIAN Law in favour of POMPEY (Year of Rome 686.) The war with the Pirates. The MANILIAN Law in favour of POMPEY, (Year of Rome 687.)

Y. R. 684. IN the following Consulship of Q. Hortensius and Q. Cæcilius Metellus (afterwards surnamed Creticus) the rebuilding of the Capitol was finished, fourteen years after its being burnt. Catulus, who had superintended the rebuilding of it, had the honour of performing the consecration^b.

The same year the war against the Cretans, whom the Prætor Marcus Antonius had attacked (as will be hereafter related,) without commission so to do, was undertaken by public authority; and Metellus had the conduct of it, by the voluntary cession of his colleague: who, having been accustomed to a kind of dominion in juridical affairs^c, chose to reside in

Val. Max. In the games which Catulus exhibited on this occasion, he covered with fine linen of various colours the theatres, which till then were open to the heaven. Plin. l. xix. c. 1.

Cic. in Brut. 228. Hortensius had been a volunteer in the first year of the Italian war, commanded a regiment in the second; but when that war was over, stuck close to the bar. He had begun very early to make a figure there, being but nineteen when he pleaded his first cause, to the admiration of all present. Like a statue of Phidias (says Cicero,) the instant he was seen, the same instant he was admired. He charmed the eye no less by his action, than the ear by his voice, and the music of his periods. "He reigned absolute in the Forum when Cicero first entered it, and

" as his superior fame was the chief spur of Cicero's industry, so the shining specimen which Cicero soon gave of himself, made Hortensius likewise the brighter for it, by obliging him to exert all the force of his genius to maintain his ground against his young rival. They passed a great part of their lives in a kind of equal contest and emulation: But Hortensius, by the superiority of his years, having first passed through the usual gradation of public honours, and satisfied his ambition by obtaining the highest, began to relax somewhat of his old contention, and give way to the charms of ease; and luxury, to which his nature strongly inclined him, till he was forced, at last, by the general voice of the city, to yield the post of honour in the City, though the Cretan war had fallen to him by lot, and he had been at first ambitious of that province. This war will be spoken of more at large, when we come to Pompey's expedition against the Pirates.

Brut. p. 443.

Midd. Life of Cic. p. 52. vol. II.

Y. R. 684
Diod. Ap.
pian &
Dio. apud
Fulv. Ur-sin.

“ honour to Cicero.—Hortensius published several orations, which were extant long after his death.—They are said to have owed great part of their credit to his ACTION, which yet was thought to have more of art than was necessary to an orator, so that his compositions were not admired so much by the reader, as they had been by the hearer; while Cicero's more valued productions made all others, of that kind, less sought for, and, consequently, the less carefully preserved. Hortensius, however, was generally allowed by the ancients, and by Cicero himself, to have possessed every accomplishment, which could adorn an orator; elegance of style; art of composition; fertility of invention; sweetness of elocution; gracefulness of action. These two rivals lived, however, always with great civility and respect towards each other, and were usually in the same way of thinking, and acting, in the affairs of the Republic; till Cicero, in the case of his exile, discovered the plain marks [marks visible to himself only, as some think] of a lurking envy and infidelity in Hortensius: yet his resentment carried him no farther, than to some free complaints of it to their common friend Atticus, who made it his business to mitigate this disgust, and hinder it from proceeding to an open breach; so that Cicero, who was naturally placable, lived again with him, after his return, on the same easy terms as before, and lamented his death [which was in 703] with great tenderness, not only as the private loss of a friend, but a public misfortune to his country, in being deprived of the service and authority of so experienced a statesman at so critical a conjuncture.”

Brut. 425.
Orator p.
261.
Quintil. xi.
3.

Cic. in Brut. 425.

Brut. init.

It would be hard to forbear being a little more particular, in this place, concerning the worthiness of the person with whom Cicero lived in such constant friendship, and concerning the grievous weight of that misfortune which the public sustained by losing so eminent a patriot, as Hortensius.

How able and assiduous a practitioner this patriot was, in corrupting the courts of Justice, has been already taken notice of. This was before his Consulship. After his ambition had been satisfied by the attainment of that highest honour; he who had ever been a fop*, and inclined to luxury, became wholly a voluptuary and a trifler.

I shall transcribe some part of what M. Crevier has given us on this head.

“ If (as Seneca thinks) it be true, that there is an infallible and necessary relation between the manners and eloquence of a speaker [talibus hominibus oratio qualis vita, Ep. 114.] what we know of the luxury and finical delicacy of Hortensius, and his fondness for trifles, will give us an idea of his speeches very conformable to the judgment passed on them by Quintilian; who thought them extremely below the reputation he had acquired as an orator.

“ He was so nice with regard to his person, that he dressed himself before a looking-glass, adjusting the plaits of his gown after the most graceful fashion, and then, to keep them in that state, most skilfully binding them with his girdle, the knot of which he contrived to hide in one of the lappets of his gown, which seemed to fall negligently.

“ Foolishly fond of his trees, he watered (if one may here use that word) his Planes with wine. And, it is reported, that, being to plead in a cause where Cicero was likewise engaged, he begged his consent to changing the hour; because he was under a necessity of going, without delay, to his Tusculan villa, to irrigate with wine a Plane-tree, which he had there planted.

“ His passion for the fish in his ponds was no less extravagant. Cicero has jested upon this folly, more than once, in his letters to Atticus. And Varro enters into particulars: He tells us that Hortensius, with regard to his fish, was like misers with regard to their money: he durst not use them. And he not only forbore eating them, but fed them with his own hands; and, when they were sick, took as much care of them as of his slaves [probably more.] He warmed their water, lest they should suffer from the coldness of it; and, it is added, that (like the orator Craffus) he wept for the death of a lamprey.”

* Macrob.
ii. 9.
Tome xi.
p. 204.

The

Y. R. 685.
Bef. Chr.
67.
384 Conf.

The next year L. Cecilius Metellus (brother of Quintus, one of the last years Consuls) and L. Marcius Rex, took possession of the Consular fasces : But Metellus died in the beginning of January. Another whose name is not transmitted to us, was chosen in his place ; but he likewise dying soon after, and before he could enter upon his office, Marcius governed, sole Consul, the remainder of the year, the Romans not thinking it proper to proceed to a new election : He did nothing memorable during his Consulship : After the expiration of it, he went into Cilicia, the government of which had fallen to him.

Y. R. 686.
Bef. Chr.
66.
383 Conf.

The following year, when M. Acilius Glabrio and C. Calpurnius Piso were Consuls, was memorable for the Gabinian law, which gave to Pompey the command of the war against the pirates.

Punt. in Pomp.
Strab. l.
xiv.

The pirates were, originally, of Cilicia ; they owed their beginning to the civil discords in the kingdom of Syria between the branches of the family of the Seleucidae. The Cilicians, favoured by those wars, and the consequent diminutions of the royal authority, carried off a prodigious number of slaves from Syria. It was a very advantageous branch of commerce ; because the Romans, grown rich since the taking of Carthage and Corinth, bought slaves without number. The mart for this trade was the island of Delos ; and very often 10,000 slaves, brought thither at once, were sold the same day. The kings of Cyprus and Egypt, ever at war with those of Syria, favoured the pirates, because they distressed that country. Of these robbers the Romans took little notice, being diverted by more important and more urgent cares from giving attention to them, and from attempting to suppress a power which at first appeared contemptible. The war of Mitridates, to whose service the pirates attached themselves, furnished them with opportunities of increasing their strength. Ever since the time when Sylla besieged Athens, their cruising about had made navigation difficult and dangerous. They very much distressed Lucullus, and put him under a necessity of being upon his guard against a surprize from them, when, by Sylla's order, he was labouring to assemble a fleet from all the maritime countries subject to the Romans, or in alliance with them. The pirates, nevertheless, had not then begun to extend themselves far : They confined their courses to the sea between Crete and Cyrene, and between the Piræus, and the promontory of Malea, now Cape Malio. But within this space, though not very large, they got such rich prizes, that they themselves gave it the name of the Golden Sea. And they confined themselves to it the rather, because they were not yet strong enough to insult Sicily and Italy : And Mitridates, with whom they acted in concert, was then master of Asia, and would not have permitted them to infest its coasts. But when that prince was constrained to abandon his conquests, and had no longer any interest in Asia, he gave full scope to the pirates : and the civil wars at Rome not permitting Sylla to check their progress, their power increased prodigiously. Enriched by the plunder of Orat. l. v.

c. 23.
Florus, l.
iii. c. 6.

App. Mi-
thrid. p.

the

the coasts of Asia, they were soon in a condition to fit out triremes and other large vessels. A multitude of people, ruined by the war between Mitbridates and the Romans, greatly increased the piratic crew; to whom they repaired, that among them they might find means of subsistence, which they were deprived of at land: And now the pirates began to form armies, and the captains of the ships became Generals. They made descents, surprized cities that were not fortified, and, by assault, or by sieges in form, took others that were in a condition of defence: and, by these military exploits, they pretended to have ennobled their profession. And this notion so far prevailed, that many persons, considerable by birth and fortune, associated with them, and were far from thinking they dishonoured themselves by so doing.

Y. R. 686.
Bef. Chr.
66.
385 Cons.

At length they formed a kind of commonwealth, of which Cilicia was the center: a country difficult to approach, because of the rocks and shoals that lined the coasts. Hence, though an assemblage from almost all the nations of the east, they were called Cilicians. They had magazines, or staples, upon the coasts where they cruized, for depositing their booty, and had even naval arsenals well supplied with every thing necessary for building and equipping ships. They likewise erected high towers, from whence they might perceive their prey at a vast distance; and, at length, they succeeded so well, as to engage in their interest great and powerful cities, Pbaselis, Olympia, and several others, which the commodiousness of a trade, carried on at the sole risque and expence of the pirates, induced to become their confederates.

Muræna, whom Sylla had left in Asia, made some efforts to stop the rapid progress of their power, but ineffectually: so that, in the year 675, P. Servilius (who had been Consul the year before) was sent from Rome with both land and sea forces against them. These robbers, nevertheless, had the boldness to venture a battle with the Roman fleet; and, though the Proconsul obtained the victory, it was not without the loss of a great number of his men. After his victory, he pursued them into their retreats, took and demolished several of their fortresses, and even those two considerable cities, Pbaselis and Olympia, which had entered into an alliance with them. Making an incursion into the country, he likewise forced the city of Isaura, and subdued the nation of the Isauri. The fruit, however, of all these conquests was little more than the honour to himself of a triumph, with the surname of Isauricus. His triumph was, probably, in the Consulship of Lucullus and Cotta, in the year of Rome 679; in which year the Prætor Marcus Antonius^b was charged with the war against the pirates, and had a more extensive commission, than had ever before been given to a Roman General: for he had the superintendence of all the sea coasts subject to the Roman empire. The maritime

Cic in
Verr. 1. 1.
4. & ibi
Ascon.

^b This Prætor was son of Marcus Antonius, the famous orator, and father of Marc Antony, the Triumvir.

Y. R. 686. countries, which he was commissioned to defend, were made sensible of
 B. d. Cn. his authority, no otherwise, than by the rapines he there committed :
 65.
 385 Conf. and, though his power extended over all the seas, he confined his opera————— tions to the attacking Crete, which had furnished some troops to the king
 F. v. l. iii. of Pontus, and a retreat to the pirates. Florus tells us, that, believing
 c. 7. himself sure of victory, he carried more chains than arms in his ships.
 The Cretans, who, notwithstanding the reduction of so many kingdoms and states under the Roman yoke, had hitherto preserved their liberty, were not intimidated. They put to sea, met him, defeated him and took many of his ships. To insult the vanquished, they tied the prisoners to the sails and rigging of their vessels, and in that manner returned triumphantly into their ports. Antonius, as meanly discouraged now, as he had been presumptuously confident before, compleated his infamy by clapping up a peace with the Cretans. He felt his disgrace; and, having already a bad habit of body, shame and grief quickly brought him to his end. He died (in 682) bearing the surname of Creticus, that had been given him in derision.

Vid. supr.
 P. 212.

Flor. l. iii.
 c. 7.

In the year 684, the war against the Cretans was undertaken by public authority, and the conduct of it given to the Consul Metellus (colleague of Hortensius,) as has been before mentioned. He acquitted himself of his commission with success: He defeated Lasthenes, one of their principal Generals, reduced the strongest cities of Crete (Cydonia, Gnossus and Lybius) and obliged Panares, the author of the war, and even Lasthenes, to surrender themselves prisoners. Nevertheless, as the Consul treated the conquered with rigour, and they were naturally obstinate, and were supported by a great number of pirates, who had long had correspondence in the island, and places of retreat there, they still made a vigorous resistance.

Plut. in
 Pomp.
 App. Mi-
 thrid.

P. 235.
 Dio. l.
 xxxvi.

Things were in this situation, with regard to Crete, when the Tribune Gabinus (in the Consulship of Acilius Glabrio and Calpurnius Piso) moved, that the conduct of the war against the pirates might be given to Pompey.

The power of the pirates was arrived to such a height, that they had above a thousand good ships, well manned and furnished with skilful pilots. They affected magnificence, and their ships glittered with gold and silver; their oars were silvered over; and the curtains of the cabins were of purple. If they went on shore, it was to feast themselves in the most sumptuous and costly manner; and these entertainments were accompanied with concerts of musick; their insolence and depredations had risen to an excess beyond all imagination. They had taken above 400 cities, and had plundered thirteen of the most famous temples in the world of all their riches: but their principal employment and delight, was to insult the *Romans and humble the pride of Italy. They landed there,

* When any one, who was taken by them, declared himself a Roman, they pretended there, infested the main roads, and rifled the country houses that were not far from the sea. Y. R. 686.

But of all the mischiefs done by the pirates, that which occasioned most complaints at Rome, was the scarcity and dearness of provisions, a matter that always greatly affects the People. The multitude therefore were overjoyed at the proposal made by Gabinus to commission Pompey to clear the seas of those vermin. But the Tribune is said not to have been actuated by any zeal for the public welfare, but to have formed his project with the sole view of gaining Pompey's favour, and thereby mending his own fortune. He did not indeed name Pompey in the Law, but the public voice sufficiently declared him to be the man intended, and the Law was so worded, as to constitute, not a General, but a Monarch throughout the whole extent of the Roman empire. Gabinus proposed, that, out of the Consulars, the People should chuse one, to whom the command should be given for three years over the whole Mediterranean, from the pillars of Hercules, and over all the provinces bordering on that sea, as far as fifty miles within land. The person elected was to have power to chuse out of the Senators fifteen Lieutenants, and to take money at discretion, both out of the public treasury, and from the farmers of the revenue: and he was to have a fleet of 200 sail, with power to raise both soldiers and seamen, in what numbers he should judge necessary. Plut. in Pomp.

The Senators, who in general were very much alarmed at the Tribune's motion, which manifestly tended to give the Republic a sovereign, exclaimed loudly against it: they fell upon Gabinus with such rage, that if we may believe Dio, he was near being killed upon the spot. The People, informed of the violence offered to their Tribune, turned their fury against the Senators, insomuch that they were forced to seek their safety by flight. The Consul Piso distinguished himself on this occasion, telling Pompey, that, as he trod in the steps of Romulus, he ought to expect the like end: words, which brought Piso into the same danger with which he had threatened Pompey. For the multitude gathered about him, and his life would have been in great hazard, if Gabinus, who feared the odium that would be brought upon himself, by the murder of the Consul, had not controuled their fury. Opposition to the Tribune's bill, Vell. Pat. l. ii. c. 32. Plut. in Pomp. Dio.

to be frightened, and to tremble: they struck their thighs, and fell at his feet, to ask him pardon. And when they had obtained forgiveness, they placed themselves about him, put on his shoes, clothed him in his proper habit, that (as they said) they might never mistake him any more; and when, in this manner, they had a long while made him their sport, they placed a ladder on the side of their ship, next the water, intimating to their prisoner, that he was now in full liberty to leave the vessel, and go whithersoever he pleased; and, upon his declining the favour, they threw him overboard.

The daughter of that very Marcus Antonius, who had been appointed to clear the seas of them, was carried by them from his house at Misenum. Plut. in Pomp.

Y. R. 686. from some of his colleagues, was now the Senate's resource; but of the Bef. Chr. whole number two only, L. Trebellius and L. Roscius Otbo, had the courage
 66. to brave the danger.
 385 Cens.

The day came for the tribes to give their suffrages upon the Law in question. Pompey acted his part to perfection. He ascended the Rostra, and addressed the People to spare him; [he was then but in the 39th year; and every body saw him in perfect health, and full of vigour; yet] he was quite spent with his past fatigues; — and — indeed — he was afraid of envy, — He desired nothing so much as the tranquillity of a private life: — Besides, — the Commonwealth had many other persons more capable of serving it: Of which capable persons, however, he would name none; because he would not give offence to any worthy man, whom, possibly, he might chance not to mention.

Gabinus likewise played his part in this comedy, undertaking to answer Pompey's reasons. He said, it were to be wished that the state abounded with men of superior merit, but that these were rare; and when a state was so happy as to possess ONE, it ought to reap advantage from his abilities. For (turning to Pompey) you were not born for yourself only, you were born for your country.

The Tribune Trebellius rose up to speak, but, observing that nobody was disposed to hear him, he only pronounced his VETO. Gabinus thinking himself authorized by the example of Tiberius Gracchus (in the case of his colleague Octavius) moved to have Trebellius deposed from his office: And seventeen of the thirty-five tribes had already voted for deposing him, when he desisted from his opposition.

Plut. &
Dio.

Roscius Otbo, intimidated by the danger which his colleague had just escaped, and not being able, by any exertion of his voice, to make himself heard, amidst the noise of a multitude in so violent an agitation, only lifted up two fingers in the air, to signify that he would have the power, which was proposed to be given to Pompey, divided between two. The People understood his meaning perfectly well, and raised a cry of indignation so loud, that a raven, it is said, flying over the Assembly, was struck with the noise, as with a thunder-clap, and fell dead in the midst of the Forum.

Midd.
P. 118.
Plut. in
Pomp.
& Dio.

Nevertheless, the grant of a power so exorbitant, and unknown to the Laws, was strenuously opposed by Catulus, Hortensius, and all the chief men of the Senate (Cæsar excepted) as dangerous to the public liberty, nor fit to be intrusted to any single person. They alledged, that these unusual grants were the cause of all the misery the Republic had suffered from the proscriptions of Marius and Sylla, who, by a perpetual succession of extraordinary commands, were made too great to be controuled by the authority of the Laws; that, though the same abuse of power was not to be apprehended from Pompey, yet the thing itself was pernicious, and contrary to the CONSTITUTION of Rome; that the equality of DEMOCRACY required, that the public honours should be shared alike by all who were worthy of them ; that there was no other way to make men worthy, and to furnish the city with a number and choice of experienced commanders : He concluded — “ You love Pompey, and you have reason “ so to do. But your affection for him transports you too far ; you “ charge him with all the most dangerous commissions, you expose him to “ the greatest dangers, Should you unfortunately happen to lose him, In “ whom would you place your confidence ? ” Upon which, as Cicero says, be reaped the just fruit of his virtue, when they all cried out with one voice, Y.R. 686. Bef. Chr. 66. 385 Cons. Pro Leg. Man. 20.

IN YOU, CATULUS.

The greater part of the day being spent in these disputes and harangues, it was necessary to put off the decision of the affair to another Assembly. Pompey retired into the country, to shew his modesty, and to have the honour of being named in his absence to so important an employment. As there had been a precedent for the Law a few years before in favour of M. Antonius, a man much inferior both in merit and interest, it was carried against the united authority of all the magistrates, but with the general inclination of the People. Pompey returned by night to Rome, in order to shun the concourse of the multitude, and the congratulations of his friends, who, coming to meet him, would have made his entry a kind of triumphal procession. At break of day he came abroad, and offered a sacrifice ; and the People being again assembled, granted him several things, which had not been granted him by Gabinus's law : for they decreed him 500 ships, 120,000 foot, 5000 horse, twenty-four Lieutenants to be chosen out of the Senate, two Quæstors, and 6000 talents. From the greatest scarcity of provisions, which had been known for a long time in Rome, the credit of Pompey's name sunk the price of them at once, as if plenty had been actually restored.

But though the Senate could not hinder the Law, yet they had their revenge on Gabinus, the author of it, by preventing his being chosen one of Pompey's Lieutenants, which was what he chiefly aimed at, and what Pompey himself solicited : though Pompey probably made him amends for it some other way. Since, as Cicero * says, he was so necessitous at this time, and so profligate, that, if he had not carried his Law, he must have turned pirate himself. * Post red. in Senat. 5.

As Pompey's first view was to restore plenty to the city, and this by delivering Sicily, Sardinia, and the coasts of Africa, the three granaries of Rome, from the fear of the pirates, he so distributed his fleet, that in forty days all the seas, from the Streights to Greece, were perfectly cleared : provisions came in great abundance to the Roman markets, and Pompey was extolled to the skies. Only the Consul Piso, through an inflexible obstinacy, prevented, or retarded, the levies of soldiers and seamen which had been granted ; which obliged Pompey to return to Rome. He was received with the loudest applauses ; and the indignation of the

Y. R. 686.
Bef. Cnr.
66.
383 Corf.

People against Piso rose to such a height, that they were disposed to deprive him of the Consulship: Gabinus had already drawn up a Law for that purpose; but Pompey would not suffer things to be carried to that extremity. On the other hand, the Senate would not support the Consul in his last measures; so that Pompey obtained full satisfaction. He presently left Rome, and, at Brundisium, embarked again, in order to finish his enterprise.

Plut. in
Pomp.

The pirates, as fast as they were driven out of their lurking-places, bent their course towards Cilicia, which was their most secure retreat. Pompey, in pursuing them to that coast, met several of their small fleets, which surrendered to him: he treated his prisoners with great humanity, and this conduct very much facilitated the completion of his enterprize: for those of the pirates, who had avoided his Lieutenants, because more severe, came in from all parts to submit to him, and gave him intelligence of the retreats of the most resolute, and the most guilty of their associates. On the coast of Cilicia, near Coraceum, the whole remaining strength of the pirates, collected into one fleet, waited for him to give him battle. Pompey, with a fleet of sixty ships, defeated them without much difficulty. They shut themselves up in Coraceum, and sustained a siege; but at length, thinking it most prudent to submit, they surrendered to the victor their cities, the islands they had fortified, and, in a word, all their possessions, and themselves.

And thus was terminated the war with the pirates, the forty-ninth day after the departure of Pompey from Brundisium.

Pompey, in this expedition, had taken above 20,000 prisoners, and the question was how to dispose of them. He could not entertain the thought of putting them to death; and, on the other hand, it was not safe to leave it in their power to renew the late mischiefs. He reflected (says Plutarch) that man is neither brutal nor unsociable; that violence is a vice contrary to his nature, and may be changed by a change of habitation, and manner of living, as even the fiercest of wild beasts are, by such methods, made tame. He resolved therefore to remove his prisoners far from the sea-coast into the inland parts, and there disperse them. He settled many in certain cities of Cilicia, which were almost deserted; and especially in Soli, which had been lately ruined by Tigranes. It was afterwards called Pompeiopolis, from the name of its restorer. He likewise transplanted a considerable number of them into Acbaia, and even into Italy.

Vid. supr.
p. 216.
Cic. pro
leg. Man.
c. 12.

Pompey made a great figure in this war with the pirates; but his conduct towards Q. Metellus, who had been commissioned to reduce the island of Crete, dishonoured him. The success of Metellus in that enterprize, and the obstinate resistance of the Cretans, aided by the pirates, have been already mentioned. As they had heard much of Pompey's lenity and clemency, they sent deputies to him in Pamphylia, where he then then was, having reduced Cilicia, declaring by them, that they surrendered themselves to him, and were ready to submit to all that he should command. Ambitious of ruling alone, Pompey, contrary to all reason and decency, received the deputies of the Cretans, and their associate pirates : and pretending, that his commission included all Crete, because no part of that island was fifty miles from the sea, he, by letter, ordered Metellus to cease the war : and he afterwards sent thither Octavius, one of his Lieutenants, to receive the submission of the people ; and in his name, and by his authority, to establish a peace. Metellus paid no regard to these orders, but pressed the siege of the place he had invested ; so that Octavius a Roman commander, was shut up in a town with pirates, to sustain a siege against a Roman army. When Metellus had forced the place, he caused the pirates to be executed, and treated Octavius himself with the utmost contempt : representing to him the unworthiness of his General's conduct, who, to gratify a mean jealousy, had taken under his protection the enemies of Gods and men.

This affair continued in suspense till the next year, when the command of the war against Mithridates was given to Pompey ; who then, being employed in more important cares, left Metellus to complete the conquest of Crete without interfering any more. For this conquest, Metellus acquired the surname of Creticus ; but his triumph was postponed, through the intrigues of Pompey, and the Tribunes of his faction.

In the following Consulship of M. Æmilius Lepidus, and L. Volcatius Tullus, Manilius, one of the Tribunes, no sooner entered on his office, than he raised a fresh disturbance in the City, by the promulgation of a Law, for granting to slaves set free, a right of voting among the tribes ; which gave so much scandal to all, and was so vigorously opposed by the SENATE, that he was presently obliged to drop it : but being always venal, as Velleius says, and the tool of other mens power, that he might recover his credit with the People, and engage the favour of Pompey, he proposed a second Law, that Pompey, who was then in Cilicia, extinguishing the remains of the piratic war, should have the government of Asia added to his commission, with the command of the *Mithridatic war, and of all the Roman armies in those parts.

This was, as Plutarch observes, putting the whole Roman empire into the hands of a single man. The Senate therefore were more alarmed by this proposal, than they had been by that of Gabinus : But the People, who at that time idolized Pompey, appeared so eagerly bent to exalt him, that of all the Fathers, not one, except Hortensius and Catulus (who had

* It was about eight years since Lucullus was first sent to that war, in which, by a series of many great and glorious acts, he had acquired a reputation both of courage and conduct equal to that of the greatest Generals.

Y. R. 687.
Bef. Chr.
65.
368 Conf.

Observations on the Life and Writings of Cicero,
p. 17.
2d edit.

both been Consuls) ventured to speak in favour of the ancient maxims. Servilius Isauricus, a consular person; Cæsar (with a view, perhaps, to commissions for himself of the like irregular kind) and even Cicero then Prætor, Cicero, the consummate patriot, supported the Tribune's proposal, though (as an ingenious and elegant writer observes) "They had not the least pretence of public necessity to justify it, as they seemed to have had in the commission they gave him against the pirates, who were, at that time, very formidable enemies: But Lucullus, who commanded in Asia, had overcome Mitbridates in several battles, and was as capable of finishing the war, as he whom they appointed to be his successor. With an eloquence worthy of a better cause, he most artfully reflected on Lucullus, whose reputation, as well as his authority, was to be made a sacrifice to the envy of Pompey: Then he proceeded to descant upon Pompey's character, which he set off with all the ornaments of rhetoric; attributing to him the whole success, not only of the African, Spanish, and Piratic wars, but even of that against the Slaves, the honour of which was solely due to Crassus. Thus by cruelly injuring two of the greatest Generals that were in the Commonwealth, by a most servile flattery of the man who was manifestly overturning all its LIBERTIES^a, he brought the People to consent to [or rather made the People more ardently desirous to pass] the MANILIAN Law: which, had a regard to the interest of his country been his constant principle, he ought to have opposed as violently, as he did afterwards the Agrarian Law, or any other attempt against the safety and freedom of the state."

Manilius's

^a i. e. All those remains of ROMAN LIBERTY, that could subsist under an usurped, Anticonstitutional, infamous ARISTOCRACY, or OLIGARCHY; where not only Officers of Trust, and even the highest Magistracies, but Judiciary Decrees, were openly bought and sold. Vid. supra, p. 204, 205.

"We have, says M. Crevier, the discourse which Cicero pronounced on this occasion. It is more to his honour, as an orator, than as a patriot, or commonwealth's man. Dio censures him for it, with a severity which I shall not imitate. This historian is almost always unjust in his judgment of those who distinguished themselves by their VIRTUS [i. e. their zeal for the Aristocracy] in the times we are speaking of. In truth, it is very hard to clear Cicero from the charge of not being faithful enough to the maxims of the ARISTOCRACY." [as if it was a proof of Virtue to adhere to those maxims in the Roman DEMOCRACY.] "But he had the Consulship nearly in view, and it behoved him therefore to gain the people's favour, and make sure of the friendship of Pompey. I am, nevertheless, persuaded, that if Cicero had looked upon Manilius's project, as a measure pernicious to the Commonwealth, he would never have promoted it, for the sake of any personal advantage to himself."

This is surely having a faith absolutely implicit in the virtue and integrity of Cicero, such a faith as Cicero, in excuse of himself, pretends to have had in the virtue of Pompey. How far this faith is defensible, I shall leave to the reader's consideration. Most persons, who are members of a FREE state, will, I imagine, judge, that if Pompey aspired to the commission in question, or discovered a willingness to accept it, he was by no means fit to be

Vid. supra,
p. 218, 219.

be

Manilius's bill, passing into a Law, placed Pompey at the utmost height of his wishes; he saw himself raised, by the suffrages of his fellow-citizens, to a power almost equal to that which Sylla had forcibly usurped. But his natural disposition, and a long habit of profound dissimulation, made him pretend great affliction, when he received the news of the honour done him. His friends vied with each other in expressing their joy; but he, frowning and striking his thigh, cried out, O Gods! am I then condemned to endless labour? How much better would it have been for me to have lived without glory and unknown, than to be thus for ever armed, for ever making war! Must I then be always exposed to that envy which persecutes me? Must I never be suffered to enjoy, in the tranquillity of a country life, the dear company of my wife and children? This dissimulation, this hypocrisy (says Plutarch^a) was intolerable even to his most familiar friends, who well knew, that, beside the pleasure of having his ambition satisfied, he had another exquisite joy, from the mortification of his hated rival Lucullus, to whom nothing could be more offensive, than to be supplanted in his command by Pompey. But, before we enter on Pompey's exploits, in the war against Mitridates, it will be proper to take a view of what had passed in Asia and the East, since the PEACE which that prince concluded with Sylla, in the year 668 of Rome; and of the present situation of things in that country.

Y.R. 687.

Plut. Dio.

Appian.

C H A P. VII.

The occasion and commencement (in 669 or 670) of the SECOND MITHRIDATIC WAR; under the conduct of MURÆNA. He concludes a peace with the King in 672, by order of SYLLA, then DICTATOR. The THIRD MITHRIDATIC WAR commences in 679, under the conduct of L. LICINIUS LUCULLUS, then Consul: and is carried on by him to the year 687, when he is succeeded in the command by POMPEY.

THE King of Pontus had no sooner made peace with the Romans, then he turned his arms against the People of Colchis, who had thrown off his government: but they requesting him to give them his be trusted with it; unless it were intended by his constituents as a thing eligible and desirable, to reduce the government to a Monarchy.

I have observed, that this ingenious French writer seems frequently to make the ARISTOCRACY, and the COMMONWEALTH, or FREE STATE, synonymous terms; whereas the Freedom of the Roman People, from the time of Sylla, who, by Laws of his own, established the ARISTOCRACY, was surely, at best, no better than the freedom of outlaws and banditti, who are under the guidance of suitable leaders; and the SENATE itself was notoriously a Spelunca Latronum.

* N. B. This historian, in the beginning of his History of Pompey's Life, makes sincerity and veracity parts of his character.

son

App. Mi-
thridat.
F. 214

son Mitridates to be their king, and he granting their request, they immediately submitted. The father, nevertheless, suspecting that the late rebellion might be the effect of his son's intrigues to obtain for himself a kingdom, sent for him, bound him with chains of gold, and then put him to death.

After this he undertook the reduction of the Bosporani, who had rebelled at the same time with the people of Colchis: and for this enterprize he made such great preparations, both of men and ships, as gave reason to think he had the Romans more in view, than his rebellious subjects. And this seemed the more probable, as he retained several fortresses in Cappadocia, notwithstanding his engagement, by treaty, to yield that country to Triobarzanes.

Muræna, who had been left by Sylla in Asia with Fimbria's Legions, and who with much ardency aspired to the honour of a triumph, was glad of these pretexts for renewing the war. While this project engaged all his thoughts, Archelaus, with his wife and children, took refuge with him. This General had been suspected by Mitridates, ever since the battle of Chærona, and the subsequent negotiation with Sylla; in which the King thought his interest had been sacrificed by his General to that of the Romans. Archelaus, who knew his master's temper, and therefore his own danger, put himself for safety into Muræna's hands, and then urged him to renew the war: an advice which he readily listened to; it being so agreeable to his own predetermination. He entered Cappadocia, seized the city of Comana, and there plundered the rich temple of Bellona. On these hostilities, the King of Pontus, by an embassy^a, remonstrated to Muræna, that he acted contrary to the treaty lately concluded. As the treaty between Sylla and Mitridates had not been put in writing, the parties having been contented with the execution of the conditions, Muræna answered, that he knew nothing of it. He continued his incursions and depredations, and took up his winter-quarters in Cappadocia^b. The King sent his complaints to Rome, and, while he waited for an answer, suffered Muræna unmolested to pursue his hostilities. At length Calpurnius arrived, bringing with him, not a written decree of the Senate, but a mere verbal order to Muræna, to discontinue the war against Mitridates. At least, this is what he said to the Roman General in public, but they saw each other in private, and the war went on as before.

App. ibid.
p. 215

Memnon.
apud Phot.

Muræna passed the river Halys, as if intending to march to Sinope, the capital of the kingdom of Mitridates, and the place where he was born.

^a The Ambassadors are said to have been some Greek philosophers, who endeavoured, instead of serving the King, to render him more odious to the Romans.

^b It is probable, that all this passed in the year 670, the Consulship of Scipio and Norbanus.

Against the Roman General, the king detached Gordius, whom he soon after followed in person, with numerous forces. The armies approached near to each other: the Halys only was between them. Mitbridates passed the river in spite of all opposition from the enemy. A general action ensued, but with what success does not appear. Each side pretended to the victory; yet it would seem, that neither had great cause to boast: For Mitbridates, after the battle, retired towards Colchis, and Muræna into Phrygia. The king, however, celebrated his pretended victory by a solemn sacrifice, after the manner of the Persians, from whom he derived his origin. This was the last action of the second war with Mitbridates, which had lasted about three years. Sylla, being created Dictator, sent his absolute orders to Muræna to desist from hostilities. Gabinus, the bearer of these orders, was likewise com-
App. u. li. sup.
Y. 672.

Muræna seems to have had no good title to a triumph, yet he had that honour: perhaps Sylla, who knew in what manner Mitbridates had celebrated his pretended victory, was willing, for the honour of the Roman name, to grant a triumph to Muræna.

Mitbridates, as we have seen, had twice made peace with the Romans; but he had no written treaty, either with Sylla or Muræna. He sent Ambassadors therefore to Rome, to demand a decree of the Senate, authorizing what had been stipulated between him and the Roman Generals: But as Ariobarzanes had likewise sent Ambassadors to Rome, to complain, that Mitbridates had not restored to him all Cappadocia, Sylla, who was then Dictator, decreed, that the king of Pontus should, previously to any new transaction, evacuate Cappadocia intirely, as had been agreed. Mitbridates obeyed; and afterwards sent a new embassy finally to settle the treaty. But *Sylla was then dead, and the thoughts of the Romans were so much engrossed with intestine troubles and divisions, that the Ambassadors could not obtain audience of the Senate: they returned therefore, without an answer, to their master, who was not sorry to have that pretext for accusing the Romans of an intention to renew the war.
App. Mitbrid. p. 216.
Y. 673 & 674.
* He died in 675.

He had taken care to keep his troops in exercise, by making war upon several nations on the borders of the Phasis and mount Caucasus, and likewise upon the people of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, whom he subjected, and over whom he made his son, Machabes, king.

And now the difficulties, into which the war of Lepidus, and, afterwards, that of Sertorius, had thrown the Roman Commonwealth, made the king of Pontus believe he might renew hostilities with advantage. However, at first, he did not appear himself, but engaged Tigranes to act, who, having entered Cappadocia, became presently master of it, ruined twelve Grecian cities in that country, and carried off the inhabitants, to the number of 300,000, to people his favourite city, Tigranocerta.
Y. 675 & 676.

Liv. Epit.
l. cent.
Y. 678.

Vid. supra,
p. 189,
190.

Plut. in Luc.

Y. 679.

In the year of Rome 678* died Nicomedes, king of Bitbynia, who, by his will, made the Roman People his heir; whereupon M. Junius Silanus, Proconsul of Asia, received orders to go into that kingdom, and reduce it into a Roman province. Mitbridates, who had long entertained the design of seizing that kingdom, would by no means acquiesce in its becoming a part of the Roman dominion. It was at this time therefore he threw off the mask, and having sent the famous embassy, before spoken of, to Sertorius, undertook this his THIRD WAR against the Romans, with more confidence than he had done the two former; his preparations being more judiciously made. Instead of an innumerable multitude of Barbarians of different nations and languages, whose confused noises could only terrify the soft Asiatics, and whose arms glittered with gold and precious stones, he assembled an army of 120,000 stout soldiers, formed and disciplined after the Roman manner. To this body of infantry he added 16,000 troopers well mounted, and 100 chariots armed with scythes. He likewise fitted out a fleet of 400 sail, well manned; and he amassed above nine millions of bushels of corn, which he distributed, in different magazines, along the coast. Thus prepared for war, he attacked Bitbynia both by land and sea.

The Consular Fasces had been transferred to *L. Licinius Lucullus and M. Aurelius Cotta; and the province of Gallia Cisalpina, had * Consulship of L. Octavius and C. Aurelius Cotta.

* Plutarch tells us, that the father of Lucullus, who had been Prætor in Sicily, was accused and found guilty of extortion, and that his mother, sister of Metellus Numidicus, was a woman of very indiscreet conduct. Lucullus distinguished himself by a very uncommon degree of fraternal affection. He was older than his brother Marcus, and therefore sooner capable of holding offices; but never would accept of any office till his brother became capable, by his years, of being associated with him: And the Roman People were so pleased with this turn of his mind, that in his absence they chose him Ædile, conjointly with that brother who was so dear to him: He was much addicted to letters, and could write and speak readily in the Greek as well as the Roman language. A history of the Marse War, written by him in Greek, was extant in Ph- tarcb's time. He was fortunately absent from Italy during those dreadful times, when Marius and Sylla caused such desolation there. He had no share in the Dictator's tyrannical proceedings. Nevertheless, Sylla always treated him as a person he esteemed and loved, and employed him in his most important affairs: and, as a mark of particular friendship, inscribed his Commentaries to him, and left him guardian to his son (as was before mentioned.) Cicero declares, that Lucullus set out from Rome with little or no experience in war, and arrived in Asia an accomplished general: but we learn from others, that Lucullus had served with distinction in the Social War, and had been Sylla's Quæstor, and in that capacity had commanded a fleet, and fought several battles, in all which he came off victorious. He had been Ædile in 674; Prætor at Rome in 676; and Prætor in Africa in 677.

fallen

fallen by lot to the former: But news being soon after brought to Rome, that the government of Cilicia was vacant (by the death of L. Octavius, who had succeeded Servilius Isauricus;) Lucullus, ardently desirous of conducting the war against Mitbridates, employed all his thoughts to get Cilicia assigned to him; because, as Cappadocia joined to Cilicia, if he obtained this province, the accomplishment of his other desire would be a natural consequence.

In order to obtain his wish, he was forced to pay humble court to the mistress of one Cethegus, an infamous, contemptible man, but who had found means to make himself so very popular, that nothing was done at Rome without his approbation; and there was no access to him, but through his mistress, Precia. Lucullus gained her by presents. It greatly flattered her vanity, that a Consul, and such a man as Lucullus, should solicit her protection. The province of Cilicia was given to him by the People, and, of course, as he had foreseen, the conduct of the war against the king of Pontus. However, his colleague, Cotta, desiring to have part in that enterprize, obtained of the Senate to send him with a fleet to guard the Propontis, and to defend Bitbynia. Plut. in Lucull.

Lucullus carried only one legion from Italy: He found four in Asia, but two of the four were those who (as above* related) had formerly killed Flaccus their General, and afterwards betrayed Fimbria: all stout soldiers, experienced in war, and inured to fatigues, but intractable, seditious, and accustomed not to obey their commanders, but to be humoured by them. Lucullus had the skill to bring them under better discipline; (though not to keep them in obedience to the end of the war.) * Vid. supr. p. 146.

And whereas the exactions of Sylla, and the oppressions and extortions of the publicans and usurers, had greatly indisposed the cities of Asia towards the Roman government, Lucullus applied himself to remedy this evil, as much as the cares of the war would allow him to do. He checked the Harpies (as Plutarch call them) in their course of oppression, till he could entirely expel them; insomuch, that the states of Asia left him in full liberty to march without fear to the aid of his colleague Cotta, who, by imprudence, had brought himself into very great danger. For being arrived in Bitbynia, and finding Mitbridates there with his army, he aspired to the glory of conquering him without the aid of Lucullus. Defeated near Chalcedon both by land and sea in one day, he lost 4000 Romans, and above 60 ships, and was obliged to shut himself up in that city, where he had no hope of succour, but from his colleague. If Lucullus had followed the inclinations of his soldiers, he would not have attempted to relieve Cotta, with whom they were greatly offended, on account of his project of conquering without them. They would have had their General turn his arms towards Pontus; but he, having Liv. Epit. l. xciii. Mitbrid. p. 218. Plut. in Luc.

Strab. l.
xii. p. 575.
Plut. in
Luc.

called them together, declared to them, that he had rather rescue a single Roman citizen from danger, than conquer all the dominions of Mitbridates. He began his march therefore towards Bithynia; upon advice of which, Mitbridates left Chalcedon and Costa, and met Lucullus near Otræ, a city of Phrygia; but a mass of fire falling between the two armies, this prodigy so terrified them, that they separated, as it were, by consent. Lucullus, judging from the enormous multitude which followed Mitbridates, that he would soon be obliged to retire for want of provisions, resolved to avoid an action. Accordingly it so fell out: the king decamped, and, to conceal his march, set forward in a very dark and rainy night, and arrived before Cyzicum, an important city^d, and one of the keys of Asia. The inhabitants had suffered a considerable blow in the naval battle of Chalcedon, where they had lost 3000 men and ten ships, so that he expected to carry the place with ease. He formed ten camps about it, and made his fleet shut up the two extremities of the Streight, that separated the island from the continent. Lucullus, nevertheless, who had followed the enemy, and had encamped at a small distance from them upon an eminence, where he was safe from insult, and at hand to cut off their provisions, boasted to his soldiers, that, without fighting, he should force Mitbridates to quit his enterprize.

The Cyzicenians sustained the siege with wonderful resolution, only they were somewhat disturbed for having no news of the Roman General. They could see his camp, but did not know that it was his; for the enemy had made them believe, that it was the camp of the Armenians and Medes, sent by Tigranes to the aid of Mitbridates. Lucullus very soon found means to undeceive them.

App. Mi-
thrid.
221.
Plut. in
Luc.

The king's army began to suffer famine; however, he would not yet abandon his enterprize: only, to be less straitened for want of provisions, he sent away almost all his cavalry, the beasts of burden, and that part of his infantry, which, having suffered most, was least capable of service. Lucullus intercepted this detachment, near the river Rhyndicus; many were killed on the spot, and 15,000 taken prisoners, together with 6000 horses, and a prodigious number of beasts of burden. Lucullus brought all to his camp, passing within view of the besiegers, in a kind of triumph. The famine increased in the king's camp; for the sea, by which he had been hitherto supplied with provisions, became impracticable on account of the bad season. Many therefore died of hunger, some fed on human flesh; others, who, abhorring that diet, fed upon grass and herbage, sunk through weakness; and the great number of the dead, that remained without burial, brought the plague into the camp: Mitbridates, nevertheless, continued the siege, waiting the success of some batteries he had planted.

^d It was about fifty miles in circumference, and situated in an island of the Propontis.

The Cyzizenians, who knew the weak condition of his troops, made a vigorous sally, destroyed his works, and burnt all his engines. Nothing remained now for the king but flight, and this was difficult in the presence of a victorious army. To divert the thoughts of Lucullus to another object, he equipped another squadron of ships, that was to go to the Ægean sea. Aristonicus, the admiral, carried ten thousand pieces of gold with him, in order to corrupt, if possible, Fimbria's legions, which Mitbridates had long been in hopes of seducing. His hopes had some foundation, as those soldiers were mutinous and seditious, and had been adherents to Marius's faction, of which he had actually with him some persons, sent to him by Sertorius. Fimbria's soldiers pretended to listen to the proposals of Aristonicus, but, having contrived to draw him to a place, where they were masters, seized both his gold and him, and killed those that accompanied him.

In the mean time, Mitbridates was making the best dispositions he could for retiring from before Cyzicum. He directed two of his Generals to march his land forces, which were still about 30,000, to Lampsacus. As for himself, he embarked for Parium, and had a safe passage; but his land army was pursued, and overtaken near the Granicus (or the Æsepus) by the Romans, who cut in pieces near 20,000 of them, and took many prisoners. Those few that escaped shut themselves up in Lampsacus. Lucullus appeared before the place, and they would have fallen into his hands, if Mitbridates had not sent ships to carry them off with all the inhabitants. The Roman General returned to *Cyzicum and was received with acclamations by the inhabitants, who, in honour of him, instituted a festival, which they called Lucullea.

It is said, that Mitbridates, in this unfortunate expedition, did not lose less than 300,000 men, including the necessary followers of an army.

Lucullus turned his thoughts to drive Mitbridates entirely out of Bitbynia; but, for that purpose, he wanted a fleet, Mitbridates being master of the sea: Nevertheless, he declined an offer made him by the Senate of 3000 talents, to equip a fleet: He answered, that the zeal and fidelity of the allies of the Republic would supply him with what he wanted. Accordingly he drew together a great number of ships from the cities of Asia, and, in a little time, was able to distress Mitbridates by sea, as well as by land. His lieutenants, Voconius Barba and Valerius Triarius, took the principal cities of Bitbynia, Apamea, Prusa, Prusias, Nicea: and Mitbridates, after a shipwreck, in which he lost a great number of vessels, near Parium, was obliged to shut himself up in Nicomedia, whither Cotta first, and afterwards Triarius, came to besiege him.

* The siege of Cyzicum seems to have been begun towards the end of the year 679, in which L. Lucullus was Consul; and it was raised in the beginning of the Consulship of M. Terentius Varro Lucullus and C. Cassius Varus, year of Rome 680.

Piut. in
Luc.

The king, far from being driven to despair by so much bad success, or from confining himself to the defensive, actually sent away a fleet to support the revolt which Spartacus had excited in Italy. He had given the command of this fleet to two of his own officers, and M. Marius, whom Sertorius had sent to him with the title of Proconsul. Lucullus sailed in quest of this fleet, found it the road of Lemnos, and destroyed the whole, being thirty-two ships of war, with a great number of transports; and the three admirals were made prisoners. Lucullus, considering Marius as a traitor to his country, and apprehending that he might escape due punishment, by dying sword in hand, had taken the precaution, before the battle, to order his soldiers not to kill any man who had but one eye, which was Marius's case; the victor put him to death by torture.

The intire evacuation of Bitbynia by Mitbridates, was the consequence of this victory; for having received advice, that Lucullus was advancing against him with the utmost expedition, he set sail from Nicomedia, to return into his own kingdom: But not far from Heraclea a violent storm dispersed his fleet, and sunk many of his ships. The whole coast was covered with the wrecks; and this completed the ruin of his maritime forces. Being himself in a ship too large to approach the shore, during the violent agitation of the sea, he was constrained to go on board a pirate's sloop; in which he escaped to Heraclea.

Memnon.
aped Phot.

This city did not belong to him; but was a petty Grecian Republic, which, discontented with the exactions of the Romans, and yet dreading their power, remained fluctuating between the two parties. It was by means of a secret intelligence, with one of the principal citizens, that the king got admittance; but, being once admitted, he easily brought the citizens to declare in his favour: after which, under pretext of defending the town against the Romans, he placed there a garrison of 4000 men, then marched to Sinope, and from thence to Amisus.

Lucullus, after conferring with Cotta, left to him the care of besieging Heraclea, gave the command of the fleet to Triarius, and resolved in person to pursue Mitbridates by land, and carry the war into his dominions.

App. Mi-
thrid. p.
224.

The king neglected nothing in so pressing a danger, sent Ambassadors and letters to the Armenian and Partbian kings, and to the kings of Scythia. The minister whom he sent into Scythia betrayed him; carrying the gold and presents, with which he was intrusted, into the camp of Lucullus. The king of Partbia would have nothing to do with a quarrel that seemed foreign to him. Only Tigranes, solicited by one of his wives, the daughter of Mitbridates, made some promises, but was not in haste to put them in execution. The king of Pontus, thus reduced to place all his hopes in himself, undertook to traverse the march of Lucullus, sending

R. Y. 610. light-armed troops to harass him, and intercept his convoys; insomuch, that that the Roman General, in order to have bread, made 30,000 Gallo Greeks, each with a medimnus * of corn upon his shoulders, march along with the army. But this scarcity was of no long duration: the Roman army soon found itself in a plentiful country; which, not having for a long time past experienced the calamities of war, supplied the conquerors with such abundance, that an ox was sold for a drachma, a slave for four, and the rest of the booty was reckoned of no value, because they could find no purchasers.

* Somewhat more than a bushel.
Plut. in
Luc.

Lucullus, not meeting with any resistance, laid siege to two cities, neighbouring one to the other, Amisus and Eupatoria. He did not, however, press the siege of those places. Blocking them up, he advanced into the country as far as Themiscyra, near the Thermodon. His soldiers, greedy of plunder, were much dissatisfied with his manner of carrying on the war. Many places, which had surrendered to him, he had received on capitulation: he had taken none by force of arms: and it was manifest that he intended to spare Amisus, which was one of the royal cities of Mitbridates, who had a palace in it. Lucullus despised their murmurs, but thought himself obliged to justify his conduct to those, who thought that he did not follow Mitbridates close enough, but imprudently gave him time to assemble new forces. “There is nothing I wish “more, said Lucullus, than to see Mitbridates again at the head of “an army, numerous enough to make him believe he is in a condition to “contend with us, and under no necessity of flying at our approach.
“Should he despair of defending himself by his own strength, he will “have recourse to his son-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia, the most pow“erful prince of Asia, and who is seeking a pretence for making war a“gainst us: and what more specious pretext can he have, than that of “defending a prince his ally, who implores his protection?” In fact, Lucullus suffered the rest of the campaign to pass without any considerable surprize, and Mitbridates took advantage of this inaction to draw together, during the winter, 40,000 foot, and 4000 horse, with which, in the beginning of the spring, he passed the Lycus, and marched to meet the Romans, who were advancing in quest of him.

Plut. ibid.

The two armies, though for a considerable time in view of each other, came to no general engagement. In a skirmish of the cavalry, Mitbridates had all the advantage; insomuch that the Roman, sensible of the enemy's superiority in horse, and therefore of the necessity of avoiding the plains, removed his camp to an eminence, where he could not be forced to fight against his will.

* Y. 681.
App. Mi-
thrid. p.
225.

It was about this time, that Lucullus narrowly escaped being assassinated by Oltacus, prince of the Dandarians, a nation in the neighbourhood of the Palus Meotis. This prince having promised Mitbridates to rid him of Lucullus, came to the Roman camp as a deserter, and so far insinuated himself into the good graces of the General, as to be often admitted to his table, and even to his councils. The Dandarian, having chosen a day for the execution of his purpose, commanded his servant to keep his horse in readiness for him without the camp; and, at noon, when the excessive heat disposed every body, soldiers and officers, to take some repose, he went to Lucullus's tent, expecting to be readily admitted. But as Lucullus, who had fatigued himself very much the day before, and had passed the night without sleep, was just then laid down to rest, his servant signified this to Oltibacus. The prince, nevertheless, answered peremptorily, That he would go in; for that he must speak to the General upon an affair of importance. To which the servant replied, There is nothing more important than my master's health: and then, without hearkening any further to him, roughly with both his hands pushed him away. Oltibacus, afraid of being suspected, left the camp immediately, and returned to Mitbridates.

Plut. in Lucull.

* L. Gellius Poplicola and Cn. Corn. Lentulus Clodianus.

App.
Mithr. p.
226.

Plut. in
Luc.

In the mean time, both armies began to suffer famine, having eaten up the country where there were. The Romans had no provisions, but what they brought from the territories of Ariobarzanes, and were obliged to detach large bodies of troops to escort their convoys. Mitbridates rightly judged, that if he could intercept their convoys, he should reduce Lucullus to the same state to which Lucullus had reduced him before Cyzicum. This therefore he attempted: whereupon two considerable actions ensued, in both which the Romans were victorious. In the second, the king's detachment, amounting to 4000 foot and 2000 horse, was so entirely overthrown, that only two men escaped to carry to their master the news of his misfortune. The victors passed insulting before his camp, with a long train of carriages, loaded with spoils, and provisions; and this sight spread so great a consternation among his troops, that he lost all confidence in their service, and, being distressed, by the want of provisions, resolved to steal away from his army: and this resolution he imparted to the principal persons of his council, who immediately turned their thoughts to save their baggage, by sending it off with all expedition. The soldiers, observing these preparations for flight, stopt the baggage: a scuffle ensued; the enraged multitude plundered the carriages, and massacred those to whom they belonged. Dorylaus, one of Mitbridates's principal Generals was murdered solely for the sake of the purple robe which he wore. Upon this uproar, the king came out of his tent, and endeavoured to pacify the troops; but no body hearkened to him; and when, without either officer, or slave to attend him, he sought to escape by flight, he was thrown down, and must have been trampled to death, if one of his eunuchs, who perceived him in that miserable condition, had not given him timely aid, and a horse to carry him off. Lucullus, apprised of what had passed, sent his cavalry in pursuit of the runaways, while he himself with the legions entered the camp. A body of Gallo-Grecian horse pursued Mitbridates so close, that it would have been scarce possible for him to escape, had not the pursuers found in their way a mule loaded with gold. Their stopping to seize the rich prey^a gave him time sufficient. He arrived at Comana, and from thence went to Tigranes in Armenia. By this victory, all Pontus was subjected to the Romans. Lucullus took the city of Cabira, where Mitbridates had passed the preceding winter; hither came the commanders of forts and castles^b, bringing the keys of them to the victor without delay. He followed Mitbridates in his flight, till he learned that the king had entered the dominions of Tigranes: then, turning back, he reduced Armenia Minor, and some nations in the neighbourhood of Colchis: after which he led his army towards the cities of Amisus and Eupatoria, which had been only blockaded during his absence. He presently took Eupatoria by assault: Amisus cost him more trouble, having a good engineer for its governor, a man well skilled in the science of defending towns. Lucullus, nevertheless, chusing a time to assault the walls, when the governor did not expect it, carried the place. The governor made his escape by sea, and, in going off, set the city on fire, the better to secure his retreat; or, perhaps, to prevent the Romans from enriching themselves with the plunder. It was thridat.
Legions

App. Mi-
p. 227.
Plut. in Luc.

* Y. 682.

^a The king's secretary had fallen into the hands of the Romans; and, though Lucullus had given orders that particular care should be taken of him, yet those to whose charge he was committed, having discovered that he had 500 pieces of gold about him, killed him for the sake of the money. Plut. in Lucull.

Lucullus had likewise forbid the soldiers to plunder the camp, it being, probably, his purpose to have all the spoil collected, and then equally distributed among them, according to ancient custom. But times were changed: the sight of so many gold and silver vessels, purple carpets, and other rich spoil, made them regardless of the General's orders. App. Mitbr. p. 227.

^b In these castles, the Roman General found great treasure and many prisoners, who had been long shut up. Of these some were Greeks, other princes of the royal family, whom the public supposed to be dead. Nysa, the sister of Mitbridates, and widow of Nicomedes, became Lucullus's prisoner on this occasion, and very fortunately for her: For the sisters and wives of Mitbridates, who had not fallen into the hands of the Romans, but were kept under guard, near Pharnacia, perished miserably. The king, not finding Tigranes very forward to assist him, and therefore thinking himself irretrievably ruined, sent the eunuch Bacchidas to Pharnacia, with orders to his two sisters, Raxana and Statira, who had never been married, and were then about forty years of age, to die. Raxana loaded with imprecations her barbarous brother: the other, affecting an heroic courage, highly praised the goodness of the king, who, not being able to protect them, spared them at least the shame of captivity, and perhaps of a treatment most unworthy of their rank.

Berenice and Monimia, two of the king's wives, perished in the same castle. Berenice was accompanied by her mother, then very old, who would share with her daughter the cup of poison; and she quickly expired. But the daughter, being young, was not so soon dispatched; so that Bacchidas, being in haste, strangled her. When Bacchidas signified to Monimia the king's order to die, which left her to chuse what kind of death she pleased, she snatched off the diadem that encircled her head, and, having put it round her neck, hung herself up by it: but, the weight of her body soon breaking it, she threw it upon the ground and spit upon it, saying, Wretched bandage, couldst thou not do me such a service as this at least! And then she presented her throat to the eunuch's sword. Plut. in Lucull.

* Consulship of Cn. Aufidius Orestes and L. Corn. Lentulus Sura.

originally Grecian, and a colony from Athens; for which reason especially, the victor was very desirous to save it. He would have had his soldiers extinguish the fire, and forbear plundering; but seeing them ready to mutiny, he suffered them to plunder, hoping that this would engage them to stop the conflagration. But they, on the contrary, searching into every dark corner with torches^a for hidden treasures, set fire themselves to a great number of the houses. A heavy rain, however, happily falling, extinguished the fire. Lucullus gave orders for rebuilding what was destroyed, and signalized his humanity in many instances; after which he set out for Asia, there to pass the winter, sending, at the same time, his brother-in-law, Appianus Claudius, to Tygranes, to demand of him to deliver up Mitridates to the Romans.

Plut. in Luc.
• Y. 683.

Asia was, at this time, in a state of extreme distress. The fine of 20,000 talents, laid on by Sylla, had given occasion to numberless oppressions by the Roman farmers of the taxes, and by the usurers. The cities were constrained to sell the ornaments of their temples, and the paintings and statues which adorn their public buildings. Fathers sold their sons and daughters: and, even after this, they themselves were so cruelly treated, that slavery, into which they fell at last, seemed to them a redemption from it. Lucullus, to remedy these evils, in the first place, prohibited the exacting a greater interest than twelve per cent. which it was the custom of the Romans to pay for money lent. In the second place, he entirely cancelled those debts, of which the interest had exceeded the principal. And, lastly, he decreed, that the fourth part of the debtor's estate should be made over to the creditor, till the discharge of the debts; declaring farther, that whoever should add the interest to the principal, and exact interest for the whole, should lose both absolutely. By these methods, in less than four years the debts were paid off, and the estates became clear in the hands of the owners. The usurers, though they had already received 40,000 talents†, the double of the principal sum; yet, accumulating interest upon interest, pretended that 80,000 talents‡ were still due to them from the province.

In great wrath therefore were these usurers; and they hired certain mercenary orators to declaim against Lucullus at Rome; where, the greater part of those who governed the State being in debt to the same usurers, these doubted not of the success of the invectives. Lucullus, however, enjoyed the unmixed delight of being incessantly blessed by multitudes, and even whole nations, which he had relieved from misery. The fame of his justice spread into the neighbouring provinces, and made them envy the happiness of the people who had such a governor.

^a Lucullus is reported to have wept when he saw the desolation of this city, and to have said to his friends, that he had always looked upon Sylla as the happiest of men, in that he had been willing and able to preserve Athens from destruction; but his own hard fate would make him resemble Mummius, who took Corinth, and destroyed it. Plut.

† 7,750,000 l.

‡ 15,500,000 l.

• Consulship of M. Licinius Crassus and Cn. Pompeius Magnus.

In the mean time, Appius Claudius returned from the court of Tigranes, to whom he had been sent to demand Mitbridates.

Tigranes was, at that time, the most powerful king of Asia; much more powerful than his father had been, who had reigned over a part only of Armenia. He had passed his youth as a hostage among the Parthians, and did not obtain his liberty, without making a cession to them of a considerable part of the dominions of his ancestors; but he had no sooner mounted the throne, than he conceived thoughts of aggrandizing himself; and, having subdued several petty princes his neighbours, he thence assumed the pompous title of King of Kings. Having augmented his strength by these conquests, he retook from the Parthians the country which he had been obliged to resign to them; and he even entered their territory, and ravaged it. He subdued Mesopotamia, and filled it with Greeks, transplanted from Cilicia and Cappadocia. He constrained the Arabians, called Sœnitæ, to quit their deserts; and, having settled them in permanent abodes, employed them in carrying on the commerce of the different parts of his vast dominions. And, at length the Syrians, quite tired out by the divisions that were perpetually reviving between the princes of the house of the Seleucidæ, cast themselves under his protection: And it was in the city of Antioch, the capital of the kingdom of Syria, that he gave audience to Appius Claudius. Plut. in Luc. & Strab. l. xi. p. 532.

This course of prosperity, not interrupted by any stroke of adverse fortune, had rendered Tigranes frantic with pride. He had amongst his servants several kings, whom he constrained to wait upon him; and particularly four, who, when he was on horseback, attended him on foot, meanly habited; and, when he gave audience sitting upon his throne, they stood on each side with their hands across, to express, by that attitude, that they were humble slaves, ready to suffer whatever their imperious master should ordain. Plut. in Luc.

This theatrical shew made no impression upon Appius. When he was admitted to an audience, he told the monarch plainly, that he was come to carry away Mitbridates as a conquered enemy, destined to adorn the triumph of Lucullus; and to declare war against Tigranes himself, in case of his refusal to deliver up the king of Pontus. The Armenian, having never heard a word of such freedom, during the five and twenty years he had reigned, was disconcerted by the unexpected haughtiness of the young Roman. Nevertheless, he affected to appear unmoved, and answered with an air of serenity, that he would not abandon his father-in-law; and that, as to himself, if the Romans thought proper to begin a war with him, he should know what measures to take in his defence, and would make them repent of their aggression. As Lucullus, in his letter to him, had stiled him only King, not King of Kings, he put on the superscription of his answer, only the name of Lucullus, without adding IMPERATOR. However, he did not omit to send the customary presents to Appius: and, when the Roman refused them, Tigranes insisted, adding other presents more considerable. Appius, judging it not proper to appear so much out of humour, as to act towards the king like an enemy, accepted a cup, but sent back the rest, and returned to Lucullus with all possible expedition.

This embassy had a good effect in favour of Mitridates; with regard to whose interests Tigranes had hitherto shewn himself remarkably cold, having never so much as seen him, since his coming into Armenia. But now he invited him to court, and had frequent conferences with him.

Lucullus had no sooner received the answer of Tigranes, than he prepared to carry the war into that prince's dominions. Leaving Asia, he rejoined his army in Pontus, where Cotta had just got possession of Heraclea, after a two year's siege; the commander of the garrison having betrayed the town to Triarius, the Roman admiral, who attacked it by sea. Cotta carried off great numbers of the inhabitants into captivity, rifled the temples of their treasures, and of their statues of the Gods; and, when he was possessed of all the riches of the place, he set it on fire, reducing the greater part of it to ashes: after which he returned to Italy, leaving the troops, that had been under his command, to Lucullus.

Ap. Phot. The people of Heraclea having sent ambassadors to Rome, to complain of Cotta's violences, he was very ill received there at his arrival. Memnon, an historian of Heraclea, reports, that Cotta was deprived of his dignity of Senator; that the captives were set at liberty by the Senate; and that the People, before whom the affair was brought, restored to the Heracleotes their territory and port.

Plot. in Luc.
App. Mi-
thridat.
p. 227.
Memnon.

Lucullus, soon after his entering Pontus, took Sinope, where Mitridates was born, and had passed his infancy, and which, for these reasons, he had made the capital of his dominions. As the place was taken by assault, Lucullus could not, at first, hinder his soldiers from committing great disorders and slaughter; but, at length, he put a stop to their violence; and those of the inhabitants, who had escaped, he treated with great clemency.

The only considerable place, which remained to Mitridates in Pontus, was the city of Amisus, and this very soon surrendered. Lucullus passed the winter in Pontus, and, whilst he was there, received ambassadors from Macchares, one of the sons of Mitridates, who had made him king of Bosporus. This prince, seeing his father abandoned by all his subjects, followed their example; and having before courted the friendship of Lucullus, during the siege of Sinope, sent him now a crown of gold. Lucullus, on his part, acknowledged Macchares king, and the ally and friend of the Roman people.

The

The next year (684) nothing was talked of, but the mighty preparations of Tigranes, who, in conjunction with Mitbridates, was soon to enter Lycaonia and Cilicia; and thence to go and attack the Romans, even in the province of Asia. * Y. 684.

Lucullus, despising such an enemy, disdained to keep upon the defensive, and leaving Sornatius, one of his Lieutenants, with 6000 men, to keep the country in awe, he, with only 12,000 foot and 300 horse, marched away to attack Tigranes in the heart of his kingdom.

As the Armenian king was one of the most powerful sovereigns at that time in the world, the enterprize of the Roman General seemed rash to many. His soldiers followed him with reluctance; and at Rome, when his design was known there, some orators, instigated by his enemies, exclaimed that Lucullus made war upon war, not by necessity, nor for the service of the Commonwealth, but to be always at the head of an army, and to enrich himself more and more, regardless of the dangers to which he exposed the State. Plut. in Luc.

Nevertheless Lucullus pursued his plan, crossed the kingdom of Ariobarzanes (a prince always in alliance with the Romans) and advanced to the Euphrates, which he passed without much difficulty, and encamped that day upon its banks. The following days he crossed Sophene, without hurting the country in the least; which gained him the affection of the inhabitants, so that they received the Roman troops with joy, and supplied them with all the provisions they needed. He was extremely desirous to advance; and his soldiers having expressed some eagerness to attack a fort, which was said to be full of riches, There's the fort we must take, said Lucullus to them, pointing to mount Taurus, which was very distant; what we leave behind us will be the reward of our victory. He continued his march, and having passed the Tigris, drew near to Tigranocerta.

That Lucullus should thus penetrate to the very center of the enemy's country, without opposition, cannot but seem wonderful. The senseless and almost incredible pride of Tigranes was the cause of it. The first man who brought the news of Lucullus's approach had his head cut off, in reward of his service. After this example, we may naturally suppose, that nobody was in haste to bring advice of the motions of the Roman army; and, while the king's dominions were actually a prey to the enemy, his courtiers said to him in flattery, that Lucullus would be a great General, indeed, if he only ventured to stay at Ephesus, and did not immediately fly from Asia, when he should see what an innumerable multitude of soldiers he had to contend with. But, at length, Mitrobarzanes, one of those who had easiest access to him, ventured to tell him the truth, and inform him of the arrival of Lucullus. Tigranes, still besotted with the notions of his own grandeur, commissioned this courtier to go with 3000 horse and a strong body of foot, and bring him the Roman General alive, and put his army to the sword. The event was, that Mitrobarzanes, falling with fury upon an advanced part of the Roman army when pitching their camp, lost his life in the action, and the troops were cut in pieces. Tigranes began then to open his eyes, and to see his danger; and finding himself obliged to abandon Tigranocerta, he retired towards mount Taurus, in order to collect his forces from all parts of his dominions; sending at the same time to Mitridates to come and join him. Lucullus, by several detachments, did all he possibly could to hinder the assembling of Tigranes's troops, and to harass the king himself, in his retreat. Murena fell upon him in a pass, and so distressed him, that he was constrained to fly with precipitation, leaving his baggage a prey to his enemies. But as it was impossible for Lucullus to subsist his army long in an enemy's country, without a victory, he, in order to draw Tigranes to a general battle, resolved to besiege Tigranocerta, his beloved city, his own work, and his glory, and which he had called after his own name. The king, somewhat humbled at first by the checks he had received, listened to the counsels of Mitridates, who, by letter, and by Taxiles, one of the best Generals of the Armenian, advised him not to give battle to the Romans, Troops invincible in action; but destroy them, by employing his numerous cavalry to cut off their provisions. But when Tigranes saw so great a number of soldiers, of different nations, assembled round him, Armenians and Gordyemians, Medes and Adiabeniensians, led by their kings; Arabians from the country between Babylon and the Persian gulph; Albanians and Iberians from the coasts of the Caspian sea; and even the free nations and Nomades (Tartars) from the neighbourhood of the Araxes, who, being subject to no prince, were allured by the presents and largesses of the Armenian king, this monarch returned to his former confidence: and in this confidence he was mightily upheld by the folly of all around him; whose discourses, at banquets and councils, were nothing but empty boastings and menaces. Intoxicated with pride and presumption, he thought the advice, to avoid fighting, which Taxiles continued to give, had the appearance of treachery, and it had like to have cost that officer his head. And as for Mitridates, the Armenian suspected him of giving the same counsel from envy. This suspicion made Tigranes in haste for a battle, lest the king of Pontus should come and share with him the glory of defeating the Romans; and having expressed his concern that he had only Lucullus to fight with, and not all the Roman Generals together, he put his whole army in march.

* Consulship of Q. Hortensius and Q. Cecilius Metellus.

His forces were, in reality, numerous enough to inspire so vain a prince with great confidence: For he had twenty thousand archers and slingers, and fifty-five thousand horse, seventeen thousand of which might be said to be cased up in iron, so covered they were with their impenetrable armour; and and his infantry amounted to an hundred and fifty thousand men, besides the pioneers and other labourers, to the amount of thirty-five thousand. When this prodigious multitude had passed mount Taurus, and was near enough to be perceived from Tigranocerta, the besieged raised shouts of joy, and from the top of the walls menaced the Romans, by pointing to that cloud of avengers.

Lucullus called a council to deliberate upon the measures proper to be taken. Some were for having him raise the siege, and march against Tigranes; others advised him to continue the siege, and not leave behind him a place so important, and furnished with so strong a garrison. He answered, that he thought both opinions right: and accordingly, dividing his army, left Murena with six thousand foot before Tigranocerta; and, taking with him the rest of his infantry, which hardly amounted to ten thousand men, all his cavalry, and about one thousand slingers and archers, marched away to meet the enemy. Plut. ibid.

The small army of Lucullus appeared so contemptible in the eyes of the Armenian troops, that the first sight of it produced abundance of jests among them. Each of the kings, who then followed the standard of Tigranes, addressed him for leave to attack, with their own people only, that handful of Romans, against whom, they said, it was below the dignity of the King of Kings to move in person. Even Tigranes himself condescended to pleasantry; If they are ambassadors, they are too many; if soldiers, too few. And thus the day passed in raillery and bravadoes.

Lucullus, the next morning, put his troops in march, to pass a river which divided the two armies. The Barbarians were on the east side of it; and as the best ford was in an angle, made by the winding of the stream westward on his left, the Romans, in moving to that ford, unavoidably turned their backs upon the enemy. Tigranes, who perceived that motion, began to triumph; calling to Taxiles, See there! your invincible Romans are flying from us! Taxiles replied, I wish your good fortune may at this time produce what I always thought could never happen. But I see their arms glitter; and I know that, when they are upon a march, they cover them with cases of leather. When they have their shields and helmets uncovered, and shining, it is a sure indication that they are advancing against an enemy. He had hardly finished these words, when the foremost of the Roman eagles was seen suddenly to turn to the right, followed by the whole column, in order to pass the river. How! (cried out Tigranes, in the greatest astonishment) those people are coming to us! He repeated these words two or three times; and then drew up his army with much precipitation. Of the center he took the conduct himself, gave the right to the king of the Medes, and the left the king of the Adiabeniens: and, in the front of the right wing, he posted that heavy unwieldy cavalry, in which the Barbarians placed their chief confidence.

Just

* One of the Dies Atri.

Just as Lucullus was about to pass the river, somebody observed to him, that he was going to fight on an unlucky day. (It was the 6th of October, the day in which Cepio had formerly been defeated by the Cimbri, and which from that time was marked as unfortunate * in the Roman Calendar.) Say you so? (said Lucullus) then I am going to make it a lucky day. Instantly he crossed the stream, and advancing the foremost, held out his sword drawn, to signify to his troops that they should endeavour at a close engagement with the enemy, whose missile weapons (their darts and arrows) would thereby be rendered almost useless in their hands. Directing his Thracian and Gallo-Greek horse to flank the enemy's heavy-armed cavalry (before-mentioned) which were posted at the foot of a hill, he himself, at the head of two cohorts only, fetched a compass, and gained the top of that hill: where he no sooner arrived, than he cried out, The victory, soldiers, is ours. He ordered his men not to throw their javelins, but, keeping them in their hands, made use of them to wound the enemy in their legs and thighs, which were the only unarmed parts of their bodies. The iron troopers did not wait to be attacked: terrified with the approach of the two cohorts, they instantly fled, and in their fright threw themselves precipitately among their own infantry, causing there the like dismay and confusion; so that these too turned their backs, but could not easily fly, having been drawn up deep in file, and being now huddled into a vast unwieldy throng. The slaughter therefore was dreadful, and the more so, as Lucullus had forbid his men to lose time, by stopping to strip the dead. Treading over bracelets and gorgets enriched with precious stones, they pursued the Barbarians very far; nor ceased the havoc, till the General, seeing his victory absolutely complete, ordered a retreat to be sounded. It is said, that on the side of the Armenians above 100,000 foot perished, and almost all the cavalry; and that, of the Romans, only five men were killed, and some hundreds wounded.

The Romans soldiers, returning by the same way they had come, now gathered up the rich spoils of the vanquished. Tigranes had galloped off at the beginning of the rout with a few attendants. Seeing his son among these, he took off his diadem, and, weeping, gave it into his hands, at the same time exhorting him to fly a different way: The young prince, not daring to put it on his head, delivered it to the care of one of his pages; and, this page being afterwards taken prisoner, it thus happened, that the very diadem of the Armenian king became part of the spoils, which fell into the hands of the victor.

The ancients, who have mentioned this overthrow of Tigranes's forces, have spoken of it with amazement. The sun (says one writer) never beheld such a day. The victors (says another) were themselves ashamed of having drawn their swords against such contemptible cowardly slaves. Livy † tells us, that the Romans had never gained a victory, in which their

† Apud
Plut. in Lucull.

number

number was so much inferior to that of the enemy, for the conquerors were not the twentieth part of the conquered.

The military skill of Lucullus has been much admired [more perhaps than it deserved,] in that he knew how to conquer by quite contrary methods of proceeding; a skill, which he had manifested in the wars he successively conducted against Mitridates and Tigranes.

The former of these kings he had totally defeated at Cyzicum and Cabiræ, by temporising and prudent delays: the latter by activity and expedition, forcing him to a battle, while the troops of his ally, the king of Pontus, were yet at a distance.

Mitridates had used no diligence to join his ally, having deceived himself (it is said) into a persuasion, that Lucullus would proceed against the Armenian with the same slowness, as formerly against himself, when before Cyzicum. Apprized of the defeat of Tigranes, by some of the fugitives from the battle, he sought him out carefully, and found him in a most piteous condition, dejected, terrified, quite destitute, a real object of compassion. Far from aggravating his distress, by returning the insults, which he himself, in the like adversity, had formerly received from him, Mitridates wept with him, endeavoured to console him, revive his courage, and inspire him with the hope of seeing better days; and at the same time (to do him honour as a king) gave him his own guard, and his own servants, to attend him.

The natural consequence of Lucullus's victory, was the taking of Tigranocerta; which did not, however, surrender immediately. The governor found means to defend it for some time, distressing the besiegers chiefly by discharging upon them the Naphtha, a kind of Bitumen, which easily kindles, and which water itself can hardly extinguish. But it happened that an intestine war broke out in the city. The governor, distrusting the Greeks, and not without reason, (they being all of opinion, that it would be best to open the gates to the Roman General) disarmed them. The latter apprehending something worse, rose in a body, and having armed themselves with clubs instead of swords, and wrapt their coats about their left arms to serve them in the place of bucklers, boldly attacked the Barbarians, who, though completely armed, were not able to withstand their fury. The victors, so soon as they had knocked any one down, seized his arms; and this, in a short time, put them in a condition to possess themselves of some of the towers that flanked the walls; which having done, they called to the Romans, and assisted them in entering.

Lucullus, master of the place, immediately seized and secured the royal treasures, and then gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers. They found in it, beside other riches, eight thousand talents in gold ^{1,550,000*l.*} and silver money ^b. The general out of the whole booty, gave to each soldier eight hundred drachmas. Supplying the Greeks with what money was necessary for the expence of their journey, he sent them all back into their own country : and with the like generosity he treated those people, whom Tigranes had forced from their own countries, to settle at Tigranocerta ; which now on a sudden, from a great city, was reduced to a small village, and no longer made any figure in the country. But thus, by dispersing the inhabitants of a single city, Lucullus, re-peopled a great number ; and these always loved and honoured him, not only as their benefactor, but even as their founder.

^b Arbutnot understands these eight thousand talents to have been found in the King's treasury. Arbut.
Tab. &c.

The amiable humanity of the Roman General became every day more conspicuous, and so effectually subdued the Barbarians, as to make force unnecessary. Having found several princesses in Tigranocerta, he treated them with all the regard due to their sex and rank ; a conduct which naturally acquired him the warm friendship of their husbands, who were in the service of Tigranes. The Arabian kings came of themselves to him, to put all their interests into his hands. The nation of the Sopbenians promised him obedience ; and the Gordyenians (it is said) were for leaving their country and cities, to follow him with their wives and children. One cause of so warm an affection for him was this :

Appius Claudius, whom Lucullus had appointed his Ambassador to Tigranes, made a considerable stay at Antioch, waiting the arrival of that prince, who was then employed in the siege of Ptolemais. Not wholly to lose his time, Appius contrived to open a negociation with Zarbienus, king of the Gordyenians, who, he knew, impatiently bore the tyranny of Tigranes. The intrigue was discovered, and the king with his wife and children put to death, before the Romans entered Armenia. When Lucullus was become master of the country, he went to Gordyene, caused obsequies to be performed for the unfortunate Zarbienus, erected a funeral pile, adorned it magnificently, set fire to it himself, and, in conjunction with the relations and friends of Zarbienus, (whom he stiled his companion, and the friend and ally of the Romans) made the customary libations : and lastly, he raised a stately monument for him, applying to that use part of the treasures found in his palace, which were very considerable. [He found also in the magazines of that prince above 300,000 medimni (or bushels) of corn.]

Whilst Lucullus was yet in Gordyene, he received an embassy from Arfaces king of Partbia, soliciting his friendship and alliance. The Roman received the proposal amicably, and, in return, sent Ambassadors to the Partbians. These ministers soon discovered that Arfaces was fluctuating, and uncertain, whether to espouse the cause of the Romans, or that of the two kings, who both were pressing him earnestly to join with them.

* Arfaces was a name common to all the kings of Partbia of this race. The proper name of him who now reigned was Sinatrax.

The Armenian offered to make a cession to the Parthian of Mesopotamia, Adiabene, and that part of Armenia, which the Parthians had formerly taken from Tigranes, and which he had since reconquered. The letter which Mitridates wrote to Arfaces to engage him in the confederacy, is still extant among the fragments of Sallust. It contains an Invective against the Romans, more copious and particular, indeed, but the same in substance with what one historian has put into the mouth of Jugurtha, ^{vid. sup.} against the same people, on occasion of that prince's alliance with king ^{P. 54.} Bocchus.

Lucullus, dissatisfied with the ambiguous answers of the Parthian, who seemed disposed to stand neuter, resolved to attack him in his dominions. To this he was animated by the thought, how glorious it would be for him, in the course of one war, to dethrone three kings, the most powerful of any in the universe.

He sent orders therefore to Sornatius, whom he had left in Pontus (as was before related) with 6000 men, to come and join him with those troops in Gordyene, from whence he intended to invade the country of the Parthians.

Sornatius's soldiers had long been disposed to mutiny, and now they broke out into open disobedience. They declared peremptorily, that they would neither march to join Lucullus, nor yet continue in Pontus, but would return to Italy. This example of mutiny spread, like a contagion, to the camp of the Proconsul; whose soldiers grown rich and voluptuous, and desirous of repose, applauded the noble resolution of their fellow-soldiers of Pontus, and loudly declared themselves determined to follow their example. Lucullus therefore was necessitated to drop his design (for the present at least) of marching against the Parthians.

Tigranes, utterly^d confounded under the sense of the calamity he was fallen into by his late overthrow, remitted all things to the care and direction of Mitridates, as one better experienced in military affairs, and better acquainted with the Roman way of making war.

Before the beginning of the spring, Mitridates had raised an army of^{* Y. 68;} Armenians amounting to 70,000 foot, which he caused to be disciplined after the Roman manner, and 35,000 horse. The two kings, however, did not take the field, till the middle of summer, and even then ^d Had Lucullus, immediately after his victory over Tigranes, pursued him, and not given him the opportunity of raising new forces, he must either have driven that prince out of the country, or have taken him prisoner, and thereby put an end to the war. His omitting to do this displeased the Romans, as well in the camp as in the city at home, as if his neglect herein had been out of design to draw out the war for the continuing of himself the longer in command: and the discontent, which was hereby created, furnished the best reason for that resolution, which was taken hereupon, of sending him a successor, though it was not executed till two years after. Dio Cass. l. xxxv. p. 1. [See Prideaux, Vol. III. p. 414.]

^{*} Consulship of Q. Marcius Rex and L. Cæcilius Metellus.

they did not seek their enemies, but, every movement, were careful to encamp themselves in places where they could not be attacked ; nor, when Lucullus had passed mount Taurus in search of them, was he able, by any skill whatsoever, to draw them out, to hazard another general battle. Skirmishes there were, in which the Armenian cavalry, fighting as they fled, after the Partbian manner, and with barbed arrows, very much galled and distressed the Romans.

This manner of making war did by no means suit with Lucullus's plan of operations : He must, at length, by such delays, have been starved out of the country ; which was indeed the aim of the two kings. To break their measures therefore, and force them to a battle, he resolved upon an expedient, like that he had used the year before, to bring on a general action. Tigranes having left his wives and children at Artaxata, the old metropolis of Armenia, and there deposited the most and best of his effects and treasures, Lucullus put his army in march towards that city, concluding, that Tigranes would certainly follow him, to hinder his getting possession of it. The stratagem succeeded. Tigranes, upon the first advice of Lucullus's design to lay siege to Artaxata, marched away with his whole army, and with all expedition, in order to get between the Romans and the city. In four days time he effected this purpose, and posted himself on the further side of the river Arsanus, which the Romans were to pass in their way to Artaxata.

Lucullus, confident of victory, crossed the river without hesitation, and drew up his army for action. The fortune of the day was presently decided. The Armenians not able, neither horse nor foot, to sustain the sight of the Roman infantry, fled at their first approach. Of three kings, who had posted themselves in the front of the Armenian army, Mitridates was the first that turned his back, behaving himself this day most shamefully. The slaughter was not so great as in the former battle, but there fell more persons of distinction.

The Roman General, after this victory, would have continued his march to Artaxata, the taking of which would probably have put an end to the war : but it lying at the distance of many days march to the north, and winter coming on with snowy and tempestuous weather, his soldiers, already disgusted with the fatigues of the campaign, which had been very severe, refused, after a few days march, to follow him any further into those cold regions. At first, indeed, they behaved themselves with some degree of respect, sending their Tribunes to make their remonstrances to him. But not obtaining any thing by this method, they assembled in companies tumultuously, during the night, and nothing was heard in the camp but confused and menacing voices. Lucullus, in the perplexity which this spirit of revolt threw him into, had recourse to expostulations and entreaties, conjuring his soldiers to have a little patience, only till they had completed the destruction of the Carthage of Armenia (so he called the city of Artaxata, which was said to have been built by Hannibal, when that illustrious fugitive, after the defeat of Antiochus, had retired^d to the court of Artaxias, the head of the house from which Tigranes was descended.) It was all in vain; nothing could move them: marching back therefore to the southward, and repassing mount Taurus, he entered into Mesopotamia, and sat down before Nisibis. Guras, the brother of Tigranes, was nominally commander in this place, but the person, who really performed the functions of that office, was the same Callimachus, who had defended Amisus against the Romans, and, quitting it, had set it on fire. Lucullus, after investing Nisibis a few days only, took it by assault. Guras he treated with great humanity; but Callimachus, though he offered to discover hidden treasures, could obtain no favour. The victor caused him to be laid in irons, in order to his suffering the punishment due to him for burning Amisus; a crime which Lucullus could not forgive, because it had deprived him of the satisfaction of exercising his clemency and generosity towards one of the most considerable of the Greek colonies in Asia.

* Mitridates and Tigranes were two of those kings, and the third seems to have been a king of Media. Prideaux, b. vi. p. 415.

The Roman army, taking up their winter-quarters in this new conquest, passed the bad season much at their ease; for it was in a mild climate, and a fertile country.

Hitherto it would seem (says Plutarch) as if Fortune had taken a * Y. 686. pleasure to wait upon Lucullus, and to fight for him; but from this period, as if he had quite lost her favour, he could effect nothing without difficulty and labour, and was continually running upon rocks and shelves. It is true, his virtue, his courage, his firmness of soul, suffered no alteration; but his actions had not the same lustre as before; and he was very near losing even the glory he had acquired by his past exploits; and what was worst of all (adds the historian) his adversities were entirely owing to his own misconduct.

He had taken no pains to gain the affections of his soldiers, and they had several causes of discontent. Two successive winters, in which they had undergone great fatigues, the first before Cyzicum, and the second before Amisus, had given birth to their complaints. And they had been obliged to pass the following winters, either making war in the enemy's country, or under tents in the countries of the allies: For Lucullus

^d Plutarch, who mentions this tradition, does not speak of it as a certain truth: and Cornelius Nepos, in his account of Hannibal's misfortunes, says nothing of his going into Armenia. He tells us, that, after the victory gained by Scipio Asiaticus over Antiochus the Great, Hannibal went first into Crete, and then to the court of Prusias, king of Bithynia, where he killed himself.

* Consulship of M. Acilius Glabrio and C. Calpurnius Piso.

Sallust. ap. Plut. in Luc.

never quartered his troops in any of the Greek cities, or in the cities of the allies of Rome. This severe discipline, together with a certain reserve and haughtiness in his manner, alienated the hearts of the soldiers from him. And they were confirmed in this bad disposition by accounts from Rome, that the conduct of the General was there censured. Certain speech-makers, whom envy excited against Lucullus, publicly accused him of an immoderate desire of command, and an insatiable greediness of riches. They told the People, that he had not pushed the war with vigour against either Mitridates or Tigranes; but had given these two kings time to retrieve their affairs, in order to make himself appear necessary, and to furnish a pretext for his being continued, year after year, in a command of such vast extent, as to comprehend Cilicia, the province of Asia, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Galatia, Pontus, Armenia, and Colchis, as far as the Phasis.

Dio.

Plut. in Luc.Cic. pro
Sext. xliii.

Gabinus displayed to the eyes of the people a plan, painted upon a banner, of the magnificent palace which Lucullus was then building, to intimate that he was making all that expence out of the spoils of the Republic. In short, the discourses and artifices of his enemies had such an effect, as to engage the People to pass a decree, that the oldest of his troops, and especially Fimbria's Legions, should have their discharge; that he should be succeeded in the command of Cilicia by Marcus Rex, Consul of the last year; and by M. Acilius Glabrio, Consul of the present year, in the command of Bithynia and Pontus, and of the war against the two kings.

But what gave the final blow to the authority of Lucullus, was the discourses and intrigues of P. Clodius, (so famous for his enmity to Cicero) a thoroughly wicked man, void of all sense of shame, debauched to such an excess, as to be suspected, not without foundation, of incest with all his sisters, one of whom was the wife of Lucullus. Clodius was, at this time, in the army of his brother-in-law, and greatly dissatisfied on account of Lucullus's preferring others, more worthy, before him. This man, from a spirit of revenge, stirred up the soldiers, and especially those who had served under Fimbria, to mutiny. Pretending great concern for their interest, he asked them, Whether soldiers, who had grown old in arms, were never to see an end of their fatigues, but to pass their lives in attacking nation after nation, and running over the world; and this for no other end, but solely to convoy the carriages and camels of Lucullus, loaded with golden vessels glittering with gems? He added, The soldiers of Pompey, who have forced none of the royal cities of Asia, nor have had other enemies to contend with, but some exiles in Spain, and slaves in Italy, live now in perfect repose with their wives and children, possessing good lands, and inhabiting fair cities. If we are still to suffer the fatigues of war, let us reserve what strength is left us, for a General who makes it his greatest glory to enrich the soldiers that have served well under his command.

It

It was during the winter, and while the Roman army was in quarters at Nisibis, that the spirit of mutiny, thus fostered, grew almost to perfect rebellion. The two kings, doubtless no strangers to the disaffection of the soldiers to their General, took advantage of it. Tigranes re-entered Armenia, and forced L. Fennius, who commanded there for the Romans, to shut himself up in a castle. Mitridates, with 4000 of his own men, and an equal number of Armenians, returned into his kingdom of Pontus, and there he defeated Fabius Adrianus (one of Lucullus's Lieutenants) whose army would have been entirely dispersed, or destroyed, if the king (who, though almost seventy years of age, exposed his person like a young warrior) had not received two wounds, which obliged him to quit the field. This event slackened the ardour of the victors, so that the vanquished had time and opportunity to gain the fort of Cabiræ.

Plut. in Luc.
App. Mi-
thrid.
Dio.

It was not long before the king, cured of his wounds, marched to besiege that fort; but being informed, that Triarius was advancing with all the troops he had been able hastily to assemble, he retired. Triarius pursued him as far as Comana, and even gained over him some small advantage; and with this the campaign ended.

At the return of spring, * Mitridates, having without question, re-cruited his army, led it against Triarius, whom he hoped to drive entirely out of the kingdom of Pontus, before Lucullus could come to his aid. Triarius kept upon the defensive, and declined a battle. To force him to it, the king made preparations to attack a castle, in which was all the heavy baggage of the Roman army. This stratagem succeeded. The soldiers of Triarius, to preserve their baggage, obliged their commander to fight; who, it is said, was not backward thereto, having flattered himself with the prospect of the glory he should acquire, by conquering in the absence of his General. The two armies met three miles from Ziela, a city that became famous in the Roman story from this action. Triarius was totally routed; nor perhaps, would any of his troops have escaped the sword of the enemy, if Mitridates had not been again wounded^a, and thereby rendered unable to keep the field; which made his Generals order a retreat to be sounded. This was the most bloody defeat the Romans had suffered during the whole course of their wars against Mitridates: seven thousand Romans remained dead upon the field of battle, amongst whom were four and twenty Tribunes, and an hundred and twenty Centurions. Cicero, making his court to Pomyey, at the expense of Lucullus, says, that, when this General received the news of Triarius's defeat, it was from public rumour, and not from any soldier who had escaped the slaughter.

* Y. 686.

Cic. pro
Leg. Man.

* The wound was in his thigh. The king had in his army many persons habited and armed after the Roman manner; which accounts for his not being upon his guard against a Roman Centurion, who gave him the wound. The Centurion was killed upon the spot.

The

The troops of Lucullus, though they had before refused to follow him, yet, through shame, consented to march, when they learnt that Triarius was in danger; but it was too late: He did not arrive in Pontus till after the disaster: He found the dead bodies lying upon the field of battle; and, by neglecting to bury them, he farther exasperated his soldiers against him. And as for Triarius, they would have torn him in pieces, if their General had not furnished him with means of saving himself by flight.

Tigranes had recovered the greater part of his dominions, and, having assembled a considerable army, was marching to the assistance of his ally; and this made Mitridates industriously avoid, for the present, a battle with Lucullus. The Roman, not being able to force him to an engagement, resolved to lead his army against Tigranes, whose troops he hoped to defeat with ease, by attacking them unexpectedly, when fatigued with a long march: But this plan was disconcerted by the untractableness of his own men; who though they had followed him some time, yet, when they saw that he meant to go into Cappadocia, declared peremptorily, they would not follow him thither. Lucullus went from tent to tent, and almost from man to man, taking them by the hand, and with tears intreating them to advance. There was no kind of submission to which he did not descend; but the evil had taken too deep root to admit of a remedy. They treated him with insolence and contempt, Shewing to him their empty purses*, they said, that he, who alone grew rich by the war, ought to make war alone. What confirmed the Fimbrian Legions in this insolence, was the arrival of the Consul Glabrio, who had been appointed to succeed Lucullus. The Consul was already in Bitynia, and had caused proclamation to be made in all the adjacent countries, that he prohibited all persons from obeying the orders of Lucullus, upon pain of confiscation of their estates, the Roman people having put an end to his command. In consequence of this proclamation, the soldiers of Fimbria considered Lucullus only as a private person: and all that the soldiers of the other Legions, who still retained some respect for their General, could obtain from these mutineers, was, that they would continue with the army to the end of the summer; and even this was upon express condition, that, if the enemy did not appear during the interval, they should be entirely at liberty to withdraw.

Lucullus, to avoid being totally abandoned, was under a necessity of accepting what they thought fit to grant, and consequently of suffering Tigranes to ravage Cappadocia, and of bearing unrevenge the insults of Mitridates. He had wrote to the Senate, that, having subdued those two kings, it was necessary ten commissioners should (according to custom) be sent to regulate with him the disposition of his new conquest. The commissioners arrived at this time, and found Lucullus so little master of the enemy's country, that he was not even master of his own troops. And this reduced him to say, that, as to any future measures relative to the war, he was entirely out of the question; that those were Glabrio's business, who had been named to succeed him. But Glabrio, who had expressed great ardour for the employment, while he believed he should have nothing to do, more than reaping the fruits of his predecessor's victories, kept aloof, when he found there were difficulties and dangers to be encountered.

* This is related by Plutarch, who had before related the considerable booty the soldiers got at the plundering of Tigranocerta.

The end of the summer, with which the service of the Fimbrian Legions was to end, being come, they marched out of the camp, drew their swords, brandished them in the air, and with loud cries called upon the enemy; who not appearing, they pretended they had performed their engagements, and would now retire. Lucullus was under a necessity of dismissing them. He likewise sent part of the other troops to Glabrio, retaining with him only an inconsiderable number of soldiers, with whom it was impossible for him to undertake any thing further*.

Pompey, who (as above-mentioned) was already in Asia, when he learnt that the Manilian Law had transferred to him Lucullus's command, lost no time in improving the opportunity, which this commission gave him, of mortifying his rival. Without delay, he caused edicts to be fixed up in all the cities, enjoining the Roman troops to repair to him: obedience was punctually paid to his edicts: and even Fimbria's Legions,

Plut. in
Pomp. & in Lucull.

* Plutarch, upon this occasion, descants again on Lucullus's want of affability and condescension to his soldiers. "If with all the great qualities he possessed courage, vigilance, activity, prudence, and the love of justice, he had likewise possessed that principal talent of a General, the skill of making himself loved by his soldiers, the empire of the Romans would not have had the Euphrates for its boundary, but the Caspian sea and the extremities of the East. For, by conquering Tigranes, they would have reaped the benefit of his conquests, and held in subjection to themselves all the nations which that prince had subdued. And as to the Parthians, they were not at this time so powerful, as afterwards, when Crassus attacked them. Rent in pieces by civil wars, and harassed by their neighbours, their strength was not equal to that of a king of Armenia."

The same historian is of opinion, that Lucullus's victories were eventually more hurtful to his country, than beneficial; they being the cause of Crassus's unfortunate expedition against the Parthians. [As, according to Polybius, the safe retreat of the Greeks under Xenophon, through the whole country of their enemies, was the cause of Alexander's invasion of Persia.] "The conquests of Tigranocerta and Nisibis, the immense riches brought from those cities to Rome, and the diadem of Tigranes, borne in pomp in the triumph of Lucullus; these inflamed Crassus with the desire of carrying the Roman arms into the East. He imagined, that all the wealth of Parthia would be the sure prey, as well as ample reward, of whoever would take the trouble of going to seize it. But the arrows of the Parthians very soon undeceived him; and his deplorable defeat evinces, that Lucullus owed his victories, not to the unskilfulness and unmanliness of his enemies, but to his own undaunted courage and able conduct."

which, by a decree of the People, had obtained their dismissal, went voluntarily, and ranged themselves under the ensigns of Pompey; who left his rival not more than 1600 soldiers to attend him in his triumph, and even these were unwilling to stay with him.

Pompey likewise summoned the principal Magistrates of the Asiatic nations, and forbade them to pay any regard to the orders of Lucullus: And whereas this General, in concert with the ten commissioners, had made some decrees and regulations, Pompey cancelled them all, and wherever he went, suffered nothing to subsist, that had been instituted by his rival, whom he endeavoured, by all possible means, to render contemptible.

Lucullus complaining of this strange procedure, some of their common friends proposed a conference between the two Generals. Accordingly they met in Galatia. The politest expressions of reciprocal esteem and respect, warm congratulations, high compliments upon each other's victories, were the introduction to mutual accusations (which immediately followed) in the most opprobrious terms. Lucullus reproached Pompey with his unjust, injurious, insatiable ambition: Pompey reproached Lucullus with his passion for money, and with the prodigious wealth he had amassed during the war. They parted more inflamed, than before, with anger against each other; and this anger was for ever breaking out in their daily discourse. Pompey affected to lower the value of Lucullus's exploits, by alledging, that he had fought with nothing but the empty shadows of armies, whereas he himself should have real soldiers to combat; an infantry, which Mitridates, grown wise by his misfortunes, had well disciplined, and had armed, not with gilded toys, but with swords and shields; and a cavalry, which the same prince had gradually learnt to make truly serviceable in war. On the other hand, Lucullus affirmed, that he had left his successor nothing to do against Mitridates or Tigranes; that the war was at an end: but that Pompey (like those cowardly birds which fall greedily to prey upon dead and mangled bodies, which they did not kill) was accustomed to come in at the close of a war, and fall furiously upon the scattered remains of armies defeated and routed by other commanders; and then ascribe to himself the sole merit of those victories. Thus it was he, this mighty man, not Catulus, Metellus, and Crassus, who conquered in the wars of Lepidus, Sertorius, and Spartacus. And how then was it possible, that he should not aspire to the fame of having terminated the wars of Pontus and Armenia, HE, who was so nobly ambitious of a triumph over a gang of runaway slaves?

After Lucullus's return into Italy, violent and long-continued opposition was made to his demand of a triumph. What the event was we shall see hereafter.

C H A P. VIII.

The THIRD MITHRIDATIC WAR continued, under the conduct of POMPEY, to the death of MITHRIDATES in 690.

POMPEY's good fortune attended him in the discharge of his new commission. Pbraates, king of Parthia, and Tigranes, king of Armenia, the allies of Mitbridates, and on whose aid, after his many losses, he chiefly depended for support, were fallen at variance. For the son of Tigranes, revolting against his father, had repaired to the court of Pbraates, his father-in-law, with whom having prevailed to espouse his quarrel, he returned into Armenia with an army of Parthians.

The elder Tigranes therefore, had he been never so much inclined to assist the king of Pontus, was incapable of doing it; but, in truth, he had no such inclination, having entertained a suspicion, that this good ally, grandfather of the rebel-prince, secretly encouraged him in his rebellion: so that Mitbridates was left with only his own troops, which amounted to no more than 30,000 foot, and 3000 horse, to withstand all the forces of the Romans. A battle he prudently and industriously avoided; but, to make the best use of the strength he had, employed it to shut up the entrances into his kingdom, and to starve his enemies, by cutting off their supplies of provisions, as often as possibly he could: and it was the easier to distress the Roman troops in this respect, as the adjacent countries all around them had been wasted and ruined by Lucullus.

Plut. in
Pomp.
App. Mi-
thridat.
p. 238.

Pompey, at the same time that he began his march against the king, dispatched Metrophanes to him, to sound his disposition, whether he might be brought to submit; that is, first to deliver up all the deserters, and then surrender himself at discretion. The monarch rejected the second article with indignation: The deserters, either conjecturing the truth, or being informed of their concern in the negotiation, rose, and drew into their mutiny the national troops, who well knew the need they had of those strangers: But at length the king appeased the soldiery, by protesting, he would never deliver up those who had done him service, nor would ever make peace with the Romans; that he had never in reality entertained the thoughts of peace; and that the Ambassadors he had sent to Pompey, were, in truth, only spies.

The Roman General not finding it practicable to dislodge the king from the strong posts he held, and apprehending a want of provisions, turned towards Armenia Minor, which, being destitute of troops, presented an easy conquest. Mitbridates, to whom that province belonged, followed him thither, and encamped his army so advantageously upon a hill, that he could not be forced to a battle. Drawing his provisions commodiously from the countries behind him, he employed his cavalry to carry off the enemy's convoys; in which they often succeeded; so that, had he continued in that post, he might have greatly distressed his enemy; but he quitted it for want of water, not knowing that water was to be had there. Pompey seized the post immediately; and the verdure with which the hill was covered, indicating that there were springs in it, he caused wells to be dug. These were presently filled with water, so as abundantly to supply the whole army.

Plut. in
Pom. 1.

Not long after Pompey, by his superior skill in war, contrived to surprise, and almost entirely destroy, the cavalry of Mitbridates; a fatal blow to him, in that it gave the Romans a facility in getting provisions. As the king still persisted in declining a battle, Pompey undertook to shut him up in his camp by lines drawn round it. Five and forty days Mitbridates continued in a manner besieged: at length, pressed by famine, he turned his thoughts to flight; and he made his dispositions so skilfully, as to deceive Pompey's vigilance. Leaving fires lighted in his camp, he set out during the night. Pompey pursued him the next morning, but without being able to attack him; for he kept himself shut up in his camp the whole day, and renewed his march only when it was dark; and the Romans, being unacquainted with the country, were not forward to hazard a battle in the night.

However, when the king drew near to the Euphrates, Pompey made a secret and expeditious march, got before him, and posted himself in his way to hinder his passing that river, which would have brought him into the dominions of Tigranes. Mitbridates knew nothing of this march of the Roman army; and his troops, having set out as usual in the evening, less vigilant than before, because expecting to be very soon in a place of security, fell unawares, and in the dark, into the midst of their enemies. Pompey ordered all his trumpets to sound at once, and all his soldiers to give a shout; which so increased the terror and confusion of the Barbarians, that they presently turned their backs, and fled: and it is said (though it seems not probable, if this conflict happened in the night) that above 10,000 of their number were slain, and that the prisoners were not much fewer. The king with 800 horse opened himself a way through the Romans; but his guard did not stay with him long, and he was reduced to continue his flight with only three companions. Among these was Hypsicratea, one of his concubines, whom he used to call Hypsicrates, on account of her masculine courage and strength. Habited and armed like a trooper, she rode by his side in all his battles, accompanied him in all his expeditions, and in all his flights; and, in this last, did him the office of a groom, as well as of a valet, taking care not only of his person, but of his horse.

Mitbridates, having picked up in his flight about 3000 foot, and some foreign cavalry, arrived at a fort called Synoria, on the frontiers of Armenia menia Minor. It was one of the places in which he kept his treasures; he took thence 6000 talents, distributing the rich habits and other things of value among his friends: To each of whom he likewise gave a provision of poison, that they might be masters of their own fate, if they should be in danger of falling alive into the hands of the Romans. He had hoped to find an asylum with Tygranes; but the Armenian, actuated by the suspicion above-mentioned, or pretending so to be, not only seized the Ambassadors whom Mitbridates sent to ask his permission to enter his dominions, but set a price upon the king's head, promising 100 talents to any one who should bring it him.

Mitbridates, thus abandoned by his ally, resolved to retire to the *Cimmerian Bosphorus, where his son Machabes reigned: He could go thither only by land, the enemy being masters of the sea: But though the march was long and difficult, the king, supported by his courage, pushed on beyond the springs of the Euphrates, passed the Phasis, and arrived at Dioscurias, situated on the Euxine sea in the western extremity of the Isthmus, which divides that sea from the Caspian, and there he took up his winter-quarters. Pompey had detached some horse and light troops in pursuit of him; but, upon advice of his having passed the Phasis, relinquished all hope of overtaking him; and applied himself to found a new city on the spot where he had gained the late victory, calling the place Nicopolis [the city of victory.] To people it, he left there such of his soldiers as, by wounds, sickness, or age, were disabled from further serving. With these some families of the country joined, and in process of time the city became considerable.

It was here that the son of Tigranes, the only remaining son of three whom he had by Cleopatra, the daughter of Mitbridates, came to the Roman camp. The father had put to death the other two on light occasions; whereupon young Tigranes, the third son, not thinking his life safe within the power of so cruel a father, fled to Phraates, king of Parthia, his father-in-law, who not only gave him a kind reception, but brought him back into Armenia with an army, and laid siege to Artaxata, the capital of the kingdom: For Tigranes had retired to the mountains. The city being well fortified and well defended, the siege was spun out to a great length; and Phraates, the necessity of his affairs recalling him into Parthia, returned thither with the better part of his forces. Tigranes seized the favourable opportunity, fell upon his son, vanquished him, and drove him out of the country. The prince's first thought, after this disaster, was to repair to his grandfather Mitbridates; but meeting, in the way, the news of his defeat, and of the bad state of his affairs, he fled to the Roman camp, and threw himself as a suppliant at the feet of Pompey, who received him kindly, and was glad of his coming; for being then just going to enter Armenia, he wanted a guide well acquainted with the country, and he made use of young

* Crim Tartary.
• Vid. sup.
p. 225.

young Tigranes for this purpose, marching under his guidance directly towards Artaxata. The Armenian king, terrified to excess, now turned his mind wholly to make his peace with the Romans; and, in his fright, the first step he took was delivering up those Ambassadors, by whom Mitridates, when distressed, had asked his protection, to Pompey: The negotiation, however, for peace was traversed and impeded by the young prince; and the Romans, still advancing, passed the Araxes. Reduced to extremity by his fears, Tigranes then opened the gates of Artaxata, and received a Roman garrison into it; and having heard much of Pompey's clemency, and honourable dispositions, set forward, without any precaution taken, to resign himself and his kingdom to the pleasure and disposal of the Roman General. He laid aside his royal Robe, but retained his crown, or tiara, that he might command some respect, even while, as a suppliant king, he knew himself an object of compassion. When he arrived at the camp of the Romans (which was about sixteen miles from Artaxata) two Lictors, at the entrance of it, signified to him that he must dismount; for that no stranger had ever been permitted to enter a Roman camp on horseback. Tigranes alighted, gave them his sword, took off his royal tiara as soon as he came into the presence of Pompey, and cast himself prostrate on the ground before him. Pompey, hereupon, leaped from his seat, ran to him, and, kindly taking him by the hand, lifted him up, put his crown again upon his head, and placed him on a seat at his right hand, and his son on another at his left. The king said, "He should never have acted in the manner he had just then done, towards any other person of any other nation; but that there could be no dishonour in being vanquished by a General, whom no potentate on earth could ever hope to vanquish; nor in submitting to a man, whom fortune had exalted above all other mortals." To this flattering compliment Pompey answered, by assuring the dejected monarch, he should have no reason to complain of his fate; that he should not lose Armenia; and should gain the friendship of the Romans. After these words of consolation, he invited the king and his son that night to sup with him, appointing the next day for hearing their cause. Young Tigranes had not risen from his seat at his father's appearing, nor shewed the least mark of respect for him: He had flattered himself with the hope of being put into immediate possession of the crown of Armenia, and was therefore far from being pleased with what had just past. Wholly possessed by his anger, he not only refused to go to the supper to which he was invited, but even intimated, in a kind of threat, that if Pompey did not give him satisfaction, he should find some other Roman who would be more effectually his friend.

The day following Pompey, after holding a great council, (to which he had called both father and son, that he might know their several pretensions) pronounced a decree, by which he ordained, that the elder Tigranes, nes, yielding up to the Romans all his conquests on this side the Euphrates, and paying 6000 talents, for having made war upon them without cause, should still reign in his paternal kingdom of Armenia Major; and his son in Gordyene and Sophene (two provinces bordering on Armenia) during his father's life time, and succeed him in all the rest of his dominions after his death: but to the father was reserved, out of Sophene, the treasure he had there deposited, without which he would not have been able to pay the fine of 6000 talents imposed on him. The elder Tigranes joyfully accepted these terms, being glad even thus to be again admitted to reign; and he was so overjoyed to hear the Romans salute him king, that he promised to give every common soldier fifty drachmas, each Centurion a thousand, and each military Tribune ten thousand. But the son was highly displeased with the decree; and, pretending that the treasure in Sophene belonged to him, refused to permit his father to take it away. Pompey decided the dispute in favour of the father: the son, enraged more than ever at this decision, meditated an escape; but this design was discovered, and a guard was placed upon him; and, being afterwards detected in soliciting the nobles of Armenia, and also the Partians, to renew the war, Pompey put him among those whom he reserved for his triumph. Tigranes, the father, as soon as he had received his treasure out of Sophene, paid the 6000 talents, and was thereupon declared a Friend and Ally of the Roman people. The king likewise performed now his promise to the soldiers. Vell. Pat.

Pbraates solicited ineffectually for the release of his son-in-law, young Tigranes. Pompey answered the ambassadors of the Partian, That a father Plut. & Dio. had more right over his son than a father-in-law. And whereas the Partian had proposed, that the Euphrates should be the boundary of the two empires, Pompey, without entering into any discussion, declared, that he knew no boundaries but those of right and justice.

Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, ever faithful to the Romans, to whom he owed his elevation to the throne, had been the sport of their enemies, had been expelled, restored, and expelled again; now by Mitbridates, then by Tigranes. The flight of the king of Pontus, the ruin of his affairs, and the peace granted by the Romans to the king of Armenia, confirmed the Cappadocian in the possession of his dominion: And Pompey, in recompence of his fidelity, gave to him Sophene, which he had once allotted to the prince of Armenia.

After these regulations, Pompey marched northward in pursuit of Mitbridates. Liv. Epit. Plut. & Dio. Coming to the river Cyrus, he was opposed by the Albanians, and the Iberians, two potent nations inhabiting the Isthmus, between the Caspian and the Euxine seas, and confederates of the king of Pontus; but having overthrown them in battle, he forced the Albanians to sue for peace, and then wintered in their country.

Y. R. 688.

Bef. Chr.

64
3-9 Conf.Luc. &
Dio.L. AURELIUS COTTA,
L. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, } Consuls.

Early the next year he marched against the Iberians, who were a very warlike nation, and had never submitted to either Medians, Persians, or Macedonians, during all the time that these, successively, held the empire of Asia. But, though Pompey found some difficulties in this war, he soon surmounted them, and forced the Iberians to terms of peace; their king Ariocetes, for hostages, giving his sons.

After this, he reduced the people of Colchis to a submission, having taken Oitabaces, their king, prisoner (whom he afterwards caused to be led before him in triumph;) and then marched back against the Albanians, who, while he was engaged with the Iberians and Colchians, had renewed the war. He overthrew them in battle with great slaughter, killing, with his own hand, their General Cosis, the brother of their king Orodes [or Orases] and thereby forced the king to purchase the renewal of the last year's peace by rich presents, and also to send his sons to him for hostages.

Having finished this war in the North, he led back his army into the southern parts; for, Mitbridates being arrived in the kingdom of Bosporus, on the other side of the Euxine sea, there was no pursuing of him thither, but round that sea a great way about, through many barbarous Scythian nations, and several deserts; which was not to be attempted by the Roman army, without manifest danger of a total miscarriage. (All that Pompey could do, was to order his fleet, commanded by Servilius, one of his lieutenants, to be so stationed, as to hinder supplies of provisions, and other necessaries, from being carried to the king.) In crossing the kingdom of Pontus, in his way to Syria, he arrived at the place where Triarius had been defeated by Mitbridates; and, finding the dead bodies of the Romans still lying unburied upon the field of battle, he caused them to be interred in honourable manner; which much pleased his army, and made the fault of Lucullus, who had neglected that duty, appear in a stronger light. After this, continuing his march, he subdued Darius, king of Media, and Antiochus, king of Commagene; and having, by Scaurus, reduced Cæle-Syria and Damascus, and, by Gabinus, the rest of those parts, as far as the Tigris, he was become master of all the Syrian empire. Antiochus Asiaticus (the son of Antiochus Eusebes) the remaining heir of the Seleusian family, who, by the permission of Lucullus, had now reigned four years in some part of Syria, after Tigranes had been forced to withdraw his forces from it, applied himself to the Roman General, requesting to be re-established in the kingdom of his ancestors. But Pompey answered, That the Romans had found Tigranes in possession of that country, and had conquered it from him, and

Plur. in Dio.App. in Mithrid.
Joseph.
Antiq.
l. xiv. c. 4.
Dio Cass.Julian.
l. xl. c. 2.

and were not to yield the fruits of their victory to another^a. And accordingly he reduced Syria into the form of a Roman province. Antiochus being thus deprived of his crown, here ended the empire of the Seleucidae in Asia, after it had lasted two hundred and fifty-eight years.

Y. R. 682.
Bef. Chr.
64.
379 Conf.

What made Pompey so fond of this march into Syria, was a vain and ambitious desire of extending his conquests to the Red sea. He had formerly, while he commanded first in Africa, and afterwards in Spain, pushed his conquests on both sides of the Mediterranean to the Western ocean, and had lately, in his Albanian war, led his forces as far as the Caspian sea; and, if he could also lead them to the Red sea, he thought it would complete his glory.

Plut. in
Pomp.

While these things were doing by the Romans, there happened great disturbances and revolutions in Judea: They had their original from the ambition and aspiring spirit of Antipater (the father of Herod.) He, having had his education in the court of Alexander Jannæus and his queen Alexandra, who reigned after him, insinuated himself into the good graces of Hyrchanus, the eldest of their sons, hoping to rise by his favour, when he should come to the crown after his mother: But when Hyrchanus was deposed, and Aristobulus made king, from whom he had no prospect of favour, he set himself, with all the art he was master of (and that was not a little) to restore Hyrchanus to his crown: In order whereto he treated with Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, and engaged him to assist Hyrchanus with an army: and he had, by his intrigues, drawn great numbers of the Jews into the same design. The greatest difficulty was to excite Hyrchanus himself to the undertaking: for he, being a quiet indolent man, who loved ease more than any thing else, had no inclination to stir a foot for obtaining a kingdom. But, at length, being made to believe, that his life was in danger, and that he must either reign or die, if he staid in Judea, this argument rouzed him to fly for safety, and to put himself into the hands of Aretas. This Prince, according to his agreement with Antipater, brought Hyrchanus back into Judea, with an army of 50,000 men; and, having there joined the Jews of Hyrchanus's party, gave battle to Aristobulus, gained an absolute victory over him, pursued him to Jerusalem, entered the city without opposition, drove the vanquished prince to take refuge in the mountain of the temple, and there besieged him. All the priests adhered to Aristobulus, but the generality of the people declared for Hyrchanus^b.

Joseph.
Antiq. l.
xiv. c. 2.

Joseph.
Antiq. l.
xiv. c. 3.

Scaurus

^a Another reason assigned for this conduct of Pompey was, That Antiochus being a weak prince, of no courage, or capacity, to protect the country, the putting it into his hands would be to betray it to the ravages and depredations of the Jews and Arabs.

VOL. III.

^b This happened in the time of their passover, on which occasion Aristobulus, wanting lambs and beasts for the sacrifices of that holy solemnity, agreed with the Jews, that were among the besiegers, to furnish him with them, for a sum specified. But when they had received

L 1

Joseph.
Antiq. l.
xiv. c. 4.

Scaurus being by this time come to Damascus with a Roman army, Aristobulus sent thither to him, and, by the promise of four hundred talents, engaged him on his side. Hyrcanus offered him the like sum; but Scaurus, looking upon Aristobulus as the more solvent of the two, chose to embrace his cause; and Gabinus, by a present of three hundred talents, from the same quarter, was induced to do the same. And, accordingly, both the Roman generals sent to Aretas to retire, threatening him with the Roman arms in case of refusal. Aretas raised the siege, and marched off towards his own country; whereupon Aristobulus, having got together all the forces he could, pursued after him, overtook him, and, with a great slaughter, defeated him in a battle, wherein perished many of the Jews of Hyrcanus's party.

Ibid. l.
xiv. c. 5.

About this time, Pompey himself came to Damascus, whither resorted to him ambassadors from all the neighbouring countries, especially from Egypt and Judaea. The ambassadors from Egypt presented him with a crown of gold, of the value of four thousand pieces of gold money, and those from Judaea with a vine of gold, of the value of four hundred talents, which was afterwards deposited in the temple of Jupiter, in the Capitol at Rome, and there inscribed as the gift of Alexander, king of the Jews. [It seems the Romans would not own Aristobulus to be king, and, for that reason, put his father's name upon it instead of his]. While Pompey was in these parts, there came, to make their court to him, twelve kings, who were all seen, at the same time, attending upon him.

Plut. in
Pomp.

Strabo. l.
xii. 7.

As many strong places in Pontus and Cappadocia still held out for Mitridates, Pompey found it necessary to march again thither to reduce them; which having, soon after his arrival, in a great measure, accomplished, he took up his winter-quarters at Aspis in Pontus. Of the places which he reduced, one, called Καύη, i. e. Newcastle, was the received the money, which was let down to them over the wall, they refused to deliver the sacrifices. Nor was this the only base action they were guilty of at this time. For there being then at Jerusalem one Onias, a man of great reputation for the sanctity of his life, who was thought to have obtained, by his prayers, rain from heaven, in a time of drought, they brought him forth into the army; and, concluding that his curse would be as prevalent as his prayers, pressed him to curse Aristobulus, and all that were with him. He long refused to hearken to them, but, at length, finding no rest from their opportunities, he lifted up his hands towards heaven, as he stood in the midst of the soldiers, and prayed thus, O Lord God, Rector of the universe, since these that are with us are thy people, and they that are besieged in the temple are thy priests, I pray thee, not to bear the prayers of either of them against the other. The besiegers were so enraged against the good man for this, that they stoned him to death.

Among other things here found, were Mitridates's medicinal Commentaries, which Pompey caused to be translated into Latin by Lenæus, one of his freedmen, a learned Grammarian. For, among many other extraordinary endowments, with which this prince had accomplished himself, he was eminently skilled in the art of physic, and is esteemed the author of that excellent Alexipharmical medicine, which, from his name, is now called Mitridate, which has ever since been in great use among the physicians. Plin. l. xiv. c. 2.

strongest strongest: there Mitridates had laid a great part of his treasure, and the best of his other effects, as reckoning the place impregnable. Here Pompey found the private memoirs of the king, which discovered many of his transactions and secret designs.

Y. R. 688.
Bef. Chr.
64.
379 Conf.

Pompey having, while he lay at Aspis, settled the affairs of the adjacent countries, as well as their circumstances would then admit, as soon as the spring began, returned again into Syria, to do the same in that country.

L. JULIUS CÆSAR, }
C. MARCIUS FIGULUS, } Consuls

Y. R. 689.
Bef. Chr.
63.
380 Conf.

On his arrival there, he made Antioch and Seleucia, on the Orontes, free cities, and then continued his march to Damascus, intending from thence to make war upon the Arabians, in order to carry on his victories to the Red sea. But in his way to Damascus he made many stops, to examine into the conduct of the princes of those parts, and to hear the complaints that were made against them. For in the declension of the Syrian empire, many petty princes had raised themselves upon its ruins in several districts of it, and there exercised tyranny over the people, and depredations on their neighbours. These Pompey, as he passed through the country, summoned to him, and, on hearing their causes, confirmed some of them in their toparchies, under the condition of becoming tributaries to the Romans; others he deprived, and some he condemned to death for their misadministration. But Ptolemy, the son of Menneus, prince of Chalcis, who was the wickedest of them all, having made himself very rich by oppressing his people, and plundering his neighbours, presented Pompey with a thousand talents, and thereby redeeming not only his life, but his principality, continued in the enjoyment of both a great number of years.

Jos. Ant.
Plut. &
Dio.

On Pompey's coming into Cæle-Syria, Antipater, from Hyrcaus, and one Nicodemus, from Aristobulus, addressed themselves to him concerning the controversy that was between these two brothers, each of the delegates requesting his patronage to that brother by whom he was sent. Pompey, having heard what they had to say, dismissed them with fair words, ordering, that both brothers should appear in person before him; and promising, that he would then take full cognizance of the whole cause, and determine it as justice should direct. At this audience Nicodemus did much hurt to his master, by complaining of the four hundred talents, which Scaurus, and the three hundred which Gabinus had extorted from him. For this made both those Generals his enemies; and Pompey was afterwards much influenced by them in his determination of the dispute. But Pompey, being then intent upon making preparations for his Arabian war, could not immediately find leisure for this matter; and, soon after, an event happened, which forced him to lay aside, for the present, whatever he had to do in Syria, and march again into Pontus. It was as follows.

Jos. Ant.
l. xiv. c. 5.

Y. R. 689.

App. in
N. E. 2.Plut. in Pomp.Strabo. l.
xii.Dio. Cass.
Plut. in
Pomp.

Before Pompey left Syria in the former year (688) there came ambassadors to him from Mitridates, out of Bosporus, with proposals of peace. They offered on the king's part, in case he might be allowed to hold his paternal kingdom (as Tigranes had been,) to pay tribute for it to the Romans, and quit to them all his other dominions. To this Pompey answered, that the king should have come to him in person, in the same manner as Tigranes had done. The negotiation had no effect; for Mitridates could not entertain the thought of surrendering himself: He offered to send his sons, and some of his principal friends; but this offer was rejected: Whereupon he made new preparations for war with as great vigour as at any time before: he levied exorbitant sums upon the people, who, having been lately terrified, and almost destroyed by a dreadful earthquake, changed that respect and zeal, which they had hitherto retained for their sovereign, even in his worst fortune, into indignation and hatred, when they felt themselves thus oppressed by him: for the violences and vexations committed by the officers appointed to collect the taxes were insupportable; and he, falling sick at this time, could not remedy the evil. He was shut up in his palace with three eunuchs, who attended him, and were the only persons admitted to see him. But, notwithstanding his confinement, the levies went on, and sixty cohorts, of six hundred chosen men each, were raised, besides a great multitude of other soldiers, in whom he had less confidence. Pompey, having notice of these preparations for war, found it necessary to hasten back again into Pontus to watch the king's proceedings. On his arrival, he fixed his residence for some time at Amisus, and, while he continued in that place, was guilty of the very folly which he had before censured in Lucullus. For he there settled the dominions of Mitridates into provinces, and bestowed the rewards as if the war had been ended: whereas Mitridates was still alive, and with a great army, and was meditating an invasion on the very heart of the Roman dominions. Pompey, in distributing his rewards, gave the lesser Armenia, with several other territories and cities adjoining, to Deiotarus^{*}, one of the princes of the Galatians, to recompense him for his adhering to the Roman interest during all this war, and honoured him with the title of king of those countries, whereas before he was only a Tetrarch.

While the Roman forces were in Pontus, Aretas, the Arabian king, took the advantage of their absence to make incursions and depredations in several parts of Syria. This called Pompey back again into that country.

^{*} This is the same king Deiotarus, in whose behalf Cicero afterwards made one of his orations, which was spoken before Julius Cæsar. Galatia was formerly governed by four Tetrarchs, of which Deiotarus was now one. To his Tetrarchy, Pompey added the grants above mentioned, without dispossessing the other Tetrarchs. But Deiotarus had acquired all Galatia at the time when Cicero pleaded for him. Strabo, l. xii. p. 567.

MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO, } Consuls.
CAIUS ANTONIUS,

Y. R. 690.
B. f. Chr.
62.
381 Conf.

On his arrival at Damascus, the cause of Hyrchanus and Aristobulus was brought to a hearing before him. They both appeared in person, as he had ordered; and, at the same time, several of the Jews appeared there against both: these last requested, in behalf of themselves, "That they might not be governed by a king." They pleaded, "That it had been formerly the use of their nation to be governed by the high-priest of the God they worshipped, who, without assuming any other title, administered justice to them, according to the Laws and Constitutions transmitted from their forefathers: that it was true indeed, the two contending brothers were of the sacerdotal race, but had introduced a new form of government, that they might thereby subject the people to slavery."

Joseph.
Antiq. &
de Bell.
Judaic.

Hyrchanus, on his part, urged, "That, being the elder brother, he was unjustly deprived of his birth-right by Aristobulus, who, having left him only a small portion of land for his subsistence, had usurped all the rest from him; and, like a man born for mischief, practised piracy at sea, and rapine and depredation at land, upon his neighbours." And for the attesting of what Hyrchanus had alledged, there appeared about a thousand of the principal Jews, whom Antipater had procured to come thither for that purpose.

To this Aristobulus answered, "That not his ambition had excluded Hyrchanus from the government, but his own incapacity to manage it, being an inactive, slothful man, utterly unfit for the business of the public, and fallen into the contempt of the people: He added, I was therefore forced to interpose, in order to preserve the government from falling into the hands of strangers; and I bear no other title in the state, than what Alexander my father had before me." And, for witnesses of this, he produced several young men of the country in gaudy and splendid apparel, who did not, by their dress, or by their behaviour, bring any credit to the cause, in support of which they appeared. Pompey, on this hearing, saw far enough into the matter to make him disapprove of the violence done to Hyrchanus, but would not immediately determine the controversy; lest Aristobulus, being provoked thereby, should obstruct him in his Arabian war; an enterprize which he had then much at heart. Giving therefore fair words to both brothers, he dismissed them for the present, promising, that, after he had reduced Arctes, and his Arabians, he would come in person into Judea, and there settle and compose all matters. Aristobulus, perceiving how the Roman general was inclined, went from Damascus without taking leave; which very much angered Pompey.

Y. R. 690.

Plut. &
Dio.
App. in Mithrid.

In the mean time, Aretas, though he had hitherto contemned the Roman arms, yet, when he found the Romans near him, and ready to invade him with their victorious army, sent Ambassadors to make his submission. Pompey, nevertheless, marched to Petra, the metropolis of Aretas's kingdom, and having taken the place, and the king in it, put him into custody; but released him afterwards on his submitting to the terms required, and then returned to Damascus.

Joseph.
Antiq. &
de Bell.
Jude.
Plut. in
Pomp.
App. in Mithrid.

Being there informed of the warlike preparations, which Aristobulus was making in Judea, he marched into that country, and found him in his castle at Alexandria, which was a strong fortress, situated in the entrance of the country on a high mountain. Pompey sent him a message to come down to him; which he was very unwilling to do; but at length, by the persuasions of those about him, who dreaded a Roman war, he was prevailed with to comply; and, after some discourse with Pompey about the controversy depending, he returned again into his castle: And this he did two or three times, hoping by these compliances to gain Pompey to his side: but at the same time he was fortifying his castles, and making preparations for his defence, in case the sentence should go against him; of which proceeding Pompey being informed, forced him, on his next coming down, to make a cession of all his castles, and to sign orders to those that commanded in them, to deliver them up to the Romans. Aristobulus grievously resented the putting this force upon him, and therefore, as soon as he got free, fled to Jerusalem, and there prepared for war. Pompey, not to give him time for assembling his forces, marched after him. The first place where the Romans pitched their camp was in the plains of Jericho; and here they received the news of the death of Mitridates. It was brought to Pompey by special messengers sent from Pontus. The messengers having their spears wreathed about with laurel, which was always a token of some victory, or other important advantage gained to the state, the army were eager to know what had happened; and whereas there was no tribunal yet erected for the General (the camp being just pitched), and it would require some time to erect one of turf (as was the custom,) they heaped up their pack-saddles one upon another, and thereby made an eminence: Pompey ascended it, and from thence communicated to them, that Mitridates had laid violent hands upon himself, and was dead; that his son Pharnaces, having seized his kingdom, submitted both that and himself to the Roman State; and that from him came the letters bringing this account: so that the war, which had caused them so many fatigues, was now at an end. The army immediately expressed their joy by shouts, and nothing was to be seen the whole day, but festivity and sacrifices of thanksgiving.

Joseph.
Jude.
Plut. in Pomp.Vid. sup.
p. 252.

The sequel of Mitridates's story, after his arrival at Dioscurias, on the eastern coast of the Euxine, is as follows.

Having there wintered, he set out early in the spring for the kingdom of Bosporus, which had been a province^a of his empire, and where he had placed one of his sons, called Macbares, to govern it with the title of king. But the young king having been hard pressed upon by the Romans, while they lay at the siege of Sinope, and were masters of the Euxine sea by means of their fleet, he made peace with them, and had ever since maintained the terms of it. This having much angered the father, the son dreaded his approach; and therefore, while he was on the way, sent Ambassadors to pacify him, urging in excuse of his conduct, that what he had done was by the necessity of his affairs, and not by choice. Finding that his father was implacable, he endeavoured to make his escape by sea; in which attempt not succeeding, he killed himself, to avoid falling into his father's hands.

It has been mentioned, that from the kingdom of Bosporus Mitbridates sent Ambassadors unsuccessfully to treat with Pompey, then in Syria; and that losing all hopes of obtaining peace from the Romans, upon any tolerable terms, he made all the preparations he could for war.

As soon as he was capable (after his sickness formerly mentioned) of acting and managing his affairs in person, he sent troops to Phanagoria, on the east side of the Streight, that he might be absolute master of the channel, of which he was already master on the west side, by means of Panticapeum. Castor, a man of obscure birth, who was governor of Phanagoria, had formerly been affronted by the eunuch Tryphon; and now, seeing this eunuch arrive with the king's troops, killed him, made the inhabitants take arms, and exhorted them to resume their liberty. The whole city rose. The citadel, in which were several of Mitbridates's children, and, among the rest, Artaphernes, above forty years old, made some resistance; but the people heaping up wood round about it, in order to set it on fire, the prince's courage failed, and he surrendered himself prisoner, with three of his brothers, Darius, Xerxes, and Oxatbres, and one sister, called Eupatra, all four under age. Cleopatra, another daughter of Mitbridates held out against the rebels, notwithstanding her being thus deserted by her brother; and gave her father time to send ships to carry her off to Panticapeum. Castor delivered up his prisoners to the Romans.

The example of Phanagoria was followed by several of the neighbouring towns; so that Mitbridates, seeing treasons multiply around him, turned his thoughts to purchase the friendship of the Scythian kings, by giving them some of his daughters in marriage, with rich presents: But the soldiers, who were appointed to escort the princesses, delivered them

^a The Bosporani were those people who inhabited the northern coast of the Euxine sea; which coast (or at least the western part of it) seems to have been subject to Mitbridates, as well as the country called (in this part of the Roman story) the Cimmerian Bosporus, which is also the name of the Streight, which divides the Chersonesus from Asia.

into

V. R. 692. into the hands of the Romans, having first killed the eunuchs who had the care of them. All these disappointments determined him to make a desperate expedition through the way of Pannonia and the Trentine Alps, into Italy itself, and there attack the Romans, as Hannibal had done, at their own doors. In order hereto, he collected numerous forces out of the Scythian nations, for augmenting his former army, and sent agents to engage the Gauls to join with him. There were abundance of Gauls settled upon the Danube, and the rivers that fall into it, and he had for a long time kept up a good correspondence with these; so that he expected not only to meet with no opposition from them, but to have them for his allies and auxiliaries.

F. deaux. But this enterprize containing a march of above 2000 miles, through all those countries which are now called Tartaria Crimea, Podolia, Moldavia, Wallachia, Transylvania, Hungaria, Stiria, Carinthia, Tyrol, and Lombardy, and over three great rivers, the Boristenes, the Danube, and the Po, the very thought of it so terrified the army, that, to avoid it, they conspired against him, and made his son Pharnaces their king. Mitbridates had always distinguished this son as his favourite, and intended him for his successor. But the prince, who was desirous to preserve, at least the wreck of his father's fortune, and foresaw, that the project of marching into Italy, if only begun to be put into execution, would probably occasion the loss of all, by rendering the Romans irreconcilable to the family of Mitbridates, put himself at the head of the conspirators^b.

The king, informed of what was in agitation, sent some of his guards to seize the prince; but he gained over these soldiers to join him in the conspiracy: into which, by remonstrances and promises, he easily brought likewise the Roman deserters, who were encamped without the walls of Panticapeum. The prince found no greater difficulty in gaining the soldiers of the other camps; and at the head of this multitude of rebels he presented himself before the place at day-break.

The city soon followed the example of the camps. Some officers, whom the king had sent to enquire the cause of the shouts he heard, having gone over with their soldiers to Pharnaces, the inhabitants presently opened the gates to the prince: so that the king was reduced to shut himself up

^b Fear might perhaps concur with ambition in prompting the prince to rebel. The death of his brother Xipharcus might make him think his own life very precarious.

P. ad. Mitbridates, in the decline of his affairs, had placed Stratonice, the mother of Xipharcus, in a strong castle (called Symphorian) in Pontus. She, finding herself like to be deserted, delivered the place to Pompey, upon his promise of safety for herself, and likewise for her son, in case he should happen to fall into the hands of the Romans: and Pompey continued her in possession of that castle, and of most of the effects in it. Xipharcus was at this time in Pontus with his father, who, to be revenged on the mother, carried this son to the side of the Streight, on the opposite side on which the castle stood, and there slew him within her view, and left the dead body unburied on the strand.

in the citadel. From thence he sent to ask the mutineers what their demands were: They answered with extreme insolence, “ We demand that Pharnaces should be our king. We want a young king, not an old one, governed by eunuchs, and who makes known his power only by cruel- ties to his Generals, his friends, and even his children.”

Y.R. 690.
Bct. Chr.
62.
389 Conf.

Mitbridates came out, in order to speak in person to them; but the soldiers who attended him, thinking it would be best for themselves to follow the stream, offered their services to the rebels. The Roman deserters, proud of their number and strength, and ever at the head of the rebel-crew, made answer to this offer of the soldiers, “ That it would not be accepted, unless they first gave some signal proof of their zeal.” And, at the same time, they pointed to Mitbridates. In so great extremity, the king had no choice but to return into the fort, which he did not effect without great difficulty, having had his horse killed under him. At the same instant, the whole multitude of the revolted proclaimed Pharnaces king; and, for want of a diadem, they bound about his head a broad fillet of Egyptian paper, which somebody had taken out of a neighbouring temple.

Prideaux.

Mitbridates, who, from a tower, saw all that passed, sent many times to ask his life of his son, with permission to retire. But as none of his messengers returned, and he found he must die, he made this prayer: O ye gods! the avengers of fathers, if it be true that you exist, and if there be justice in heaven, grant that Pharnaces may, one day, bear his sentence of death pronounced by his children. He then called some of his officers and guards, who had hitherto continued faithful to him, and, having praised their generosity, ordered them to repair to the new king; after which he retired into his apartment, distributed poison to his wives, concubines, and daughters*, and took a dose of it himself: this not operating upon him, he had recourse to his sword; but failing to give himself such a wound as was sufficient to do the business, he called to him a Gallic officer (who, at the head of some of the rebels, had forced the walls of the castle;) Brave soldier, you did me great services at the time you fought under me. You will do me a greater now than ever, if you will save me from the shame of falling alive into the hands of the Romans, and being led by them in triumph. The Gaul complied with his desire.

Orof. vi. 5.

Dio. App.

Such was the end of Mitbridates†; whom Cicero styles the greatest of kings.

Cic. in
Luc.

* Two of his daughters, Mitbridatis and Nysa, who were to be married to the two Ptolemys, the one king of Egypt, and the other king of Cyprus, desired to have the consolation of dying before their father: they made haste therefore to drink the poison, and expired in a very short time.

The number of this prince's sons and daughters, by his wives and concubines, was very considerable. Many of his sons he slew in his displeasure; and many of his daughters he poisoned, when he could not carry them off in his flights. Nevertheless, five of his sons, and two of his daughters were carried by Pompey to Rome, and there led before him in his Triumph.

VOL. III.

† The continuance of Mitbridates's war with the Romans, according to Justin was

M m forty-

Y. R. 690.
Vol. I. ii.
13.

kings after Alexander. He was (says Velleius) a very great prince, sometimes by his fortune, always by his magnanimity ; a general in council and design, a soldier in execution, and, for hatred to Rome, another Hannibal. It is agreed, that he was a very extraordinary person, both for the greatness^a of his spirit, and the endowments of his mind : and that he was learned in all the learning of those times ; and it is affirmed, that of twenty-two nations under his command, he could speak to every forty-six years ; according to Appian, forty-two ; according to Florus and Extrepius, forty ; and according to Pliny, thirty ; but according to the exact truth of the matter, though we reckon the beginning of the war from Mitridates's seizing Cappadocia (which was the first occasion of it) its duration to his death, will be no more than twenty-seven years ; which, for the sake of a round number, Pliny calls thirty, and thereby comes nearest to the truth. Prideaux, Connect. p. 432.

^a The summary given us, by an ingenious and judicious modern, of the wars, and fortunes of Mitridates, and of his character as a warrior, may not perhaps be unacceptable to the reader :

Montesquieu de la Grandeur, &c.

— “ This disposition of things [mentioned above in the note, p. 148.] gave rise to three mighty wars, which form one of the noblest parts of the Roman history : because we do not, on this occasion, read of princes already overcome by Luxury and Pride, as Antiochus and Tigranes ; nor by Fear, as Philip, Perfes, and Jugurtha ; but a magnanimous king, who, in adversity, like a lion that gazes upon his wounds, was fired with greater indignation upon that account. This part of the Roman history is singular, because it abounds with perpetual and ever unexpected revolutions ; for if Mitridates could easily recruit his armies, it is likewise true, that in those reverses of fortune, in which kings stand in greatest need of obedience, and a strict discipline, his barbarous forces forsook him : As he had the art of enticing nations, and stirring up cities to rebellion, so was he likewise betrayed by his captains, his children, and his wives ; as he had sometimes experienced Roman Generals to contend with, so, at other times were sent against him, Sylla, Lucullus, and Pompey.

“ This prince having defeated the Roman Generals, and conquered Asia, Macedonia, and Greece, was vanquished, in his turn, by “ Sylla ; confined by a treaty to his former limits ; harassed and insulted by the Roman Generals. Become once more superior to them, and conqueror of Asia, he was driven thence by Lucullus ; pursued into his own country ; obliged to fly for shelter to Tigranes, and defeated with him : Depending now upon himself alone (the Armenian march being irrecoverably lost) he took sanctuary in his own dominions, and re-ascended the throne.

“ Lucullus was succeeded by Pompey, who quite overpowered Mitridates. He then fled out of his dominions, and, crossing the Araxes, marched from danger to danger through the country of the Lazi, and, assembling in his way all the Barbarians he met with, appeared in Bosporus against his son Macchares, who had reconciled himself to the Romans.

“ Although plunged in so deep an abyss, he yet formed a design of making Italy the seat of the war, and of marching to Rome, at the head of those nations who enslaved it some years after, and by the same way they then took.”

[I know not whether by these last words, the judicious author intended to intimate, that because the Roman State was, some hundreds of years after this time, enslaved by the nations she refers to, it would now have been endangered by an invasion from the same nations. If he did, he must surely have forgot for a moment, that Rome was now almost in the highest degree of strength she ever attained to ; and that she was fallen into extreme weakness, and broken all to pieces, when those nations succeeded in their attempt upon her.]

“ Betrayed by Pharnaces, another of his sons, and by an army terrified at the greatness of his enterprizes, and the perils he was going in search of, he died in a manner worthy of a king.”

one in their own proper language. Other of his accomplishments have been already mentioned. But that he was inhuman, unnatural in his displeasure, a monster of cruelty (not to mention the massacre in cold blood of 80,000 Italians settled in Asia) is manifest from his murdering his mother and his brother, and from the great number of his sons, and of his friends and followers, whom, at several times, and often on very slight occasions, he had put to death. He lived seventy-two years, sixty of which he reigned.

Y.R. 690.

Plin. l. vii.
c. 24.

Prid. 4; 7.

Pompey, from the plains of Jericbo, where (as was before related) he received the news of the death of Mitridates, led his army toward Jerusalem. On his approach, Aristobulus, terrified, and repenting of what he had done, went out to meet him; and, in order to pacify his anger, promised him an absolute submission, and likewise a considerable sum of money. The Roman General accepted the proposal, detained the king, and sent Gabinus, one of his Lieutenants, with a body of men, to receive the money; But when Gabinus came to the city, he found the gates shut against him; and was told from the walls, that the citizens would not stand to the agreement. Pompey, thinking himself mocked by Aristobulus, laid him in chains, and marched with the whole army directly for Jerusalem. The place, by its situation, as well as by its fortifications, was very strong, and might have held out a long time, if the people within had not been divided among themselves: the adherents of Aristobulus were unanimously for defending it; and to this they were the more vehemently carried, by their extreme indignation at Pompey's making their king a prisoner: But the partizans of Hyrchanus being the stronger, and being determined to receive Pompey into the city, the other party retired to the mountain of the temple, where, having broken down the bridges over the deep ditches and vallies that surrounded it, they resolved to maintain themselves. Most of the sacerdotal order adhered to the cause of Aristobulus, and shut themselves up with those who had seized the temple; while the main body of the people, not only admitted Pompey into the city, but, with Hyrchanus at their head, supplied the Romans with all the necessaries they could furnish for carrying on the siege of the temple. The north side of it being observed to be the weakest part, Pompey began his approaches there. At first he offered the beleagued terms of peace; but these being rejected, he sent to Tyre for battering rams, and all other engines of war proper for a siege, determined to exert his utmost efforts for the speedy reduction of the place. Nevertheless it held out three months, and, perhaps, the Romans would have been necessitated to quit their enterprize, had it not been for the superstitious rigour with which the Jews observed their Sabbath. Formerly it had been carried so high, that they would not defend their lives on that day, but, if then assaulted, would rather patiently yield their throats to be cut, than stir a hand in their own defence. But the mischief and folly of this being sufficiently made appear in what they Jes. A. c.

& de Bell
Judæc.1 Macc. ii.
32-33.
Ptolem.

they suffered from it in the beginning of the Maccabean wars, it was then determined, that the necessary defence of a man's life was not within the prohibition of the fourth commandment. But this being understood to hold good only against a direct and immediate assault, and not against any antecedent preparative leading thereto, it reached not in their opinion, to the allowing of any work to be done on that day, for the preventing or destroying the worst designs of mischief, till they came to be put in execution. Although, therefore, they vigorously defended themselves on the Sabbath day, when assaulted, yet they would not then stir a hand, either to hinder the enemy's works, or destroy their engines, or obstruct their erecting of them, as they did on other days: Which Pompey perceiving, ordered, that no assault should be made upon them during their Sabbaths; but that those days should be employed wholly in carrying on his works, and erecting and fitting his engines in such manner, as they might best do execution the following days. And thus the Romans, taking advantage of the superstition of the Jews, filled up the ditches with which the temple was surrounded, and brought forward their engines of battery, without meeting with any opposition: By which engines they at length beat down a strong tower; and this drew a great part of the adjoining wall with it; so that a breach was made large enough for an assault. Cornelius Faustus, the son of Sylla, being posted near the breach, immediately mounted it, and was followed by the whole army, who thus entering the place, made a dreadful slaughter of those whom they found within it: it is reckoned, that no less than 12,000 were put to the sword; and, in this massacre, none acted more cruelly than the Jews of the contrary faction did against their own brethren. During all this scene of destruction, we are told, that the priests, who were then in the temple, went on with the daily service of it, not being deterred, either by the rage of their enemies, or by the death of their friends; and that many of the priests, while they were so employed, had their own blood mingled with the blood of the sacrifices which they were offering: an instance of constancy much admired by Pompey himself.

And thus, after a siege of three months, was the Temple of Jerusalem taken by the Romans, in the end of the first year of the hundred and seventy-ninth Olympiad (Caius Antonius and Marcus Tullius Cicero being then Consuls at Rome) about the time of our Midsummer, and on the day which the Jews kept as a solemn fast for the taking of Jerusalem, and the temple with it, by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon.

As soon as the Romans had made themselves masters of the place, Pompey, accompanied by several of his chief officers, went up into it, and not contenting themselves with viewing the outer courts, caused the * most sacred

* That the temple was now taken on the day of a solemn fast, is said, not only by Josephus in the places last above cited, but also by Strabo, l. xvi. p. 763. The taking of Jerusalem sacred parts of the temple to be opened to them; and they entered not only into the HOLY PLACE, but also into the HOLY OF HOLIES, where none were permitted, by the Jewish law, to enter but the high-priest, and he only once in a year, on their great day of expiation. The Jews are said to have more grievously resented the profanation of their temple by Pompey, than all they had before suffered from the Romans during the war.

Y.R. 699.
Bef. Chr.
62.
389 Conf.

Though Pompey found, in the treasures of the temple, 2000 talents in money, besides its rich utensils and others things of great value, he left it all intire and untouched, for the sacred uses to which it was devoted. And the next day he ordered the temple to be cleansed, and divine service to be there carried on, in the same manner as formerly.

Jos. Ant.

The walls of Jerusalem, however, he demolished; and, though he restored Hyrcanus to the office of high-priest, and made him also prince of the country, would not allow him to wear a diadem, or to extend his borders beyond the old limits of Judæa; but deprived him of all those cities which had been taken by his predecessors from the Cale-Syrians and Phœnicians. Gadara (which was one of them) having been lately destroyed by the Jews, he ordered to be rebuilt, at the request of Demetrius, his freedman and chief favourite^b, who was a native of that place. This, and all the rest of those conquered cities, he added to the province of Syria; of which he made Scaurus president, giving him two Legions to keep the country in order. Then, carrying with him Aristobulus, and his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus, and two of his daughters, as captives to be led before him in his triumph, he set forward in the way to Rome.

App. in
Syr. & de
Bell. Civ.

Pompey on his return from Syria, coming to Amisus in Pontus, found there the body of Mithridates, which had been sent to him from Pharnaces, with many presents to procure his favour. The presents Pompey received, but as to the body, that he might not seem to insult the dead,

Plut. in
Pomp.

Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, was on the 9th day of their month Tamuz (2 Kings xxv. 21.) which usually falls about the time of our Midsummer, sooner or later, according as their intercalation happened. But in their present Kalendar, it is translated to the eighteenth of that Month.

^b The enormous riches and power of this Demetrius reflect no honour upon his patron. He was not ashamed, says Seneca, of being richer than Pompey: and Plutarch relates of him, that before he returned to Rome, he had very fine houses in the most agreeable suburbs of the city, with magnificent gardens, whilst Pompey had only a plain habitation. Frequently at feasts, while Pompey was waiting for his guests, or politely receiving them, Demetrius had already taken his place at table, with his head covered, and lolling at his ease. But such was the disposition of Pompey; he overlooked every thing in those he loved. Gabinius, Scaurus, and others, acted all kinds of injustice and oppression, under his authority, and enriched themselves by pillaging without any reserve. Pompey suffered it, either through weakness, not daring to check them, or through policy, to attach creatures to him, whom he was afraid to remove by too much severity. It is a blot in his reputation; for it does not suffice for a man in office, that his personal conduct be irreproachable; he is answerable for the misconduct of those who act under his commission. Crevier.

he

Y. R. 693 he would not see it, but ordered it to be carried to Sinope, and there buried
 Bef. Chr. 62. in the ancient burial place of the kings of Pontus; adding such expences 389 Cons. for the funeral, as were necessary for the solemnization of it in a royal manner.

Vid. supr. Pbarnaces delivered up likewise to Pompey those persons, who, some
 P. 123 years before, had seized Manius Aquilius, at Mitylene, and put him into
 App. the hands of the king of Pontus; and together with these he sent also a Mithrid. great number of hostages, whom Mitbridates had exacted from various
 P. 250. princes and states, Greek and Barbarian.

Many governors of fortresses and castles^a in this country had waited the D. 3 Caff. arrival of the Roman General, in order to surrender them to him in person,
 l. xxxvii. and thereby avoid being made answerable for such parts of the treasures there deposited, as they imagined would otherwise be embezzled by under officers; so that a prodigious quantity of jewels and rich moveables fell into his hands.

And now the conqueror distributed rewards to all those petty princes, who had deserved well of the Republic: to Pbarnaces, he gave the title of
 P. 123 Friend and Ally of the Roman People, confirming him in the possession of the App. kingdom of Bosporus: Only he excepted, out of the number of his sub-Mithrid. jects, the inhabitants of Phanagoria, declaring them free: Because, by P. 250. their revolt, they had given the final blow to Mitbridates. Castor, the author of that defection, was likewise rewarded with the title of Friend and Ally of the Roman People: [This man became afterwards the son-in-law of king Dejotarus.] From Amisus Pompey marched into the province of Asia Propria, and took up his winter-quarters in the city of Ephesus. While he lay there, he rewarded his victorious army, giving to each private sol-481. 85. 91. dier 1500 drachmas, and proportionably more to all the officers according as they were in higher or lower posts of command; on which occasion, he 3,100,000. expended out of the spoils taken in this war 16,000 talents: and yet he 3,875,000. reserved 20,000 talents to be carried into the public treasury at Rome, on the day of his triumph, to make which as glorious, as possibly he could, was now his principal object.

^a In some of these castles Perseus found vast riches, especially at Telaura, where was the chief wardrobe, or storehouse, of Mitbridates: for it contained 2000 cups made of the onyx stone, and set in gold, with such a vast quantity of all sorts of plate, household goods, and furniture, and of all manner of rich accoutrements both for man and horse, that the Quæstor of the army was thirty days in taking an inventory of them.

C H A P. IX.

Extraordinary honours are decreed to POMPEY by the SENATE, at the motion of MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO, then Consul; and by the PEOPLE, at the motion of two of their Tribunes. An account of the birth, education, and travels of CICERO; his progress through the Quæstorship, Ædileship, and Prætorship, to the Consular dignity; his acts and proceedings, (in his Consulship) prior to his Discovery of CATALINE'S Conspiracy. Brief histories of C. JULIUS CÆSAR, M. PORTIUS CATO, and L. SERGIUS CATILINA, to that time. The conspiracy is quashed. Honours done to CICERO by the SENATE. He is affronted by one of the Tribunes; but contrives to make the affront turn to his glory.

THE joy at Rome on the news of the death of Mithridates may be said to have been intemperate. Cicero, who, in a speech (the first he ever made from the Rostra) had employed his eloquence with the People to procure for Pompey that unprecedented commission, which was given him by the Manilian Law, employed now his consular and personal influence with the Senate to obtain for him unprecedented honours. At the motion of Cicero, the FATHERS decreed a public thanksgiving, in Pompey's name, of ten days, which was twice as long as had ever been decreed before to any General, even to Marius himself, for his victory over the Cimbri ^a.

And upon the receipt of the public letters, which brought the account of Pompey's success in Judæa (which put an end to the wars in the East) two Tribunes of the People, T. Labienus and T. Ampius, passed a Law, that this singular favourite should, on all festival days, have the privilege of wearing a laurel crown, with his General's robe; and in the equestrian races of the Circus his triumphal habit ^b.

But we read, that in vain would have been these decrees in reward of Pompey's victories, in vain would have been the victories themselves, if his eloquent Panegyrist, a most able and vigilant Magistrate, had not preserved Rome (in the close of this very year) from the mischievous machinations of her own Citizens; machinations so big with destruction, that Pompey, at his return home, declared himself indebted to Cicero, for the satisfaction of seeing again his native country. Before we proceed to the relation of that

^a The reader will not perhaps much wonder at this, if he calls to mind what was formerly mentioned (Vol. II. b. vi. c. 9.) that Cicero (a thorough party-man) speaks of Scipio's starving a small garrison out of Numantia (a town in the heart of Spain) as an exploit equally momentous with Marius's victory (near the Po in the entrance of Italy) over the numerous forces of the Cimbri; an army amounting to 300,000 men, which, in the opinion of the public at Rome, threatened the City with speed and total destruction.

^b If we may believe Patérculus and Dio, Pompey, ashamed of these marks of distinction, so contrary to Republican maxims, made use of them but once. Cicero seems to say the contrary: Pompeius togulam illum pictam silentio tuetur suam.

Li. i.
Ep. 18.
ad Attic.

memorable transaction, it may be proper to give some account of the origin of this famous CONSUL, ORATOR, and PHILOSOPHER, of the steps by which he rose to the highest Magistracy, and of the acts of his Consulship anterior to that which was the chief glory of his life.

Midd. vol. I. p. 3. Cic. Ep. ad Art. vii. 5. Fig. Ann. xxxvii. 2. Cic. de Leg. ii. 3. Val. Max. ii. 2. Marcus Tullius Cicero was ^a born on the third of January, in the 647th year of Rome, at Arpinum, a city anciently of the Samnites (now part of the kingdom of Naples) which, upon its submission to Rome, acquired the freedom of the City, and was inserted into the Cornelian Tribe. It had the honour also of producing the great C. Marius; which gave occasion to Pompey to say, in a public speech, That Rome was indebted to this corporation for two Citizens, who had, each in his turn, preserved it from ruin.

Midd. p. 11. Cic. pro Arch. i. 3. Cicero's father ^b, encouraged by the promising genius of his son, spared no cost nor pains to improve it by the help of the ablest masters, and among the other instructors of his early youth, put him under the care of the Poet Archias, who, when Cicero was about five years old, came to Midd. p. 2. ^a His mother was called Helvia; a name mentioned in history and old inscriptions among the ancient families of Rome. She was rich and well descended. It is remarkable, that Cicero never once speaks of his mother in any part of his writing.—As to his father's family—Some derive his descent from Kings, others from Mechanics, but the truth lay between both; for his family, though it had never borne any of the great offices of the Republic, was yet very ancient and honourable, of principal distinction and nobility in that part of Italy in which it resided, and of Equestrian rank, from its first admission to the freedom of Rome. As often as there was occasion to mention the character and condition of his ancestors, Cicero speaks of them always with great frankness, declaring them to have been content with their paternal fortunes, and the private honours of their own City, without the ambition of appearing on the public stage of Rome. Thus, in a speech to the People, upon his advancement to the Consulship, I have no pretence, says he, to enlarge before you, upon the praises of my ancestors; not but that they were all such as myself, who am descended from their blood, and trained by their discipline; but because they lived without this applause of popular fame, and the splendour of these honours which you confer. It is on this account, therefore, that we find him so often called a new-man; not that his family was new or ignoble, but because he was the first of it, who ever sought and obtained the public Magistracies of the State.

^b Cicero, being the first-born of the family, received, as usual, the name of his father, and grandfather, Marcus. This name was properly personal, equivalent to that of baptism with us, and imposed with ceremonies somewhat analogous to it, on the ninth day, called Macrob. Sat. i. 16. the lustrical, or day of purification; when the child was carried to the temple by the friends and relations of the family, and before the altars of the Gods, recommended to the protection of some tutelar Deity.

Tullius was the name of the family, which, in old language, signified flowing streams, or ducts of water, and was derived probably from their ancient situation, at the confluence of the two rivers.

The third name was generally added on Pompeius account of some memorable action, quality, or accident, which distinguished the founder, or chief person of the family. Plutarch says, That the surname of Cicero was owing to a wart, or excrescence, on the nose of one of his ancestors, in the shape of a vetch, which the Romans called Cicero. But Pliny tells us, more credibly, That all those names, which had a reference to any species of grain, as the Fabii, Lentuli, &c. were acquired by a reputation of being the best husbandmen, or improvers, of that species. As Tullius therefore, the family name, was derived from the situation of the farm; so Cicero, the surname, from the culture of it by Vetches. This, I say, is the most probable, because agriculture was held the most liberal employment in old Rome; and those tribes, which to Rome with a high reputation for learning and poetry, and lived in the family of Lucullus ^c.

When Cicero, at about seventeen years of age, had changed the puerile for the manly gown, and had (according to custom) been introduced into the Forum, he was placed under the care of Q. Mucius Scævola, the Augur, ^{Midd. p.} the principal lawyer, as well as statesman, of that age, who had passed ^{13.} through all the offices of the Republic with a singular reputation of integrity, and was now extremely old; Cicero never departed from his side, but carefully treasured up in his memory all the remarkable sayings, which ^{Cic. de Amicit. 1.} dropt from him, as so many lessons of prudence for his future conduct; and, after his death, applied himself to another of the same family, Scævola, ^{Cic. in Brut p. 89. (edit. S. Corrad.)} the high priest, a person of equal character for probity and skill in the Law; who, though he did not profess to teach, yet freely gave his advice to all the young students, who consulted him.

which resided on their farms in the country, the most honourable: and this very grain, from which Cicero drew his name, was, in all ages of the Republic, in great request with the meaner people; being one of the usual largesses bestowed upon them by the rich, and sold every where in the theatres and streets ready parched or boiled for present use.

^{Hor. Sat. l. II. iii. 182. & de Art. Poet. 249 Midd. p. 11.} It was the custom of the great, in these days, to entertain in their houses the principal scholars and philosophers of Greece, with a liberty of opening a school, and teaching together with their own children, any of the other young nobility and gentry of Rome. Under this master, Cicero applied himself chiefly to poetry, to which he was naturally addicted, and made such a proficiency in it, that, while he was still a boy, he composed and published a poem, called Glaucus Pontius, which was extant in Plutarch's time.

^{Pauf. Bæot. c. 22.} After finishing the course of these puerile studies, it was the custom to change the habit of the boy, for that of the man, and take what they called the manly gown, or the ordinary robe of the Citizens: This was an occasion of great joy to the young men, who, by this change, passed into a state of greater liberty and enlargement from the power of their tutors. They were introduced, at the same time, into the Forum, or the great square of the City, where the Assemblies of the City were held, and the Magistrates used to harangue to them from the Rostra, and where all the public pleadings, and judicial proceeding were usually transacted: This, therefore, was the great school of business and eloquence, the scene on which all the affairs of the Empire were determined, and where the foundation of their hopes and fortunes were to be laid: so that they were introduced to it with much solemnity, attended by all the friends and dependants of the family, and, after divine rites performed in the Capitol, were committed to the special protection of some eminent Senator, distinguished for his eloquence and knowledge of the laws, to be instructed, by his advice, in the management of civil affairs, and to form themselves, by his example, for useful members and magistrates of the Republic.

Writers are divided about the precise time ^{Midd. p. 12.} of changing the puerile for the manly gown: What seems the most probable, is, that in the old Republic it was never done till the end of the seventeenth year; but when the ancient discipline began to relax, parents, out of indulgence to their children, advanced this æra of joy one year earlier, and gave them the gown at sixteen, which was the custom in Cicero's time. Under the emperors, it was granted at pleasure, and, at any age, to the great, or their own relations; for Nero received it from Claudius, when he just entered into his fourteenth year, which, as Tacitus says, ^{Ann. xii. 41.} was given before the regular season.

Under these masters he acquired a complete knowledge of the laws of his country^f; but the knowledge of the Law was but one ingredient of many, in the character which he aspired to, of an universal patron, not only of the fortunes, but of the lives and liberties of his countrymen: For that was the proper notion of an ORATOR, or PLEADER OF CAUSES; whose profession it was, to speak aptly, elegantly, and copiously on every subject which could be offered to him, and whose art therefore included in it all other arts of the liberal kind, and could not be acquired to any perfection, without a competent knowledge of whatever was great and laudable in the universe. This was his own idea of what he had undertaken.

The transactions of the Forum were greatly interrupted by the civil dissensions; in which some of the best orators were killed, and others banished. Cicero, however, attended the harangues of the Magistrates, who possessed the Rostra in their turns.

In the mean while, Philo, a philosopher of the first name in the Academy, with many of the principal Athenians, fled to Rome from the fury of Metridates, who had made himself master of Athens, and all the neighbouring part of Greece. Cicero immediately became his scholar, and was exceedingly taken with his philosophy; and, by the help of such a professor, gave himself up to that study with the greatest inclination, as there was cause to apprehend, that the laws and judicial proceedings, which he had designed for the ground of his fame and fortunes, would be wholly overturned by the continuance of the public disorders.

But Cinna's party having quelled all opposition at home, while Sylla was engaged abroad in the Mitbridatic war, there was a cessation of arms within the City for about three years, so that the course of public business began to flow again in its usual channel; and Molo, the Rhodian, one of the ^f This branch of knowledge was thought to be of such consequence at Rome, that it was the common exercise of boys at school to learn the laws of the twelve tables by heart; as they did their poets and classic authors. Cicero particularly took such pains in this study, and was so well acquainted with the most intricate parts of it, as to be able to sustain a dispute on any question with the greatest lawyer of his age: So that pleading once against his friend S. Sulpicius, he declared, by way of railery, what he could have made good likewise in fact, that, if he provoked him, he would profess himself a lawyer in three days time.

The profession of the law, next to that of arms and eloquence, was a sure recommendation to the first honours of the Republic, and for that reason was preserved, as it were, hereditary in some of the noblest families of Rome; who, by giving their advice gratis to all who wanted it, engaged the favour and observance of their fellow-citizens, and acquired great authority in all the affairs of state. It was the custom of these old senators, eminent for their wisdom and experience, to walk every morning up and down the Forum, as a signal of their offering themselves freely to all, who had occasion to consult them, not only in case of law, but in their private and domestic affairs. But in latter times they chose to sit at home with their doors open, in a kind of throne, or raised seat, like the confessors in foreign churches, giving access and audience to all people. This was the case of the two Scævola's, especially the Augur, whose house was called the oracle of the City; and who, in the Marfic war, when worn out with age and infirmities, gave admission every day to all the Citizens, as soon as it was light, nor was ever seen by any in his bed during that whole war.

principak

principal orators of that age, and the most celebrated teacher of eloquence, happening to come to Rome at the same time, Cicero presently took the benefit of his lectures, and resumed his oratorical studies with his former ardour². And that he might neglect nothing which could help in any degree to improve and polish his style, he spent the intervals of his leisure in the company of the ladies; especially of those who were remarkable for a politeness of language, and whose fathers had been distinguished by a fame and reputation of their eloquence.

Thus adorned, and accomplished, by having run through all that course of discipline, which he himself lays down as necessary to form the complete orator, he offered himself to the bar about the age of twenty-six.

The first criminal cause in which he was concerned, was that of L. Roscius Amerinus, of which an account has been already given. He was then in his 27th year; the same age, as the learned have observed, in which Demosthenes first began to distinguish himself in Athens. Plutarch says, that presently after this trial, Cicero took occasion to travel abroad on pretence of his health, but in reality to avoid the effects of Sylla's displeasure³.

He was twenty-eight¹ years old when he set forward upon his travels to Greece 41.

² In the first or second year of Sylla's Dictatorship, Melo the Rhodian came again to Rome, to solicit the payment of what was due to his country for their services in the Mithridatic war, which gave Cicero an opportunity of putting himself a second time under his direction, and perfecting his oratorical talents, by the further instructions of so renowned a master: whose abilities and character were so highly revered, that he was the first, of all foreigners, who was allowed to speak to the Senate in Greek without an interpreter; which shews in what vogue the Greek learning, and especially eloquence, flourished at this time in Rome.

³ There seems no ground for this notion — We have a clear account from himself of the real motive of this journey: “My body (says he) at this time was exceedingly weak and emaciated; my neck long and small, which is a habit thought liable to great risk of life, if engaged in any fatigue or labour of the lungs; and it gave the greater alarm to those who had a regard for me, that I used to speak without any remission or variation, with the utmost stretch of voice, and great agitation of my body: When my friends, therefore, and Physicians advised me to meddle no more with causes, I resolved to “run any hazard, rather than quit the hopes of glory, which I proposed to myself from pleading: But when I considered that by managing my voice, and changing my way of speaking, I might both avoid all danger, and speak with more ease, I took a resolution of travelling into Asia, merely for an opportunity of correcting my manner of speaking; so that, after I had been two years at the bar, and acquired a reputation in the Forum, I left Rome, &c.” Brut. 437.

¹ If Cicero, who was born Jan. 1, 647, was 28 years old when he began his travels, he did not set forward till the year 675; and, if so, the learned writer of his life might have found a better reason than the passage in Brut. 437. for conjecturing that he did not leave Rome to avoid the effects of Sylla's displeasure: For Sylla (if indeed he was then alive) was not then Dictator. He abdicated the Dictatorship in 674, the year in which Cicero defended L. Roscius Amerinus: And though the orator boasts of his having defended this Roscius against Sylla himself, in the height of his power, and refers to his oration as extant, in proof of what he says [quæ ut scis, extat oratio] it is highly probable, that the bold passages of it, in which he glories, were

Greece and Asia; the fashionable tour of all those who travelled either for curiosity, or improvement^k:

He

Vid. supr.
p. 170.

were never spoken by him (which was the case with regard to some other of his orations) and it may well be doubted, whether they were ever written before Sylla's abdication, or even before his death.

Midd. p.
41.

* His first visit was to Athens, the capital seat of arts and sciences; where some writers tell us that he spent three years, though in truth it was but six months: He took up his quarters with Antiochus, the principal philosopher of the old academy; and under this excellent master renewed, he says, those studies which he had been fond of from his earliest youth. Here he met with his school-fellow, T. Pomponius, who, from his love to Athens, and his spending a great part of his days in it, obtained the surname of Atticus; and here they revived and confirmed that memorable friendship which subsisted between them through life with so celebrated a constancy and affection.

P. 42.

"It was in this first journey to Athens that he was initiated, most probably, into the Eleusian mysteries; for, though we have no account of the time, yet we cannot fix it better than in a voyage undertaken both for the improvement of his mind and body. The reverence with which he always speaks of these mysteries, and the hints that he has dropped of their end and use, seem to confirm what a very learned and ingenious writer has delivered of them: That they were contrived to inculcate the unity of God, and the immortality of the soul. As for the first, after observing to Atticus, who was one also of the initiated, how the gods of the popular religions were all but deceased mortals, advanced from earth to heaven, he bids him remember the doctrine of the mysteries, in order to recollect the universality of that truth. And as to the second, he declares his initiation to be in fact, what the name itself implied, a real beginning of life to him; as it taught the way, not only of living with greater pleasure, but of dying also with a better hope."

Tusc.
Quæst. i.
13.
De Leg. ii.
14.

N. B. Notwithstanding this grave declaration, of his having learnt so important and so pleasing a truth by his initiation, the very learned author of the Divine Legation, &c. (above cited) has produced probable evidence, at least, that our traveller, after his return home, did not believe the immortality of the soul in any sense, that could make him die with a better hope, than a man who believes its mortality. Book III. Sect. iii. "The several and various characters he sustained in his life and writings, habituated him to feign and dissemble his opinions. He may be considered as an Orator, a Statesman, a Philosopher; characters all equally personated; and no one more the real man than the other: but each of them taken up and laid down for the occasion. This appears from the numerous inconsistencies we find in him throughout the course of his sustaining them."—The learned writer gives an instance, where "the Philosopher confuted the Statesman;" he adds, "As in another instance the Statesman seems to have got the better of the Philosopher. He defends the paradoxes of the Stoics in a philosophic dissertation: but, in his oration for Muræna, he ridicules those paradoxes in the freest manner."

N. B. "Nor under one and the same character, or at one and the same time, is he more consistent. In the orations against Catiline, when he opens the conspiracy to the Senate, he represents it as the most deep-laid design, which had infected all orders and degrees of men amongst them: yet, when he brings the same affair before the People, he talks of it as only the wild and senseless escape of a few desperate wretches: it being necessary for his purpose, that the Senate and People, who viewed the conspiracy from several stations, should see it in different lights.

"We meet with numbers of the like contradictions delivered in his own person, and under his philosophic character. Thus in his Books of Divination he combats all Augury, &c. and yet, in his philosophic Treatise of Laws, he delivers himself in their favour, and in so serious and positive a manner, that it is difficult not to believe him to be in earnest. In a word, he laughed at the opinions of state, when he was amongst the philosophers; he laughed at the doctrines of the philosophers, when he was cajoling an assembly;

He spent two years in this excursion; and having, after his return, spent one year at the bar, he was, in the next, (the Consulship of Cn. Octavius and C. Scribonius, year of Rome 677) elected to the office of Quæstor, “and had the honour to be chosen the first of all his competitors, by the unanimous suffrage of the Tribes, and in the first year in which he” was “assembly; and he laughed heartily at both, when withdrawn amongst his friends in a corner. Nor is this the worst part of the story. He hath given us no mark to distinguish his meaning: For in his Academic Questions he is ready to swear, he always speaks what he thinks: Jurarem per Jovem, Deosque penates, me & ardere studio veri reperiendi, & ea sentire quæ dicerem: yet, in his Nature of the Gods, he has strangely changed his tone: Qui autem requirunt, quid quaque de re ipsi sentiamus, curiosius id faciunt quam necesse est.

“If it be asked then, in which of his writings we can have any reasonable assurance of his true sentiments? I reply, scarce in any but his Epistles.---It is only in his EPISTLES to his friends, where we see the man divested of the Politician, the Sophist, and the Advocate: and there he professes his disbelief of a future state of rewards and punishments in the frankest and freest manner.” [The passages, cited in Latin, are thus translated by the very ingenious Mr. Melmoth.]

He says to L. Mescinius.---“This advantage we may at least derive from our extreme calamities; that they will teach us to look upon Death with contempt; which, even if we were happy, we ought to despise, as a state of total insensibility,” &c. Ep. Fam. l. v. Ep. 21.

To A. Torquatus.---“I have the consolation in common with yourself, that should I now be called upon to lay down my life, I shall not be cut off from a commonwealth, which I can by any means regret to leave, especially, as the same blow which deprives me of my life, will deprive me likewise of all sensibility.” Lib. vi. Ep. 4.

To Toranius.---“Now that counsel can profit nothing, and that the Republic is utterly overturned, the only rational part that remains, is to bear with calmness whatever shall be the event; especially, when it is considered, That Death is the final period of all human concerns.” Lib. vi. Ep. 21.

The ingenious translator is of opinion, that admitting these several passages to be so many clear and positive assertions, that the soul perishes with the body; yet it would by no means follow, that this was Cicero's real belief. It is usual with him to vary his sentiments in the letters, in accommodation to the principles, or circumstances, of his correspondents.” After some instances given, the ingenious translator adds, “Other instances of the same variation from himself might be produced; but these, together with those that have already been occasionally pointed out in the course of these remarks, are sufficient perhaps to evince, that Cicero's real sentiments and opinions cannot be proved by any particular passages in these letters. In those to Atticus, indeed, he was generally, though not always, more sincere.” Melmoth, Remark 6. Vol. II. p. 232.

From Athens he passed into Asia, where he gathered about him all the principal orators of the country, who kept him company through the rest of his voyage; and with whom he constantly exercised himself in every place where he made any stay. The chief of them, says he, was Menippus of Stratonica, the most eloquent of all the Asiatics; and if to be neither tedious, nor impertinent, be the characteristic of an Attic orator, he may justly be reckoned in that class.

But as at Athens, where he employed himself chiefly in philosophy, he did not intermit his oratorical studies; so at Rhodes, where his chief study was oratory, he gave some share also of his time to philosophy with Pesidomius, the most esteemed and learned Stoic of that age; whom he often speaks of with honour, not only as his master, but as his friend. It was his constant care, that the progress of his knowledge should keep pace with the improvement of his eloquence; he considered the one as the foundation of the other, and thought it vain to acquire ornaments, before he had provided necessary furniture: He declaimed " was capable of it by Law, the thirty-first of his age". [Cotta was the same year chosen Consul, and Horatius Ædile.]

The island of Sicily, though under the government of one Prætor, was divided into the two provinces of Lilybæum and Syracuse, which had each of them a distinct Quæstor. The former fell by lot to Cicero. Sicily was usually called the granary of the Republic, and the Quæstor's chief employment in it was to supply corn and provisions for the use of the City; but there happening to be a peculiar scarcity this year at Rome, it made the People very clamorous, and gave the Tribunes an opportunity of inflaming them the more easy, by charging it to the loss of the Tribunician power, and their being left a prey, by that means, to the oppressions of the great. It was necessary therefore to the public quiet, to send out large and speedy supplies from Sicily, by which the island was like to be drained; so that Cicero had a difficult task to furnish what was sufficient for the demands of the City, without being grievous at the same time to the poor natives; yet he managed the matter with so much prudence and address, that he made very great exportations, without any burthen upon the province: shewing great courtesy all the while to the dealers, justice to the merchants, generosity to the inhabitants, humanity to the allies, and, in short, doing all manner of good offices to every body; by which he gained the love and admiration of all the Sicilians, who decreed greater honours to him at his departure, than they had ever decreed before to any of their governors^m.

When

declaimed here in Greek, because Melo did not understand Latin, and, upon ending his declamation, while the rest of the company were lavish of their praises, Melo, instead of paying compliments, sat silent a considerable time, till, observing Cicero somewhat disturbed at it, he said, As for you, Cicero, I praise and admire you, but pity the fortune of Greece, to see Arts and Eloquence, the only ornaments which were left to her, transplanted by you to Rome. Having thus finished the circuit of his travels, he came back again to Italy, extremely improved, and changed as it were into a new man: the vehemence of his voice and action was moderated; the redundancy of his stile and fancy corrected; his lungs strengthened; and his whole constitution confirmed.

¹ We have no account of the precise time of Cicero's marriage, which was celebrated most probably in the end of the preceding year, immediately after his return to Rome, when he was about thirty years old; it cannot be placed later, because his daughter was married the year before his Consulship, at the age of thirteen; though we suppose her to be born this year, on the fifth of August, which is mentioned to be her birth-day. Nor is there any thing certain delivered of the family, or condition of his wife Terentia; yet from her name, her great fortune, and her sister Fabia's being one of the Vestal virgins, we may conclude, that she was nobly descended.

■ Before he left Sicily he made the tour of p. 64. the island, to see every thing in it that was curious, and especially the city of Syracuse, which had always made the principal figure in its history. Here his first request to the magistrates, who were shewing him the curiosities of the place, was to let him see the tomb of Archimedes, whose name had done so much honour to it; but, to his surprize, he perceived, that they knew nothing at all of the matter, and even denied that there was any such tomb remaining; yet as he was assured of it beyond all doubt, by the concurrent testimony of writers, and remembered the verses inscribed, and that there was a Sphere with a Cylinder

Midd. p.
62.

Vid. Orat.
Cicero ad
fratrem.
Sunt it.

Pro Planc.
22.

Plut. in Cic.

Brut. p.
438.

Midd. p.
59.

When five years, from the time of his election to the Quæstorship, were almost elapsed, which was the proper interval prescribed by Law, before he could hold the next office of Tribune or Ædile (thro' one of which it was necessary to pass in his way to the superior dignities) he chose to drop the Tribunate, as being stripped of its ancient power by the late ordinance of Sylla, and began to make interest for the Ædileship, while Hortensius, at the same time, was suing for the Consulship. Cicero had employed all this interval in a close attendance on the Forum, and a perpetual course of pleading, which greatly advanced his interest in the City; especially when it was observed, that he strictly complied with the law; by refusing, not only to take fees, but to accept even any presents, in which the generality of patrons were less scrupulous. Midd. p. 74. Brut. p. 40. Plut. in Cic.

As he had now devoted himself to a life of business and ambition, so he omitted none of the usual arts of recommending himself to popular favour, and facilitating his advancement to the superior honours. He thought it absurd, that, when every little artificer knew the name and use of all his tools, a Midd. p. 76. Plut. in Cic.

Tusc.
Quæst. v.
3.

Cylinder engraved on some part of it, he would not be dissuaded from the pains of searching it out. When they had carried him therefore to the gate, where the greatest number of their sepulchres stood, he observed in a spot overgrown with shrubs and briars, a small column, whose head just appeared above the bushes, with the figure of a Sphere and Cylinder upon it: this, he presently told the company, was the thing they were looking for, and sending in some men to clear the ground of the brambles and bushes, he found the inscription also which he expected; though the latter part of all the verses were effaced. Thus, says he, one of the noblest cities of Greece, and once likewise the most learned, had known nothing of the monument of its most deserving and ingenious citizen, if it had not been discovered to them by a native of Arpinum. At the expiration of his year he took leave of the Sicilians, by a kind and affectionate speech, assuring them of his protection in all their affairs at Rome; in which he was as good as his word, and continued ever after their constant patron, to the great benefit and advantage of the province.

He came away extremely pleased with the success of his administration; and flattering himself, that all Rome was celebrating his praises, and that the people would readily grant him every thing that he desired; in which imagination he landed at Puteoli, a considerable port, adjoining to Baiæ, the chief city of pleasure in Italy, where there was a perpetual resort of the rich and the great, as well for the delights of the situation, as the use of its baths and hot waters. But here, as himself pleasantly tells the story, he was not a little mortified by the first friend whom he met, who asked him how long he had left Rome, and what news there? He answered, I came from the Provinces: From Afric, I suppose, says another? No, (replying with some indignation) I came from Sicily. A third, who stood by, and had a mind to be thought wiser, said presently, How! did not you know that Cicero was Quæstor of Syracuse? [which he was not, but of Lilybæum] Upon which, perceiving it in vain to be angry, he fell into the humour of the place, and made himself one of the company, who came to the waters. This mortification gave some little check to his ambition, or taught him however, how to apply it more successfully; and did him more good, he says, than if he had received all the compliments that he expected. For it made him reflect, that the People at Rome had dull ears, but quick eyes; and that it was his business to keep himself always in their sight; nor to be so solicitous how to make them hear of him, as to make them see him: So that from this moment he resolved to stick close to the Forum, and to live perpetually in the view of the City; nor to suffer either his porter, or his sleep, to hinder any man's access to him. Pro Plancio, 26.

statesmen should neglect the knowledge of men, who were the proper instruments with which he was to work: He made it his business therefore to learn the name, the place, and the condition of every eminent Citizen; what estate, what friends, what neighbours he had; and could readily point out their several houses, as he travelled through Italy^a.

He was now in his thirty-seventh year (683) when he was declared Ædile (as he was before elected Quæstor) by the unanimous suffrage of all the Tribes, and preferable to all his competitors.

This Magistracy gave a precedence in the Senate, or a priority of voting and speaking next after the Consuls and Prætors; and was the first that qualified a man to have a picture, or statue of himself, and consequently enobled his family. After Cicero's election to the Ædileship, but before his entrance into the office, he undertook the famed prosecution of C. Verres, the late Prætor of Sicily, which has been already spoken of in the preceding pages of this work^b.

Cic. in Pacem.

Midd. p.
79.

In Verr.
v. 14.

Vid. sup.
p. 226. &
173.

Midd. p.
76.

Vid. de pe-
nit. Coni.
11 Hor.
1 Epist. vi.

^a This knowledge, which is useful in all popular governments, was particularly necessary at Rome; where the people, having much to give, expected to be much courted; and where their high spirits and privileges placed them as much above the rank of all other citizens, as the grandeur of the Republic exceeded that of all other States: so that every one who aspired to any public dignity, kept a slave or two in his family, whose sole business was to learn the names, and know the persons of every Citizen at sight, so as to be able to whisper them to his master as he passed through the streets, that he might be ready to salute them all familiarly, and shake hands with them as his particular acquaintance.

Plutarch says, that the use of these Nomenclators was contrary to the Laws; and that Cato for that reason, in suing for the public offices, would not employ any of them, but took all that trouble upon himself. But that notion is fully confuted by Cicero, who, in his oration for Muræna rallies the absurd rigour of Cato's Stoical principles, and their inconsistency with common life, from the very circumstance of his having a Nomenclator.—"What do you mean, says he, by keeping a Nomenclator? The thing itself is a mere cheat: For if it be your duty to call the citizens by their names, it is a shame for your slave to know them better than yourself.—Why do you not speak to them before he has whispered you? Or, after he has whispered, why do you salute them as if you knew them yourself? Or "when you have gained your election, why do you grow careless about saluting them at all? All this, if examined by the rules of social life, is right; but if by the precepts of your philosophy, very wicked." [Pro Muræna, 36.] As for Cicero himself, whatever pains he is said to have taken in this way, it appears from several passages in his letters that he constantly had a Nomenclator at his elbow on all public occasions. Ad Attic. iv. 1.

^b In the first contest (there mentioned) with Cæcilius, Cicero estimates the damages of the Sicilians at above 800,000 pounds; but this was a computation at large, before he was distinctly informed of the facts: for after he had been in Sicily, and seen what the proofs actually amounted to, he charged them at somewhat less than half that sum; which gave occasion, as Plutarch intimates, to a suspicion of some corruption, or connivance, in Cicero, for suffering so great an abatement of the fine: But, if there was any abatement at all, it must needs have been by the consent of all parties, out of regard, perhaps, to Verres's submission, and shortening the trouble of the prosecutors: For it is certain, that, so far from leaving any imputation of that sort upon Cicero, it highly raised the reputation both of his abilities and integrity, as of one, whom neither money would bribe, nor power terrify, from prosecuting a public oppressor; and the Sicilians ever after retained the highest sense of his services, and, on all occasions, testified the utmost zeal for his person and interests.

Midd. p.
87 Divin.
in Cæcil.

Cic. in Verr. i. 18.

Plut. in Cic.

From

From the conclusion of his orations against Verres [the five last of which were never spoken] we may observe, that Cicero's vigour in this cause had drawn upon him the envy and ill-will of the Nobility : which was so far, however, from moving him, that, in open defiance of it, he declares, That the Nobles were natural enemies to the virtue and industry of all new men ; and, as if they were of another race and species, could never be reconciled, or induced to favour them by any observance of good offices whatever : That for his part therefore, like many others before him, he would pursue his own course, and make his way to the favour of his People, and the honours of the State, by his diligence and faithful services, without regarding the quarrels to which he might expose himself. That if in this trial the Judges did not answer the good opinion which he had conceived of them, he was resolved to prosecute, not only those who were actually guilty of corruption, but those too who were privy to it : and if any should be so audacious as to attempt by power or artifice to influence the bench, and screen the criminal, he would call him to answer for it before the People, and shew himself more vigorous in pursuing him, than he had been even in prosecuting Verres.

From the impeachment of Verres, Cicero entered upon the ^a Ædileship, [year of Rome 684] and after the usual interval of two years from Midd.

p. 111.
In Verr.
v. 14.

^a In one of his speeches he gives us a short account of the duty of it ; “ I am now chosen Ædile,” says he, “ and am sensible of what is committed to me by the Roman People : I am to exhibit with the greatest solemnity the most sacred sports of Ceres, Liber, and Libera ; am to appease and conciliate the mother Flora to the People and City of Rome, by the celebration of the public games ; am to furnish out those ancient shews, the first, which were called Roman, with all possible dignity and religion, in honour of Jupiter, Juno, Minerva ; am to take care also of all the sacred edifices, and indeed of the whole City,” &c. The People were passionately fond of all these games and diversions ; and the public allowance for them being but small, according to the frugality of the old Republic, the Ædiles supplied the rest at their own cost, and were often ruined by it. For every part of the empire was ransacked for what was rare and curious, to adorn the splendour of their shews : The Forum in which they were exhibited was usually beautified with porticos, built for the purpose, and filled with the choicest statues and pictures which Rome and Italy afforded. Cicero reproaches Appius for draining Greece and the islands of all their furniture of this kind, for the ornament of his Ædileship : And Verres is said to have supplied his friends Hortensius and Metellus with all the fine statues of which he had plundered the provinces.

Several of the greatest men of Cicero's time had distinguished themselves by an extraordinary expence and magnificence in this Magistracy ; Lucullus, Scaurus, Lentulus, Hortensius, and C. Antonius ; who, though expelled so lately from the Senate, entertained the City this year with stage-plays, whose scenes were covered with silver ; in which he was followed afterwards by Murena ; yet J. Cæsar outdid them all ; and, in the sports exhibited for his father's funeral, made the whole furniture of the theatre of solid silver, so that wild beasts were then first seen to tread on that metal. Cicero observed the rule which he prescribed afterwards to his son, of an expence agreeable to his circumstances, so as neither to hurt his character by a sordid illiberality, nor his fortunes by a vain ostentation of magnificence ; since the one, by making a man odious, deprives him of the power of doing good ; the other, by making him necessitous, puts him under the temptation of doing ill.

Pro Dom.
ad Pont.
43.

Asconius.

De Off. ii.
16.

Pro Mu-
ræna.

Plin. Hist.
N. xxxiii.

3.

De Off. ii.
17.

Vid. supra.
P. 217.
Midd.
P. 121.

the time of his being chosen Ædile, he offered himself a candidate for the Prætorship, but the City was in such a ferment all this summer [A. U. 686] that there was like to be no election at all: the occasion of it arose from the publication of some new Laws, which were utterly disliked, and fiercely opposed by the SENATE. The first of them was that of Gabinus, in favour of Pompey. The consequences of this motion have been already related.

A second Law was published by L. Otbo, for the assignment of distinct seats in the theatres to the Equestrian order, who used before to sit promiscuously with the populace^a.

Dio,
l. xxxvi.
c. 18.
Pro Mu-
ren. 23.
Midd.
P. 122.

C. Cornelius also, another Tribune, was pushing forward a third Law, of a graver kind, to prohibit bribery in elections, by the sanction of the severest penalties: The rigour of it highly displeased the SENATE, whose warm opposition raised great disorders in the City; so that all other business was interrupted, the elections of Magistrates adjourned, and the Consuls forced to have a guard. The matter, however, was compounded, by moderating the severity of the penalties in a new Law offered by the Consuls, which was accepted by Cornelius, and enacted in proper form, under the title of the Calpurnian Law, from the name of the Consul, C. Calpurnius Piso. Cicero speaks of it still as rigorously drawn; for, besides a pecuniary fine, it rendered the guilty incapable of any public office, or place in the Senate. This Cornelius seems to have been a brave and honest Tribune: He published another Law, to prohibit any man's being absolved from the obligation of the Laws, except by the authority of the People; which part of the old constitution had long been usurped by the SENATE, who dispensed with the Laws by their own decrees, and those often made clandestinely, when a few only were privy to them. The SENATE, being resolved not to part with so valuable a privilege, prevailed with another Tribune to inhibit the publication of it when it came to be read; upon which Cornelius took the book from the clerk, and read it himself. This was irregular, and much inveighed against as a violation of the rights of the Tribunate; so that Cornelius was once more forced

Pro Mu-
ren. 19.

^a By this Law, fourteen rows of benches, next to those of the Senators, were to be appropriated to their use; by which he secured to them, as Cicero says, both their dignity and their pleasure. The Senate obtained the same privilege of separate seats, one hundred and twenty seven years before, in the second Consulship of Scipio Africanus (A. U. 559) which highly disgusted the People, and gave occasion (says Livy) as all innovations are apt to do, to much debate and censure; for many of the wiser sort condemned all such distinction in a free City, as dangerous to the public peace: and Scipio himself afterwards repented, and blamed himself for suffering it. Pro Cornel. i. Fragment. ex Asconio. [Liv. l. xxxiv. 54.] Val. Max ii. 4. Otbo's Law, we may imagine, gave still greater offence, as it was a greater affront to the People to be removed yet farther from what of all things they were fondest of, the sight of plays and shows: It was carried, however, by the authority of the Tribune, and is frequently referred to by the Classic writers, as an act very memorable, and what made much noise in its time. Hor. Ep. iv. 15. Juv. iii. 159.

to compound the matter by a milder Law, forbidding the SENATE to pass Asc. Arg. pro Corn. any such decrees, unless when two hundred Senators were present. These disturbances, however, proved the occasion of an unexpected honour to Cicero, by giving him a more ample and public testimony of the People's affection; for in three different Assemblies convened for the choice of Prætors, two of which were dissolved without effect, he was declared every time the first Prætor, by the suffrages of all the Centuries. Pro Leg. Manil. 1.

Cicero's conduct, during his Prætorship^b, in the affair of the Manilian Law, has been already related. Vid. supr. p. 222.

When his Magistracy was just at an end, Manilius, whose Tribune Midd. p. 130. expired a few days before, was accused before him of rapine and extortion; and though ten days were always allowed to the criminal, to prepare for his defence, he appointed the very next day for the trial. This startled and offended the Citizens, who generally favoured Manilius, and looked upon the prosecution as the effect of malice and resentment, on the part of the Senate, for his Law in favour of Pompey. The Tribunes therefore called Cicero to an account before the People, for treating Manilius so roughly; who, in defence of himself, said, that as it had been his prac-

Midd. p. 124. In Verr. Act. i. 8. Pro Corn. i. Fragm. Pro Rabi. Post. iv. Brut. 252.

^a The business of the Prætors was to preside and judge in all causes, especially of a public or criminal kind, where their several jurisdictions were assigned to them by lot: And it fell to Cicero to sit upon actions of extortion and rapine, brought against Magistrates and Governors of provinces; in which, as he tells us himself, he had acted as an Accuser, sat as a Judge, and presided as Prætor. In this office he acquired a great reputation of integrity by the condemnation of Licinius Macer, a person of Prætorian dignity and great eloquence, who would have made an eminent figure at the bar, if his abilities had not been sullied by the infamy of a vicious life. "This man," as Plutarch relates it, "depending upon his interest, and the influence of Crassus, who supported him with all his power, was so confident of being acquitted, that, without waiting for sentence, he went home to dress himself; and, as if already absolved, was returning towards the court in a white gown, but being met on his way by Crassus, and informed, that he was condemned by the unanimous suffrage of the bench, he took to his bed, and died immediately." The story is told differently by other writers: "That Macer was actually in the court expecting the issue; but perceiving Cicero ready to give judgment against him, he sent one to let him know that he was dead, and stopping his breath at the same time with a handkerchief, instantly expired; so that Val. Max. "Cicero did not proceed to sentence, by ix. 12. "which Macer's estate was saved to his son Plut. Cic. "Licinius Calvus," an orator afterwards of the first merit and eminence. But from Cicero's own account it appears, that, after treating Macer in the trial with great candour and equity, he actually condemned him with the universal approbation of the People.

^b Though he had full employment as Prætor, both in the affairs of State and Public trials, yet he found time still to act the Advocate, as well as the Judge, and not only to hear causes in his own Tribunals, but to plead them also at the Tribunals of the other Prætors. He now defended A. Cluentius, a Roman Knight of splendid family and fortunes, accused, before the Prætor, Q. Nasa, of poisoning his father-in-law, Oppianicus, who, a few years before, had been tried and banished for an attempt to poison Cluentius. The oration, which is extant, lays open a scene of such complicated villainy, by poisons, murder, incest, suborning witnesses, corrupting Judges, as the poets themselves have never feigned in any one family; all contrived by the mother of Cluentius, against the life and fortunes of her son. Ad Att. i. 4. Pro Cluent.

He is supposed to have defended several other criminals this year, tho' the pleadings are now lost, and particularly M. Fundanius.

tice to treat all criminals with humanity, so he had no design of acting otherwise by Manilius, but, on the contrary, had appointed that short day for the trial, because it was the only one of which he was master; and that it was not the part of those, who wished well to Manilius, to throw off the cause to another Judge. This made a wonderful change in the minds of the audience, who, applauding his conduct, desired, that he would undertake the defence of Manilius, to which he consented, and stepping up again into the Rostra, laid open the source of the whole affair, with many severe reflections upon the enemies of Pompey. The trial, however, was dropped on account of the tumults ^a which arose immediately after in the City, from some new incidents of much greater importance.

Plut. in Cic.

Midd.

p. 132.
Pro Mu-
ren. ii.

Vid. supr.
p. 168.

In Ver.
v. 70.

Ad Att.
i. 1.
Midd.
p. 134.

Cicero, at the expiration of his Prætorship, would not accept any foreign province, the usual reward of that Magistracy.—The glory which he pursued, was to shine in the eyes of the City. And he was now preparing to sue for the Consulship, the great object of all his hopes; and his whole attention was employed how to obtain it in his proper year, and without a repulse. Two years were to intervene [contrary to Sylla's Law] between the Prætorship and Consulship; the first of which was usually spent in forming a general interest, and soliciting for it, as it were, in a private manner; the second, in suing for it openly, in the proper form and habit of a candidate. The affection of the City, so signally declared for him in all the inferior steps of honour, gave him a strong presumption of success in his present pretensions to the highest: but as he had reason to apprehend a great opposition from the Nobility, he looked upon the public dignities as a kind of birthright, and could not brook their being intercepted, and snatched from them by new men: so he resolved to put it out of their power to hurt him, by omitting no pains which could be required of a candidate of visiting and soliciting all the Citizens in person. At the election therefore of the Tribunes on the sixteenth of July [688] where the whole City was assembled in the field of Mars, he chose to make his first effort, and to mix himself with the croud, on purpose to caress and salute them familiarly by name: And as soon as there was any vacation in the Forum, which happened usually in August, he intended to make an excursion into the Cisalpine Gaul, and, in the character of a Lieutenant to Piso, the governor of it, to visit the towns and colonies of that province, which was reckoned very strong in the number of its votes, and so return to Rome in January following.

He wrote about the same time ^b to Atticus, then at Athens, to desire him to engage all that band of Pompey's dependants, who were serving under ^a This relates to a conspiracy said to have been formed at this time against the State, of which more hereafter.

^b Cicero was now engaged in the defence of

C. Cornelius, who was accused and tried for practices against the State in his late Tribunate, before the Prætor Q. Gallius. This trial, which lasted four days, was one of the most important.

Midd.
p. 137.

under him in the Mitbridatic war, and by way of jest, bids him tell Pompey himself, that he would not take it ill of him, if he did not come in person to his election.

Cicero being now in his forty-third year, the proper age required by Law, declared himself a candidate for the Consulship, with six competitors; P. Sulpicius Galba, L. Sergius Catilina, C. Antonius, L. Cassius Longinus, Q. Cornificius, and C. Licinius Sacerdos. The two first were Patricians; the two next, Plebeians. yet Noble^a; the two last, the sons of fathers, who had first imported the public honours into their families: Cicero was the only new man among them, or one born of Equestrian rank. Cornificius and Galba were persons of great virtue and merit; Sacerdos without any particular blemish upon him; Cassius lazy and weak, but not thought so wicked as he soon after appeared to be; Antonius and Catiline, though infamous in their lives and characters, yet by intrigue and faction had acquired a powerful interest in the City, and joined all their forces against Cicero, as their most formidable Antagonist, in which they were vigorously supported by Crassus and Cæsar.

This was the state of the competition, in which the practice of bribing was carried on so openly and shamefully, by Antonius and Catiline, that the Senate thought it necessary to give some check to it, by a new and more rigorous Law; but when they were proceeding to publish it, L. Mucius Orestinus, one of the Tribunes, put his negative upon them.

As the election of Consuls approached, Cicero's interest appeared to be superior to that of all the candidates: For the Nobles themselves, though always envious, and desirous to depress him, yet out of regard to the dangers which threatened the City from many quarters, and seemed ready to burst out into a flame, began to think him the only man qualified to pre-important in which he had ever been concerned: The two Consuls presided in it, and all the chiefs of the Senate, Q. Catulus, L. Lucullus, Hortensius, &c. appeared as witnesses against the criminal; whom Cicero defended, as Quintilian says, not only with strong but shining arms, and with a force of eloquence that drew acclamations from the people. [N. B. The names of the witnesses are sufficient to make us know the real Crimes of Cornelius, if we only turn back to the Laws he had published when Tribune, p. 282.]

He published two orations spoken in this cause, whose loss is a public detriment to the literary world, since they were reckoned among the most finished of his compositions: He himself refers to them as such; and the old critics have drawn many examples from them of that genuine eloquence, which extorts applause, and excites admiration.

C. Papius, one of the Tribunes, published a Law this year to oblige all strangers to quit the City, as one of his predecessors, Pennus, had done likewise many years before him: The reason which they alledge for it was the confusion occasioned by the multitude, and insolence of foreigners, who assumed the habit, and usurped the rights of Citizens: But Cicero condemns all these Laws as cruel and inhospitable, and a violation of the Laws of nature and humanity.

^a Many of the Plebeians surpassed the Patricians themselves in point of Nobility: For the character of Nobility was wholly derived from the Curule Magistracies which any family had borne. Vid. Ascon. Arg. in Teg. candid.

Ascon.
Arg. lib.
viii.

Orat. 67.
70.

Philip.
v. 17.
Midd.
p. 140.

Ascon.
Argum. in Teg.
Cand.

Midd.
p. 145.

De Off. iii.
11.

serve the Republic, and break the cabals of the desperate, by the vigour and prudence of his administration : For, in cases of danger, as Sallust observes, pride and envy naturally subside, and yield the post of honour to virtue. The method of chusing Consuls was not by an open vote, but by a kind of baliot, or little tickets of wood, distributed to the Citizens, with the names of the candidates severally subscribed upon each : But in Cicero's case, the People were not content with this secret and silent way of testifying their inclinations ; but, before they came to any scrutiny, loudly and universally proclaimed Cicero : be first Consul ; so that, as he himself declared, in his speech to them after his election, he was not chosen by the votes of particular Citizens, but the common suffrage of the City ; nor declared by the voice of the crier, but of the whole Roman People. He was the only new man,^{*} who had obtained this sovereign dignity, or, as he expresses it, had forced the intrenchments of the Nobility for forty years past, from the first Consulship of C. Marius, and the only one likewise who had ever obtained it in his proper year, or without a repulse.

De Leg.
Agr. con.
Rull. ii. 2.
In Pison. i.

De Leg.
Agr. ib.
1, 2.

Antonius was chosen his colleague, by the majority of a few Centuries, above his friend and partner Catiline.

Cicero's first care, after his election^{*}, was to gain the good-will of his colleague, and to draw him from his old engagements to the interest of the Aristocratical Faction [which our orator calls the Republic.] To this end, he tempted him with a kind of argument, that seldom fails of its effect with men of Antonius's character, the offer of power to his ambition, and of money to his pleasures : In short, a bargain was presently agreed upon between them, that Antonius should have the best of the provinces, which had been assigned to the Consuls of this year.—By which address, Cicero gained him so entirely, as to have him ever after obsequious to his will.

Sall. Bell.
Cat. 26.

In Pison.
iii.
Midd.
p. 152.

In Cat. iv.
10.

There was another project which he had likewise much at heart, to unite the Equestrian order with the Senate into one common party and interest. This body of men, next to the Senators, consisted of the richest [and most knavish] Citizens of Rome, who, being the constant farmers of all the revenues of the empire, had a great part of the inferior People dependent upon them. Cicero imagined, that the united weight of these two orders [Conspiratio omnium BONORUM] would always be an over-balance to any other power in the State, and a secure barrier against any attempts of the POPULAR [whether men of inordinate ambition, or true Republicans, friends of the old constitution, upon the usurped prerogatives of the Senate.] He was the Ad Att.

i. 6.
Ibid. p. 3.

^{*} Cicero's father died this year (689) on the 24th of November. In this year also, most probably, Cicero gave his daughter Tullia in marriage, at the age of thirteen, to C. Piso Frugi, a young Nobleman of great hopes, and one of the best families in Rome : It is certain, at least, that his son was born in this same year, for he tells us it was in the Consulship of L. Julius Cæsar and C. Marcius Figulus. Ad Att. i. 2.

only man in the City capable of effecting such a coalition, being now at the head of the Senate, yet the darling of the Knights, who considered him as the pride and ornament of their order; whilst he, to ingratiate himself the more with them, affected always in public to boast of that extraction, and to call himself an Equestrian; and made it his special care to protect them [right or wrong, as we shall see hereafter] in all their affairs, and to advance their credit and interest: so that, as some writers tell us, it was the authority of his Consulship, that first distinguished and established them into a third order of the State. The policy was certainly very good, with respect to Cicero's views; for through the year of his Consulship, he had the whole body of Knights at his devotion, who, with Atticus at their head, constantly attended his orders, and served as a guard to his person: And if the same maxim had been pursued by all succeeding Consuls, it might probably have preserved the liberty of the Republic [i. e. the anticonstitutional usurped power of the Senate] from being so soon overthrown.

Plin. Hist. Nat. l. xxxiii. 2.

Ad Att. ii. 1.

The Tribunes entered always into their office on the tenth of December; the Consuls on the first of January. A little before Cicero's inauguration, P. Servilius Rullus, one of the new Tribunes, had been alarming the Senate with the promulgation of an Agrarian Law. The purpose of it was, to create a Decemvirate, or ten commissioners, with absolute power for five years over all the revenues of the Republic; to distribute them at pleasure to the Citizens; to sell and buy what lands they thought fit; to determine the rights of the present possessors; to require an account from all the Generals abroad, excepting Pompey, of the spoils taken in their wars; to settle colonies wherever they judged proper, and particularly at Capua; and, in short, to command all the money and forces of the empire.

Midd. p. 153--161.

The publication of a Law, conferring powers so excessive, gave a just alarm to all who wished well to the public tranquillity. As soon therefore as Cicero was invested with his new dignity, he raised the spirits of the SENATE, by assuring them of his resolution to oppose the Law, and all its abettors, to the utmost of his power; nor suffer the Senate to be hurt, or its liberties to be impaired, while the administration continued in his hands. From the SENATE he pursued the Tribune into his own dominion, the Forum; where, in an artful and elegant speech from the Rostra, he gave such a turn to the inclination of the People, that they rejected this Agrarian Law with as much eagerness, as they had ever before received one.

Contr. Rull. ii. 37.

He began, "By acknowledging the extraordinary obligation he had received from them, in preference and opposition to the Nobility; declaring himself the creature of their power, and of all men the most engaged to promote their interests; that they were to look upon him as the truly popular Magistrate; nay, that he had declared, even in the SENATE, that he would be the PEOPLE'S CONSUL." He then fell into a commendation of the Gracchi, whose name was extremely dear to them, professing, telling, " That he could not be against all Agrarian Laws, when he recollected, that those TWO MOST EXCELLENT MEN, who had the greatest love for the Roman People, had divided the public lands to the Citizens ; that he was not one of those Consuls, who thought it a crime to praise the Gracchi, on whose counsels, wisdom, and laws, many parts of the present government were founded : That his quarrel was to the particular Law, which, instead of being popular, or adapted to the true interest of the City, was, in reality, the establishment of a tyranny, and a creation of ten kings to domineer over them all." This he displays at large, from the natural effect of that power which was granted by it ; and proceeds to insinuate, that it was covertly levelled at their favourite Pompey, and particularly contrived to retrench and insult his authority. " Forgive me, Citizens, for my calling so often upon SO GREAT A NAME : you yourselves imposed the task upon me, when I was Prætor, to join with you in defending his dignity, as far as I was able : I have hitherto done all that I could do ; not moved to it by my private friendship for the man, nor by any hopes of honour, and of this supreme Magistracy, which I obtained from you, though with HIS APPROBATION, yet without his help.

Ibid. 3.

 Since then I perceive this Law to be designed, as a kind of engine, to overturn HIS POWER, I will resist the attempts of these men ; and, as I myself clearly see what they are aiming at, so I will take care that you also shall see, and be convinced of it too." He then shews, " how the Law, though it excepted Pompey from being accountable to the Decemvirate, yet excluded him from being one of the number, by limiting the choice to those who were present at Rome ; that he subjected likewise to their jurisdiction the countries just conquered by him, which had always been left to the management of the General : " Upon which he draws a pleasant picture of the Tribune Rullus, with all his train of Officers, Guards, Lictors, and Apparitors, swaggering in Mitbridates's kingdom, and ordering Pompey to attend him by a mandatory letter in the following strain :

" P. Servilius Rullus, Tribune of the People, Decemvir, to Cneus Pom- pey, the son of Cneus, greeting.
 (" He will not add the title of GREAT, when he has been labouring to take it from him by Law.)

" I require you not to fail to come presently to Sinope, and bring me a sufficient guard with you, while I sell those lands by my law, which you have gained by your valour."

He observes, " That the reason of excepting Pompey was not from any respect to him, but for fear he should not submit to the indignity of being accountable to their will : But Pompey (says he) is a man of that temper, that he thinks it his duty to bear what you please to impose ; but if there be any thing which you cannot bear yourselves, he will take care

" that

“ that you shall not bear it long against your wills.” He proceeds to enlarge “ upon the dangers which this Law threatened to their liberties : that, instead of any good intended by it to the body of the Citizens, its purpose was to erect a power for the oppression of them ; and, on pretence of planting colonies in Italy and the provinces, to settle their own creatures and dependants, like so many garrisons, in all the convenient post of the empire, to be ready on all occasions to support their tyranny : That Capua was to be their head-quarters, their favourite colony ; of all cities the proudest, as well as the most hostile and dangerous, in which the wisdom of their ancestors would not suffer the shadow of any power or magistracy to remain : yet now it was to be cherished and advanced to another Rome : That by this Law the lands of Campania were to be sold or given away, the most fruitful of all Italy, the surest revenue of the Republic, and their constant resource when all other rents failed them ; which neither the Gracchi, who, of all men, studied the People’s benefit the most, nor Sylla, who gave every thing away without scruple, durst venture to meddle with.” In the conclusion he takes notice “ of the great favour and approbation with which they had heard him, as a sure omen of their common peace and prosperity ; and acquaints them with the concord that he had established with his colleague, as a piece of news of all other the most agreeable, and promises all security to the Republic, if they would but shew the same good disposition on future occasions, which they had signified on that day ; and that he would make those very men, who had been the most envious and averse to his advancement, confess, that the People had seen farther, and judged better than they, in chusing him for their Consul.”

Contr.
Rull. 28.
32.

Ib. 29.

In the course of this contest, he often called upon the Tribunes to come into the Rostra, and debate the matter with him before the People ; but they thought it more prudent to decline the challenge, and attack him rather by sedulously insinuating to the multitude, that his opposition to the Law flowed from no good-will to them, but an affection to Sylla’s party, and to secure to them the lands which they possessed by his grant ; that he was making his court by it to the seven tyrants, as they called seven of the principal Senators, who were known to be the greatest favourers of Sylla’s cause, and the greatest gainers by it ; the two Lucullus’s, Crassus, Catulus, Hortensius, Metellus, Philippus. These insinuations made so great an impression on the City, that he found it necessary to defend himself against them in a second speech to the People, in which he declared, “ That he looked upon the Law, which ratified all Sylla’s acts, to be of all Laws the most wicked, and the most unlike to a true Law, as it established a

^a Is it possible to observe the many strokes of flattery to Pompey in this speech without feeling an utter contempt for the speaker, a Patriot Consul ?

“ tyranny in the City; yet, that it had some excuse from the times, and, in “ their present circumstances, seemed proper to be supported; especially by HIM,
 “ who, for this year of his Consulship, professed himself the patron of peace;
 “ but that it was the height of impudence in Rullus, to charge him with “ obstructing their interests for the sake of Sylla's grants, when the very “ Law, which that Tribune was then urging, actually established and per- “ petuated those grants, and shewed itself to be drawn by a son-in-law “ of Valerius, who possessed more lands than any other man by that “ invidious tenure, which were all by this Law to be partly confirmed,
 “ and partly purchased of him.” This he demonstrates from the express words of the Law “ which he had studiously omitted (he says) to take “ notice of before, that he might not revive old quarrels, or move any “ argument of new dissention in a season so improper: That Rullus, there- “ fore, who accused him of defending Sylla's acts, was, of all others, the “ most impudent defender of them: For none had ever affirmed them to be good
 “ and legal, but to have some plea only from possession, and the public quiet;
 “ But by this Law the estates, that had been granted by them, were to “ be fixed upon a better foundation, than any other estates whatsoever.”
 He concludes, “ by renewing his challenge to the Tribunes to come and “ dispute with him to his face.” But after several fruitless attempts, finding themselves wholly unable to contend with him, they were forced at last to submit, and to let the affair drop, to the great joy of the SENATE.

• Vid. sup.
p. 282.

This alarm being over, another accident broke out, which might have endangered the peace of the City, if the effects of it had not been prevented by the authority of Cicero. Otho's Law, mentioned above, for the assignment of *separate seats for the Equestrian order, had highly offended the People, who could not digest the indignity of being thrust so far back from their diversions; and while the grudge was still fresh, Otho, happening to come into the theatre, was received by the Populace with an universal hiss, but by the Knights with loud applause and clapping: Both sides redoubled their clamour with great fierceness, and from reproaches were proceeding to blows, till Cicero, informed of the tumult, came immediately to the theatre, and calling the People out into the temple of Bel- lona, so tamed and stung them with power of his words^b, and made them so ashamed

^b The speech was soon after published, tho' from the nature of the thing it must have been made upon the spot, and flowed extempore from the occasion; and as it was much read and admired for several ages after, as a memorable instance of Cicero's command over men's passions, so some have imagined it to be alluded to in that beautiful passage of Virgil:

Ac Velati magno in populo cum saepe coorta est
Seditio, saxitque animis ignobile vulgus;
Tanque facies & saxa volant, furor arma ministrat:

ashamed of their folly and perverseness, that, on their return to the theatre, they turned their hisses into applauses, and vied with the Knights themselves in demonstrations of their respect to Otho.

There happened about the same time a third instance, not less remarkable, of Cicero's great power of persuasion. Sylla had, by an express law, excluded the children of the proscribed from the Senate, and all public honours; which was certainly an act of great violence, and the decree rather of a tyrant than the Law of a free State: So that the persons injured by it, who were many, and of great families, were now making all their efforts to get it reversed. Their petition was highly equitable, but, by Cicero and the Aristocratical faction, censured as highly unreasonable, in the present disorders of the City: And why? Because, without question, the first use, that they would naturally make of the recovery of their privileges, would be to revenge themselves on their oppressors. It was Cicero's business, therefore, to prevent that inconvenience, and, as far as it was possible, with the consent of the sufferers themselves: On which occasion this great commander of the human affections, as Quintilian calls him, found means to persuade those unfortunate men, that to bear their injury was their benefit; and that the government itself could not stand, if Sylla's Laws were then repealed, on which the quiet and order of the public were established.—The three cases just mentioned make Pliny break out into a kind of rapturous admiration of the man, who could persuade the People to give up their bread, their pleasure, and their injuries, to the charms of his eloquence.

Another

*Tum pietate gravem & meritis si forte virum quem
Appetere, silent, arrectisque auribus adstant;
Ille regit dictis animos, & pectora muket.*

VIRG. ÆN. i. 152

As when sedition fires th'ignoble croud,
And the wild rabble storms and thirsts for blood;
Of stones and brands a mingled tempest flies,
With all the sudden arms that rage supplies:
If some grave sire appears amidst the strife,
In morals strict and innocence of life,
All stand attentive, while the sage controuls
Their Wrath, and calms the tempest of their souls.

MR. PITT.

Macrob. Sat. ii. 10. One topic, which Cicero touched in the speech, and the only one of which we have any hint from antiquity, was to reproach the rioters for their want of taste and good sense, in making such a disturbance while Roicius was acting.

* This last mentioned effect of Cicero's eloquence, must surely appear to an unprejudiced reader as incredible, as it is extraordinary. Did Cicero, to induce the petitioners to withdraw their petition, employ the same arguments which swayed him to oppose it? Did he say to them, You had better desist from your pursuit: For should you obtain a restoration of your privileges, you would naturally make use of the grant to revenge yourselves on your oppressors? In a speech, made several years afterwards, he declared, that he had excluded from honours a number of brave and honest young men, whom fortune had thrown into so unhappy a situation, that if they had obtained power, they would probably have employed it to the ruin of

In Pison.

• Per duellio.

Vid. supr.
p. 94. ad
ann. 653.

Vid. Vol.
I ad ann.
189.

Another transaction of moment in which he was engaged, a little before the last mentioned, was the defence of C. Rabirius, a Senator, accused by the Tribune Labienus, of treason * or rebellion, for having killed L. Saturninus, a Tribune, about thirty-seven years before, who had caused a dangerous sedition in the City. The fact, if true, had been done in consequence of a decree of the Senate, by which all the Citizens were required to take arms in aid of the Consuls C. Marius, and L. Flaccus.

It is highly probable, that to punish Rabirius was not the thing aimed at^d; (nor to vindicate the character or proceedings of Saturninus;) but to attack that assumed prerogative of the Senate, by which, in the case of a sudden commotion, they used to arm the City at once, by requiring the Consuls to take care, the Republic received no detriment: Which vote, it was pretended, gave a sanction to every thing that was done in consequence of it. The practice of thus investing the Magistrates with so extraordinary a power commenced in the early times of the Republic; and tho' the first instance of it was on the occasion of a great and sudden danger from a foreign enemy, the example was afterwards followed in cases of domestic feuds and disturbances, but had been always complained of by the Tribunes as an infringement of the constitution, by giving to the Senate an arbitrary power over the lives of the Citizens, which could not legally be taken away without a hearing and judgment of the whole People: And, indeed, experience had shewed, that by such a vote the Tribunes themselves, whose persons the Laws had made sacred, were exposed to be cut off without sentence or trial, and even when engaged in the most laudable measures for the public good.

This point, therefore, was to be tried on the person of Rabirius. The Duoviri, or two Judges for this trial, according to Suetonius, were drawn the State. Supposing this to have been Cicero's opinion, that they would have so employed their power—Did he deliver this opinion to them as the reason of his opposing their request?

Or did he tell them, that their injury was their benefit; for that the government itself could not stand, if Sylla's iniquitous Law relating to them were repealed? Would it not have been a most intolerable impertinence (not to say impudence) after Pompey had repealed the most material and important of all Sylla's Laws, without ruining the State, or doing it any real mischief, to speak of the quiet and order of the Republic, as depending on the maintenance of Sylla's Laws? (many of which, beside the law relating to the Tribunes, had without ceremony, or any inconvenience, been violated.) Doubtless, if the petitioners were prevailed upon by words to desist a while from their pursuit, it must have been by a promise to do them justice, so soon as the present alarm, caused by the rumour of a dreadful conspiracy, should be over.

^d Jus omne retinendæ majestatis Rabirii causa continebatur. [Cic. in Oratore.] Non enim C. Rabirium culpa delicti, non invidia, vitæque turpitudine, non denique veteres, juste gravesque inimicitie civium, in discrimen capitis vocaverunt: Sed ut illum summum auxilium majestatis, atque imperii, quod nobis a majoribus est traditum, de Republica tolleretur! ut nihil posthac auctoritas Senatus, nihil consulare imperium, nihil consensio bonorum contra pestem ac perniciem Civitatis valeret. Cic. pro Rab. c. 1.

by by lot, and C. Julius Cæsar, who, the same author tells us, had instigated * Labienus to begin the prosecution, happened to be one of the two : Lucius J. Cæsar was the other, according to Dio, who reports that they were both named by the Prætor †. Hortensius pleaded the cause of the accused, and proved (as Cicero affirms) by many witnesses, that Saturninus was actually killed by the hand of a slave, who, for that service, obtained his freedom from the Republic. The Judges, however, condemned Rabirius; whereupon he appealed from their sentence to the PEOPLE. Cicero pleaded his cause before the Centuries, but was not suffered, by the prosecutor, to speak above half an hour. He opened the defence with great gravity, declaring, “ that in the memory of man there had not “ been a cause of such importance, either undertaken by a Tribune, or

Midd. p.
164.

* By some passages in Cic. pro Rabir. it appears, that Labienus pretended at least to commence the prosecution, in order to revenge the death of his uncle, who was slain in company with Saturninus.

In this affair there were two circumstances which deserve Notice. The first is, that Saturninus, after he had surrendered himself, was killed, contrary to the will of the Consul Marius, and in violation of the public faith, pledged to him by Marius. Now unless the extraordinary commission of Dent operam, &c. from the Senate to the Consuls, empowered them only to kill, not to spare, Marius was free to pledge the public faith to Saturninus; and when that had been done, it was highly criminal in any private Citizen to kill him, how flagitious soever his conduct had been. It appears, that Labienus had urged this in his accusation: For Cicero thus answers: “ If, as you have very often affirmed, “ any promise of indemnity were made to “ Saturninus, they were made, not by Rabirius, but by Marius, and, if they were “ broken, that breach is to be imputed to “ him. What promise could pass? Who could “ make any promise but by a resolution of “ the Senate? Are you so much a stranger to “ this City? Are you so very ignorant of our “ government and constitution, as to be ignorant of that?” &c.

The force of this answer I shall leave to the readers consideration.

The other circumstance (of which Cicero takes no notice) is, that Rabirius carried about, from house to house, in a triumphant and most insulting manner, the head of Saturninus; which proceeding ought naturally to make Rabirius be considered as more maliciously concerned, than any other person in the murder. Marius senatus consulto armatus Saturninum & Glauciam in Capitolium persecutus obsedit. — in deditionem accepit: nec deditis fides servata — Caput ejus [Saturnini] Rabirius quidam Senator per convivia in ludibrium circumtulit. Aurel. Viét. cap. 73.

† M. Crevier, to reconcile, as well as he can, these differing accounts, conjectures, that the two Judges were drawn by lot, by a Prætor.

The Jesuit Catrou writes, that though “ it properly belonged to the Duumviri to try the cause in the first instance, it was brought before the Prætor, and Cæsar got himself nominated to be one of the Prætor’s assessors; but that Cicero unriddled the affair, brought the cause before the People, and got Rabirius acquitted.” Now both Suetonius and Dio agree in this, that the accused brought the affair by appeal, before the PEOPLE: Neither of them say that he was acquitted. Nay, Dio says, he would certainly have been condemned, if any sentence had been given; which, if true, it is hard to guess what Suetonius means by saying, that nothing was of so much service to the accused, as his trial before the PEOPLE, as the forward severity of the Judge who had condemned him. [Cæsar] forte judex in reum ductus, tam cupide condemnavit, ut ad populum provocanti nihil æque ac judicis acerbitas presuerit: For it does not appear, that any service was done him, but by the Prætor, who contrived to dissolve the Assembly.

“ defended “ defended by a Consul: That nothing less was meant by it, than that for “ the future there should be no Senate or public council in the City; no “ consent or concurrence of the HONEST, against the rage and rashness of “ the wicked; no resource or refuge in the extreme dangers of the Repub“ lic.—He wishes, that he had been at liberty to contend what Hortensius “ indeed had proved to be false, that Saturninus, the enemy of the Ro“ man People, was killed by the hand of Rabirius. --- That he should “ have proclaimed and boasted of it, as an act that merited reward instead “ of punishment.—Here he was interrupted by the clamour of the oppo“ site faction; but he observes it to be the faint effort of a small part of the “ Assembly; and that the body of the People, who were silent, would never “ have made him Consul, if they had thought him capable of being disturbed by so “ feeble an insult; which he had advised them to drop, since it betrayed only “ their folly, and the inferiority of their numbers^b.—The Assembly being “ quieted, he goes on to declare, that though Rabirius did not kill Satur- “ ninus, yet, together with the Consuls, and all the best of the City, he “ took arms with intent to kill him, to which his honour, virtue, and duty, “ called him.-- That to charge Rabirius with this crime, was to condemn

 “ the greatest and worthiest Citizens whom Rome had ever bred; and tho’
 “ they were all dead, yet the injury was the same to rob them of the honour “ due to their names and memories^c.” To this he added many oratorical flourishes concerning fame and glory and immortality, and in praise of Marius, one of the wisest, as well as bravest of the Roman heroes, whose spirit, worthy for its holiness to be worshipped, he calls to witness how much he thinks himself obliged to vindicate and fight strenuously for the renown of all such meritorious heroes. But all this was to very little purpose, if we may believe Dio; for the People would have condemned the criminal, had not Metellus Celer, at that time Augur and Prætor, contrived by a^d stratagem to dissolve the Assembly before they came to vote: and Labienus

^b It would give great light to the history of these times, if we could know the dates of the publication of Cicero’s speeches. We may well doubt, whether the Orator was really so stout, on this occasion, as he represents himself: His cajoling the multitude by such an extravagant strain of panegyric upon C. Marius [whom at other times he speaks of as the most villainous of all villains] would naturally make one disbelieve his venturing to reproach the popular faction, with the inferiority of their numbers in the present Assembly; and especially if (as Dio reports) they were the majority.

^c There is one particular in Cicero’s speech on this occasion, in which it may, to some readers be difficult to discern the skill of the Orator. His chief purpose, as we have seen, was to maintain that assumed prerogative of the SENATE, whereby, whenever they pleased to think it necessary or convenient, they gave an absolute uncontrollable power to the Consuls, by the vote Dant operam, &c. and yet, in this very oration, he makes a new^e and a fine encomium on Caius Gracchus, who was murdered, together with 3000 Citizens, by the Consul Opimius, in consequence of the Senate’s exerting the said ASSUMED PREROGATIVE.

^e The Assemblies, by Centuries, were in some sense military, the People being under arms, and drawn up in line of battle. They were

^d Vid. sup. p. 288, 289. Vid. Vol. II. B. vi. ch. x.

Labienus did not afterwards revive the prosecution, though he was free to do it^a.

Cicero made a new Law this year to correct the abuse of a privilege, ^{Midd. p. 228.} called Legatio Libera, that is, an honorary legation or embassy, granted arbitrarily by the Senate to any of its members, when they travelled abroad on their private affairs, in order to give them a public character, and a right to be treated as Ambassadors, or Magistrates; which, by the insolence of these great guests, was become a grievous burden upon all the states and cities through which they passed. Cicero's design was to abolish it, but being driven from that ^{DeLeg. iii. 2.} by one of the Tribunes, he was content to restrain the continuance of it, which before was unlimited, to the term of one year.

It was about this time that the news came from the East, of Pompey's having happily finished the long war in that part of the world, by the taking of ^{*Vid. sup. 268.} Jerusalem. The honours decreed him by the Senate, at the motion of Cicero, have been related †; and it is not to be doubted, that the Consul, by his zeal on this occasion, attached to him more firmly than ever Pompey's friends; of whose support, in the exercise of his Magistracy, he foresaw he should very soon stand in need^{†Vid. sup. p. 271.}.

And

were held in the field of Mars without the City, which might, therefore, in the early times, when Rome was weak, and had but a very small territory, be exposed to a sudden incursion of their neighbours: To obviate which danger, a guard was posted, and an ensign planted upon the Janiculum; and these continued there so long as the Assembly lasted, the soldiers, who formed the guard at first, being relieved by others who had given their votes. This precaution was no longer necessary at the time of which we are speaking, but was retained through a superstitious regard to an ancient usage; and the Assembly could decree nothing legally, but while the banner was seen flying. Metellus hastened to the Janiculum, and caused the ensign to be taken down; and the Assembly of course broke up.

^a By the issue of this affair, as well as from the passage above cited [p. 292. note.] of Cicero's speech; it seems reasonable to think, that no design had been formed against the life of Rabirius; and if I might be allowed to hazard a conjecture, concerning the view of the popular faction in this prosecution, I should say, it was to deter the Consul and his friends, in this very time of alarm, from having recourse to the old, but dangerous expedient, of Dedit operam consules, &c. and if Cicero had paid more regard to the admonition, it might have been better for him, and for the public tranquillity.

[†] It has been related above, that Cicero, by a promise to his colleague Antonius, of yielding to him the best of the provinces assigned to them, had engaged him not to obstruct the measures of his administration. It was the custom for the Senate to appoint what particular provinces were to be distributed every year to the several Magistrates, who used afterwards to cast lots for them among themselves; the Prætors for the Prætorian, the Consuls for the Consular provinces. In this partition, therefore, when Macedonia, one of the most desirable governments of the empire, for command and wealth, fell to Cicero's lot, he exchanged it immediately with his colleague for Cisalpine Gaul, which he resigned afterwards to Metellus. Cicero, in a letter to Atticus [Lib. ii. Ep. 1.] mentions an oration he made to the PEOPLE, on occasion of his resigning his pretensions to this province; and speaks of that oration as the sixth of his ten Consular orations. [Sexta cum provinciam in concione deposui.] The two first were against Rullus's Agrarian Law. The third concerning Osbo. The fourth in defence of Rabirius. The fifth concerning the children of the Proscribed.

Y. R. 693. And now he took the opportunity, which his Consular authority gave him, of acquiring the friendship and support of ^a Lucullus, whom probably he thought he might at this time oblige, without disobliging his rival, whose conquests were finished, and whose glory was complete.

Midd. p. 229. Plut. in Luc. Lucullus was soliciting the demand of a triumph for his victories over Mitbridates; in which pursuit he had been obstructed for three years successively by the intrigues of some of the Magistrates, who, by putting this affront upon him, paid their court to Pompey. By the Law and Custom of the Republic, no General, while he was in actual command, could come within the gates of Rome, without forfeiting his commission, and consequently all pretensions to a triumph; so that Lucullus continued all this time in the suburbs, till the affair was decided. The Senate favoured his suit, and were solicitors for him, but could not prevail, till Cicero's authority at last helped to introduce his triumphal car ^b into the City; making him some amends by this service for the injury of the Manilian Law, which had deprived him of his government. After his triumph, he entertained the whole Roman People with a sumptuous feast, and was much caressed by the Nobility, as one whose authority would be a proper check to the ambition and power of Pompey; but having now obtained all the honours, which he could reasonably hope for, and observing the turbulent and distracted state of the City, he withdrew himself, not long after, from public affairs, to spend the remainder of his days in a polite and splendid retreat. He was a generous patron of learning, and himself eminently learned, so that his house was the constant resort of the principal scholars and wits of Greece and Rome; where he had

• Prescribed. The seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth, against Catiline. It was probably, therefore, after his defence of Rabirius, that he made this resignation. At what time he cast lots with his colleague, is not said. By Caius Gracchus's Law relating to the Senate's appointment of the provinces to the Consuls and Prætors, the Senate was annually to name the provinces, before the elections of the Magistrates. [Cic. de Prov. Cons. 2. pro Dom. 9. Sall. de Bell. Jug. xxix. 47.]

^a L. Lucullus cum victor a Mithridatico bello revertisset, inimicorum calumnia triennio tardius, quàm debuerat, triumphavit. Nos enim Consules introduximus pene in urbem curum clarissimi viri: Cujus mihi Consilium & auctoritas quid tum in maximis rebus profuisset, dicerem, nisi de me ipso dicendum esset. Cic. in Luc.

^b The pomp of this triumph was not remarkable for the quantity of spoils, or number of prisoners. The chief fruits of Lucul- lus's victory were in the hands of Pompey. A gold statue of Mitbridates, six feet high, a shield adorned with precious stones, and abundance of gold and silver plate, together with 2,700,000 drachmas in coined silver, were the most shining part of the shew. But Plut. in Luc. there were also written scrolls, on which were set down the sums with which Lucullus had supplied Pompey for the war with the Pirates, and those he had remitted at different times to the Quæstors. He had likewise given 950 drachmas to each of his soldiers. 30 l. 13 s. 6 ½ d.

He gave a feast to the whole People, at which above 100,000 casks (containing twelve gallons each) of Greek wine were consumed. He adorned the public places and buildings with a great number of statues, but the most valuable thing which he brought from the East was the cherry-tree, unknown till then in Europe, but which grew in Pontus without cultivation. Ibid.

provided a well-furnished library, with porticos and galleries annexed, for the convenience of walks and literary conferences, at which he himself used frequently to assist; giving an example to the world of a life truly noble and elegant, if it had not been sullied by too great a tincture of Asiatic softness, and Epicurean luxury.

WE COME NOW to the famed CONSPIRACY, of which Sallust has written the history, and which is the subject of a great part of Cicero's writings. He had intimations of it, in the very beginning of his Magistracy, but it did not break out till towards the end of his year.

In order to a more perfect knowledge of this part of the Roman story, it will be proper to give some account of the life and fortunes of CATILINE, the contriver of the intended mischief, together with a character of the man, as formed upon a view of his conduct prior to that wicked conspiracy; and because the METHOD taken to avert the impending evil was extraordinary, and not universally approved, and was attended with very momentous consequences, it may likewise be proper to acquaint ourselves more particularly, than we have hitherto done, with the principal persons, who, in the Senate, appeared in opposition to each other on this occasion. Sallust mentions but three who made speeches, the Consul Cicero, Cæsar, and Cato. Of the first a good deal has already been said; but we shall become better acquainted with him, by the following brief histories of Cæsar and Catiline till the time of the wicked conspiracy of the latter. And because the histories of these two Romans have in some parts of them, a connexion with each other, it may be best to place them together, immediately before Sallust's account of the discovery of the plot, and give first the history of Cato to that time, which has no connexion, or very little, with either of the other, and is inserted here only to make us know the character he then bore.

MACUS PORCIUS CATO, commonly called Cato Minor, or Cato of Utica, was great grandson of Cato the Censor, and descended from a son which the Censor had, in his old age, by a second wife, the daughter of one of his clients. Cato of Utica had, by both father and mother's side, one sister, named Porcia. His mother, by a former marriage, had a son, whose name was Servilius Cæpio (for whom Cato's fraternal affection was not less remarkable than that of Lucullus for his brother) and several daughters, of whom the most known was the mother of Brutus.^b

It is said of Cato, that, from his infancy, he discovered by his speech, his countenance, and even his childish sports and recreations, an inflexibility of mind; for he would force himself to go through with whatever he had undertaken, though the task was ill suited to his strength: He was

^b All these lived together, and were bred up in the house of Livius Drusus, their uncle by their mother, a man of weight in the government at that time.
VOL. III.

rough towards those that flattered him, and quite untractable when threatened; was rarely seen to laugh, or even to smile; not easily provoked to anger, but, if once incensed, hard to be pacified.

Plut. in Cat.

Sylla, having had a friendship with the father of Cato, sent often for him and his brother, and talked familiarly with them. Cato, who was then about fourteen years of age, seeing the heads of great men brought thither, and observing the sighs of those that were present, asked his Præceptor, Why does nobody kill this man?—Because, said the other, He is feared more than he is hated. The boy replied, Why then did you not give me a sword, when you brought me hither, that I might have stabbed him, and freed my country from this slavery?

He learnt the principles of the Stoic philosophy (which so well suited his character) under Antipater of Tyre, and applied himself diligently to the study of it. Eloquence he likewise studied, as a necessary means to defend the cause of Justice; and he made a very considerable proficiency in that science. To increase his bodily strength, he inured himself to suffer the extremes of heat and cold; and used to make journeys on foot, and bare-headed, in all seasons. When he was sick, patience and abstinence were his only remedies: he shut himself up, and would see no body till he was well. Tho' remarkably sober in the beginning of his life, making it his rule to drink but once after supper, and then retire, he insensibly contracted a habit of drinking more freely, and of sitting at table till morning. His friends endeavoured to excuse this, by saying, that the affairs of the public engrossed his attention all the day, and that, being ambitious of knowledge, he passed the night at table in the conversation of [tipsy^d] philosophers. Cæsar wrote that Cato was once found dead drunk at the corner of a street by a great number of people, who were going early in the morning to the levée of some great man; and that when, by uncovering his face, they perceived who it was, they blushed for shame. You would have thought, added Cæsar, that Cato had found them drunk, not they him. Pliny observes, that by this reflection, Cæsar praises his enemy, at the same time that he blames him. And Seneca (his extravagant Plin. Ep.

iii. 12.

Sen. de Tranq.
Vit. xxi.
Plut.

Plut. in Cat.

^c When Cato was a child, the Italian allies solicited for the freedom of the City; Pompedius Sili, one of the deputies, and who had contracted a friendship with Drusus, lodged at his house for several days, in which time being grown familiar with the children, he said to them, Well, will you desire your uncle to befriend us in our business? Cæpio smiling, seemed to consent; but Cato made no answer, only he looked steadily and sternly upon the stranger: And you, said Pompedius, will not you, as well as your brother, intercede with your uncle in our behalf? Cato seeming by his silence and by his look to reject their petition, Pompedius snatched him up, and, holding him out of the window, shook him several times, threatening to let him fall, if he would not comply: the boy remained unmoved, and, seemingly, unconcerned: whereupon Pompedius, setting him down again, said softly to his friends, "Were this child a man, I believe we should not gain one voice among the People."

^d Cato vino laxabat animum, curis publicis fatigatum. Sen. de Tranq. Vitæ. c. xv.

panegyrist) panegyrist) ventures to assert, that it is easier to prove drunkenness to be a virtue, than Cato to be vicious. He affected singularity, and, in things indifferent, to act directly contrary to the taste and fashions of the age, [which some hold to be a sure mark of a flaw in the understanding.] Magnanimity and constancy are generally ascribed to him; and Seneca would fain make that haughtiness and contempt for others, which, in Cato, accompanied those virtues, a matter of praise. Cato, says Seneca, having received a blow in the face, neither took revenge nor was angry; he did not even pardon the affront, but denied that he had received it: His virtue raised him so high, that injury could not reach him. He is reputed to have been chaste in his youth. His first love was Lepida, but when the marriage was upon the point of being concluded, Metellus Scipio, to whom she had been promised, interfered, and the preference was given to him. This affront extremely exasperated our Stoic: He was for going to Law with Scipio, and when his friends had diverted him from that design, by shewing him the ridicule of it, he revenged himself by making verses upon his rival. When this first flame subsided, he married Atilia, the daughter of Serranus, had two children by her, and then divorced her for her very indiscreet conduct.

Sen de Constan.
Sap. c. xv.
Plut.

It has been already mentioned, that he served as a volunteer under Gellius in the war of Spartacus, and when military rewards were offered him by the commander, refused them, because he thought he had no title to them.

Some years after, he went a Legionary Tribune into Macedonia, under the Prætor Rubrius: In which station he appeared, in his dress and during a march, more like a private soldier than an officer; for the dignity of his manners, the elevation of his sentiments, and the superiority of his views, set him far above those, who bore the titles of Generals and Proconsuls. It is said, that Cato's design in all his behaviour, was to engage the soldiers to the love of virtue; whose affections he engaged thereby to himself, without having that in his intention. For the sincere love of virtue (adds Plutarch) implies an affection for the virtuous. Those who praise the worthy without loving them, pay homage to their glory; but are neither admirers, nor imitators of their virtues.

Vid. sup.
P. 197.

When the time of his service expired, and he was leaving the army, the soldiers were all in tears, so effectually had he gained their hearts by his condescending manners, and sharing in their labours [as Marius had used to do.]

Before he returned to Rome, he resolved to make the tour of Asia (where Pompey then was, at the head of the Roman armies) not only to see that fine country, but to acquaint himself with the manners of its inhabitants, and be an eye-witness of the condition of its states and provinces. In the course of his travels he came to Antioch, curious to see one of the finest cities of the East. When not far from it, he perceived, without the gates,

Plut. in Pomp. & in Cat.

V.I. sup.
p. 269. in the note.

Plut. in Cat.

Id. ibid.

a multitude of people in white habits, and, on both sides of the way, young persons and children ranged in order. He imagined, that this was intended for his reception, which displeased him; for he did not affect pomp and ceremony. He was travelling on foot, according to his constant custom, but his friends being on horseback, he ordered them to dismount, in civility to those, who, he believed, were come out with a design to do him honour. [Among them were the Priests, and the Magistrates of the city.] But when he was at some small distance, the person who had ranged the multitude in order, having a crown upon his head, and a staff in his hand, came forwards, and asked him, where he had left Demetrius [Pompey's freedman] and whether he would soon arrive? On that question, the friends of Cato burst out into a loud laugh; but, for himself, ever serious and austere, he went on, without answering one word to the man who had questioned him; but cried out, Ob wretched city!

We are told, that Cato coming to make his compliments to Pompey at Ephesus [no body knows when] that General ran to meet him, and gave him the highest praises, both when present and after he was withdrawn; but did not press his worthy guest to stay with him, as he used to do other young Romans.

After his return home he was chosen to the Quæstorship, and had scarce entered upon this charge, when he made a great reformation in the Quæstor's office, and particularly with regard to the Registers.

These Registers, whose places were for life, and through whose hands incessantly passed the public accounts, being to act under young Magistrates, unexperienced in business, assumed an air of importance; and, instead of asking orders from the Quæstors, pretended to direct and govern, as if they themselves were the Quæstors. Cato reduced them to their proper sphere. One of these fellows had the protection of Catulus, then CENSOR⁴, whom he engaged to go to the Quæstor's office to solicit for him. As Catulus lived in friendship with Cato, and was of the same faction, he doubted not of success in his application. But the Quæstor remonstrated to him, that the person, for whom he interested himself, was very criminal, having forged a will. Catulus, nevertheless, sued for favour, on his own account, to the guilty Register. Hereupon Cato expostulated with the Patriot, on his acting a part so inconsistent with his dignity and his virtue; but finding him still persist in his solicitation, said to him, in a very different tone of voice, It would be a great shame for ³ Julian, the Apostate, revived the reproach, several ages afterwards, against the inhabitants of Antioch, when he was angry with them. Julian, Misopog.

⁴ The other CENSOR was Crassus. These Magistrates discharged no one function belonging to their office. A dispute arose between them, in relation to the people of Gallia Transpadana, to whom Crassus, supported by Cæsar, was for granting the freedom of the City. Catulus opposed the design; and the colleagues agreed in nothing, but the resolution to abdicate their office, which they actually did. Plut. in Crass. & Suet. in Cæs.

you, Catulus, if while you are CENSOR, and charged with the inspection of our manners, I should order my serjeants to turn you out of my office. Angry and confounded, Catulus opened his mouth, as if to reply; but having nothing reasonable to say, retired silent and out of countenance. However, he managed so knavishly, as to save the Regilter from any further punishment, than the loss of his employment and salary.

One thing by which Cato extremely pleased the People, was his making the assassins, to whom Sylla had given considerable rewards out of the treasury, for murdering the proscribed, disgorge their gains.

Plutarch tells us, that Cato was so exact in performing the duties of a Senator, as to be always the first who came to the house, and the last who left it; and that he never quitted Rome during those days when the Senate was to sit.

Nor did he fail to be present at every Assembly of the people, that he might awe those, who, by an ill judged facility, bestowed the public money in largesses, and frequently, through mere favour, granted remission of debts due to the State. At first his austerity and stiffness displeased his colleagues, but afterwards they were glad to have his name to oppose to all the unjust solicitations, against which they would have found it difficult to defend themselves. Cato very readily took upon him the task of refusing.

The amount of all this seems to be, that Cato had been a stout, stubborn, ill-natured boy; that he affected singularity when a man: yet was capable both of friendship and of love; was condescending to his inferiors; a brave and hardy soldier; a good senator; in his principles a Stoic; in his practice chaste and temperate, only a little given to tipling in good company; complexionally true and honest; and aspiring to the character of rigid, unrelenting justice.

CAIUS JULIUS CÆSAR was born in the year of Rome 654, in the Consulship of M. Antonius and A. Posthumius Albinus. The Julian family was Patrician: It had been transplanted from Alba* to Rome by king Tullius Hostilius, and, from the beginning of the Commonwealth, had been adorned with the highest dignities. Cæsar was in his sixteenth year when he lost his father, of whom all that we know is, that he had been Prætor, and that he died suddenly one morning while putting on his shoes. Cæsar's mother was Aurelia, a lady of merit, and of a very noble family, though Plebeian; she is much praised for the care she took of her son's education. It has been already mentioned, that in the year 671, he was in great dan-

Pigh.
ad ann.
654. &
676.

Plin. vii.
53.

Auſt. de
Caus. Cor.
Eloq. c.
28.

Suet. in
Cæſ. 6.

* It is said, that the Julii traced back their origin to Iulus the son of Æneas, and therefore, without doubt, the grandson of Venus. The first of the Julian family, who bore the surname of Cæsar, was Sex. Julius Cæsar, Prætor in the year of Rome 545. It is generally thought that this surname denotes an infant, for the birth of whom it was necessary to cut open the mother's womb, a Cæſo matris utero, Plin. vii. 9. and that very dangerous and uncommon operation, called the Cæſarean operation, has its name from thence. According to another etymology, Cæsar signifies a child born with long hair, a Cæſarie.

ger

ger of being put to death as a Marian, being the nephew of Marius's wife Julia, and having married Cinna's daughter, whom all the tremendous power of the Dictator could not induce him to repudiate. He was saved through the intercession of the friends of his family; to whom, at the same time, Sylla is said to have foretold, that the youth, for whom they interceded, would, one day, be the ruin of their party. Suetonius adds, that Sylla often admonished the Optimates to be upon their guard against that loose-girded boy.

Suet. in J.
Cæs. 1.

Id.

But Cæsar, though he thus escaped being murdered by the Dictator, did not think it safe for him to continue in Italy; he passed into Asia^a, made his first campaigns under Minucius Thermus, distinguished himself by his courage, and at the taking of Mitylene, acquired the honour of a civic crown, which was given him by his General.

Vid. supra.
P. 179.

From thence he went to the army of Servilius Isauricus, then commander against the pirates in Cilicia, but he did not stay long there. Upon the news of Sylla's death he returned to Rome, and was very active in obtaining an amnesty for those of the Marian party. Following the example of young persons desirous of acquiring a name, he accused of extortion Dolabella, who had been Consul in the year 672, and on his return from his government of Macedonia had obtained the honour of a triumph. Cæsar produced a great number of witnesses against the accused, and, though not twenty-three years of age, pleaded the cause in so masterly a manner, that his discourse was cited above an hundred years after his death, as not to be read without admiration. Nevertheless, Hortensius and Cotta, who were then the leading men at the bar, saved Dolabella by their eloquence; and Cæsar is said to have been mortified at his failure of success. To perfect himself in eloquence, he soon after went to Rhodes, to hear the lessons of Apollonius Molo the rhetorician, under whom Cicero had improved his talents. In his passage thither he was taken by pirates near the island of Pharmacusa, which lies opposite to the city of Miletus in Asia. To these robbers he behaved himself, though their prisoner, as if he had been their master. When they asked him twenty talents for his ransom, he laughed at them, telling them they did not know who their prisoner was, and he promised them fifty: After which he dispatched most of his attendants to the neighbouring cities, to collect that sum for him; and, with only his physician, and two domestics, remained 34.

Auct. de
Caus. Cor.
Eloq. c.

Plut. in J.
Cæs.

^a Suetonius, who seems to delight in expatiating on the private vices imputed to those whose lives he writes, tells us, that Cæsar incurably hurt his character, by his familiarity with Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, a prince of corrupt manners, to whose court he went twice; but that this was the only blot upon him of that sort. Pudicitia ejus famam nihil quidem præter Nicomedis contubernium læst, gravi tamen & perenni opprobrio & ad omnium convitia exposito. The historian gives us many severe strokes upon him, but they are all from persons interested to dishonour him, and whose malice is evident, whether they spoke truth or not. His gallantries, mentioned by this writer, were not what would distinguish his character from those of his contemporaries; and he had Cato's testimony to his exemplary sobriety. Suet. in Cæs. 53.

eight and thirty days in the power of those villains, and during all that time maintained an air of command; so that when he laid down to sleep, if they disturbed him with their noise, he sent them orders to be silent. To amuse himself, he composed verses and oratorical discourses, which he afterwards read to the pirates; and, if they did not admire his performances, he called them fools and barbarians: and though he made himself familiar with them, and took part in their sports and exercises, yet he always sustained his dignity, and threatened them from time to time with crucifixion. The pirates were not displeased with his easy manner, and were far from taking his menaces to be serious. However, when he had paid them the sum promised, he caused himself to be conveyed to Miletus, and, having there, with wonderful activity, fitted out all the small vessels he found in that port, came by surprize upon the pirates, who were still at anchor near the isle of Pharmacusa. He sunk some of their ships, and took others; and having put his prisoners into confinement at Miletus, went immediately to Junius, the Proconsul of Asia, who was then in Bitbynia, to ask his orders for punishing them. The Proconsul, weak, avaricious, and envious of the young man's glory, answered, That he did not intend to have the prisoners executed, but to sell them. Cæsar returned to Miletus with all expedition, and by his own private authority, before any orders could come from the Proconsul, caused the pirates to be crucified as he had often threatened them he would do: Only, to mitigate the punishment, he directed that their heads should be first struck off.

From thence he went to Rhodes, pursuant to his first design, but did not continue there long. Mithridates was at that time ravaging the neighbouring countries: whereupon Cæsar, that he might not appear idle and indolent, when the allies of Rome were threatened with danger, went over from Rhodes into Asia, and, having assembled some troops, drove the king's lieutenant out of the province, and thereby kept the cities, that were wavering, from a revolt.

On his return to Rome, he employed all possible methods to make himself friends, gain the multitude, and draw all eyes upon him. He was frequently the advocate of the distressed; his manners were affable and polite, condescending to the lowest of the People; and he was magnificent in his retinue and his table. His enemies imagined, that he would soon be ruined by his expences, and that his credit would expire with his patrimony. And indeed he was ruined as to his fortune; for before he obtained any magistracy he was thirteen hundred talents in debt; but ^{251,875} his credit with the multitude had taken deep root. It seems to be agreed, that he was what is called a man of pleasure, and was much in favour with the women. In his early youth he had an intrigue with Servilia, Cato's sister, the mother of Brutus; and riper years did not put end to it.

The first office which he obtained by the suffrages of the People, was that of Military Tribune, or Tribune of the Soldiers, and in that post he supported, with all his credit, those who were for restoring to the Tribunes of the People, all the privileges and authority, of which Sylla had deprived them.

The Marian party were much delighted with his behaviour on occasion of the funeral of his aunt Julia, the widow of Marius. He made a speech in praise of that lady in the Forum; and caused images of Marius to be carried in the funeral procession: As no such thing had been seen in public since Sylla's Dictatorship, this boldness occasioned some clamours; but the People answered them with applauses, were transported with joy, and admired his courage.

At the funeral of his wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna, Cæsar increased the good-will and affection which the People had conceived for him. It had been customary to make funeral orations upon ancient ladies: But Cæsar was the first who did that honour to a young one, his deceased wife; and for so doing was now considered as a man estimable for the goodness of his heart, as before for a thousand other shining qualities. Being Quæstor^r when he made these orations upon his aunt and wife, he soon after set out for Spain, to perform the business of that office, under the Prætor, or Proconsul, Antistius Vetus.

In the Year 688, Cotta and Torquatus being Consuls, Cæsar was Ædile. In the games and theatrical^s shews, which in this office he exhibited, according to custom, he acquitted himself with a magnificence, that surpassed every thing of that kind, which had ever been seen.

Vid. sup.
p. 281.
note (c)

Suet.

To do honour to his father's memory, Cæsar, during his Ædileship, entertained the People with combats of gladiators, to the number of 320 pair; and he had provided many more, but an alarm having been spread in the City, the Senate passed a decree to fix the number of gladiators, that should be allowed to fight on these occasions.

Cæsar seized the opportunity which his office of Ædile gave him, to place in the Capitol, during the night, certain statues of Marius, which he had caused to be made secretly, with Victories bearing trophies, and with inscriptions that celebrated the conqueror of the Cimbri. At break of day, the splendor of these statues, which were master-pieces of art, and ^r By the Roman Laws, the tie between a Quæstor and his superior was sacred. Cæsar, faithful to this maxim expressed his gratitude and friendship to Vetus, by shewing great kindness to his son.

It was at this time, that, on seeing a statue of Alexander, he is said to have sighed, and reproached himself for having done nothing at an age, at which the Macedonian had subjected the greater part of the world. He asked his discharge, and quitted Spain before the time, animated with a passionate desire to signalize himself, and raise his fortune.

^s Among these shews there were some at the joint expence of himself and his colleague Bibulus, others which he gave at his own expence, and this occasioned the honour of the whole to be ascribed to Cæsar; whereupon Bibulus is said to have complained, in a strain of pleasantry of his own hard fortune, saying, that the same thing had happened to him as to Pollux, to whom, conjointly with his brother, a temple was built in the Forum; and that, nevertheless, Pollux was universally forgot, the temple being never called by any other name, than the temple of Castor. Suet in Cæs.

finely finely gilded, drew a mighty concourse of spectators, and every body admired so bold an act, of which the author was presently known by all the world. Many considered this step as an enormous crime, the honours formerly done to Marius having been abolished by the decrees of the Senate. They said, it was an essay of Cæsar's to try what the Roman People were capable of bearing, and to pave his way to the tyranny. On the other hand, the Marrians, encouraged by an event so pleasing, and so little expected, came flocking from all parts, and, by their number, astonished those who had imagined that party to be almost annihilated. The Capitol in the mean time resounded with acclamations; many even melted into tears at the sight of those statues, proscribed from the time of Sylla's sovereignty; and they extolled Cæsar to the skies, as a man worthy of the honour of being allied to Marius.

The affair was laid before the Senate, and it was upon this occasion that Plut. Catulus said, It is time, Fathers, to take care of ourselves: for Cæsar no longer attacks the COMMONWEALTH by undermining and sapping, but by open assaults. Nevertheless, Cæsar, by his eloquence, gained the Senate's approbation of what he had done.

Suetonius tells us, that Cæsar having, by his splendid shews, gained the good-will of the People, engaged some of the Tribunes to move for a decree, by which Egypt should be assigned to him a province; and that the pretence for asking this extraordinary commission, was, that the Alexandrians had by violence expelled their king, whom the Senate had complimented with the title of Friend and Ally of the Roman People. As Egypt was not a province of the empire, it is hard to guess what the historian

^r Concerning this sententious patriot, vid. supr. p. 282 & 285, and more hereafter.

^s Tentavit per partem Tribunorum, ut sibi Ægyptus Provincia plebiscito daretur. Suet. c. 11.

^t M. Crevier is of opinion, that what Cæsar wanted, was a commission for reducing Egypt and the isle of Cyprus into a Roman province, and this in consequence of a Will said to have been made by Alexander III. king of Egypt, who died at Tyre: by which Will he left the Senate and People of Rome all his right to the inheritance of the Lagides. He adds, " 'Tis difficult to decide, whether this Will was real or only pretended. Cicero mentions it in one of his orations, but without explaining himself clearly [Cic. in Rull.] Certain it is, that the Senate sent deputies to Tyre, to take possession of the money deposited there by Alexander. — Cæsar was supported in his project by Crassus, then General; but he met with opposition from Crassus's colleague, Catulus, and from several others, who maintained that there was no such Will, and that it was not for the honour of the Roman People to seem greedy of the inheritance of kings."

As to the pretension of the Romans to the inheritance in question (supposing the Will to be genuine) M. Crevier gives us what he thinks the most probable account.

"After the death of Ptolemy Lathyrus, the Egyptians placed his daughter Cleopatra upon the throne. Sylla, then Dictator, having with him Ptolemy Alexander, the son of another Alexander, Lathyrus's brother, who died before him, sent that young prince into Egypt, to reign there jointly with Cleopatra. But Alexander, at the end of nineteen days, caused Cleopatra to be murdered, for which horrible cruelty he was himself killed by the people of Alexandria. I suppose, that this Alexander left a son of the same name, who, as his father and grandfather had reigned over Egypt, had well-founded pretensions to that kingdom, especially as the legitimate historian means : But, whatever the business was, Cæsar was strenuously opposed by the Optimates, and did not carry his point.

R r

" poste-

Midd. 143. In the year 689, he was one of the Assistant Judges to the Prætor, whose province it was to sit upon the Sicarii, that is, those who were accused of killing, or carrying a dagger with intent to kill : and he concurred with the other Judges in condemning by the Law of assassinate, those, who in Sylla's proscription had been known to kill, or receive money for killing, a proscribed Citizen ; which money Cato, when he was Quæstor the year before, had made them refund to the Treasury.

Pict. in Cat.
Suet. J.
Cæf. 11.

Vid. supr.
p. 168.

Suet. J.
Cæf. 13.
Pigh. An.
nal.

In the present year, 690, he sued for the High-Priesthood, vacant by the death of Metellus Pius ; a post of the first dignity in the Republic. The Tribune Labienus had opened his way to it, by the publication of a new Law for transferring the right of electing from the college of Priests to the People, agreeably to the tenor of a former Law, which had been repealed by Sylla. Cæsar carried this high office, before he had yet been Prætor, [being only Prætor Elect this year] against two considerable competitors, of the first authority in Rome, Q. Catulus, and P. Servilius Isauricus ; the one of whom had been Censor, and then bore the title of Prince of the Senate ; and the other had been honoured with a triumph : Yet he procured more votes against them, even in their own tribe, than they both had for them out of the whole number of Citizens.

Vid. supr.
p. 203.

Hitherto all that we have learnt of Cæsar, is, that he was of the first class of the Nobles, a rake in his early years, and a spendthrift, but remarkably brave and intrepid, magnanimous, polite, eloquent, generous, liberal even to profusion : That with regard to the public affairs, he was of the popular party, and had the courage to make funeral panegyrics on his aunt Julia, the widow of Marius, and on his own wife Cornelia, Cinna's daughter, whom he refused to repudiate at the command of Sylla [with whose sovereign will and pleasure Pompey shewed a mean compliance, by parting with Antistia :] That, when he was Ædile, he exhibited very fine and expensive shows, and replaced in the Capitol the statues of Marius (of " posterity of Lathyrus was extinct by the " death of Cleopatra. The Egyptians, how" ever, recognized Ptolemy Auletes, the natu" ral son of Lathyrus, for their king.

" I further suppose, that the divisions
" which happened in Egypt, whilst Pompey
" was making war in Asia, and which occa" sioned the sending of Embassies to that ge" neral, arose from the opposite pretensions
" of Alexander III. and Auletes. Pompey would " not take cognizance of this difference.
" Ptolemy Auletes continued in possession of " the throne, and Alexander, withdrawing to " Tyre, died there soon after.

" Usher and Prideaux, whom M. Rollin has " followed in his Ancient History, gives us a " different succession of the crown of Egypt,

" from Lathyrus : But, from a note upon M.
" Prideaux's text, I think it evident, that " Usher's opinion is not to be sustained. Græ-
" vius, in a note upon the first Agrarian of " Cicero, mentions the third Ptolemy Alexan- " der, of whom I speak in this place. I " thought this a point necessary to be cleared " up, and I know no better means of recon" ciling the testimonies of Porphyry, Appian,
" Suetonius, Plutarch, and Cicero, than the " plan which I follow. This system connects " all the fragments which we find upon this " subject in different authors."

which

which action he obtained the Senate's approbation :) That notwithstanding a Law made by Sylla (as Suetonius significantly remarks) exempting from punishment the assassins, who for hire had killed the Citizens by him proscribed (which assassins Cato had the year before constrained, as villains and murderers, to refund the money paid them out of the treasury, in reward of their bloody atchievements) he condemned them to suffer as guilty of murder : and that, by these popular measures, and his extraordinary liberality, he became so great a favourite, as to be preferred, for the High-Priesthood, to two eminent Consulars, Catulus and Servilius.

It seemed proper to give this short summary, containing every thing that is well attested, and of moment, in Cæsar's character and public conduct prior to the present time, that the reader may from thence, and not from the conjectures of historians, or party-men, or from predictions made of events after the events were past, form his judgment of the disposition of this illustrious Roman, when Cicero was Consul. For it may be observed, that almost all the modern writers on this subject have endeavoured^u, in

Vid. supr.
p. 39.
note c.

^u Some considerations have already been offered in the foregoing sheets, to shew the injustice done to the reader, and the inconvenience which may happen to the writer, by prefacing the history of a man's actions with his moral character; such as, to the writer who has considered the whole tenour of his life, he may seem, upon the whole, to have deserved. The character given by Plutarch of Marius, previous to what he relates of the life and actions of that famous Roman, furnished an instance of the injustice and inconvenience of that practice. What has been said of Cæsar by some historians, before they relate his actions, furnishes another.

Cicero's English historian, speaking of the dedication of the Capitol by Catulus (in 684) after the rebuilding of it, writes thus :

Midd.
p. 114.

" On the occasion of this festival he is said
" to have introduced some instances of luxury,
" not known before in Rome, of covering the " area, in which the People sat, with a purple
" veil, imitating the colour of the sky, and de-
" sending it from the injuries of it, and of gild-
" ing the tiles of this fabric, which were made " of copper : For though the cielings of tem" ples had before been sometimes gilt, yet this " was the first use of gold on the outside of a " building." Catulus, however, is not supposed by this writer to have had any unjustifiable views in his introduction of those instances of luxury. [He was not like Cæsar, " the grand p. 32.

" purpose of whose whole life was to oppress
" the liberties of his country; and who, by his p. 113.
" prodigality, was forced to repair his own
" ruin by ruining the Republic.] Cæsar, in
" the sports exhibited for his father's funeral,
" made the whole furniture of the theatre of " solid silver : But the excess of his expence was
" but in proportion to the excess of his ambition :
" for the rest were only purchasing the Consul-" ship, he the Empire." But why are we to suppose, that Cæsar was then more criminally ambitious than Catulus ? The reason, I suppose is, " that Catulus, being the son of that " Catulus who was the ablest statesman of his " time, and the chief assertor of the Aristocra-
" tical interest, and condemned to die by
" Marius, had inherited the virtues, as well p. 51.
" as principles, of his father." Whether this be any great compliment to the father, the reader will judge when he has attended to the following conjecture of our author concerning the son.

" Brutus, after sustaining the siege of Mo- p. 52.
" dena, surrendered himself into Pompey's
" hands ; but being conducted, as he desired,
" by a guard of horse, to a certain village
" upon the Po, [Orosius says to Rhegium] he " was there killed by Pompey's orders. This " act was censured as cruel and unjust, and " Pompey generally blamed for killing a man
" of

in imitation of some of the ancients, to prepossess their readers with the most “ of the first quality, who had surrendered “ himself voluntarily, and on the condition

 “ his life : But he acted probably by the advice “ of Catulus, in laying hold of the pretext of “ Brutus’s treason [to called by the conquerors] “ to destroy a man, who, from his rank and “ authority, might have been a dangerous “ head to the Marian party, and capable of “ disturbing that Aristocracy which Sylla had “ established, and which the Senate, and all
 “ the better sort, were very desirous to main“ tain.” To this let it be added, that Catulus was by Sylla declared to be the best man in the Republic : From whence we may (not unreasonably) conclude, that he was one of the worst ; that he was one of that tyrant’s satellites, and had a heart, if not a hand, in all his reformations and massacres : And this will account for his being the zealous friend and defender of his brother satellite, Catiline ; which has created a difficulty to those who have entertained a high opinion of Catulus’s virtue, without ever asking themselves why ; or, perhaps, because they have found that Cicero speaks well of him. Not one good action is recorded of Catulus, except his opposition to the passing of the Gabinian and Manilian Laws ; which opposition we shall not readily ascribe to a concern for the public weal, if we

Vid. supr.
 p. 282.
 285.
 Hist de
 Cic. p. 90.

call to mind his malicious prosecution of Cornelius, on account of the reasonable and necessary Laws proposed by that honest Tribune. Of this prosecution, M. Morabin (Cicero’s French historian) in his excellent work, writes thus : Les plus accredités d’entre le Sénateurs porteroient témoignage contre cet ancien Tribun, et tout le peuple étoit dans une merveilleuse perplexité sur ce qui en arriveroit. De quoi s’agissoit-il au fond ? Cornelius avoit lu lui même son projet de loi ; et parcequ’aucun Tribun n’en avoit usé ainsi avant lui, sans peut-être de s’être trouvé dans les memes circonstances, il plaisoit à Hortensius, à Catulus, à Metellus Pius, à Lucullus, et à M. Æmilius Lepidus, d’en faire un crime [de Lèse Majesté] à ce Magistrat, prétendant qu’il avoit autant qu’il étoit en lui rendu inutile la voye d’opposition. Le véritable attentat — c’étoit de leur avoir fait perdre le droit de dispenser des loix. Tant il est vrai que les plus honnêtes gens sont sujets à s’oublier lorsqu’on les attaque sur leurs intérêts.

Again, Cicero’s English historian, speaking of the Law, proposed by Manilius in favour of Pompey, tells us, that “ J. Cæsar was a zealous promoter of this law ; but from a different motive than the love either of Pompey, or the Republic : His design was to recommend himself by it to the PEOPLE, whose favour, he foresaw, would be of more use to him than the SENATE’s.”

And was not this the design of Cicero in his zealous defence of the Manilian Law ? Let us hear his panegyrist.

“ He was now in the career of his fortunes ; and in sight as it were of the Consulship, the grand object of his ambition ; so that his conduct was suspected to flow from an interested view of facilitating his own advancement, by paying his court to Pompey’s power : But the reasons already intimated [The reasons are ; “ The mutinous spirit in Lucullus’s troops, and the loss of his authority with them, which Glabrio was still less qualified to sustain, — and Pompey’s success against the Pirates, and his being upon the spot with a great army] and Pompey’s singular character of modesty and abstinence, joined to the superiority of his military fame, might, probably, convince him, that it was not only safe, but necessary at this time, to commit a war, which nobody else could finish, to such a general ; and a power, which nobody else ought to be entrusted with, to such a man. This he himself solemnly affirms, in the conclusion of his speech : I call the Gods to witness, says he, and especially those who preside over this temple, and inspect the minds of all who administer the public affairs, that I neither do this at the desire of any one, nor to conciliate Pompey’s favour, nor to procure from any man’s greatness, either a support in dangers, or assistance in honours : — Whatever pains I have taken in this cause, I have taken it all, I assure you, for the sake of the Republic. — After so many honours received from you, and this very honour [the Prætorship] which I now enjoy, I have made it my resolution, Citizens, to prefer your will, the dignity of the Republic, and the safety of the provinces, to all my own interests and advantages whatsoever.”

That most unfavourable opinion of Cæsar's heart and designs, before he

Midd.
Vol. II.
p. 512.

That the able historian and panegyrist of the faint, who, now probably, in the regions above, lives in the fruition of endless happiness, did not, in the present instance, believe him, notwithstanding his solemn affirmation, we may gather, I think, not only from some words in the beginning of the passage above cited, but more evidently from what he says on occasion of the faint's obtaining the Consulship.

Midd.
p. 148.

"Cicero was now arrived, through the usual gradation of honours, at the highest which the People could regularly give, or an honest Citizen desire.---The subordinate Magistracies, therefore, being the steps only to this sovereign dignity, were not valued so much for their own sake, as for bringing the candidates still nearer to the principal object of their hopes, who, thro' this course of their ambition, were forced to practise all the arts of popularity; to court the little as well as the great, to espouse the principles and politics in vogue, and to apply their talents to conciliate friends, rather than to serve the Public. But the Consulship put an end to this subjection, and with the command of the State gave them the command of themselves: so that the only care left was how to execute this high office with credit and dignity, and employ the power entrusted to them for the benefit and service of their country.

"We are now, therefore, to look upon Cicero in a different light, in order to form a just idea of his character: To consider him not as an ambitious courtier, applying all his thoughts and pains to his own advancement; but as a great Magistrate and Statesman; administering the affairs, and directing the councils of a mighty empire."

The extract given above (p. 222.) from the Observations on the Life and Writings of Cicero, furnishes a plain proof, that the candid author of that elegant piece does not believe what the orator swears, on this occasion, concerning his disinterestedness: neither does M. Crevier believe him, as the reader may see by the note in the same page.

† Lib. vi. p. 21. Vid. Pref. to Midd. Life of Cic. p. xxv. Well---But Cicero's historian, upon the authority of Dio † [whose authority is to be of great weight when he places Cæsar in a bad light, but of no weight when he speaks disadvantageously of Cicero] tells us, that Cæsar had, beside the design of recommending himself to the PEOPLE, another [less manifest to the world;] and this was, "To cast a fresh load of envy upon Pompey, which, by some accident, might be improved afterwards to his hurt." Nor was this the worst; for His CHIEF VIEW was to make the precedent familiar, that whatever use Pompey might make of it, he himself might, one day, make a bad one. For this is the common effect of breaking thro' the barrier of the Laws, by which many States have been ruined, when, from a confidence in the abilities and integrity of some eminent Citizen, they invest him, on pressing occasions, with extraordinary powers, for the common benefit and defence of the society: for tho' power so entrusted may, in particular cases, be of singular service, and sometimes necessary." [N. B. These two words, sometimes necessary, seem to be thrust into the period merely for the sake of Cicero, who, during his Consulship, was invested with the extraordinary powers referred to] "yet the example is always dangerous, furnishing a perpetual pretence to the ambitious and ill-designing to grasp at every prerogative, which had been granted at any time to the virtuous, till the same power, which would save a country in good hands, oppresses it at last in bad."

We shall hereafter see, that this is the very argument made use of by Julius Cæsar against Cicero's dispensing with the Laws, in virtue of his unconstitutional, and (in those times, when very few of the nobles were better men than Catiline himself) most dangerous powers from the Senate: Powers, with which, in all probability, Cicero would have been very unwilling to see any man of the popular party invested, though even for the crushing of Catiline's conspiracy. But the argument, perhaps, is of no force in the mouth of Cæsar, because he was not of the number of Cicero's honest men.

What Cicero's English historian has hazarded concerning Cæsar, when sitting as Judge on the Sicarii, I shall take notice of in the history of Catiline; and likewise of the suspicions entertained of Cæsar's being engaged in Catiline's first plot. [The concern which Cæsar had in the affair of Rabirius has been already considered.]

To

Midd.
p. 128.

Vid. supr.
p. 295.
Note (a)

he makes his appearance upon the stage in the great scenes of action.

Crev. Vol. X. p. 265.

To endeavour to blast the character of Cæsar as a Citizen of Rome, before any mention of facts, by him committed, that really dishonour him as such, is not peculiar to Cicero's English historian. M. Crevier having mentioned what Sylla answered to Cæsar's friends and advocates, In that boy I see many Marius's; thus proceeds. Never was prediction more exactly verified; and it proves that Sylla had great penetration, and knew mankind extremely well. How was this prediction verified? In what did Cæsar resemble Marius, except in military skill, courage, activity and fortitude? Did Cæsar resemble him in cruelty and abuse of Power? Cæsar, in making himself monarch of the State, was more like Sylla than Marius, but he resembled neither of them in their bad qualities. And Sylla's second-sight seems to amount to no more than a discovery, that Cæsar had too much spirit and honour to divorce his wife, merely because such a monster as Sylla hated her as Cinna's daughter.

Vid. sup. p. 161.

Crev. Vol. X. p. 473.

Ib. p. 478, 479.

Again, "As soon as Cæsar was informed of Sylla's death, he returned suddenly to Rome, principally from the hope of seeing new disturbances, and to take advantage of the commotions raised by Lepidus—his inclination for that [the popular] faction manifested itself by the ardour with which he laboured to obtain an amnesty for those who had been engaged in it (and were in exile.) Every thing being quiet in the Commonwealth, Cæsar, who had not yet sufficient power to excite commotions in it, &c.

"The ambitious designs he then revolved in his mind more easily escaped the penetration of the most discerning, as he was a man of pleasure, or more properly speaking, abandoned to debauchery—People could not conceive, that he could unite so serious and so arduous a design, as that of changing the form of the Commonwealth, with a life that seemed entirely engrossed by follies and voluptuousness. Cicero himself, whose penetration was so great, and who foresaw events at so great a distance [or rather was one of the most short-sighted of mankind, as will appear hereafter] was at a loss in respect of Cæsar. I discovered, said he, in all his enterprises, and his whole conduct, a plan continually pursued for raising himself to the tyranny. But when I observed how curiously and skilfully his locks were adjusted, and saw him scratching his head with one finger, it could not enter into my imagination, that such a man was capable of forming, and executing, the design of subverting the Roman Commonwealth." [N. B. Plutarch adds, but this was not said till a long time after; so that Cicero foretold an event after it was past.]

"It is not to be doubted, but he had that object in view from his earliest years: For we find no step of his, that does not tend thereto, and this determinately and directly." How does this appear? Why, "He always shews himself intent upon reanimating the faction of the people, reviving the Marian party, and opposing that of Sylla. The first office, which he obtained by the suffrages of the People, was the Tribuneship of the soldiers; and, in that post, he supported with all his credit those, who were for restoring to the Tribunes of the People all the right and authority, of which Sylla had deprived them." [And which Pompey did actually restore to them; herein doing well and wisely in the judgment of Cicero.]

"On arriving in Italy [from Spain] he seized the first occasion that offered for raising disturbances; and as he knew, that the States of Gallia Transpadana, who enjoyed only the privileges of Latium, ardently desired to obtain the freedom of Rome, he made a tour through their country, to exhort them to act, and would have made them rise and take arms, if the Consuls had not kept in Italy the troops that were to have been sent against Mithridates. Thus this attempt of Cæsar's proved abortive, &c." This attempt, which has neither motive nor consequence apparent, is imputed to Cæsar, upon the authority of Suetonius alone; who speaks of some Roman calamities, without mentioning Gallia Transpadana, or any other country; and tells us, not any evil that Cæsar did, but what he would have done, if, &c.

Vol. XI. p. 445.

Speaking of Labiæus's prosecution of Rabirius,—"Cæsar set him to work; and being always intent upon depressing the authority of the Senate, and exalting the faction of the People, made no scruple to employ the most odious means for attaining his ends."

LUCIUS

LUCIUS SERGIUS CATILINA^u, of an illustrious family, (from which Sallust. & Cic. Consuls, and Military Tribunes with Consular power, had frequently been taken to govern the State) was a man of singular strength both of body and mind, but of a disposition extremely vicious. He had a head to contrive, a tongue to persuade, and a hand to execute, the hardest attempt. From his youth up, he took pleasure in civil broils, civil wars, rapine, and massacres. He was wonderfully constituted for enduring cold, hunger, and want of rest; of a spirit daring, and insidious; expert in all the arts of disguise and dissimulation; greedily covetous of other mens wealth, lavish of his own; violent in his passions, eloquent enough, but not endowed with much wisdom. His boundless ambition hurried him into extravagant and romantic projects, making him aspire to things greatly beyond the reach of his abilities.

Sallust reports, that Catiline, when a very young man, had been engaged in many scandalous intrigues; that he had debauched a young lady of illustrious birth, and even a Vestal Nun: and that at last (postremo, i. e. not long before his conspiracy) he fell in love with Aurelia Crestilla, in whom no good man ever saw any thing to commend but her beauty; and finding her indisposed to marry him, because he had a son grown to man's estate, whom she did not like for a son-in-law, he murdered him (at least it was confidently so believed) to facilitate the wicked nuptials. And this (says the historian) in my opinion, was what hurried him to the execution of his atrocious enterprize. For his polluted soul, full of rage against both Gods and Men, could find no rest either waking or sleeping, so incessantly did a guilty conscience torment him. Hence his face pale, his countenance ghastly, his gait and motion unequal, now quick, then slow; in a word, his appearance was that of a man out of his senses.

He had probably been Quæstor in the year 676, or 677, and after Vid. Pigh. the expiration of his Quæstorship, Lieutenant to Scribonius Curio, Proconsul of Macedon, A. U. 678: and he was Prætor at Rome in 686.

At the Consular election, which was held in the summer of 687, P. Aufidius Sallust. Pætus and P. Cornelius Sylla were declared Consuls: But their election was no sooner published, than they were accused of bribery and corruption by the Calpurnian Law, and being brought to trial, and found guilty before their entrance into office, their accusers and competitors, L. Manlius Torquatus and L. Aurelius Cotta, were proclaimed Consuls elect. Some little time after this, Catiline, who, on the expiration of his Prætorship, had obtained * the province of Afric, * Cic. pro Cæl. came to Rome to sue for the Consulship; but, being accused of extortion ^u Catiline was great grandson to Marcus Sergius Silus, who distinguished himself by his bravery on many occasions, in the war of Hannibal.

and Dis.

lib. xxxvi.
Vid. Pigh.
ad ann.
687.

and rapine in that government, was not permitted to pursue his pretensions *.

At this time Cn. Piso, a young nobleman, extremely bold, indigent, and factious, was instigated by his poverty, and depraved morals, to raise disturbances in the State: with him Catiline and Autronius entered * Te vero, Catilina, consulatum sperare aut cogitare non prodigium atque portentum est? a quibus enim petis? a principibus civitatis, qui tibi cum L. Volcatius Cos. in Consilio fuisset, ne petendi quidem potestatem esse voluerunt? In Tog. Cand.

Vol. XI.
p. 362.

Cicero's English historian imagines, that Catiline came from Africa to stand candidate at the Consular election held this year. His words are "came to Rome this year to appear a candidate at the election." And M. Crevier writes, seemingly, to the same effect.— "The Africans sent deputies to Rome to complain of the oppressions and violences of their governor (Catiline) and many very severe censures were passed upon him in the Senate." (Catilina ex prætura Africam provinciam obtinuit, quam cum graviter vexasset, legati Afri in Senatu tum absente illo quæsti sunt, multæque graves sententiæ in Senatu de eo dictæ sunt. Alcon. in Tog. Cand.) "This, however, did not hinder him from returning to the City—when Lepidus and Volcatius were Consuls (i. e. in 687.) to stand for the Consulship. But he no sooner arrived, than he was accused of extortion by Clodius.—This accusation hindered his appearing among the candidates.—The election of the Consuls excited a great commotion.—P. Sylla and P. Autronius had been nominated: but two of their competitors, L. Cotta and L. Torquatus, having accused them of bribery, and proved the charge against them, they were deprived of their office, and their accusers nominated in their stead."

Father Catrus, after enumerating the Crimes of Catiline, writes thus:

Tom. 15.
p. 557.
558.

"Such was the villain who appeared in a white robe in the presence of the People, to dispute the Consulship with Torquatus and Cotta." The father does not suppose, that Catiline came to Rome time enough to be competitor with Autronius and Sylla; but arrived after they, being convicted of bribery and corruption, were declared disqualified for the office: and the father supposes, that the People went to a new election, at which Catiline would have stood candidate, but was not suffered so to do, because of the complaints brought against him from Africa, and because his trial was not over till after the Comitia, where Torquatus and Cotta were chosen Consuls; and this accords better with Sallust's account, than what is said by the two other writers: For it is plain, from the words of the Latin historian, that the decree, which prohibited Catiline's suing for the Consulship, was not till after the election of Autronius and Sylla to that Magistracy, and after their disgrace. *L. Tullo M. Lepido cos. P. Autronius & P. Sulla, designati consules, legibus ambitus interrogati, pœnas dederant. Post paullo Catilina, pecuniarum repetundarum reus prohibitus erat petere consulatum, quod intra legitimos dies profiteri nequiverit. And may we not understand the words petere consulatum to mean no more here than ambire magistratum in toga candida? It would seem that Catiline's coming to Rome, in 687, was not in the hope of being chosen Consul at the election of that year, but to make interest, and secure friends, against the Consular election of the next year [688.] For, as Mr. Kennet observes, those, who aspired to that office, generally declared their pretensions about a year before the election, all which time they spent in making circuits round the City to solicit votes. And so Dr. Middleton himself, in speaking of Cicero's suing for the Consulship, tells us, that "there were two years necessarily to intervene between the Prætorship and Consulship, the first of which was usually spent in forming a general interest, and soliciting for it, as it were, in a private manner" (that is, as he explains himself afterwards, mixing with the croud, caressing and saluting the Citizens by name, when the whole City was assembled in the field of Mars;) The second in suing for it openly in the proper form and habit of a candidate. And this latter seems to have been Catiline's purpose: He came at*

Midd.
p. 133.

entered into a combination, about the fifth of December, to assassinate the Consuls Torquatus and Cotta, in the Capitol, on the first of January; which done, Autronius and Catiline were to seize the Consulship, and send Piso with an army to take possession of both Spains. But their project some-how getting air, they deferred the intended assassination to the fifth of February; at which time they proposed to murder not only the Consuls, but most of the Senators. And if Catiline had not been so hasty as to give the signal, when not a sufficient number of his associates were yet assembled before the door of the Senate-house (which frustrated the design,) on that day had been perpetrated the most wicked deed that Rome had ever beheld since the foundation of the City.

Not long after this disappointment, Piso, though he had no higher office than that of Quæstor, was sent into further Spain with the authority of Prætor. He obtained the commission by the interest of Crassus, who, knowing him to be a bitter enemy of Pompey, favoured him for that reason: nor indeed was the Senate backward to grant him the province; thinking it an advantage to keep so troublesome a Citizen at a great distance from Rome; and besides, there were many who thought he might prove a good defence against the power of Pompey, which was become formidable. But Piso, in the way to his province, was murdered by some Spanish horse of his own army. The historian adds, "Some say, this was owing to his unjust, haughty, cruel behaviour in command, which the Barbarians were not able to endure. Others pretend, that those troopers were some old trusty clients of Pompey, and that by him they were instigated to the murder."

In

at the proper time to solicit and secure friends to support him at the next Consular election; which would be in 688. If he had stood candidate, and had been chosen this year, 687, there would have been but one year between his Prætorship and Consulship; and he could not have spent more time in solicitation, than the short interval between the condemnation of Autronius and Sylla, and the nomination of Torquatus and Cotta in their place. Add to this, that as Catiline, notwithstanding his eagerness to get the Consulship, did not stand candidate at the election of 688, we may reasonably presume, that he was barred from it by the accusation brought against him of extortion and oppression in his government.

^a This is Sallust's account. Cicero's English historian has chosen to add some particulars out of Suetonius. "This disgrace of men so powerful and desperate, [Autronius, Sylla, and Catiline] engaged them presently in a "conspiracy against the State," in which it was resolved to kill the new Consuls, with several others of the Senate, and share the government among themselves. But the effect of it was prevented by some information given of the design, which was too precipitately laid for execution. Cn. Piso, an audacious, needy, factious young nobleman, was privy to it; and, as Suetonius says, (upon the authority of a rabble of writers, Tanucius Geminus, Aulorinus Naso, &c.) two more of much greater weight, M. Crassus and J. Caesar; the first of whom was to be created Dictator, the second his master of the horse. But Crassus's heart failing him, either through fear or repentance, he did not appear at the appointed time, so that Caesar would not give the signal agreed upon, of letting his robe drop from his shoulder. The Senate was particularly
Vol. III.

S I jealous

In the Consulship of L. Torquatus and L. Cotta [A. U. 688^b] Catiline was brought to a trial for his oppressions in Afric. Of his guilt nobody doubted. Cicero, in a letter written some time before the trial, says to Atticus, If it shall be judged that at noon day it is not light, I shall certainly have Catiline for a competitor^c. Nevertheless, the criminal had, for his advocate, even the Consul Torquatus; who, though not unacquainted (if we may believe Cicero) with the rumour of his client's having entered into a treasonable conspiracy, gave no credit to it at that time^d: nor did the illustrious advocate find any great difficulty in getting his client acquitted: For P. Clodius, the prosecutor, a young nobleman as profligate as Catiline himself, agreed for a sum of money to betray the cause, by suffering the criminal to have, in reality, the nomination of the Judges^e.

And the very next year (689) when Cicero was a candidate, in form, for the Consulship, Catiline, being then free, stood against him for the same dignity. It has been mentioned, that, during that competition, in order to give a check to the open and shameful practice of bribery and jealous of Piso, and hoping to cure his disaffection by making him easy in his fortunes, or to remove him, at least, from the cabals of his associates, gave him the government of Spain, at the instance of Crassus, who strenuously supported him as a determined enemy to Pompey. But, before his setting out, Cæsar and he are said to have entered into a new and separate engagement, - that the one should begin some disturbance abroad, while the other was to prepare and inflame matters at home: But this plot also was defeated, by the unexpected death of Piso; who was assassinated by the Spaniards, as some say, for his cruelty, or, as others, by Pompey's clients, and at the instigation of Pompey himself.

Tome XL. M. Crevier, though not over favourable to p. 364. Cæsar, writes thus: "I cannot readily believe that Cæsar, whose disposition was always far from cruel, could have a part in so horrid a design, [the massacre of the Consuls and Senators.] I might say almost as much for Crassus."

Neither the authority of Suetonius, nor that of Dio, ought to be of great weight with us on this head, seeing they charge Sylla with the same confidence that they charge Antonius; yet Sylla is not once mentioned by Sallust, as either guilty, or even suspected of the present conspiracy; and, being afterwards accused of it, was defended by Hortensius, and acquitted: and Cicero warmly asserts his innocence.

^b It was in this year, as Cicero tells us, that those prodigies happened, which were interpreted to portend the great dangers and plots that were now hatching against the State, and broke out two years after in Cicero's Consulship, when the turrets of the Capitol, the statues of the Gods, and the brazen image of the infant Romulus sucking the wolf, were struck down by lightning. In Catil. iii. 8.

^c Catilina, si judicatum erit meridie non lucere, certus erit competitor. Lib. I. Ep. i. ad Attic.

^d Quin etiam parens tuus, Torquatus, Consul reo de pecuniis repetundis, Catilinæ fuit advocatus—cui cum attuit post delatam ad eum primam illam conjurationem, indicavit se audisse aliquid, non credidisse. Orat. pro Sylla, 29. N. B. Torquatus, Sylla's accuser, to whom Cicero addresses himself, was the son of that Torquatus, who, when Consul, had defended Catiline.

^e A Catilina pecuniam accepit, ut turpissimè prævaricaretur. De Harusp. Resp. 20.

Hoc judicio absolutus est Catilina, infamia judicium. Ut & Clodius infamis fuerit, quippe qui prævaricatus est. Nam & rejectio judicium ad arbitrium rei videbatur esse facta. Afcon. in Tog. Cand.

corruption corruption of Antonius and Catiline, a new and more rigorous Law, than any in force was proposed, but did not pass; because the Tribune Mucius Orestinus put his negative upon it. “ [This Tribune had been ^{Midd. p. 142.} Cicero’s client, and defended by him in an impeachment of plunder ^{Ascon. in Tog. Cand.} and robbery; but, having now sold himself to his enemies, made it the subject of all his harangues to ridicule his birth and character as unworthy of the Consulship: In the debate, therefore, which arose in the Senate upon the merit of his negative, Cicero, provoked to find so desperate a confederacy against him, rose up, and, after some raillery and expostulation with Mucius, made a most severe invective on the flagitious lives and practices of his two competitors, in a speech usually called In Toga Candida, because it was delivered in a white gown, the proper habit of all candidates, and from which the name itself was derived.”

In this speech Cicero reproaches Catiline with all his crimes and vices, and particularly with his incestuous wickedness^f; his late plotting with Piso to cut off the chiefs of the Senate^g; and his grievous oppressions of the Africans^h: and he intimates to him in a kind of menace, that, though, through the iniquity of the Judges, he had been acquitted ^f Hanc tu habes dignitatem, quâ fretus me contemnis & despicias? an eam quam reliquâ vitâ es consecutus? cum ita vixisti ut non esset locus tam sanctus, quo non adventus tuus, etiam cum culpa nulla subesset, crimen adferret. In Tog. Cand.

Fabia virgo vestalis causam incesti dixerat, cum ei Catilina objiceretur. Eratque absoluta hæc Fabia, quia soror erat Terentia Ciceronis, ideo sic dixit etiam si culpa nulla subesset; ita & suis pepercit, & nihil levius inimico summi opprobrii turpitudinem objecit. Ascon. in loc.

Cum deprehendere in adulteriis; cum deprehendebas adulteros ipse; cum ex eodem stupro tibi & uxorem & filiam invenisti. In Tog. Cand.

Dicitur Catilinam adulterium commisisse cum eâ, quæ ei postea socrus fuit; eo stupro duxisse uxorem cum filia ejus esset. Hæc Luceius quoque Catilinæ objicit in orationibus, quas in eum scripsit. Ascon. in loc.

& Prætereo illum nefarium conatum tuum & pene acerbum & luctuosum populo Romano diem, cum, Cn. Pisone socio, neque alio nemine eadem optimatum facere voluisti. In Tog. Cand.

N. B. Cicero speaks here of this plot as a fact known; yet, in his Orat. pro Sylla, he says, it was not known at the time of Catiline’s trial in 688, nor known at the time of his second trial when all the Consulars appeared for him.

^h Te vero, Catilina, consulatum sperare aut cogitare non prodigium atque portentum est? a quibus enim petis? — a principibus civitatis? qui tibi cum L. Volcatius Consul in Consilio fuisset, ne petendi quidem potestatem esse voluerunt: — a senatoribus? qui te auctoritate suâ, spoliatum ornamentis omnibus, victum pene Africanis oratoribus tradiderunt.

Ne se jam tum respexit cum gravissimis vestris decretis absens notatus est.

In judiciâ quanta vis esset, didicit, cum est absolutus, si aut illud judicium, aut illa absolutio nominanda est — diripuit socios, leges, quæstionis judicia violavit; — quid ego ut violaveris provinciam prædicem? nam ut te illic gesseris non audeo dicere, quoniam absolutus es. Mentitos esse equites Romanos, falsas esse tabellas honestissimæ civitatis existimo: mentitum Q. Metellum Pium, mentitam Africam; vidisse puto nescio quid illos judices, qui te innocentem judicarunt: Oh miser! qui non sentias illo judicio te non absolutum, verum ad aliquod severius judicium ac majus supplicium reservatum. In Tog. Cand.

• He was killed by a centurion, according to Plutarch.

on his trial for extortion and rapine in Afric, he would be brought into judgment again; and, for his cruel murder of Marius Gratidianus^b (a man dear to the People) and others, proscribed by Sylla (crimes which he could not have the impudence to deny) would be condemned to a severer punishment than could have been inflicted on him for his male-administration in Afric, had he been convicted of it. And we find, that Catiline, in the very year when Cicero pronounced this invective, was tried for those murders before the Judges who sat upon the Sicarii; and who, though they condemned Bellicus, Catiline's uncle, for killing Ofella^{*}, and condemned Luscus, and other satellites of Sylla, for killing Citizens by him proscribed, acquitted Catiline, than whom none was more notoriously, or more odiously guilty. Asconius^c says, that this trial was after Catiline's repulse from the Consulship; which indeed is sufficiently supported by Cicero's now threatening him with it as a danger to which he remained exposed^d.

But what seems here the most worthy of remark is, that the cruel murders with which Cicero, in his invective, reproaches Catiline, murders notorious, facts confessed, and which the Orator has, in several parts of his writings, painted in the most shocking colours^e, are the very crimes from the punishment of which he once resolved to defend the ^b Quem amicum habere potest is, qui tot cives trucidavit? [Consulatum petis] ab equestri ordine? quem trucidasti.

A Plebe?—cui spectaculum ejusmodi tua crudelitas præbuit, ut nemo sine luctu aspicere, sine gemitu recordari possit. Ibid.

Ejusdem illius Marii Gratidiani quod caput gestavit, objicit quo loco dicit Catilinam caput M. Marii gestasse, quod caput etiam tum plenum animæ & spiritus ad Sullam usque ab Janiculo ad ædem Apollinis manibus ipse suis detulit. Ascon. in loc.

Populum vero, cum inspectante populo collum secuit hominis maxime popularis, quanti faceret, ostendit. In Tog. Cand.

Quid tu potes in defensione tua dicere, quod illi [Luscus & Bellicus] non dixerunt? Quæ tibi dicere non licebit.—Denique ille negare potuerunt, & negaverunt: tu tibi ne insciendi quidem impudentiæ locum reliquisti. Quare præclara dicentur judicia tulisse, si, qui inscientem Luscum condemnarunt, Catilinam absolverint confidentem. In Tog. Cand.

^c The same Asconius tells us, that Antonius and Catiline, in their answer to this invective, dwelt wholly on the obscurity of the Orator's birth, his being a novus homo. Ascon. in Tog. Cand.

^d Hujus autem criminis periculum, quod objicit Cicero, paucos post menses Catilina subiit, post effecta enim comitia consularia & Catilinæ repulsam, fecit eum reum inter Sicarios L. Lucullus [Luccius] paratus eruditusque, qui postea consulatum quoque petiit. Ibid.

^e Quintus Cicero, in his letter to his brother Marcus, De Petit. Consulatu. mentions the shocking barbarity of Catiline. Quid ego nunc dicam petere eum consulatum, qui hominem carissimum Populo Rom. M. Marium inspectante Populo Rom. vitibus per totam urbem ceciderit? ad bustum egerit [Q. Catuli] ibi omni cruciatus vivum lacerarit? Stanti collum gladio sua dextra secuerit, cum sinistra capillum ejus a vertice teneret? Caput sua manu tulerit, cum inter digitos ejus rivi sanguinis fluerent? [Quintus adds, with regard to Catiline's general course of life] Qui postea cum histrionibus & cum gladiatoribus ita vixit, ut alteros libidinis, alteros facinoris adjutores haberet? Qui nullum in locum tam sanctum, ac tam religiosum accessit, in quo non, etsi in aliis culpa non esset, tamen ex sua nequitia dedecoris suspicionem relinquerit?

criminal, criminal, for the sake of making him his friend; and unquestionably would have defended, had Catiline been accused in form, and brought to trial before the Consular elections of 689; and provided he would have condescended to be the Orator's partner and associate in canvassing for the Consulship at that election. It seems very plain, that all the Consulars did appear for Catiline (when brought to trial after his repulse) those Senators whom Cicero calls good and honest men, and friends of the Republic: It is no wonder therefore that he was acquitted.

In justice to the reader it ought to be here confessed, that the foregoing account of the two trials of Catiline, the one for oppressions, the other for murder, does not accord with what is said of them, by certain modern writers, who, with great reason, are much esteemed. Two letters from Cicero to Atticus, in each of which mention is made of some accusation on which Catiline was to be tried, have occasioned a deal of perplexity to the commentators upon those letters, and to the translators of them, and to modern compilers of Roman history, who cannot agree concerning the date of the second of those letters, nor the time when Catiline was tried for extortion: Nor is it strange, that the moderns should differ on these articles, seeing Asconius and Fenestella, cotemporaries, and both living in the reign of Augustus, differ upon the question, whether Cicero did actually defend Catiline, or not.

The reader will, I hope, excuse the digression, if I step a little aside to examine into these matters; which I am disposed to do, not merely for the sake of ascertaining the facts (which, alone, can hardly be thought worth the trouble) but in order to be better acquainted with Cicero, from whose writings our modern Histories of his Times are chiefly extracted. I shall begin with inserting such parts of the two letters, as regard the business in hand.

Book I. Ep. I. Cicero to Atticus.

" I send you the best account, which conjecture enables me to give you,
 " of the competitors I shall have for the Consulship. Galba is the only " man who has declared his purpose of standing,—[yet] it seems certain,
 " that not only he, but Antonius and Cornificius will be candidates.—Some " talk of Cæsonius.—Aquilius I don't believe has any such intention. But " I SHALL certainly have Catiline for a competitor, if the Judges will declare " that it is not light at noon day."

Cicero Attico sal.

" Petitionis nostræ, quam tibi summæ curæ esse scio hujusmodi ratio est, quod
 " adhuc conjectura providere possit. Prensat unus P. Galba.—Competitores, " qui certi esse videantur, Galba & Antonius & Q. Cornificius—Sunt qui
 " etiam Cæsonium putant. Aquilium non arbitramur, qui denegat.—Catilina,
 " si judicatum erit meridie non lucere, certus erit competitor."

Ep. II. Cicero to Atticus.

“ In the Consulship of Lucius Julius Cæsar and Caius Marcius Figulus.
 “ My wife is safely delived of a son.—I formerly gave you a full ac“ count how things stood with regard to my suit for the Consulship. At “ this time I am thinking to defend my competitor Catiline; we have Judges “ to our mind, yet such as the accuser himself is pleased with: I hope, if “ he be acquitted, that he will be the more ready to serve me in our com“ mon petition; but if it fall out otherwise, I shall bear it with patience.
 “ It is of great importance to me to have you here as soon as possible:
 “ For there is a general persuasion, that certain nobles of your acquaint“ ance will be against me; and you, I know, could be of the greatest ser“ vice in gaining them over. Wherefore don’t fail to be here in January, “ as you intended.”

Cicero Attico sal.

“ L. Julio Cæsare, C. Marcio Figulo Coss. filiolo me auctum scito, salva “ Terentia. Ego de meis ad te rationibus scripsi antea diligenter.—Hoc tem“ pore Catilinam, competitorem nostrum, defendere cogitamus. Judices “ habemus quos volumus, summa accusatoris voluntate. Spero, si absolutus erit, “ conjuvitiorem illum nobis fore in ratione petitionis: sin aliter acciderit huma- “ niter feremus. Tuo adventu nobis opus est maturo. Nam prorsus summa bo- “ minum est opinio, tuos familiares, nobiles homines, adversarios honori nostro “ fore. Ad eorum voluntatem mihi conciliandam maximo te mihi usui fore video.
 “ Quare Januario mense, ut constituisti, cura ut Romæ sis.”

[L. Julio Cæsare, C. Marcio Figulo Coss.] Sous le consulat de L. Julius Cæsar, & C. Marcius Figulus. On these words M. l'Abbeé de St. Real makes the following remark. “ Il y a des difficultés extraordinaires à dater cette “ lettre, & les commentateurs s’y sont épuisés. Par ces Consuls qui y sont nom“ més il semble qu’elle soit de 689, qui est leur année. Cependant cela paroît “ comme impossible par le dernier article, où Cicéron exhorte Atticus à “ venir passer à Rome * le mois de Janvier: car il ne peut entendre que le “ Janvier de cette même année, puisque c’étoit pour l’aider à obtenir le consulat “ de la suivante, ce qui se devoit décider, suivant la coutume au commence“ ment d’Août, pour le plus tard. Or quand même son fils seroit né, & cette “ lettre écrite le premier jour de cette année 689, le tems seroit bien court pour “ l’envoyer en Grece, & pour faire arriver Atticus à Rome, dans le même mois.
 “ Cette considération jointe à ce que la plupart des vieilles éditions mettent Ja“ nuario ineunte, au lieu de Januario mense, comme il y a dans les plus cor-“ rectes des nouvelles éditions, a fait croire à plusieurs commentateurs, qu’elle est “ de l’année précédente 688, & que Cicéron a seulement entendu en nommant les “ Consuls qu’il y nomme, qu’ils venoient d’être élus pour l’année suivante, & non “ pas qu’ils fussent déjà en exercice.

“ Mais puisque cette manière de dater est si hors d’usage, que ces commenta“ teurs n’en ont pu trouver un seul exemple, dans toute l’Antiquité Romaine, pour “ appuyer

* Probably, there is here an error of the press.

“ appuyer leur opinion, il me semble qu’il y a bien moins d’inconvenient à croire “ que cette lettre est effectivement de l’année qu’elle marque. Car il n’est pas “ impossible, que Cicéron crût qu’Atticus étoit déjà en chemin quand il l’écrivoit.
 “ Peut-être aussi ne comptoit-il pas qu’Atticus pût arriver dans tout Janvier, “ quoiqu’il le lui écrivoit pour le presser davantage. Que si la naissance d’un pre“ mier fils est un événement de nature à être daté plus particulièrement, que “ par l’année dans laquelle il est arrivé, en l’écrivant à son meilleur ami, n’est-il “ pas à presumer que Cicéron entendoit quelque jour particulier de cette même “ année, quoiqu’il ne l’ait point exprimé? Que si cela est, quel jour peut-il “ avoir entendu naturellement, en disant seulement que son fils est né sous tels “ Consuls, que le premier jour de leur consulat? comme nous entendons le pre“ mier jour de l’année en disant seulement le jour de l’an. Voilà, ce me semble, “ de quelle manière on peut se hasarder raisonnablement à deviner, pour se deter“ miner dans les difficultés de cette nature, Et non pas, comme la plupart des com“ mentateurs, par des subtilités de Grammaire.”

Cicero’s English historian agrees with M. de St. Real, concerning the year in which this letter was written. Midd. Life of Cic. vol. I. p. 146.

“ It is certain, that his son [Cicero’s son] was born in this same year “ (689) as he expressly tells us, in the Consulship of L. Julius Cæsar, and “ C. Marcius Figulus. L. Julio Cæsare & C. Marcio Figulo Coss. filiolo me “ autum scito, salva Terentia.” Ad. Attic. l. i. ep. 2.

And Cicero’s French historian is of M. de St. Real’s opinion as to the day, as well as year, when Cicero wrote the letter in question.—La naissance du fils de Cicéron,—se trouve fixée au premier jour de 689, dans une lettre que le même Cicéron écrivoit à Atticus pour le presser d’arriver incessamment, par la raison du besoin qu’il avoit de lui auprès de quelques personnes puissantes qui paroissent vouloir le traverser dans sa demande. Morabin, Hist. de Cic. p. 92.

M. Mongault, in an answer to M. de St. Real, has given reasons for adhering to the opinion of the old commentators. But, it seems, his reasons were of no weight with either of the said historians, who could not be ignorant of what he has said on this head. M. Mongault writes thus: Cette lettre [the letter beginning with the words L. Julio Cæsare, &c.] a été écrite peu de tems après la précédente, comme M. de St. Real l’a reconnu lui même sans y penser lorsqu’il a traduit Ego de meis ad te rationibus scripsi antea diligenter, par je vous ai écrit, il n’y a guères, fort particulièrement sur ma prétention, ce qui a un rapport visible à la lettre précédente: or elle a été certainement écrite vers le dix-septième de Juillet, donc celle-ci a dû l’être avant le premier Janvier suivant. Mongault’s Remarks on Cic. Letters to Atticus, tome I. p. 89.

Mais voici quelque chose de plus décisif. Cicéron dit qu’il pensoit à plaider pour Catilina son compétiteur: or l’affaire de Catilina, dont Cicéron parle ici, fut jugée sous le consulat de Cotta & de Torquatus (688) Cæsar & Figulus n’étant encore que Consuls désignés.

We see that all the four writers above cited take for granted, that the trial of Catiline, on the accusation brought against him by Clodius, for

Y. R. 690. for male-administration in Afric, is the trial concerning which Cicero says, in the first letter, "If Catiline be acquitted, I shall certainly have him for a competitor;" and concerning which he says in the second letter, "I am thinking to defend my competitor Catiline."

Prepossessed with this persuasion, M. de St. Real and M. Morabin, to reconcile it with the date of the second letter, L. Julio Cesare and C. Marcia Figulo Coss. put off the trial to the year 689, when Cæsar and Figulus were actually in the Consulship; contrary to the express testimony of Cicero himself, who tells us, that the Consul Torquatus with all the ornaments of his Magistracy appeared at that trial, and was Catiline's advocate^a.

M. Mengault too, prepossessed with the persuasion, that both the letters speak of one and the same accusation (viz. that of Catiline's male-administration in Afric) in order, I suppose, to reconcile this persuasion with Cicero's testimony concerning the time when Catiline was tried on that accusation, will by all means have L. Julio Cesare and C. Marcio Figulo Coss. to mean when Cæsar and Figulus were CONSULS ELECT; but he stands alone in this particular.

Cicero's English historian, through a strange degree of inattention, has represented Cicero preparing in 689, a defence of Catiline, in a cause which, according to the said historian's own account, had been tried and determined the year before^b.

That the trial of Catiline for his male-administration in Afric was not the trial of which Cicero speaks in the second letter to Atticus, is sufficiently manifest from comparing the two letters together. In the first, Cicero says, Nobody but Galba has declared himself.-- If Catiline should happen to be acquitted, I shall certainly have him for a COMPETITOR. In the second, he says, I am thinking to defend my COMPETITOR Catiline. The trial, therefore, referred to in the first letter, was now over, and Catiline had been acquitted; he being actually at this time one of Cicero's Competitors.

If this be not satisfactory, what follows will, I imagine, remove all doubt; and may perhaps evince, that some modern historians, who treat professedly of the times in which Cicero lived, are not to be read without the same caution, which Cicero's English historian advises us to use, in reading the Greek historians Plutarch, Appian, and Dio, who, he says, were subject to prejudices in their relation of Roman affairs.

Midd.
Pref. p.
xxiv.

Catiline was twice tried upon criminal accusations, and twice acquitted: bis absolutum esse Lentulum, bis Catilinam. That his first trial was in the Consulship of Torquatus and Cotta, for oppressions and exactions in Africa, cannot be questioned by any body who has attended to what Cicero says in his oration for Sylla, and in that for Cælius.

Ad. Attic.
lib. i. ep.
16.

^a Orat. pro Sylla, 29. & pro Cæli. 4.

^b See Middleton's Life of Cicero, p. 138. compared with p. 146.

But another question arises—Whether Cicero pleaded for Catiline or not at that trial? “This question is not decided (says M. Mongault,) Asconius maintains the negative against Fenestella:” And M. Mongault^c, in support of Asconius’s opinion, adds, “There is no fragment remaining of Cicero’s oration, nor any citation from it;” An argument in which there seems but little force; because as Cicero in his posterior speeches and letters reproached Catiline so often, and so bitterly, with all his crimes, it is not likely the orator would preserve and publish a speech, wherein he had employed his eloquence to defend him.

Cicero’s French historian is of opinion, that Catiline having found means to bribe both his Accuser and the Judges, did not make application to Cicero to defend him, though the Orator was well disposed to do it. He imagines, that Catiline being aware of Cicero’s views, which did not coincide with his own, chose rather with money to purchase an acquittal, than owe it in any measure to a man with whom he so little agreed in sentiment^d.

Cicero’s English historian is positive, that Cicero did not defend Catiline, Midd. p. but imagines a different reason for his declining that task. He writes ^{139.} thus :

“Catiline was brought to a trial for his oppressions in Afric: He had been soliciting Cicero to undertake his defence; who at one time was much inclined, or determined rather, to do it, for the sake of obliging the nobles, especially Cesar and Craſſus, or of making Catiline at least his friend, as he signifies in a letter to Atticus: I design (says he) Ad Attic. i. 2. at present to defend my competitor Catiline, we have Judges to our mind, and yet such as the ACCUSER himself is pleased with: I hope, if he be acquitted, that he will be more ready to serve me in our common petition; but if it fall out otherwise, I shall bear it with patience. But Cicero changed his mind, and did not defend him; upon a nearer view,

^c M. Mongault thinks it highly probable, that Cicero, if he had defended Catiline, would in his speech in Tog. Cand. have reproached him with ingratitude, as he did the Tribune Mucius, whom he had formerly defended, when accused of robbery.

^d Catilina, qui quoiqu’accusé de concussion & par conséquent exclus de droit de toutes les charges, lui paroissoit le pretendant le plus formidable. En effet l’argent qu’il distribua à P. Clodius Pulcher son accusateur & à ses juges eux-mêmes lava dans le tems cet obstacle & il ne fut point obligé de recourir à Cicéron, qui s’étoit attendu à le défendre & qui en avoit au moins eu la volonté. Il s’étoit flatté qu’en se le conciliant par ce bon office ils s’entendroient mieux dans leur poursuite commune, & que Catilina le préféreroit à tout autre pour son collègue: en cela je n’ai garde de vouloir justifier Cicéron; sur tout après avoir appris de lui que Catilina étoit si manifestement coupable, qu’on auroit aussitôt nié qu’il fût jour en plein midi, que de détruire les preuves des son crime.

Catilina pressentit ses vues; & comme elles ne quadroient en rien avec les siennes, il aimoit mieux acheter son absolution à prix d’argent, que de s’engager à des retours, s’il arrivoit qu’il la dût à l’éloquence d’un homme avec qui il sympathisoit si peu. Morabin. Hist. de Cic. p. 91.

“ perhaps, of his designs and traiterous practices; to which he seems to “ allude, when, describing the art and dissimulation of Catiline, he de-Pro Cati. 6. clares, that he himself was once almost deceived by him, so as to take him “ for a good citizen, a lover of honest men, a firm and faithful friend, &c
 “ But it is not strange, that a candidate for the Consulship, in the career “ of his ambition, should think of defending a man of the first rank and “ interest in the City, when all the Consular Senators, and even the Consul “ himself, Torquatus, appeared with him at the trial, and gave testimony “ in his favour. Whom Cicero excused, when they were afterwards re“ proached with it, by observing, that they had no notion of his treasons, “ nor suspicion at that time of his conspiracy; but out of mere humanity and Pro Syll. 29. “ compassion defended a friend in distress, and in that crisis of his danger “ overlooked the infamy of his life.
 “ His prosecutor was P. Clodius, a young nobleman as profligate as “ himself; so that it was not difficult to make up matters with such an “ accuser, who for a sum of money agreed to betray the cause, and suffer Vid. in fr. 223. “ him to escape: which gave occasion to what Cicero said afterwards in “ a speech against him in the Senate, while they were suing together for Orat. in Toga Cand. “ the Consulship: Wretch! not to see that thou art not acquitted, but re- “ served to a severer trial, and heavier punishment.”

There are, to my apprehension, not a few infirmities in this passage of the celebrated historian's work. For,

1. The second letter to Atticus, to which reference is made, says not a word of Cæsar, or of Crassus, or of Cicero's being determined to defend Catiline, for the sake of obliging the nobles, but for the sake only of making Catiline his friend.

2. In the next place, the historian cites the authority of Asconius, for saying that Cicero did not defend Catiline; yet Asconius delivers that only as his opinion, in opposition to the assertion of Fenestella, and gives reasons which are of very little weight. By the way, it should be remembered, that the question upon which Asconius and Fenestella differ is, whether Cicero defended Catiline at his trial in 688, for extortion? Nobody supposes that Cicero, after making that invective called Orat. in Toga Candida, and after Catiline's repulse from the Consulship in 689, did actually defend him at his trial for murder; though this was most certainly the trial at which Cicero once purposed to defend him; it being apprehended, at the time when Cicero wrote the second letter to Atticus, that Catiline would, before the Consular elections of that year 689, be brought into judgment on the accusation of killing the proscribed.

3. The historian thinks it not improbable, that Cicero's change of mind proceeded from his having (in 688) a nearer view of Catiline's designs and traiterous practices; whereas we shall presently see, that in the latter part of the year 689, those traiterous practices were (according to Cicero)

Cicero) an absolute secret to the Consulars, who all appeared for him at the trial which he then underwent.

4. The historian relates, as if it were a thing not only credible, but certainly true, that Cicero, who speaks so often of the notoriety of Catiline's many and most atrocious crimes anterior to his conspiracy, and has represented his whole life as an uninterrupted series of uncommon wickedness, took him, nevertheless, or, at least, was once almost deceived by him, so as to take him for a good citizen, a lover of honest men, a firm and faithful friend.

5. There is no evidence, that all the Consular Senators appeared (as the historian pretends) for Catiline in 688, at his trial for oppressions and rapine: But we learn from a passage, in Orat. pro Sylla*, that all the * C. 29. Consulars did appear for Catiline at a posterior trial which he underwent. And when Cicero, in his speech in Tog. Cand. said to him, Wretch! not Vid. sup. to see that thou art not acquitted, but reserved only to a severer trial, and P. 322. heavier punishment, it is not more plain, that this menacing prediction related to a trial, which he had still to undergo, than it is, that this future trial would be for having killed some of the proscribed, and particu- Vid. supra. larly Marius Gratidianus; a fact which Catiline could not have the impu- P. 316. dence to deny. note (b)

From the passage in Cicero's speech for P. Sylla, to which I here refer, and which will presently be given at length, it is very evident that Torquatus, the prosecutor, apprehensive lest the advocation in Cicero, and the patronage of the CONSULARS, who had all been zealous in the measures taken to crush Catiline, might be considered, as a presumptive proof of Sylla's being entirely innocent of Catiline's conspiracy, had therefore reminded the Judges of the appearing of all the Consulars for Catiline himself, when brought into judgment upon a criminal accusation.—“ Yes” (answers Cicero) “ it is very true, they did appear for him: and your father, when Consul, was Catiline's advocate, at his trial for oppressions and rapine; but your father was then ignorant of his traiterous plots: nor did your father afterwards, when he had received some intimation of those plots, appear for him at his second trial, though all the other Consulars did; they being then as ignorant of his treasonable practices, as your father was at the time of the first trial. But when those men “ who had been really accomplices of Catiline in the conspiracy were brought into judgment for it, none of the Consulars appeared for them, or gave them the smallest assistance.” And the orator seems, on this occasion, to intimate, that treasons against the Senate was the only crime, from the punishment of which a man might not honourably defend the

* Those of the conspirators, who, after Catiline's defeat and death, were tried in form, found guilty and punished.

P. Sylla was, at the same time, accused by the younger Torquatus, and defended by Cicero.

Vid. supr.
p. 207.

guilty : [yet he had formerly censured Hortensius with some severity for defending Verres.]

Accusati sunt uno nomine CONSULARES.—Affuerunt, inquit, Catilinæ, illumque laudarunt. Nulla tum patebat, nulla erat cognita conjuratio : defendebant amicum, aderant supplici, vite ejus turpitudinem in summis ejus periculis non insequabantur. Quin etiam parens tuus, TORQUATE, CONSUL, reo de pecuniis repetundis Catilinæ fuit advocatus :—At idem non adfuit ALIO IN JUDICIO, CUM ADESSENT CETERI. Si POSTEA cognorat ipse aliquid, quod IN CONSULATU ignorasset : ignoscendum est iis, qui POSTEA nihil audierunt. Sin illa res de pecuniis repetundis PRIMA valuit : non inveterata, quàm recens, debuit esse gravior. Sed si tuus parens etiam in illa suspitione periculi sui, tamen humanitate adductus advocationem hominis improbissimi Sella curuli, atque ornamentis & suis, & consulatus honestavit ; quid est quamobrem CONSULARES, qui Catilinæ adfuerunt, reprehendantur ? At iidem iis, qui † ante hunc [Syllam] causam de conjuratione dixerunt, non adfuerint. TANTO SCelere adstrictis hominibus statuerunt nihil a se adjumenti, nihil opis, nihil auxilii ferri oportere. Orat. pro Sylla, 29.

† Lege.
Plautia de Vi interro-gati. Vid.
Cic. pro
Cœl. 29.

M. Crevier, being fully persuaded, I suppose, that the second letter to Atticus was written in the Consulship of L. Cæsar and C. Figulus [A. U. 689,] and therefore that Cicero's determination, there mentioned, to defend Catiline, could not relate to his trial for oppressions, which was over, writes thus :

Tome XI.
p. 409.

“ Cicero the year before, when he was preparing to stand this year (689) for the Consulship, had said, upon seeing Catiline accused of extortion, we shall certainly have him for a competitor, if it be judged that it is not light at noon-day. Catiline was tried and acquitted ; and being afterwards accused either of incestuous commerce with the Vestal Fabia^f, or of the murder of the proscribed, applied himself to Cicero,
“ to

^f “ For the incest, which Catiline committed with the Vestal Fabia, a criminal prosecution, in form, (says M. Crevier, Tom. IX. p. 361.) was commenced against him. But Fabia was Cicero's wife's sister, and Catiline was protected by Catulus. Favour prevailed, and the criminals were acquitted. It will perhaps appear surprising, that Catulus, a man of worth, and a good citizen, should interest himself for Catiline.” [N.B. It is the character here given of Catulus, which, being supposed his due, occasions the surprize at his appearing in favour of Catiline ; but the wonder ceases at once, when we call to mind that Catulus was one of Sylla's creatures, and a brother satellite of Catiline, and his zealous defender, when tried for the murder of the proscribed ; by the confiscation of whose estates, Catulus, Hortensius, Metellus Pius, and the rest of the murderous crew, were become rich.] M. Crevier, for the fact of Catiline's being tried for the affair of the Vestal, cites Ascon. in Or. Cic. in Toga Cand. and Orosius, l. vi. c. 3. But Asconius does not say it, but seems rather to intimate, that Fabia only was tried. Vid. supr. p. 315. note^f. What Orosius says, is this : Eodem anno [683] apud Romanam Catilina incesti accusatus, quod cum Fabia virgine Vestali commisisse arguebatur, Catuli gratia fulius evasit.

Without

to be his defender. It is not certainly known, whether Cicero pleaded so bad a cause; but it is certain, that he was not averse to the undertaking, and that he reasoned thus. Either I shall get him acquitted, in which case I may count upon his hearty concurrence with me in our common suit for the Consulship; or he will be condemned, and in that case I shall not be entirely disconsolate."

Now if Cicero defended, or designed to defend, Catiline, in a trial which he underwent in the year 689, it could be no other, than that for killing the proscribed; for it does not appear, that he was ever tried upon the affair of the Vestal.

"Catiline, says Cicero's English historian, was suspected also at the same time [in 689] of another heinous and capital crime, an incestuous commerce with Fabia, one of the Vestal virgins and sister to Cicero's wife. This was charged upon him so loudly by common fame, and gave such scandal to the City, that Fabia was brought to a trial for it; but, either through her innocence, or the authority of her brother Cicero, she was readily acquitted: which gave occasion to Cicero to say, among other reproaches on his flagitious life, That there was no place so sacred, whither his very visits did not carry pollution, and leave the imputation of guilt, where there was no real crime subsisting."

Though the learned historian speaks here of the affair of the Vestal as in the year 689, [Catiline was also suspected at the same time, &c.] yet, according to Orosius, the only writer (and he was of the fifth century) who reports that Catiline was tried on that accusation, the trial was about the year 683; and, according to Sallust, who is our best authority, the incest was committed when Catiline was a young man, or, at most, not old enough to stand for the Consulship: He was adolescens.

Nor is it credible, that Cicero would threaten Catiline with a trial for that crime, of which the Orator believed, or pretended, at least, to believe him innocent.

It may fairly be concluded, therefore, that the cause in question was the impeachment of Catiline for killing some of the proscribed; and that at this trial Catulus, and all the other worthy Consulars, with whom Catiline lived in strict friendship, appeared in his defence, gave him an excellent character [illum laudarunt] and got him acquitted. Catulus indeed was particularly interested in this affair, on account of the great honour which, by one of the murders in question, had been done to his father; to whose manes, and at whose tomb, Marius Gratidianus was, by Catiline, most devoutly and most bloodily sacrificed.

Vid. supr.
p. 161.

Without debating whether these words of Orosius, (from which, if what the writer says be true, it would follow that Catiline underwent three trials in all] be of any force against Cicero's bis absolutum Catilinam, I shall only observe, that the time, in which Orosius places this trial, proves that it could not be the same trial at which Cicero, in the second letter to Atticus, declares his design to defend the criminal.

And

And now, that I may pursue the purpose of this digression, Does it not indicate an extreme and most unreasonable prejudice against Cæsar, to impute, without any hesitation, to him principally the acquittal of Catiline, and give this acquittal as one proof, among many (equally cogent) of Cæsar's pernicious designs against his country?

For thus proceeds Cicero's English historian, after mentioning Cæsar's being one of the Assistant Judges to the Prætor who was to sit upon the Sicarii:—"This gave him an opportunity of citing before him as criminals, and condemning by the Law of Assassinate, all those, who in Sylla's prescription had been known to kill, or receive money for killing a proscribed citizen; which money Cato also, when he was Quæstor the year before, had made them refund to the treasury. Cæsar's view was [not to execute justice upon those murderers, whom Cato had in effect already condemned as murderers, but] to mortify the Senate, and ingratiate himself with the People, by reviving the Marian cause, which had always been popular, and of which he was naturally the head, on account of his near relation to old Marius. For which purpose he had the hardiness likewise [when Ædile in 688] to replace in the Capitol those trophies and statues of Marius, which Sylla had ordered to be thrown down and broken to pieces. But while he was prosecuting with such severity the agents of Sylla's cruelty, he not only spared, but favoured Catiline, who was one of the most cruel in spilling the blood of the proscribed; having butchered with his own hands, and in a manner the most brutal, C. Marius Gratidianus, a favourite of the People, nearly related both to Marius and Cicero; whose head he carried in triumph through the streets to make a present of it to Sylla. But Cæsar's zeal provoked *L. Paullus [L. Luceius] to bring Catiline also under the lash of the same Law, and to accuse him in form, after his repulse from the Consulship [consequently after Midsummer 689,] of the murder of many Citizens in Sylla's proscriptions, of which, though he was notoriously guilty, yet, contrary to all expectation, he was acquitted." [Bis absolutum Catilinam. Ad Att. i. 16. Sallust. 31. Dio, l. xxxvi. p. 34.]

* L. Paullus was not the accuser of Catiline in this cause, nor in this year 689; but towards the end of the year 690, upon the Plautian Law of treason: and no trial ensued. See Sallust. — Asconius writes thus: Catilina est absolutus quem post repulsum in petitione Consulatus L. Lucullus, qui postea quoque eundem honorem petiit, lege de Sicariis postulaverat. On which words Freinsheimius makes the following comment. Haud facile est statuere, quis sit hic Lucullus. Asconius, ex quo hæc desumpta sunt, paulo post mentionem facit orationum Luceii in Catilinam. Hinc nobis verisimile videtur hic legendum esse Luceius, pro L. Lucullus. Pulcrè enim omnia conveniunt. Hic accusator Catilinæ dicitur ab Asconio fuisse paratus eruditusque: Luceii eruditio nota est ex epistolis ad eum Ciceronis. Idem qui Catilinam nunc accusat, consulatum postea petiit nec consecutus est. Luceius consulatum cum Cæsare & Bibulo frustra petiit.

M. Crevier is not so positive, as to Cæsar's partiality in this affair; he ventures no farther than conjecture.

“ The severity with which Cato had made the murderers of the pro- “ scribed refund the money they had received out of the treasury, cleared
 “ the way for Cæsar's condemnation of them as guilty of murder. It “ is perhaps the only public affair, wherein Cato and Cæsar were of one “ mind. Cæsar, on the expiration of his Ædileship, accepted a commis“ sion for trying Homicides. He was then what the Romans called Ju- “ dex Questionis; that is, a commissioner appointed to preside in the “ place of a Prætor, at the trial of causes within a certain jurisdiction.
 “ He probably contrived to get this employment, in order to bring into “ judgment, and to punish, as murderers, those who had killed the “ proscribed, though they were excepted by name in Sylla's Laws.
 “ They had been already condemned, in some manner, by Cato; and “ when they were brought before Cæsar's Tribunal, the People had the “ satisfaction of seeing them punished for those very crimes, which they “ had before been rewarded for perpetrating. The catastrophe of those “ villains was matter of public rejoicing. Among the condemned was a “ centurion, called L. Luscius, whom Sylla's victory had so enriched, “ that he was at this time worth ten millions of sesterces. Bellicus, “ Catiline's uncle, who had killed Lucretius Ofella, was also con“ demned. But Catiline, the most criminal of them all, was, upon “ trial, acquitted. History does not tell us the reason of this inequality “ in the sentences of the Judges, where the causes were so similar. We “ may CONJECTURE, that Cæsar was too much Catiline's friend, to be “ willing to destroy him. In consequence of this acquittal, Catiline, “ loaded with crimes, a conspirator against the State, thrice brought into “ judgment upon heavy accusations, and as often acquitted (without cea“ sing to be thought criminal) was now [in 689] in a condition to stand for “ the Consulship.”

The reader may observe, that Catiline is almost as troublesome to the commentators in their way, as he was to Cicero in his way.

M. de St. Real, and M. Morabin, to get rid of their difficulties, have contradicted Cicero in relation to the TIME when Catiline was tried for extortion.

M. Mongault has been constrained to make L. Cæfare, C. Figulo Coss. mean the year when Cæsar and Figulus were CONSULS ELECT: And, with regard to the *time, when Catiline was tried for killing the proscribed,

* Upon the words bis absolutum esse Lentulum, bis Catilinam (in Cicero's 16th letter to Atticus, (lib. i.) written in 692, M. Mongault makes the following remark.

“ Que Lentulus & Catilina avoient été ab-

“ sous chacun-eux fois.” — Catilina avoit été “ mis en justice LA PREMIERE FOIS pour “ avoir fait mourir inhumainement du tems de “ Sylla, Marius Gratidianus, cousin germain “ du pere de Cicero, & qui avoit été adopté par

scribed, to contradict every writer, ancient and modern, who has mentioned that trial.

Vid. sup.
p. 325. Cicero's English historian, as I observed before, has, through inattention, fallen into an absurdity like that of yesterday we shall go into the country.

M. Crevier, though avoiding the mistakes of the other four, has, contrary to the testimony of Alconius, and the evidence of Cicero's own words, in his invective in Toga Canadina, represented the trial of Catiline for murder, as prior to his repuise from the Consulship, and prior to that invective. And he speaks of Catiline as having been thrice tried and acquitted before his standing for the Consulship, whereas in fact he had been but once brought into judgment; which was for male-administration in Afric.

Vid. sup.
p. 324. And when M. Crevier says, "History does not tell us the reason why the judgments of the court were so unlike, when the causes were so similar," it is plain, that he has overlooked what Cicero himself (M. Crevier's principal historian for these times) confesses, that all the Consular Senators (except Torquatus) appeared for Catiline at his trial, posterior to that for oppressions, consequently his trial for murdering the proscribed.
Orat. pro Sylla, 29.

Vid. sup.
p. 326.
note (c) With regard to this trial of Catiline for murder, I further observe, that though his acquittal be imputed, by some modern writers, to Cæsar, as if he were the sole judge at the trial, yet it is evident, that more Judges than one sat upon the cause, and it is not clear, that Cæsar was of the number. We have, says Cicero, (who then purposed to be Catiline's advocate) judges to our mind, yet such as the accuser himself is perfectly content with. Judices habemus quos volumus, summa accusatoris voluntate. And if Luceius, Cicero's particular^b friend and great admirer, was the accuser, (which seems highly probable) have we not good ground to suspect that the whole transaction was collusive? After Cato had forced the assassins to refund the pecuniary rewards of their villainies, and after Cæsar had set on foot prosecutions against them as murderers, it was hardly possible for Catiline to avoid a trial. The business therefore of the Optimates, the intimate friends of Catiline, was to provide a prosecutor and an advocate, and judges, through whose prevarication, eloquence, and iniquity, he might be sure to escape; especially as the most eminent Patriots, the Consuls, the Chiefs of the Honest, were to appear to his character, and par le grand Marius; & il fut accusé depuis

" de concussio, comme on a vu dans les let" tres x & xi. de ce livre, Catilia avoit en" core été accusé d'avoir eu commerce avec
" une Vestale; mais Cicéron ne parle point
" de cette accusation, parce que cette Vestale
" étoit sœur de la femme, & qu'il suppose

" qu'elle avoit été accusée sans fonde-
" ment."

^b This is the eminently learned man, who, at Cicero's request, undertook to write the history of Cicero's Consulship, and to praise his conduct beyond its merit. Ep. Fam. 12. Ad Att. iv. 6.

make make his panegyric. It is a great pity, that we have not the oration which Cicero had prepared in defence of Catiline's hacking to pieces Marius Gratidianus, the Orator's near kinsman, and carrying the bloody head, plenum animæ & spiritus, through the streets, to make a present of it to Sylla. The fact being confessed*, the Orator's task was only to shew, that it was a glorious action, and highly beneficial to the Re-

* Vid. sup. p. 316. note (c.)

I pass now to the examination of that charge against Cæsar, which is so often repeated by modern writers of Roman history. He is represented as forming projects, even from his early youth, to overturn the Commonwealth, invade the liberties of his fellow-citizens, enslave his country, and to do, nobody knows what! "Cæsar's whole life," says Cicero's English historian, Midd. p. 225. "made it probable that there could hardly be any plot in which he had not some share." Yet of his evil dispositions before Cicero's Consulship, or even at that time, there is not the least shadow of evidence produced: But, instead of proper proof, we have his speaking honourably of his aunt and of his wife at their funerals; his erecting, when Ædile, the statue of Marius, and his espousing the popular party, against the faction of Sylla's cut-throats, and the creatures of his usurped despotism.

In order to set this matter in a true light, let us consider the import of the words Republic, Free-State, Constitution, when they are used in relating the history of these times.

Cicero's English historian, in a treatise which he published on the Roman Senate, contends, that, "by the original Constitution of the government, p. 33. & 110. even under the kings, the collective body of the People was the real sovereign of Rome, and the dernier resort in all cases."—And that even in the most outrageous "insults on the authority of the Senate, p. 123. though the honest of all ranks loudly inveighed against them, and detested the authors of them as men of dangerous views, who aspired to powers that threatened the liberty of the City; yet none ever pretended to say, that the acts themselves were illegal, or that the PEOPLE had not a clear right, by the very Constitution of the Republic, to command and enact whatever they thought expedient."

And the same writer tells us, that, before Cicero's Consulship, this Democracy had been changed by Sylla into an Aristocracy.

"Sylla having subdued all who were in arms against him, was now Midd. Life of Cic. p. 31. at leisure to take his full revenge on their friends and adherents; in which, by the detestable method of a proscription, of which he was the first inventor, he exercised a more infamous cruelty than had ever been practised in cold blood, in that, or, perhaps, any other City. The proscription was not confined to Rome, but carried through all the towns of Italy, where, besides the crime of party, which was pardoned to none, it was fatal to be possessed of money, lands, or a pleasant seat; all manner of licence being indulged to an insolent army, of Sallust. xv. Plut. in Syll.

Plut. in Syll. p. 32.

Vell. Pat.
ii. 28.

“ carving for themselves what fortunes they pleased.—As soon as the “ proscriptions were over, and the scene grown a little calm, L. Flaccus, “ being chosen Inter-rex, declared Sylla Dictator for settling the state of “ the Republic, without any limitation of time, and ratified whatever he “ had done, or should do, by a special Law, that impowered him to put “ any Citizen to death, without bearing or trial. This office of Dictator, “ which in early times had oft been of singular service to the Repub“ lic in cases of difficulty and distress, was now grown odious and suspected “ in the present state of its wealth and power, as dangerous to the public “ liberty, and for that reason had been wholly disused, and laid aside,
 “ for one hundred and twenty years; so that Flaccus's Law was the pure “ effect of force and terror; and though pretended to be made by the “ People, was utterly detested by them. Sylla, however, being invested
 “ by it with absolute authority, made many useful regulations for the better “ order of the government; and by the plenitude of his power changed “ in great measure the whole constitution of it, from a democratical to an “ aristocratical form, by advancing the prerogative of the Senate, and “ depressing that of the People. He took from the Equestrian order the “ judgment of all causes, which they had enjoyed from the time of the Gracchi,
 “ and restored it to the Senate; deprived the People of the right of choosing “ the priests, and replaced it in the colleges of priests; but above all, he “ abridged the immoderate power of the Tribunes, which had been the chief “ source of all their civil dissensions; for he made them incapable of any other “ Magistracy after the Tribunate; restrained the liberty of appealing to them; “ took from them their capital privilege, of proposing Laws to the People;
 “ and left them nothing but their negative; or, as Cicero says, the power “ only of helping, not of hurting any one. But that he might not be sus“ pected of aiming at a perpetual tyranny, and a total subversion of the “ Republic, he suffered the Consuls to be chosen in a regular manner, and “ to govern, as usual, in all the ordinary affairs of the City: whilst he “ employed himself in reforming the disorders of the State, by putting “ his new Laws in execution; and in distributing the confiscated lands of the “ adverse party among his Legions: So that the REPUBLIC seemed to be “ once more SETTLED ON A LEGAL BASIS, and the Laws and judicial pro“ ceedings began to flourish in the Forum.”

After giving this account of Sylla's usurpation and tyranny, and after relating his end, the historian has these very curious passages:

“ The historian, when he says, that the im“ moderate power of the Tribunes had been the “ chief source of all the civil dissensions at Rome, “ seems to have forgot that the same immoderate “ power had likewise been the only source “ of the real liberty, the public virtue, the con“ quests, and the glory of the Republic; and that the ABUSE of the Tribunitian Authority had been wholly occasioned by the ambition, avarice, and usurpations of the Aristocratic faction, Cicero's benefactors, his good Citizens.

 See Introduction to the fourth book of this history; and Introduction to the seventh book.

“ Sylla

“ Sylla had one felicity peculiar to himself, of being the only man in history, in whom the odium of the most barbarous ¹ cruelties was extinguished ⁵⁰.
 “ by the glory of his great acts. Cicero, though he had a good opinion of “ his cause, yet detested the inhumanity of his victory, and never speaks of him
 “ with respect, nor of his government, but as a proper tyranny; calling him ^{De Fin.}
 “ a master of three most pestilent vices, luxury, avarice, and cruelty.” ^{De Off. ii. 8.}

Notwithstanding the peculiar felicity abovementioned, Cicero, we see, remembers Sylla's inhumanity, and never speaks of him with respect; and
 “ As soon as Sylla was dead, the old dissensions, that had been smothered a while by the terror of his power, burst out again into a flame, ^{Midd. p. 50.}
 “ between the two factions, supported severally by the two Consuls, Q.
 “ Catulus and M. Lepidus, who were wholly opposite to each other in “ party and politics. Lepidus resolved at all adventures, to rescind the “ acts of Sylla, and recal the exiled Marians; and began openly to solicit
 “ the People to support him in that resolution: but his attempt, though “ plausible, was factious and unseasonable, tending to overturn THE PRESENT “ SETTLEMENT of the REPUBLIC, which, after its late wounds and “ loss of civil blood, wanted nothing so much as rest and quiet, to recover “ a tolerable degree of strength.” That is to say, Sylla's gang of robbers and murderers wanted nothing so much as public peace and quiet, that they might have no disturbance in the enjoyment of their plunder and depredations. And Catulus, the colleague of Lepidus, being one of that gang, and being aided by the rest, disappointed all his designs, though, “ he had with him several of the chief Magistrates, and the “ good wishes of all the Tribunes,” and of all the popular party; in whose minds the odium of Sylla's cruelties was not extinguished by the glory of his great acts.

But whoever might dislike Sylla's establishment, it was factious (in the opinion of the historian above cited) to solicit the People to make any alteration in it.

The very ingenious M. Crevier is of the same opinion. Speaking of that wise sentence pronounced by Catulus, on occasion of Cæsar's erecting the statue of Marius — Cæsar no longer undermines, but openly attacks ^{Vid. sup. p. 305.}

^d M de l'Abbé de St. Real speaks to the same effect; only he imputes the oblivion, into which Sylla's cruelties were cast, to his ABDICATION alone.

Sylla, par un retour inespéré ennuyé de vengeance, de pouvoir, de sang & de commandement; moins peut-être par moderation, & par grandeur d'ame, comme on l'a toujours publié, que par inquiétude; s'avisâ de quitter sa Dictature & l'Empire, & de remettre le commandement entre les mains des Consuls: Changement prodigieux, qui rendit dès ce jour Sylla l'Idole des Romains. On oublia tout le sang de la proscription; pour ne se ressouvenir que de la liberté rendue; & on vit en lui l'exemple d'un usurpateur le plus violent, & le plus sanguinaire, mort paisiblement dans son lit, aimé, adoré de tous les citoyens. [These last words are mere romance, as the whole sequel of the history evinces.] Si SYLLA avoit toujours été bon Republicain, on l'auroit moins aimé, que quand, après avoir subjugué sa patrie, il lui a plu de lui rendre la liberté. Tome iii. p. 61.

Tom. XI. the Republic.—"The reflection was just. The government was at that time
 P. 265. "founded upon the Laws and Institutions of Sylla, and it was not possible to "revive the party of Marius [i. e. the popular party] without introdu"cing a general subversion of all things."

Again, "We have seen, that Sylla had deprived them [the sons of the "proscribed] of the capacity of holding dignities, and of being admitted P. 323. "into the Senate. This was very hard: but Sylla's Institutions were then "the basis of the government, and it was impossible to infringe him, with"out putting the whole State into confusion. The Consul [Cicero] was "therefore obliged to oppose their demand, how equitably however it "seemed."

The learned writer will, I hope, excuse me, if I say, that the reason he assigns for thinking that Catulus spoke wisely, and Cicero acted justly in the instances mentioned, could have no place in the minds of Catulus and Cicero: because, in fact, the Laws and Institutions of Sylla, were not the basis of the government, when Catulus uttered his wisdom in 688; nor when Cicero opposed the demand made by the sons of the proscribed, in 690.

The principal Laws and Institutions of Sylla, those that concerned the constitution of the government, had been abrogated some years before. The TRIBUNES had been reinstated in the ancient privileges of the P. 211. Tribunate: to the PEOPLE had been restored the prerogative of electing
 P. 306. the priests; and the SENATORS had been deprived of the sole right of judi-
 P. 212. cature.

Except the practice of chusing annually twenty Quæstors, instead of Eight, to supply the numerous vacancies in the Senate, whose complement of members Sylla had much enlarged, scarce any thing remained of his innovations, but the new Senators, whom he had made powerful by making * See p. 329 them rich, in the manner described * above.

These ruffians and their creatures were Cicero's REPUBLIC, and their settlement in the possession of all the power of the State was the settlement, which he was so zealous to maintain and preserve; and which the sons of the proscribed, had they been restored (as equity required) to a capacity of holding public dignities, and of being admitted into the Senate, might possibly have endangered. As Cæsar had no zeal for the preservation of this settlement, but was for reinstating the children of the proscribed in the rights and privileges they were born to, we see in what sense he was, at this time, an enemy to the REPUBLIC.

I shall here add M. Vertot's account of the State of Rome, when Cicero was Consul.

Vert. Rev. "Debauchery, luxury, and their natural consequence, poverty, gave Rom. l. "birth to Catiline's conspiracy: the excessive ambition of some private xiii. "men strengthened it, at a time when Rome had scarce any thing left of "a Republican government, besides the bare name. The great ones alone
 "reigned

“reigned with absolute authority, The whole administration was centered “in a few families, who handed the Consular dignity about from one to “another². A small number of Citizens, by turns, disposed of the “command of the armies, as also the government and revenues of the “provinces. They being arbiters of peace and war, and accustomed to “the homages and honours that go along with sovereign power, it hap“pened very seldom, that any of them, at the quitting of their great “places, could easily resolve to return to a private life, because this “would put them again upon a level with their Fellow-Citizens. Some “gained the affection of their soldiers, either by a remissness in military “discipline, or by self-interested liberalities. Others bought with large “sums the votes of the people, to raise themselves, or their creatures, to “the chief posts. Those that were out-bribed, and lost the day, eased “their envy, by endeavouring to render the power of their rivals sus“pected, and cast about to promote their ruin at the expence of the pub“lic peace.”

If this be a true account of the Roman Government and Admini- stration in the time of Cicero, can this nominal REPUBLIC be called Rome in its Free-State? the REPUBLIC in its ancient Form and Constitution? Yet this is that REPUBLIC; of which, as if it were in its perfect^{*} state, ^{Vid. sup.}
Cicero's English historian, in giving the character of his hero, thus ^{P. 3.} writes :

“As to his public conduct, no man was ever a more determined ^{Vol. II. p.}
 “PATRIOT, or a warmer lover of his country than he. His whole cha- ^{562.}
 “racter, natural temper, choice of life and principles, made its true “interest inseparable from his own. His general view, therefore, was al“ways one and the same, to support the peace and liberty of the Republic, “in that Form and Constitution of it which their ancestors had delivered down
 “to them. He looked upon that as the only foundation on which it could be “supported.”

We have seen, that he was not of this mind when he spoke against Ru- lus's Agrarian Law, nor when he rejected the petition of the sons of the proscribed; for then he thought Sylla's Laws and Institutions were the only ^{Vid. sup.} basis upon which the government could stand. ^{p. 289.}

That Cicero, to the time of his attaining the Consulship, never had any view in his public conduct, but his own interest and elevation, is abundantly manifest from so much of his history as has been given in the fore-^{290, 291.}

² Cicero's election to the Consulship, who was a New-man, and whose promotion is wholly ascribed to his merit, might seem to oppose what is here said, if Sallust had not made us known, that the elevation of the Orator to that dignity, was but an exception from a general rule, and chiefly owing to the public's being alarmed with the rumour of a dreadful conspiracy ready to break out, of which the courtezan Fulvia had, to many persons, given hints and intimations.

³ See a citation in p. 205, from Middle- ton's Life of Cicero.

going pages. What his views were in his public conduct during his Magistracy, and after the expiration of it, we shall know by impartially considering his conduct. But the secret of all his politics and patriotism is sufficiently divulged by his panegyrist, where he says, “It is certain there
 M. id. vol. II. p. 157. “ was not a man in the Republic so particularly engaged, both by principle “ and interest to wish well to its liberty,” [i. e. to its being absolutely governed by the SENATE, under the influence of Cicero] “ or who had so much “ to lose by the subversion of it: For he was undoubtedly the First Citizen
 “ in it; had the Chief Influence in the SENATE, the chief authority with “ the People,—as long as it was governed by civil methods, and stood “ upon the foundation of its Laws:” With which Laws * the SENATE frequently dispensed; as did Cicero himself, during his Consulship, as we shall presently see: And there is hardly an assassin mentioned in the Roman story, whose merit, if he killed a popular man, is not extolled by Cicero for the heroic deed. But none have a larger share of the Orator’s praises than Scipio Nasica and Opimius, the murderers of the two Gracchi; the two best Citizens perhaps that Rome could ever boast.

* See
 M. id.
 Treat. on the Rom.
 Senate, p.
 116.

Thus much it was thought proper to observe concerning Cicero and his politics, that we may thence collect the degree of credit which is due to those parts of the Roman history, which have been received upon the authority of Cicero alone, particularly men’s characters, and the motives from which they acted.

Pr. f. xix.
 xx.

“ As to the nature of my work,” says Cicero’s English historian, “ tho’
 “ the title of it carries nothing more than the history of Cicero’s Life; yet it “ might properly enough be called the history of Cicero’s Times: since from “ his first advancement to the public magistracies, there was not any thing
 “ of moment transacted in the State, in which he did not bear an eminent “ part: so that, to make the whole work of a piece, I have given a summary account of the Roman affairs during the time even of his minority;
 “ and agreeably to what I promised in my proposals, have carried on a “ series of history, through a period of above sixty years, [that is, from “ A. U. 647, when Cicero was born, to 710,] which for the importance “ of the events, and the dignity of the persons concerned in them, is by “ far the most interesting of any in the annals of Rome.

“ In the execution of this design, I have pursued, as closely as I could,
 “ that very PLAN, which Cicero himself had sketched out, for the model of a complete history, where he lays it down as a fundamental “ law, That the writers should not dare to affirm what was false, or to suppress what was true; nor give any suspicion, either of favour or disaffection: That, in the relation of facts, he should observe the order of time, and sometimes add the description of places; should first explain the counsels; then the acts; and, lastly, the events of things: That in the counsels, he should interpose his own judgment on the merit of them; in the acts, relate not only what was done, but how it was done; in the events, shew what share chance, or rashness, or prudence, had in them: that he should “ describe “ described likewise the particular characters of all the great persons, who bear “ any considerable part in the story; and should dress up the whole in a clear “ and equable stile, without affecting any ornaments, or seeking any other praise, “ but of perspicuity.

“ As I have borrowed my PLAN, so I have drawn my materials also from “ Cicero; whose works are the most authentic monuments that remain to us, “ of all the great transactions of that age: being the original accounts of one,
 “ who himself was not only a spectator, but a principal actor in them. There “ is not a single part of his writings, which does not give some light as Vid sup “ well into his own history, as into that of the Republic: But his familiar 276 and “ letters, and, above all, those to Atticus, may justly be called the memoirs of 277.
 “ the times; for they contain not only a distinct account of every memorable “ event, but lay open the springs and motives, whence each of them proceeded;
 “ so that as a polite writer, who lived in that very age, and perfectly knew Corn.
 “ the merit of those letters, says, the man who reads them, will have no oc- Nep. in Vit.
 “ casion for any other history of those times¹. Attic. 16.

Another polite writer, Thuanus, is of opinion, that we have no histories, upon the truth of which we can depend, but such as have been written of transactions, wherein the historians themselves were principal actors, and have been sincere enough to speak the truth of their own motives and purposes. Whether Cicero had this sincerity, and likewise a due degree of candour in speaking of the motives and purposes of the Chiefs of the opposite party, the reader will judge occasionally.

Sallust, after relating the universal prevalency, at Rome, of those vices that are the ruin of States, rapacious covetousness, shameless venality, and boundless luxury, adds, that Catiline had collected, which, in such

CATI-LINE'S CONSPI-RACY.

Pref. p.
xxii.

¹ The historian, however, has made some use of other helps.—“ After I had gone through my review of Cicero's writings, my next recourse was to the other ancients, both Greeks and Romans, who had touched upon the affairs of that age. Those served me chiefly to fill up the interstices of general history, and to illustrate several passages, which were but slightly mentioned by Cicero; as well as to add some stories and circumstances, which tradition had preserved, concerning Cicero himself, or any of the chief actors, whose characters I had delineated.

“ But the Greek historians, who treat professedly of these times, Plutarch, Appian, Dio, though they are all very useful for illustrating many important facts of ancient history, which would otherwise have been “ lost, or imperfectly transmitted to us, are “ yet not to be read without some caution, as “ being strangers to the language, and customs “ of Rome, and liable to frequent mistakes, as “ well as subject to prejudices in their relation

 “ of Roman affairs.”

[N. B. We are not to understand this as said of all the Greek historians, who have treated of Roman affairs, but of those Greek historians who have written of these times, [and who do not speak so advantageously of Cicero, as his English historian could wish:] For with regard to other times, [in which Cicero is not concerned, and when we have a favourite hypothesis to support,] one Greek historian ought to be of greater authority with us than all the Latin writers together. Middleton's Treatise of the Roman Senate, p. 20. See Observations, &c. p. 80.]

a City

a City it was not difficult to, a band of needy profligates, who attended him as guards to his person: that he had been very assiduous in seeking intimacies with young persons chiefly, whose minds being soft and pliable were easily moulded to what fashion he pleased: that some of these he provided with harlots; others with horses and dogs; and spared no cost to gratify the favourite passions, whatever they were, of his followers. The young men, thus seduced, and made indigent by squandering their fortunes, he trained up to every kind of wickedness; with fearless impudence to become false witnesses; forged deeds; and not to stick even at murder; which they sometimes committed without provocation, without temptation, and merely to keep their hands in exercise^k.

Depending on the aid of these his friends and associates, he formed a design to overturn the government; and raise himself to supreme power. And it is said, that his scheme was not without a foundation of probability; Italy being drained in a manner of regular forces; Pompey at a great distance, with the best army of the empire; all things quiet at home; the Senate in a careless security; and he himself in great hopes of obtaining the Consulship. But it was chiefly from the support of Sylla's veteran soldiers, whose cause he had always espoused, and among whom he had been bred, that he promised himself success in his enterprize. These, to the number of about 100,000, had been settled in the several colonies and districts of Italy, in the possession of lands assigned to them by Sylla, which the generality had since wasted by their vices and luxury; so that they wanted another civil war to repair their shattered fortunes.

Cic. pro
Mur. xxiii.

Sallust.

About the Beginning of June (689) in the Consulship of L. Cæsar and C. Figulus, Catiline began to open his project to his confidants; to each of them at first alone: and having sounded them sufficiently, so as to perceive their several tempers and dispositions, he called together all those who were the most distressed in their affairs, and the most desperately bold; judging it now adviseable to speak to them in a body. In this assembly, there were, of Senatorian rank, P. Cornelius Lentulus Sura, P. Autronius, L. Cassius Longinus, C. Cetegus, P. Sylla and S. Sylla, (the sons of Servius Sylla) L. Vargunteius, Q. Annius, M. Porcius Lecca, L. Bestia, and ^k N. B. We are to suppose that Catiline had the skill to do all this, and to perpetrate numberless other crimes (during a course of more than twenty years profligacy) in such a way, as did not render him, in appearance, unworthy of the friendship of the HONEST, Cæsar, and the CONSULARS, &c.—For Cicero himself, with all his penetration, was once almost deceived by him, so as to take him for a good Citizen, a lover of honest men, a firm and faithful friend. Me ipsum, me inquam, quondam ille penè decepit, cum & civis mihi bonus & optimi cujusque cupidus, & firmus amicus & fidelis videretur. Cujus ego facinora oculis prius quam opinione, manibus antè, quam suspitione, deprehendi. Cujus in magnis catervis amicorum, si fuit etiam Cælius, magis est, ut ipse molestè ferat errasse se, sicut nunquam in eodem homine me quoque erroris mei permittet, quam ut istius amicitie crimen reformidet. Pro Cælio, 6. One of the articles in the charge against Cælius, was, that he had lived in friendship with Catiline.

Q. Curius: Of the Equestrian order, M. Fulvius Nobilior, L. Statilius, P. Gabinius Capito, and C. Cornelius.

Lentulus was descended from a Patrician branch of the Cornelian family, one of the most numerous, as well as the most splendid, in Rome. His grandfather had borne the title of prince of the Senate, and was the most active in the pursuit and destruction of C. Gracchus, in which he received a dangerous wound. The grandson, by the favour of his noble birth, had been advanced to the Consulship about eight years before, but was turned out of the Senate soon after by the Censors, for the notorious infamy of his life, till by obtaining the Prætorship a second time, which he now actually enjoyed, he recovered his former place and rank in that supreme council. His parts were but moderate, or rather slow; yet the comeliness of his person, the gracefulness and propriety of his action, the strength and sweetness of his voice, procured him some reputation as a speaker. He was lazy, luxurious, and profligately wicked; yet so vain and ambitious, as to expect, from the overthrow of the government, to be the first man in the Republic; in which fancy he was strongly flattered by some crafty soothsayers, who assured him from the Sibylline books, that there were three Cornelius's destined to the dominion of Rome; that Cinna and Sylla had already possessed it, and the prophecy wanted to be completed in him. With these views he entered freely into the conspiracy, trusting to Catiline's vigour for the execution, and hoping to reap the chief fruit from its success.

Cetbegus, of an extraction equally noble (being of the Cornelian family) was of a temper fierce, impetuous, and daring, to a degree even of fury. He had been warmly engaged in the cause of Marius, with whom he was driven out of Rome; but when Sylla's affairs became prosperous, he presently changed sides, and throwing himself at Sylla's feet, and promising great services, was restored to the City. After Sylla's death, by intrigues and faction he acquired so great an influence, that, while Pompey was abroad, he governed all things at home; procured for Antonius, that command over the coast of the Mediterranean, and for Lucullus, the management of the Mithridatic war. In the height of this power he made an incursion into Spain, to raise contributions in that province, where, meeting with some opposition to his violences, he had the hardness to insult, and even wound the Proconsul Q. Metellus Pius. But the insolence of his conduct, and the infamy of his life, gradually diminished, and at last destroyed his credit; when, finding himself controuled by the Magistrates, and the particular vigilance of Cicero, he entered eagerly into Catiline's plot, and was entrusted, as we shall see presently, with the most bloody and desperate part of it, the task of massacring their enemies within the City. The rest of the conspirators were not less illustrious for their birth. The two Syllas were nephews to the Dictator of that name, Autronius had obtained the Consulship, but was deprived for bribery; and Cassius was a competitor for it with Cicero himself. In short, they were all of the same stamp and character; men whom disappointments, ruined fortunes, flagitious lives, had prepared for any design against the State; and all whose hopes of ease and advancement depended on a change of affairs, and the subversion of the Republic. [i. e. Of the present Aristocracy or Oligarchy.]

Sallust.

With these were joined many from the colonies and principle towns of Italy, men of family and interest in their several countries. There were likewise several other noblemen engaged in this conspiracy, but with more caution and secrecy: Men, excited to it, not by want, or distress, of any sort, but by the hopes of lawless power¹.

Catiline having assembled at his own house those first-rate heroes above-named, led them into a private part of it, and there, in a spirited harangue, represented to them, “that the government was fallen entirely “into the hands of a few; that these held kings and princes their “tributaries; that whole nations paid taxes to these, while all the rest of the “Roman Citizens, how worthy, or brave soever, remained without inter“est or authority, and were looked upon as a contemptible mob, the “slaves of those, to whom they ought to be a terror:—Would it not “be better to die in a brave attempt, than to live the sport of such men’s “insolence?—We have poverty at home and debts abroad; our condition is “bad, our expectations worse. Rouse then to action. I call the Gods to “witness, that success is in our hands. Nothing is wanting but to make “the attempt. All that you have so long wished for is now within your “reach, Liberty, Riches, Honours; these will be the sure rewards of an “easy victory.”

His associates, though (being extremely wretched, destitute of all things, even of every honest hope) they were pleased with the design, in general, of throwing the State into confusion, as imagining that this must some how or other turn to their benefit; yet desired that he would be a little more particular concerning the terms on which they were to engage in the enterprize, the assistance on which they might depend for carrying it on, and the advantages they were to expect from it. Catiline promised them an abolition of their debts; the proscription of their particular enemies, and of the rich; plunder in abundance; in short, every advantage that conquest and uncontrouled power could give. He told them, that Piso, with an army in Hisber Spain, and P. Silius Nucerinus, with another in Mauritania, were both engaged in the undertaking: That C. Antonius, whom he hoped to have for his colleague in the Consulship, was

¹ Some persons there were at that time, who believed Crassus not unacquainted with the design; and that to reduce the power of Pompey, whom he hated, and who was then at the head of a great army, he would willingly have promoted any scheme whatsoever and that he hoped, in case the conspiracy succeeded, to make himself, without much difficulty, head of the conspirators. Sallust.

his intimate friend, and desperately distressed in his affairs; and that, in conjunction with him, he would, as soon as they should enter upon their office, begin the execution of the great design. He reminded them of the rich fruits, which some there present had reaped from Sylla's victory—And when he perceived that his discourse had raised the spirits of the whole company, and filled their minds with pleasing hopes, he pressed them to be active in promoting his interest at the approaching election, and then dismissed the Assembly⁸.

In this conspiracy was Q. Curius, a man of no mean family, but who, for his scandalous conduct, had been expelled the Senate by the Censors. Desperately audacious he was, yet had not more boldness than levity; for whatever he heard he disclosed; he could not conceal even his own crimes; in a word, he considered neither what he said, nor what he did. There had been, for a long time, a criminal intercourse between him and Fulvia, a lady of quality. He had ruined his fortune by the excess of his liberality to her; and so soon as she perceived that he was poor, he found himself despised. Impatient under this disgrace, he began now to talk big, and to boast of mountains of gold, which he should soon be master of; and, sometimes, instead of the humble suitor, the submissive lover, he put on the fierce tyrant, threatening to stab her, if she would not be obsequious to his pleasure. This change of style made her curious to know the ground of it. She very soon got the secret out of him; and whether she made small account of the promises of a ruined lover, or had no opinion of an enterprize managed by debauchees, and giddy, thoughtless young men, or had too much of common humanity to approve of the detestable design, she disclosed what she had learnt to several persons of distinction; but without mentioning her author. The rumour of a dreadful plot, ready to break out, produced a forward disposition, universally, to confer the Consulship on Cicero, his abilities being well known, and he being then one of the candidates. For before this, almost all the nobles stormed through envy, and thought that the Consular dignity would in a manner be profaned, if he, deserving as he was, yet being a new man, should be invested with it: But when impending dangers threatened, pride and envy subsided.

Vid. supra.
P. 285.

⁸ Some have said that Curius did not impart to his associates his whole purpose, till he had first sworn them to secrecy; and that, before he tendered them the oath, he caused a bowl of wine, mixed with human blood, to be handed round from one to another (after the manner used at solemn sacrifices,) of which, when they had all participated, he let them know that his design in this execrable ceremony was to bind them the more strictly to matural faith, as being privy to each other's guilt in so abominable an act.

Others have thought that this and many other particulars were the inventions of Cicero's friends, who, by aggravating the crimes of the conspirators, sought to allay the odium which fell upon him for putting them to death without trial. "For my part (adds Sallust) I could never meet with any proof of the fact, proportioned to the unlikelihood of it."

Y. R. 693.
Bef. Chr.
61.
389 Cons.

Accordingly, the Centuries, with one voice, proclaimed M. Tullius Cicero the first Consul (giving him C. Antonius for a Colleague;) a heavy blow, which very much shocked the generality of the Conspirators. Catiline's fury, however, abated not in the least; he exerted himself every day more and more: provided magazines of arms in all the most commodious places of Italy; borrowed money either on his own credit, or that of his friends, and transmitted it to Fesulae, in Etruria, to one Manlius, a bold and experienced centurion, who, having enrolled a considerable body of men, waited only his orders to take the field.

It is said, that, about this time, Catiline gained to his interest a great number of men of all ranks; and some women too, who had once been able to support a vast expence by prostitution, but who, when age had put an end to their gains without lessening their luxury, had contracted heavy debts: By their means he hoped to engage the City slaves to set the City on fire. These women were likewise to draw their husbands into the plot or to kill them.

Midd. p.
167.

Pro Mu-
ren. 23.
In Vatin.
15.

Dio, l.
xxxvii. 43.

Plut. in Cic.
Pro Mu-
ren. 25.

Catiline, notwithstanding these measures taken for war, declared himself a candidate for the next year's Consulship; and renewed his efforts with greater vigour than ever to obtain it; hoping, if he should be chosen, to govern Antonius as he pleased. He pursued his pretension by such open methods of bribery, that Cicero published a new law against it, with the additional penalty of a ten year's exile, prohibiting likewise all shows of gladiators, within two years from the time of suing for any Magistracy, unless they were ordered by the will of a person deceased, and on a certain day therein specified. Catiline, who knew the law to be levelled at him principally, formed a design to kill Cicero, with some other chiefs of the Senate, on the day of election; but Cicero gave information of it to the Senate the day before, upon which the election was deferred, that they might have time to deliberate on an affair of so great importance: and the day following, in a full house, he called upon Catiline to clear himself of this charge; where, without denying or excusing it, he bluntly told them that there were two bodies in the Republic, meaning the Senate and the People, the one of them infirm with a weak head, the other firm without a head; which last had so well deserved of him, that it should never want a head while he lived. He had made a declaration of the same kind, and in the same place, a few days before, when, upon Cato's threatening him with an impeachment, he fiercely replied, that if any flame should be excited in his fortunes, he would extinguish it, not with water, but a general ruin.

At the Consular Election, which came on presently after this, Cicero apprehending, there would be an attempt to assassinate him in the Field of Mars, took care to throw back his gown, and let the People see a shining breast-plate, which he wore under it: a precaution which deeply imprinting on the Multitude a sense of the common danger, prevented, as he he told Catiline afterwards to his face, his design of killing not only him, but D. Junius Silanus, and L. Licinius Murena, who were declared Consuls elect.

Y. R. 690.
Bef. Chr.
62.
389 Conf.

Catiline, thus a second time repulsed, and breathing nothing but revenge, was now eager and impatient to execute his grand plot. With this view he dispatched C. Manlius, then at Rome, to Fesulae, and the adjacent parts of Etruria; Septimius to the territory of Picenum; C. Julius into Apulia; and others to different places, where he thought they might be most serviceable to his design. At the same time, he was busily employed in contriving the most effectual means to murder the Consul, and set fire to the City. He posted armed men in convenient places; was himself always armed; ordered his followers to be so too; was ever pressing them to be upon their guard, and prepared for action: Day and night he passed without sleep, and in a hurry; and yet was unwearied with his never-ceasing toils.

Of all these measures for war, massacres, and conflagrations, Cicero received intelligence from Crassus, who, with M. Marcellus and Metellus Scipio, came to his house at midnight, and having caused him to be waked, put into his hand a packet of letters, which had been left with Crassus's porter by a person unknown. Among these letters was one directed to Crassus himself, but without the name of the writer: the rest were directed to other Senators. Crassus opened his own, and finding in it an exhortation to him to quit Rome, because Catiline was soon to make great havock there, he immediately carried all the letters to the Consul; who thereupon convened the Senate, and delivered them, each according to its Direction. Being read aloud to the Assembly, they were found to contain advices of the same import as those to Crassus; and it was at this time, (the 21st of October) and upon this occasion that the Senate, by a decree, ordered the Consuls to take care that the Republic received no Detriment. Catiline, nevertheless, on the sixth of November, summoned the principal Conspirators to meet him in the dead of night, at the house of M. Porcius Lecca.

Plut. in.
Cic. & in Crass.

At this meeting it was resolved, that Catiline should put himself at the head of the troops in Etruria, that Rome should be fired in many places at once, and a massacre^b begun at the same time; that in the consternation of the fire and massacre, Catiline should be ready with his Tuscan army, to take the benefit of the public confusion, and make himself master of the City; where Lentulus, in the mean while, as first in dignity, was to preside in their general councils; Cassius to manage the affair of firing it; Cetbegus to direct the massacre. But the vigilance of Cicero being the chief obstacle to all their hopes, Catiline

Midd. p.
175.

Cic. pro
Syll. 19.
Plut. in
Cic.

^b Plutarch, in a most romantic strain, writes, that in this massacre the whole Senate was to be cut off, and all the Citizens, except the sons of Pompey, who were to be kept as hostages to procure a peace and reconciliation with the father.

Y. R. 690. was very desirous to see him taken off before he left Rome; upon which Bof Chr. 62. L. Vargunteius and C. Cornelius, both Roman Knights (the first a Senator) 389 Conf. undertook to kill him the next morning in his bed, in an early visit on Cic. in pretence of business. They were both of his acquaintance, and used to
 Cat. i. 4. frequent his house; and knowing his custom of giving free access to all, Sallust. made no doubt of being readily admitted, as C. Cornelius, one of the two, xxviii. afterwards confessed.

No sooner was the meeting over, than Cicero had information of all
 Cic. in that passed in it; for Curius sent Fulcia to him, with a punctual account Cat. i. 4. of their deliberations. He presently imparted his intelligence to some of Sallust. the chiefs of the City, who were assembled that evening, as usual, at his xxviii. house, informing them not only of the design, but naming the men who were
 Cic. in to execute it, and the very hour when they would be at his gate; all which Cat. i. 4. fell out exactly as he foretold; for the two Knights came before break of day, but had the mortification to find the house well guarded, and all admittance refused to them¹.

The meeting of the conspirators was on the sixth of November, in the evening; and on the seventh he summoned the Senate to the Temple of In Cat. i. Jupiter in the Capitol, where it was not usually held, but in times of
 1. public alarm. There had been several debates before this on the same subject of Catiline's treasons, and his design of killing the Consul, and a decree had passed, at the motion of Cicero, to offer a public reward Sallust. to the first discoverer of the plot; if a slave, his liberty, and eight hunxxx. dred pounds; if a Citizen, his pardon, and sixteen hundred. Yet Cati-line by a profound dissimulation, and the constant professions of his innocence, still deceived many of all ranks, representing the whole as the fiction of his enemy Cicero, and offering to give security for his behaviour, and to deliver himself to the custody of any whom the Senate would name; of M. Lepidus, of the Prætor Metellus, or of Cicero himself: But none would receive him; and Cicero plainly told him, That he
 In Cat. i. should never think himself safe in the same house, when he was in danger by
 2. living in the same City with him. Yet he still kept on the mask, and, though he stood actually impeached by L. Paullus, upon the *Plautian*²

¹ Catiline was disappointed likewise in ano-
 Cic. in ther affair of no less moment before he quitted
 Cat. i. 3. the City; a design to surprise the town of Prænestæ, one of the strongest fortresses in Italy, within twenty-five miles of Rome; which would have been of singular use to him in the war, and a sure retreat in all events: But Cicero was before-hand with him, and from the apprehensions of such an attempt had previously sent orders to the place to keep a Vell. Pat. special guard; so that when Catiline came in ii. 26. the night of 1st November to make an as-fault, he found them so well provided, that he durst not venture upon the experiment.

² The Plautian Law de Vi was passed by the Tribune P. Plautius, in the Consulship of M. Lepidus and Q. Catulus (A. U. 675.)
 It regarded those who attempted any force against the State or Senate; or used any violence to the Magistrates, or appeared armed in public upon any ill design, or forcibly expelled any person from his lawful possession. The punishment assigned to the convicted was Aque & ignis interdictio. Suet. in Jul. 3. Dio, lib. xxxix. Cic. pro Sext.
 & pro Mil.

Law,

Law, he had the confidence to come to this very meeting in the Capitol; ^{Y R. 690.} which so shocked the whole Assembly, ^{Bef. Chr. 62.} that none even of his acquaintance ^{389 Conf.} durst venture to salute him; and the Consular Senators quitted that part of the House where he sat, and left the whole bench clear to him. Cicero was so provoked by his impudence, that, instead of entering upon any business, as he designed, addressing himself directly to Catiline, he broke out into a most severe invective against him; and with all the fire and force of an incensed eloquence, laid open the whole course of his villanies, and of his treasons.

“ T O what degree then, do you purpose, Catilina, to abuse our pa- ^{In Cat. i.} “ tience? How long imagine with your frantic treasons to insult us? ”
 “ When stop your precipitate career of unbridled audacity? Perceive you “ not by the nightly guard on the Palatine, by the watch kept throughout “ the City, by the general consternation, by the assembling of the SENATE in “ this fortified place, by the looks of the Senators: Perceive you not, I say,
 “ that your dark designs are brought to light? Which of us, think you, “ is ignorant of what you did last night and the night before? where
 “ and with whom you held counsel, and what resolutions you took? The “ Senate knows all this, the Consul knows all, and yet—Oh! degenerate “ times! corrupted manners! the traitor lives; lives, did I say? he mixes
 “ with the Senate, he surveys us, and with his eyes marks out every one “ whom he has destined for slaughter: whilst we, magnanimous counsel“ lers of State, judge that we discharge our duty to the Commonwealth, “ if we escape his fury and his sword. Catilina, the Consul should, be“ fore this, have ordered thee away to execution. Did the excellent Pub- “ lius Scipio, the High-Priest, did he, a private Citizen, invested with no “ Magistracy, kill Tiberius Gracchus, for only causing some little distur“ bance in the government? and shall we, the Consuls, the supreme Ma“ gistrates, suffer Catilina to live; a traitor bent to lay waste the world, “ by slaughter and conflagration? I pass over, as too remote, the example “ of Quintus Servilius Abala, who, with his own hand, slew Spurius Maelius, “ for attempting a revolution in the State. There once was; I say, there “ once was, in this our Commonwealth, such patriot virtue, that men were “ animated with a keener resentment against a pestilent Citizen, than against “ the most implacable foreign enemy. Catilina, we have a weighty and “ awful decree of the Senate against thee; the State wants not wisdom, “ nor this Assembly due authority; we only, we the Consuls, I speak it “ aloud, are wanting in our duty.

“ Formerly, when the Senate had ordered the Consul Lucius Opimius
 “ to take care that the Commonwealth suffered no detriment, not a day inter“ vened between that order and the death of Caius Gracchus, who “ was fallen only under the suspicion of seditious designs; though Grac- “ chus was descended of a father, grand-father, and remoter ancestors,

“ all:

Y. R. 690.
Bef. Chr.
62.

389 Conf.

Eighteen days only from 21
October.

“ all distinguished for their services to the State: Marcus Fulvius too,
“ a person of Consular dignity, shared the same fate, he and his sons.
“ When, by a like decree, the care of the State was committed to the “ Consuls C. Marius, and L. Valerius, did not L. Saturninus, Tribune of “ the People, and C. Servilius, the Prætor, fall a sacrifice to the justice of “ their country, without the intervention of a single day? But we, for the “ space of twenty days, have suffered the Senate’s authority to remain un-“ active in our hands, as if it were imperfect: For we too are armed with “ a like decree, but it rests among the records like a sword in its scabbard;
“ a decree, Catilina, by which you were doomed to immediate death: yet “ still you live; you live, not to lay aside your guilty audaciousness, but “ to harden yourself in it.

“ Mercy, Conscript Fathers, is what I am heartily disposed to, but my “ conscience condemns me for inactivity and negligence, at a time when “ such terrible dangers threaten my country. An army formed against “ the Republic is already encamped in Italy, on the borders of Hebruria:
“ their numbers daily encrease; their leader we behold within our walls.
“ Should I order thee, Catilina, instantly to be seized and dragged to “ execution, there is reason to fear that all good men would censure me, “ not as too cruel, but as too slow. But I have been with-held by a “ certain reason, which still with-holds me. Thou shalt then be put to “ death, when there is not a man to be found so wicked, so desperate, so “ like to thyself, who will deny it to be done justly: So long as there is one “ who dares to defend thee, thou shalt live; but live as thou now dost, “ surrounded by the guards which I have placed about thee; the eyes and “ ears of many shall watch thee, as they have hitherto done, when thou “ little thoughtest of it.

“ What is it, Catilina, you can now have in view, when neither the “ shades of night can conceal your traiterous assemblies; not the walls of “ your house hinder the voice of your treason from being heard?”

Midd. p.
278—281.

He then goes on to give a detail of all that had been concerted by the “ conspirators at their several meetings, to let him see, “ that he was per“ fectly informed of every step which he had taken, or designed to take;”
and observes, “ that he saw several, at that time in the Senate, who had “ assisted at those meetings.——He presses him therefore to quit the “ City, and since all his counsels were detected, to drop the thoughts of “ fires and massacres;——That the gates were open, and no body should “ stop him.” Then running over the flagitious enormities of his life, and the series of his traiterous practices, “ he exhorts, urges, commands him “ to depart, and, if he would be advised by him, to go into a volun“ tary exile, and free them from their fears, that, if they were just ones, “ they might be safer; if groundless, the quieter: that though he would “ not put the question to the house, whether they would order him into “ banishment

“ banishment, or not, yet he would let him see their sense upon it by their “ manner of behaving while he was urging him to it ; for, should he bid “ any other Senator of credit, P. Sextius or M. Marcellus, to go into exile, “ they would all rise up against him at once, and lay violent hands on their “ Consul : yet, when he said it to him, by their silence, they approved it ;
 “ by their suffering it, decreed it ; by saying nothing, proclaimed their con“ sent. That he would answer likewise for the Knights, who were then “ guarding the avenues of the Senate, and were hardly restrained from “ doing him violence ; that, if he would consent to go, they would all “ quietly attend him to the gates.——Yet, after all, if, in virtue of his “ command, he should really go into banishment, he foresaw what an odium “ he should draw by it upon himself ; but he did not value that, if by his “ own calamity, he could avert the dangers of the Republic : But there was “ no hope that Catilina could ever be induced to yield to the occasions of “ the State, or moved with a sense of his crimes, or reclaimed by shame, “ or fear, or reason, from his madness. He exhorts him, therefore, if he “ would not go into exile, to go, at least where he was expected, into “ Manlius’s camp, and begin the war ; provided only that he would carry “ out with him all the rest of his crew.——That there he might riot
 “ and exult at his full ease, without the mortification of seeing one honest “ man about him.——There he might practise all that discipline to “ which he had been trained, of lying upon the ground, not only in “ pursuit of his lewd amours, but of bold and hardy enterprizes : There “ he might exert all that boasted patience of hunger, cold, and want, by “ which, however, he would shortly find himself undone.” He then in“ troduces an expostulation of the Republic with himself, for his too great “ lenity, in suffering such a traitor to escape, instead of hurrying him to “ immediate death ; and he answers —— “ If I had thought it the most “ advisable to put Catilina to death, I would not have allowed that Gla“ diator the use of one moment’s life : —— But there are some of this “ very order, who either do not see the dangers which hang over us, or else “ dissemble what they see ; who, by the softness of their votes, cherish Ca- “ tilina’s hopes, and add strength to the Conspiracy by not believing it ;
 “ whose authority influences many, not only of the wicked but the weak ;
 “ who, if I had punished this man as he deserved, would not have failed “ to cry out upon me for acting the tyrant. Now, I am persuaded, that “ when he is once gone into Manlius’s camp, whither he actually de“ signs to go, none can be so silly as not to see there is a plot, none so “ wicked as not to acknowledge it : Whereas by taking off him alone, “ though this pestilence would be somewhat checked, it would not be “ suppressed : But when he has thrown himself into rebellion, and car“ ried out his friends along with him, and drawn together the profligate “ and desperate from all parts of the empire, not only this ripened plague “ of the Republic, but the very root and seed of all our evils, will be “ extirpated

Y.R. 699.
 Bef. Chr.
 62.
 389 Conf.

Y. R. 690.
Ref. Chr.62.
389 Conf.

Sallust.

“extirpated with him at once.” Then applying himself again to Catiline, he presses him once more to leave Rome, and go to Manlius’s army.

When the Consul had finished his vehement discourse, Catiline, who was a perfect master of the art of dissimulation, with downcast looks and suppliant voice, begged of the Fathers not to believe too hastily what had been said against him : that such was his family, and such had been the tenour of his whole life from his youth up, as might encourage him to hope for every honour he could aspire to : And it was not to be imagined, that he, a Patrician, whose ancestors, as well as himself, had given many proofs of their affection to the Roman people, should wish to overturn the government ; while Cicero, a stranger, a tenant only of a house he had lately hired in Rome, was zealous for its preservation. But, as he was going on to give harsh and abusive language, the Senate interrupted him by a general outcry, calling him Paricide, and Enemy to his Country. Urged to fury and desperation by this treatment, he repeated, with a loud and menacing voice, what he had said before to Cato, Since I am circumvented, and driven headlong by my enemies, the flame that is raised about me I will extinguish by the common ruin ; and so rushed out of the Assembly.

And now, perceiving it in vain to dissemble any longer, he resolved to enter into action immediately, before the troops of the Republic were increased ; and accordingly he left Rome that very night with a small retinue, to make the best of his way towards Etruria. But, before he went off, had a short conference with Lentulus, Cethegus, and others, the boldest of the conspirators, in which he pressed them earnestly to neglect no means of augmenting their number, get rid of Cicero as soon as possible, and prepare for a massacre, and the firing of the City ; and he assured them, that he would speedily return at the head of a strong army.

He no sooner disappeared, than his friends gave out that he was gone into a voluntary exile at Marcellæ. Cicero entertained no doubt of his going directly to Manlius’s camp, knowing that he had already sent thither a quantity of arms, and all the ensigns of military command, and particularly a silver eagle, for which he had a superstitious regard, because C. Marius had made use of it in his expedition against the Cimbri. However, lest the report should gain belief in the City, and it should be said that the Consul had driven an innocent man into banishment, without any previous trial, he called the People together into the Forum, to give them an account of what had passed in the Senate the day before, and of the immediate consequence of it, Catiline’s hasty departure from Rome : He began, by “congratulating with them on the Conspirator’s flight, as on a certain vic“tory ; since the driving him from his secret plots, and insidious attempts “on their lives and fortunes, into open rebellion, was in effect to conquer “him : That the Parricide himself was sensible of it ; whose chief regret, “in his retreat, was not for leaving the City, but for leaving it standing.
 —But if there be any here who blame me for what I am boasting of, that “I did

In Cat. 2.

“ I did not rather seize than send away so capital an enemy : I must answer, Y. R. 690.
 “ that the fault is not mine ; no, Romans, it is the fault of the times. Ca- Ref. Chr.
 “ tilina, in justice, ought, long ago, to have suffered the last punishment ; the 62.
 “ custom of our ancestors, the discipline of the empire, and the interest of the 389 Conf.
 “ Republic required it : But, had I put Catilina to death, I should have drawn “ upon myself such an odium, as would have rendered me unable to prosecute “ his accomplices, and extirpate the remains of the conspiracy ; but, so far from “ being afraid of him now, I am only sorry he went off with so few to attend “ him : His forces are contemptible, if compared with those of the Republic ;
 “ they are a miserable, needy crew, who have wasted their substance, forfeited “ their bails, and who are so far from having the courage to face an armed ene“ my, that they would run away at the sight of a Prætor’s writ. Those of his “ accomplices who have staid behind, and whom I see sauntering about in the “ Forum, are more to be dreaded than the army itself ; and the more so, be“ cause they know me to be informed of all their designs, yet remain cool and “ unconcerned. Yesterday I laid open all their councils in the Senate, upon “ which Catilina was so disheartned, that he immediately fled. I cannot guess “ what the rest mean : If they imagine that I shall always use the same lenity, “ they are much deceived : For I have now gained what I was hitherto waiting “ for, Proof, which might convince all people that a conspiracy there actually is.
 “ There remains no longer, therefore, any room for clemency ; the case itself re“ quires severity : Yet I shall still grant them one thing—Permission to quit the “ City, and follow Catilina ; nay, I will tell them the way : It is the Aure-“ lian road, if they will make haste, they may overtake him before night.

“ Happy Rome, could it be drained of its impurities !

“ To me the absence of Catilina alone seems to have given the City “ fresh bloom and beauty. What is the villainy, what is the crime, that “ can enter into the heart of man, which did not enter into his ? In all “ Italy, what Poisoner, what Gladiator, what Robber, what Cut-throat, “ what Parricide, what Forger, what Ruffian, what Debauchee, what “ Adulterer, what Strumpet has there been amongst the corrupters, or the “ corrupted, of our youth, who did not live in an intimate familiarity “ with Catilina ? For these many years, has there been a murder to “ which he was not an accessory ? an infamous rape, and he not an ac“ complice ? Had ever any man such talents for debauching youth as he ;
 “ who indulged himself in a criminal flame for others, and others in an “ infamous passion for himself ? To some he promised the objects of “ their lust, to some the death of their parents¹, &c.”-----Then, after Midd.
 describing the profligate lives of his accomplices, he declared it “ insuffer- P. 185.

¹ N. B. This is the man, whose friendship, a few months before, Cicero courted, and (had Catiline been disposed to strike the bargain) would have purchased, at the price of defending him, when brought in judgment for murdering, with the most brutal cruelty, a man who had been the People’s great benefactor, and was the orator’s near kinsman. Vid. supr. p. 216, 217, & 104.

Y. R. 690.
Bef. Chr.
62.
139 Conf.

“ ably impudent for such men to pretend to plot ; the lazy against the “ active, the foolish against the prudent, the drunken against the sober,
“ the drowfy against the vigilant, &c.” He added, “ If my Consulship, “ since it cannot cure, should cut off all these, it would add no short period to the “ duration of the Republic : For there is no nation which we have reason to “ fear, no King who can make war against the Roman people ; all disturbances “ abroad, both by land and sea, are quelled by virtue of ONE MAN ; but a “ domestic war still remains ; the treason, the danger, the enemy is within ; we “ are to combat with luxury, with madness, with villainy : In this war I profess “ myself your leader, and take upon myself all the animosity of the desperate :
“ Whatever can possibly be healed, I will heal ; but what ought to be cut off,
“ I will never suffer to spread to the ruin of the City. But it seems Catilina, “ poor man ! has by my threats been so terrified, as to banish himself ! There “ is not one of those who make this complaint, and who talk of his going to “ Marseilles, but would be sorry for it if it were true. By such a change in “ his design, much odium would unquestionably fall upon me ; I should be accu- “ sed of having persecuted an unfortunate man, innocent, uncondemned, never “ brought to trial. Romans, no concern for my own ease or character can “ make me wish that you may hear of Catilina’s being at the head of an army ;
“ but this you will certainly hear in three days time.”

MAC. 137.

He then directed them “ to keep a watch only in their private houses, “ for he had taken care to secure the public without any tumult ; that “ he had given notice to all the colonies and great towns of Catiline’s “ retreat, so as to be upon their guard against him : And as to the body “ of gladiators, whom Catiline always depended upon as the best and “ surest band, they were taken care of in such a manner as to be in the “ power of the Republic ; though, to say the truth, even these were bet“ ter affected than some part of the Patricians : That he had sent Q. Me“ tellus the Prætor into Gaul and the district of Picenum, to oppose all “ Catiline’s motions on that side ; and, for settling all matters at home, “ had summoned the Senate to meet again that morning, which, as they “ saw, was then assembling. As for those therefore who were left behind “ in the City, though they were now enemies, yet, since they were born “ citizens, he admonished them again and again, that his lenity had been “ waiting only for an opportunity of demonstrating the certainty of the “ plot : That, for the rest, he should never forget that this was his coun“ try, he their Consul, who thought it his duty either to live with them, “ or die for them.” He added, “ There is no guard upon the gates, none “ to watch the roads ; if any one has a mind to withdraw himself, he may go “ wherever he pleases ; but if he makes the least stir within the City, so as to “ be caught in any overt-act against the Republic, he shall know, that there “ are in it vigilant Consuls, excellent Magistrates, a stout Senate ; that there “ are arms, and a prison, which our ancestors provided as the avenger of “ manifest

“ manifest crimes ; and all this shall be transacted in such a manner, Citizens, “ that the greatest disorders shall be quelled without the least hurry ; the greatest “ dangers without any tumult ; a domestic war, the most desperate of any in our “ memory, by me your only leader and General, in my gown ; I will manage so,
 “ that, as far as it is possible, no one even of the guilty shall suffer punishment
 “ in the City : But if their audaciousness and my country’s danger should neces“ sarily drive me from this mild resolution, yet I will effect, what in so cruel “ and treacherous a war could hardly be hoped for, that not one honest man shall “ fall, but all of you be safe by the punishment of a few. This I promise, Ci“ tizens, not from any confidence in my own prudence, or from any human “ counsels, but from the many evident declarations of the Gods, by whose Im“ pulse I am led into this persuasion ; who assist us, not, as they used to do,
 “ at a distance, against foreign and remote enemies ; but by their present help “ and protection defend their temples and our houses, &c.”

Y.R. 690.
 Bef. Chr.
 61.
 389 Conf.

We have no account of this day’s debate in the Senate, which met while Cicero was speaking to the People, and were waiting his coming to them from the Rostra : But as to Catiline, after staying a few days upon the road to raise and arm the country through which he passed, and which his agents had already been disposing to his interests, He marched directly to Manlius’s camp, with the fasces and all the ensigns of military command displayed before him. Upon this news the Senate declared both him and Manlius public enemies, with offers of pardon to all his followers, who were not condemned of capital crimes, if they returned to their duty by a certain day ; and ordered the Consuls to make new levies, and that Antonius should follow Cati- line with the army, Cicero stay at home to guard the City.

Midd.
 P. 189.
 Sallust.

In the midst of all his hurry, and soon after Catiline’s flight, Cicero found leisure to defend L. Muræna, one of the Consuls elect, who was now brought to a trial for bribery and corruption. Cato had declared in the Senate, that he would try the force of Cicero’s late law upon one of the consular candidates : And since Catiline was out of his reach, he resolved to fall upon Muræna ; yet (if we may believe Plutarch) connived at the other Consul elect, Silanus, (who had married his sister) though equally guilty with his colleague : Cato was joined in the accusation by one of the disappointed candidates, S. Sulpicius, a person of distinguished worth and character, and the most celebrated lawyer of the age, for whose service, and at whose influence, Cicero’s Law against bribery had been chiefly provided.

Midd. p.
 190--195.
 Pro Mur.
 30.

Plut. in Catone.

Muræna was bred a soldier, and had acquired great fame in the Mitribri- datic war, as Lieutenant to Lucullus ; and was now defended by three the greatest men, as well as the greatest orators, at Rome, Crassus, Hortensius, and Cicero : So that there had seldom been a trial of more expectation, on account of the dignity of the parties concerned. The character of the accusers makes it reasonable to believe, that there was clear proof of some illegal practices : yet, from Cicero’s speech, which, though imperfect,

Pro Mur.
 9.

is

Y.R. 690.
Bef. Chr.
62.
;39 Conf.

is the only remaining monument of the transaction, it seems probable, that they were such only as, though heinous in the eyes of a Cato, or an angry competitor, were usually overlooked by the Magistrates, and expected by the People.

Pro Mur.
6.

The accusation consisted of three heads; the scandal of Muræna's life, the want of dignity in his character and family, and bribery in the late election. As to the first, the greatest crime which Cato charged him with was dancing; to which Cicero's defence was somewhat remarkable: "He admonishes Cato not to throw out such a calumny so inconsiderately, or to call the Consul of Rome a dancer; but to consider how many other crimes a man must needs be guilty of before that of dancing can be objected to him; since no body ever danced, even in solitude, or a private meeting of friends, who was not either drunk or mad; for dancing was always the last act of rioting, banquetings, gay places, and much jollity: That Cato charged him therefore with what was the effect of many vices, yet with none of those without which that vice could not possibly subsist; with no scandalous feasts, no amours, no nightly revels, no lewdness, no extravagant expences, &c."

Ibid. 7, 8.

Ibid. 9, 10, 11.

As to the second article, the want of dignity, it was urged chiefly by Sulpicius, who, being noble, and a Patrician, was the more mortified to be defeated by a Plebeian, whose character he contemned. But "Cicero ridicules the vanity of thinking no family good but a Patrician: observes that Muræna's grandfather and great grandfather had been Prætors; and that his father also from the same dignity had obtained the honour of a triumph: That Sulpicius's nobility was better known to the antiquaries than to the People; since his grandfather had never borne any of the principal offices, nor his father ever mounted higher than the equestrian rank. He adds, that, when a Consul, of an ancient and illustrious descent, was defended by a Consul, the son of a Knight, he never imagined that the accusers would venture to say a word about the novelty of a family: That he himself had two Patrician competitors; the one a profligate and audacious, the other an excellent and modest man; yet that he outdid Catiline in dignity, Galba in interest; and if that had been a crime in a new man, he should not have wanted enemies to object it to him." He then shews, "that the science of arms, in which Muræna excelled, had much more dignity and splendor in it than the science of the law, [upon the forms of which he casts a great deal of ridicule] being that which first gave a name to the Roman people, brought glory to their City, and subdued the world to their empire: That martial virtue had ever been the means of conciliating the favour of the People, and recommending to the honours of the State; and it was but reasonable that it should hold the first place in that City, which was raised by it to be the head of all other cities in the world."

As

As to the last and heaviest part of the charge, the crime of bribery, Cicero makes very slight of it, and declares himself “ more afraid of the “ authority than the accusation of Cato : ” and, to obviate the influence which the reputation of Cato’s integrity might have in the cause, he observes, “ that the people in general, and all wise judges, had ever been “ jealous of the power and interest of an accuser : lest the criminal should “ be borne down, not by the weight of his crimes, but the superior force of “ his adversary. Let the authority of the great prevail for the safety of the “ innocent, the protection of the helpless, the relief of the miserable ; but let its “ influence be repelled from the dangers and destruction of Citizens : For if any “ one should say, that Cato would not have taken the pains to accuse if he had “ not been assured of the crime, he establishes a very unjust law to men in distress, by making the judgment of an accuser to be considered as a prejudice, “ or previous condemnation of the criminal ”. He exhorts Cato not to be so “ severe on what ancient custom and the Republic itself had found useful ; “ not to deprive the people of their plays, gladiators ”, and feasts, which “ their ancestors had approved, nor to take from candidates an opportunity of obliging by a method of expence, which indicated their generosity, “ rather than an intention to corrupt.”

Y. R. 690.
Bef. Chr.
62.
389 Conf.
Pro Mur.
28.

But, whatever Muræna’s crime might be, the circumstance which chiefly favoured him was the difficulty of the times, and a rebellion actually on foot, which made it neither safe nor prudent to deprive the City of a Consul, who by a military education was the best qualified to defend it in so dangerous a crisis. — “ If it be asked, what reason I have to fear Catiline ? “ — None at all ; and I have taken care that nobody else need fear him : Yet I say “ that we have cause to fear those troops of his, which I see in this very place. “ Nor is his army so much to be dreaded as those who are said to have “ deserted it : For in truth they have not deserted it, but are left as spies upon “ us, and placed as it were in ambush to destroy us the more securely : All these “ want to see a worthy Consul, an experienced General, a man both by nature “ and fortune attached to the interests of the Republic, driven by your sentence

Vid. infr.
P. 352.

After this he makes high compliments to Cato on his eminent virtues ; but rallies him on his Stoic Philosophy ; according to which all sins are equal ; all deviations from right equally wicked ; to kill a dunghill-cock without reason not less criminal than to kill a parent ; a wise man can never forgive ; never be moved by anger, favour, or pity ; never be deceived ; never repent, never change his mind. — These are the principles (adds the Orator, addressing himself to the Judges) which Marcus Cato has brought from the school of Zeno, not as subjects for exercise and argument only, but to serve him as a rule of life. The consequence is — Cato having once said in the Senate, that he would impeach a Consular Candidate, he must do it : should he be exorable or compassionate, or own himself mistaken as to the facts, he would forfeit the character of a wise man. Plutarch tells us, that the wit and humour with which Cicero raillied the profession of Salpicius as trifling and contemptible, the principles of Cato, as absurd and impracticable, made the whole audience merry, and forced Cato himself to cry out, What a facetious Consul have we !

All shows of gladiators, within two years from the time of suing for any magistracy, were expressly forbid by Cicero’s new law. Vid. supra, p. 340.

“ from

Y. R. 690. "from the guard and custody of the City—But this is no time to throw away Bel. Chr. 62. "any of the helps which we have, but by all means possible to acquire more.
 189 Conf. "The enemy is not on the banks of the Anio, which was thought so terrible in —"the Punic war, but in the City and in the Forum. Good Gods! (I cannot speak it without a sigh) there are some enemies in the very Sanctuary;

 "some, I say, even in the Senate! What will become of us, if, entering into "the new year, with these dangers around us, we should have but one Consul
 "in the Republic, and he should be employed, not in prosecuting the war, but in "providing a colleague? This consideration, so forcibly urged, of the necessity "of having two Consuls for the guard of the City at the opening of the new "year, had such weight with the Judges, that, without any deliberation,
 "they unanimously acquitted Muræna, and would not, as Cicero says, so Pro Flacc. 39. "much as bear the accusation of men the most eminent and illustrious."

Not long before the trial of Muræna, Cicero had pleaded another cause in the defence of C. Piso, who was accused by Cæsar of having, when Prætor of Gallia Transpadana, illegally punished a man of that country. It is highly probable that Piso was guilty of the charge, Cicero assigning no other reason for his being acquitted, but that he had behaved himself well in his Consulship, A. U. 686.

To return to the affair of the conspiracy.

A few days after the Senate's decree (which invested the Consuls with Dictatorial power) and before Catiline's flight, L. Senius, a member of that body, read a letter in the House, which, he said, came from Fesulæ; importing that C. Manlius had taken up arms about the latter end of October, and was at the head of a great multitude of people. It was rumoured at the same time that the slaves were arming in Capua and in Apulia. Hereupon the Senate ordered Q. Marcus Rex to Fesulæ, and Q. Metellus Creticus to Apulia and the adjacent country. [These two commanders, with their armies, were then waiting near the City, to be decreed the honour of a triumph, the grant of which had hitherto been obstructed by the malicious calumnies of a FEW MEN, who made sale of every thing, honourable and dishonourable.] On the approach of Marcus Rex, Manlius deputed some of his officers to meet him in the way, and address him in words to the following effect:

"We call the Gods to witness, GENERAL, that we have not taken "up arms either against our country, or with a view to hurt any particular "person, but to defend ourselves from injuries, wretched and needy as "we are, through the violence and cruelty of usurers; most of us banished "from our country, and all deprived of our reputations and fortunes;
 "nor were any of us allowed the benefit of the laws made by our fore"fathers to secure the liberty of our persons, when nothing else is left us;
 "such has been the cruelty of our creditors and the Prætors. We neither "desire power nor riches, for the sake of which all the wars and contests
 "among men are commenced and carried on. Liberty is our sole aim,
 "that

“ that liberty which no brave man will lose but with his life. Wherefore “ we conjure both you and the Senate to espouse the interests of your “ wretched Fellow-citizens; restore to us what the iniquity of the Prætor “ has ravished from us, the protection of the Laws, and reduce us not to “ so desperate a state of distress as shall leave us nothing to think of but “ how we may take the amplest revenge on our oppressors; and, since “ they will have our blood, make it as costly a purchase to them as we “ are able.”

Y. R. 690.
 Bef. Chr.
 62.
 389 Cons.

To this Q. Marcius answered, “ That, if they had any thing to request “ of the Senate, they must quit their arms, and make their appearance at “ Rome in the form of humble petitioners; that such had been the cle“ mency and compassion of the Roman Senate and People on all occasions, “ that no one had ever sued to them in vain for relief.”

Catiline in his way to Manlius's camp had wrote to most of the Consulars, and to every Senator and Citizen of the first rank in reputation; “ That, “ being on all sides attacked by false accusations, and unable to resist the “ faction of his enemies, he submitted to his fate, and was going a volun“ tary exile to Marseilles, not from a consciousness of guilt, but out of re“ gard to the public tranquillity, and to prevent any sedition which a strug“ gle in defending his innocence might possibly occasion.”

But Catulus produced and read a letter written in a very different stile, and which he declared had been delivered to him as from Catiline. (The main purpose of it was to recommend his Mistress to the protection of his Friend.)

“ L. Catilina to Q. Catulus, health.

“ Your very singular friendship to me, which I have so often experien“ ced in my greatest dangers, inspires me with confidence to make appli“ cation to it in my present distress.”

He then solemnly asserts his innocence: but frankly confesses, “ that “ being provoked by injuries and false accusations, he had, agreeably to “ his usual practice, undertaken the common cause of the poor and the “ oppressed.—It is not that I want means to satisfy my creditors; for “ my estate is sufficient to discharge all the debts I have contracted on “ my own account; and Orestilla (such is her generosity) would clear all “ my engagements on account of others out of her own fortune and that “ Cicero, in his oration for Murena, repre“ sents Catiline speaking to his associates of “ his affairs as being in a desperate condition:

 “ He tells them, “ That it was impossible for
 “ the wretched to find a faithful protector “ but in the person of one as wretched as “ they themselves; that men of ruined for“ tunes ought never to trust to the promises
 “ of men easy in their affairs: that, conse“ quently, all who desired to recruit their “ wasted stores, and recover what they had “ been robbed of, need only to cast their “ eyes upon him, and consider how much

 “ he was indebted, how little he possessed,
 “ and what he was capable of daring; that
 “ the leader and standard-bearer of the un“ happy ought to have very little fear, but a “ great deal of misery.”

Pro Mur.
 25.

Y. R. 690. " of her daughter. But, seeing men of no merit, raised to the highest Bef. Chr. " honours of the State, and myself slighted and rejected upon groundless
 61. " jealousies, I have taken such measures for preserving the small remains 389 Conf. " of my dignity, as, considering my circumstances, cannot but appear very " honourable. I should have said more to you, but I am just now informed " that some troops are in full march against me: In haste therefore I con" clude with recommending Orestilla to your protection, intreating you, by " the tenderness you feel for your own children, to defend her from all inju" rious treatment. Farewell."

In the mean while Lentulus at Rome, conformable to Catiline's instructions, was endeavouring, by himself or by his emissaries, to engage in the cause all such as, from their vicious manners or necessitous circumstances, he judged would be very willing to help forward a revolution; not Citizens only, but any kind of men who could be usefully employed.

There happened to be at this time in the City certain Deputies from the Allobroges (Gauls inhabiting the countries now called Savoy and Dauphiné,) a warlike people, and ever disaffected to the Roman power. These Deputies were come to solicit the Senate for some relief under the burthen of those debts with which the nation, as well as many private persons, was overwhelmed, through the oppressive covetousness of the Roman governors. They had met with no success, and were about to return home much discontented. Lentulus knowing this, and thence imagining it would not be difficult to draw them into the plot, employed one Umbrenus to sound them. This man, having traded in Gaul, was known to most of the leading men of that country, and was acquainted with their characters. The moment he got sight of the Deputies in the Forum, he walked up to them, and, in friendly manner, like one who took an interest in their affair — Well, how go matters? What is like to be the issue of your business? — "Death; our calamities admit of no other remedy; such is the " insatiable covetousness of the Magistrates, and the cruel insensibility of " the Senate." — That is very hard indeed. — Have you the spirit to act like men? — If you have, I believe I can shew you a way to get entirely out of your unfortunate circumstances. — "Be our friend then. Take pity of our " condition. There is nothing so difficult or dangerous which we would " not readily undertake to deliver our nation from the heavy load of debt
 " that crushes it."

Umbrenus said no more at that time, but conducted them to a house that stood near the Forum, and belonged to D. Brutus (then absent,) the husband of Sempronia, who was deeply engaged in the plot. To give the more weight to what he should say, he sent for Gabinus; and, as soon as he was come, laid open to the Deputies the whole plan of the Conspiracy, naming all who were engaged in it, and likewise many innocent persons of every degree, in order to create in the minds of the Gauls a better opinion of the enterprize. When, allured by the fair prospect, they had promised their concurrence, and to furnish a good body of horse (which was the aid principally wanted,) he dismissed them.

But no sooner did the Deputies begin coolly to reflect on what had been proposed to them, than they fell into great perplexity and irresolution. On one side were the pressure of a load of debt, and an inclination to war, and the hope of great advantages from victory: On the other, superior strength, safe measures, no risk; and, instead of uncertain hopes, certain reward if they discover the Conspiracy. After some fluctuation of mind, the Fortune of Rome (says Sallust) gained the ascendant. They discovered all they had learned of the plot to Q. Fabius Sanga, the Patron^p of their nation, who immediately gave intelligence of it to the Consul.

Cicero thereupon directed the Deputies to feign a warm zeal for carrying on the enterprize, and to promise every thing required of them, till they had got a full insight into the extent of the plot, with distinct proofs against the particular actors in it: Accordingly when, by the means of Gabinus, they had procured a meeting with the rest of the Conspirators, they insisted upon an oath from Lentulus, Cethegus, Statilius, and Cassius, under their hands and seals, to shew to their Constituents; who, without such credentials, would never be induced to enter into an engagement so hazardous. Not suspecting any fraud, all complied with this proposal as reasonable, except Cassius, who promised he would be in their country in a very short time: and in fact he left the City before the Deputies. Vul- Midd. p.
turcius was appointed by Lentulus to go along with them, and introduce ^{199.} them to Catiline in their road, in order to confirm the agreement, and exchange assurances also with him; to whom Lentulus sent at the same time a particular letter, under his own hand and seal, though without his name. Cicero being punctually informed of these facts, concerted privately with the Deputies the time and manner of their leaving Rome in the night, and that on the Milvian bridge, about a mile from the City, they should be arrested, with their papers and letters about them, by two of the Prætors, L. Flaccus and C. Pontinius, whom he had instructed for that purpose, and ordered to lie in ambush near the place, with a strong guard of Friends and soldiers: Cic. in All this was successfully executed, and the whole company brought prisoners to Cicero's house by break of day. Cat. iii. 2.

The rumour of this accident presently drew a resort of Cicero's friends about him, who advised him to open the letters before he produced them in the Senate, lest, if nothing of moment were found in them, it might be thought rash and imprudent to raise an unnecessary terror and alarm through the City. But he was too well informed of the contents to fear any censure of that kind; and declared, That, in case of public danger, he thought it his duty to Ibid. iii. 3.
lay the matter entire before the public Council. He sent therefore immediately for Lentulus, Gabinus, Statilius, Cethegus, and one Caparius of ^p Every nation subjected or allied to the Roman State had its Patron in the Senate.

V. R. 690. Terracina, who had been appointed to go into Apulia, and there make the slaves rise. The four first came presently to his house, suspecting nothing:
Bel. Chr. 62.
389. Conf. Ceparius, having got some notice of the discovery, had slipped out of town, but was brought back before night. The Consul being informed also of a quantity of arms provided by Cethegus for the use of the Conspiracy, he ordered C. Sulpicius, another of the Prætors, to go and search his house, where he found a great number of swords and daggers, with other arms, all newly cleaned, and ready for present service.

Ibid. it.
Plut. in
Cic.

Thus prepared, escorted by a numerous body of Citizens, and carrying with him the Deputies and the Conspirators, he set out to meet the Senate in the temple of Concord, whither he had summoned them. Lentulus was at this time Prætor; the Consul himself therefore conducted him thither, holding him by the hand all the way; the rest were brought under a guard.

Mcld. p.
200—203.

After he had given the Assembly an account of the whole affair, Vulturcius was called in to be examined separately; to whom Cicero, by order of the House, offered a pardon and reward, if he would faithfully discover all that he knew: Upon which, after some hesitation, he confessed, that he had a letter, and likewise verbal instructions, from Lentulus to Catiline, to press him to accept the assistance of the slaves, and to lead his army with all expedition towards Rome, to the intent that, when it should be set on fire in different places, and the general massacre begun, he might be at hand to intercept those who escaped, and join with his friends in the City.

Sallust.

Cic. in
Cat. iii. 4.

Ibid. v. 6.

The Deputies were examined next, who declared, that they had received letters to their nation from Lentulus, Cethegus, and Statilius; that these three, and L. Cassius also, required them to send a body of horse as soon as possible into Italy, declaring that they had no occasion for any foot: That Lentulus had assured them from the Sibylline books, and the answers of Soothsayers, that he was the third Cornelius, who was destined to be master of Rome, as Cinna and Sylla had been before him; and that this was the fatal time marked out for the destruction of the City and Empire: That there was some dispute between Cethegus and the rest about the time of firing the City; for while the rest were fixing it on the feast of Saturn, or the middle of December, Cethegus thought that day too remote and dilatory.—The letters were then produced and opened; first that from Cethegus; and upon shewing him the seal, he allowed it to be his; it was written with his own hand, and addressed to the Senate and People of the Allobroges, signifying that he would make good what he had promised to their Deputies, and entreating them also to perform what the Deputies had undertaken for them. He had been interrogated just before about the arms that were found in his house, to which he answered, That they were provided only for his curiosity, for he had always been particularly fond of neat arms: But, after his letter was read, he was so dejected and confounded, that he had nothing at all to say for himself.—Statilius was then brought in, and acknowledged his hand and seal; and when his letter was read, to the same purpose with Cethegus's, he confessed it to be his own.-----Then Lentulus's letter was produced, and his seal^a likewise owned by him: The letter was of the same import with the other two; but, having leave to speak for himself, he at first denied the whole charge, and began to question the Ambassadors and Vulturcius, what business they ever had with him, and on what occasion they came to his house, to which they gave clear and distinct answers, signifying by whom and how often they had been introduced to him; and then asked him in their turn, whether he had never mentioned any thing to them of the Sibylline oracles; upon which being confounded, or infatuated rather by the sense of his guilt, he gave a remarkable proof, as Cicero says, of the great force of conscience; for not only his usual parts and eloquence, but his impudence too, in which he outdid all men, quite failed him; so that he confessed the crime, to the surprize of the whole Assembly. Then Vulturcius desired, that the letter to Catiline, which Lentulus had sent by him, might be opened; where Lentulus again, though greatly disordered, acknowledged his hand and seal: It was written without any name, but to this effect: "You will know who I am from him whom I have sent to you. Take care to shew yourself a man; and recollect in what a situation you are, and consider what is now necessary for you. Be sure to make use of the assistance of all, even of the lowest."---Gabinus was then introduced, and behaved impudently for a while; but at last denied nothing of what the Deputies charged him with.

After the criminals and witnesses were withdrawn, the Senate came unanimously to the following resolutions: That Lentulus (after having abdicated the Prætorship, and divested himself of his robes) and Cethegus, Statilius, and Gabinus, with their other accomplices also when taken, Cæparius, Furius, Chilo, Umbrenus, should be committed to safe custody; and that a public thanksgiving should be appointed in Cicero's name, for his having preserved the City from a conflagration, the Citizens from a massacre, and Italy from a war. That Flaccus and Pontinius, the Prætors, should be thanked for their vigorous and punctual execution of Cicero's orders, and that Antonius, the other Consul, should be praised for having removed from his councils all those who were concerned in the Conspiracy.

In Cat. iii.
10.

^a Cicero, perceiving the seal to be the head of Lentulus's grandfather, could not help expostulating with him, that the image of such an ancestor, [one of the worthy accomplices of Opimius in that massacre where Caius Gracchus, together with 3000 Roman Citizens, were destroyed] so remarkable for a singular love of his country, had not reclaimed him from his traitorous designs.

^b According to Sallust, Lentulus was committed to the custody of his kinsman, P. Lentulus Spinther (at that time Curule Ædile.) Cethegus was delivered to Q. Cornificius, Statilius to Cæsar, Gabinus to Crassus, Cæparius to Cn. Terentius, a Senator. Of the commitments of the prisoners respectively to Cæsar, Crassus, Cornificius, and Terentius, Dr. Middleton takes no notice. Perhaps he did not find these particulars in any of Cicero's writings.

And

Y. R. 690.
Bef. Chr.
62.
389 Conf.

V. R. 690.

E. R. 11.

And now the common people, who just before, from a natural love of change and novelty (or perhaps from their hatred of the Senate,) had wished for some intestine commotion, were no sooner made acquainted with the true design of the Conspiracy, than they began to curse Catiline and his devices, and to extol Cicero to the skies. For, while they remained ignorant of what was intended, they entertained a hope of some possible advantage from it to themselves; but when they understood that the City was to be set on fire, they were sure that this would be meer mischief, from which they could reap no benefit; but suffer the loss of their houses and goods, and all the means of their daily subsistence.

Madd. p.

204.

In Cat. iii.

6.

Vid. supr.

p. 351.

Cicero therefore was well heard when, after dismissing the Senate, he went directly into the Rojira, and gave the People an account of the whole proceeding in the manner as above related: observing to them, “ That the thanksgiving decreed in his name was the first that had ever been decreed to any man in the gown: that all other thanksgivings had been appointed for some particular services to the Republic, this alone for saving it.——Romans, by the seizure of the accomplices of Catiline, all his hopes are blasted at once. When I was driving him out of the City, I foresaw that, if he was once removed, there would be nothing to apprehend from the drowiness of Lentulus, the fat of Cassius, or the rashness of Cethegus. Catiline was the life of the Conspiracy: he never took any thing to be done, because he had ordered it; but always followed, solicited, and saw it done himself. If I had not driven him from his secret plots into open rebellion, I could never have delivered the Republic from its dangers, or never at least with so much ease and quiet. Catiline would not have named the fatal day for your destruction so long beforehand, nor ever suffered his hand and seal to be brought against him as the manifest proof of his guilt; all which has been so managed in his absence, that no theft in any private house was ever more clearly detected than this whole conspiracy.”

The

In Cat. iii.

8, 9.

“ He added, that all this was the pure effect of a Divine influence, as was evident, not only for its being above the reach of human counsel, but from the Gods having so remarkably interposed in it as to shew themselves almost visible. For, not to mention the nightly streams of light from the western sky, the blazing of the heavens, flashes of lightening, earthquakes, &c. he could not omit what happened two years before, when the turrets of the Capitol were struck down with lightening; how the Southsayers, called together from all Etruria, declared, that fire, slaughter, the overthrow of the laws, civil war, and the ruin of the City, was portended, unless some means were found out of appeasing the Gods: for which purpose they ordered a new and larger statue of Jupiter to be made, and to be placed in a position contrary to that of the former image, with its face turned towards the East, intimating that, if it looked towards the rising sun, the Forum, and the Senate-house, then all plots against the State would be detected so evidently, that all the world should see them. — That, upon this answer, the Consuls of that year gave immediate orders for making and placing the statue;

The next day (Dec. 4.) the Senate ordered public rewards to the Depu- Y. R. 690.
ties and Vulturcius for their faithful discoveries.

The same day was brought before the Senate one L. Tarquinius, Sallust.
said to have been taken upon the road as he was going to join Catiline.
He offered to lay the whole of the plot before the House, provided he might have the security of the public faith for his pardon: The Consul assented, and bid him declare what he knew. His account was much the same with that of Vulturcius, as to the projected firing of the City, the intended massacre, and the march of the rebel-army to Rome. He added, that, when he was apprehended, he was going, by direction from Crassus, to warn Catiline not to be discouraged by the seizure of his accomplices, Lentulus, Cethegus, and the rest; but to make the greater haste for that reason, in order to rescue them, and revive the spirits of his other friends.

At the name of Crassus the whole Assembly seemed startled: For some looked upon the thing as incredible; others, though they believed it true, yet judged, that a man of his high quality, immense wealth, and mighty sway in the State, should, at this juncture, be rather soothed and courted than provoked; and very many there were, who, with respect to their private affairs, stood obliged to Crassus, or in awe of him [probably deep in his debt] so that they all cried out, A false witness! a false witness!
and would have the sense of the House (which was then very full) immediately taken upon what he had said; Cicero having put the question, they voted that Tarquinius's evidence was false; and that he should be committed to prison, and there confined, till he disclosed at whose instigation he had ferged so monstrous a lie. Some there were at that time who thought this information a contrivance of P. Autronius, to the end that Crassus, being involved in the same danger with the Conspirators, might protect them by his power. Others said, that Tarquinius was put upon it by Cicero, to prevent Crassus from embroiling the State, by undertaking the protection of bad Citizens, as was his custom. I myself (adds Sallust)

Ibid. 8, 9. “ statue; but, from the slow progress of the “ work, neither they nor their successors, nor “ himself, could get it finished till that very “ day, on which, by the special influence of “ Jupiter, while the conspirators and witnesses “ were carried through the Forum to the Temple
“ of Concord, in that very moment the Statue “ was fixed in its place; and being turned to “ look upon them and the Senate, both they and
“ the Senate saw the whole Conspiracy detected.
“ And can any man, says he, be such an enemy
“ to Truth, so rash, so mad, as to deny, that all “ things which we see, and, above all, that this “ City is governed by the power and providence
“ of the Gods?” He proceeds to observe,

“ That the Conspirators must needs be under “ a divine and judicial infatuation, and could “ never have trusted affairs and letters of such “ moment to men barbarous and unknown to “ them, if the Gods had not confounded their “ senses: And that the Ambassadors of a na“ tion so disaffected, and so able and willing “ to make war upon them, should slight the “ hopes of dominion, and the advantageous “ offer of men of Patrician rank, must needs “ be a Divine interposition; especially when “ they might have gained their ends, not by “ fighting, but, by holding their tongues.”
“ Crasso ex negotiis privatis obnoxii. Sal- lust.

heard.

Y. R. 690. heard Crassus affirm, That Cicero was the contriver of this affront upon Bef. Chr. him.

62.
 189 Conf.

Vid. supr.

P. 302.

Vid. supr.

P. 306.

Salust.

Yet, at this very time, Q. Catulus and C. Piso could not, by the most pressing solicitations, nor by any offers whatever, prevail with Cicero to have Caesar falsely accused by the Allobroges, or by any body else. Those two Senators bore an inveterate enmity to Caesar; Piso on account of Caesar's having impeached him (as above related) of oppressive Government; and Catulus, because Caesar had stood in competition with him for the High-priesthood, and, though but a young man, had carried it from him, who was advanced in years, and had filled the highest offices. Both these implacable enemies thought they had now a favourable opportunity of bringing Caesar under suspicion; his great liberality to private persons, and his largesses to the people, having plunged him very deep in debt. Not being able to persuade the Consul to so black a villainy, they themselves went about from Citizen to Citizen, whispering calumnies, and charging Caesar with facts which they pretended to have learnt from Vulturcius and the Allobrogian Deputies; insomuch that some of the Roman Knights, who were posted about the Temple of Concord, as a guard to the Senate, threatened Caesar with their drawn swords as he came out of the Assembly.

And now the City was alarmed with the rumour of fresh plots, formed by the slaves and dependants of Lentulus and Cethegus for the rescue of their masters; which obliged Cicero to reinforce his guards; and, for the prevention of all such attempts, to put an end to the whole affair, by bringing the question of their punishment, without farther delay, before the Senate, which he summoned for that purpose the next morning (Dec. 5.)

The debate was of great delicacy and importance; to decide upon the lives of Citizens of the first rank. A full Senate had indeed declared * them

Midd. p.
 303.

* The same night his wife Terentia, with the Vestal virgins and the principal matrons of Rome, was performing at home, according to an annual custom, the mystic rights of the Goddess Bona or the Good, to which no male creature was ever admitted, and, till that function was over, he was excluded also from his own house, and forced to retire to a neighbour's, where, with a select council of friends, he began to deliberate about punishing the traitors; when his wife came in all haste to inform him of a prodigy which had just happened amongst them; for the sacrifice being over, and the fire of the altar seemingly extinct, a bright flame issued suddenly from the ashes, to the astonishment of the company; upon which the Vestal virgins sent her away, to require him to pursue what he had then in his thoughts for the good of his country, since the Goddess by this sign had given great light to his safety and glory.

It is not improbable, that this pretended prodigy was projected between Cicero and Terentia, whose sister likewise was one of the Vestal virgins; and, having the direction of the whole ceremony, might help to effect, without suspicion, what had been privately concerted amongst them. For it was of great use to Cicero, to possess the minds of the People, as strongly as he could, with an apprehension of their danger, for the sake of disposing them the more easily to approve of the resolution, that he had already taken in his own mind, of putting the Conspirators to death. M. Marabin observes, that Cicero says nothing of all this. The reason might be, that the private consultation, and resolutions there made, were illegal.

guilty

guilty of treason against the State: But capital punishments were rare and ever odious in Rome, whose laws were of all others the least sanguinary; banishment, with confiscation of goods, being the ordinary punishments for the greatest crimes. The Senate indeed, as it has been said above, in cases of sudden and dangerous tumults, claimed the prerogative of punishing the leaders with death by the authority of their own decrees; but this was looked upon as a stretch of power, and an infringement of the rights of the People, which nothing could excuse but the necessity of times and the extremity of danger. For there was an old law of Porcius Læca, a Tribune, which granted to all criminals, capitally condemned, an appeal to the People; and a later one of C. Gracchus to prohibit the taking away the life of any Citizen without a formal hearing before the People: So that some Senators, who had concurred in all the previous debates, withdrew themselves from this, to shew their dislike of what they expected to be the issue of it, and to have no hand in putting Roman Citizens to death by a vote of the Senate. The Consul having moved the question, what was to be done with the Conspirators, Silanus, one of the Consuls elect, (being the first called upon to speak) advised*, that those who were then in custody, and also the rest, when taken, should all suffer the last or severest punishment, i. e. be put to death. To this all who spoke after him readily assented, till it came to Julius Cæsar, then Prætor elect, who treated that opinion not as cruel, but as new and illegal, and contrary to the constitution of the Republic.

“ All men, Conscript Fathers, when they are deliberating upon matters of moment and of difficult determination, ought to be quite free from love and hatred, pity and anger; because these passions never fail to cast such a cloud over the mind, as hinders the discernment of what is true and what is eligible. Let us be careful that our own dignity weigh more with us than the guilt of Lentulus and his associates; let us consult our reputation more than our resentment. Could a punishment be thought of equal to their crimes, I too should be for going out of the way on this provocation; but, as that cannot be, let us go on in the path which the laws have chalked out for us.

“ Many of those who spoke before me have displayed a great deal of oratory in bewailing the unfortunate condition of their country; they have enumerated all the horrors of war, and the sufferings to which the

Pro Sylla,
14, 15.

* While the prisoners were before the Senate, Cicero desired some of the Senators, who could write short-hand, to take notes of every thing that was said; and when the whole examination was finished, and reduced into an act, he set all the clerks at work to transcribe copies of it, which he dispersed presently through Italy and all the provinces, to prevent any invidious misrepresentation of what was so clearly attested and confessed by the criminals themselves.

VOL. III.

And according to Plutarch (in Cat.) these writers in short-hand had been taught their art by Cicero, and took down the speeches of the members on the present occasion. And to this the Historian ascribes the preservation of the speech which Cato made in answer to Cæsar; which speech, he says, is the only one of Cato's that was preserved: of which, however, he gives us but a sketch.

2 A “ vanquished

Y. R. 590. " vanquished will be exposed;—virgins ravished; children torn from Bef. Chr. " their mothers bosoms; matrons insulted by a victorious soldiery; tem-
 62. " ples and houses plundered; whole towns in flames; all places filled with 399 Conf. " dead bodies, blood, and lamentation. -- But, in the name of the im" mortal Gods, what does all this profusion of eloquence aim at? Is " it to excite in your minds a detestation of the Conspirators? Yes, " without question. Those whom a design so monstrously wicked cannot " move, will be moved by a florid oration. Where is the man who " under-rates the injuries done to himself, and is not rather apt to exag" gerate them beyond all reason? But some may do this with more safety " than others: Men in low life, if they are led too far by anger, their " excesses are hid in the obscurity of their state. But those who are in " high stations have less liberty of acting; for what is called anger in a " private man, is censured as tyranny and oppression in a governor. It is " my real opinion (as I just now said) that no punishment, no tortures, " are adequate to the crimes of these men: But the temper of mankind is " such that they remember best what happened last, and, in cases of the " most notorious wickedness, are apt to forget what the guilty did, and " to talk only of what they suffered, especially if the punishment inflicted " on them was, in any degree, more than commonly severe. I am entirely " persuaded that D. Silanus, in the advice he gave, meant nothing but " the public good. I am too well acquainted with his virtue and mode" ration, to imagine that he spoke from a desire to make his court to any " body, or from enmity to the prisoners. Yet his advice seems to me,
 " I will not say cruel, (for what can be cruel against such offenders?) but,
 " illegal, novel to our constitution. Certainly, Silanus, it must have " been fear for the public, which moved you, our Consul elect, and who " are to be guardian of our laws, to propose a punishment unknown to " them. How needless that fear is, I need not say, since, by the wisdom " and care of our most excellent Consul, so considerable a force is pro" vided for our security. As to the punishment proposed, one may with " truth affirm, that, to the wretched, death is rather a benefit than an " evil: It is a release from all the pains incident to humanity. Beyond " death there is no place either for anguish or delight.

" But let me ask, why did you not add to the sentence of death, that " they should be first beaten with rods? Was it because the Porcian law " forbids it? There are other laws that equally forbid punishing a con" demned Citizen with death, and that permit him to go into banishment.
 " Did you spare the prisoners from being beaten with rods, because it is " a severer punishment than death? (What can be too severe for persons " convicted of such crimes?) If you look on scourging as a punishment " less severe than death, why this tenderness for the laws in a matter of less " concern, while you scruple not to violate them in a greater? But you " may say perhaps—who will censure us for any punishment we shall “ decree against traitors to the Commonwealth? I answer, — Time, a Y. R. 695.

 “ very little time, and Fortune that rules the world at pleasure, may produce Bef Chr.
 “ such censurers. The criminals deserve the worst that can befall them; 61.
 “ but do you, Conscrip Fathers, consider well what you resolve upon in 339 Conf.
 “ this case: Bad precedents have, generally speaking, been innocent in “ their origin. An example set by worthy Magistrates of assuming arbi“ trary power, on urgent occasions, and for good purposes, has been “ often pleaded by bad and ignorant men as a precedent to justify their “ assuming the same power, when their purpose was to abuse it. The “ Spartans, when they had got the better of the Athenians, appointed “ thirty persons for the government of the conquered State. These new “ governors began with condemning to death several of the most pro“ fligate and most detested Citizens without any previous trial in form.
 “ The multitude rejoiced at it, and applauded the dispatch of justice.
 “ But in time these Governors came to treat the good and bad alike:
 “ they put to death whomever of the Citizens they pleased; and the rest “ lived in terror of the same fate. The people, then finding themselves “ enslaved, suffered grievously for their foolish joy.

“ In our own times, when Sylla had vanquished Marius, and ordered “ Damasippus and some others, who, like him, had enriched themselves “ out of the spoils of the public, to be put to death, who was there that “ did not applaud his justice? But these executions were only a prelude to “ more bloody scenes. For, when any of Sylla’s partizans took a fancy “ to the town-house or the country-house of a Roman Citizen, or even “ to his garment, or to a piece of his household furniture, he had nothing “ to do but to get the owner’s name put into the list of the proscribed.
 “ Thus many, who had rejoiced at the fall of Damasippus, were them“ selves dragged to execution; and the carnage continued till Sylla had “ enriched all his followers. I apprehend not indeed any thing like “ this from Marcus Tullius, or in these times. But in a mighty State, “ as ours is, there is a great variety of men and manners. In other times,
 “ and under another Consul, who may likewise have an army as his “ devotion, some false story may pass current for a truth, and then your “ present decree will be a precedent for him to draw the sword; and,
 “ when it is drawn, who shall oblige him to use it moderately, or to sheathe “ it again?

“ Our ancestors, Conscrip Fathers, though wanting neither prudence “ nor bravery, were not so haughty as to disdain to look into the customs “ and institutions of the nations around them, and to imitate them in the “ things wherein each nation excelled. Thus they borrowed weapons of “ war from the Samnites, and the ensigns of our Magistrates from Etruria:
 “ whatever they thought useful, whether found among their allies or “ among their enemies, they introduced into our State. In those times, “ by a custom which they had borrowed from Greece, they subjected offend-

Y. R. 690.
Bef. Chr.
61.
539 Cons.

ing Citizens to be beaten with rods, and such as were capitally convicted, they sentenced to death. Afterwards, when, our State being vastly augmented, the prodigious number of its Citizens had given birth to factions, and innocent men began to be circumvented, and such like wickedness to be practised; then the Porcian law was provided; and likewise other laws, by which, instead of death, exile was to be the punishment of Citizens capitally condemned. This institution of our fore-fathers has great weight with me; I think we should be cautious how we break in upon it. Certainly they, who, from so small beginnings, could raise this mighty Empire, must, in virtue and wisdom, have excelled us, who have a difficulty to preserve what they so worthily acquired.

“Are we then to release these criminals, and send them away to reinforce the army of Catiline? By no means. My opinion is, that their estates be confiscated, and their persons closely confined in the strongest of the municipal towns (each of the criminals in a distinct town) and that no person hereafter move the Senate or People in their favour: And let it be declared as the opinion of this House, that whoever shall do so, will act contrary to the welfare of the Republic, and of all its members.”

Sallust.
Pist. in Cat. in Cic.
in Cæf.
Suet. vii.
Plut. in
Cic.

Cæsar's discourse made a great impression on the Assembly; even Silanus excused and mitigated the severity of his vote; and Cicero's friends came readily into Cæsar's opinion, as likely to create the least trouble to Cicero himself, for whose peace and safety they now saw reason to be solicitous.

Sallust.

But Cato, one of the new Tribunes, rose up, and in a good deal of warmth began with observing, that those who had spoken before him had all mistaken the question: That he was surprized to see any debate about the punishment of men who had commenced an actual war against their country: That the question was how to secure themselves against the Conspirators, rather than how to punish them: That other crimes might be punished after commission; but unless this was prevented before its effect, it would be in vain to seek a remedy after: That the debate was not about the public revenues, or the oppression of the allies, but about their own lives and liberties; not about the discipline or manners of the City, on which he had often delivered his mind in that place; nor about the greatness or prosperity of their Empire; but whether they or their enemies should possess that Empire:—

“In the name of the immortal Gods, I call upon you, who have always had your magnificent houses and your villas, your statues and your pictures, more at heart than the interest of the Republic*; I call upon you to rouse yourselves for once, and stand up in defence of your coun-

* These were Cicero's worthies, those Consuls who had enriched themselves by oppressing the provinces of which they had the government after the expiration of their magistracies.

“try,

“ try, if you would preserve those things you are so fond of, and enjoy, “ without interruption, that voluptuous indolence in which you pass your “ days. Often have I spoke, Conscript Fathers, and much have I com“ plained in this Assembly of the rapacious covetousness and prodigal “ luxury which prevail among us; and those complaints have created me “ many enemies. But I, who never was disposed to excuse in myself even “ an inclination to evil, cannot readily pardon the evil deeds of others.
 “ You have long since lost the true names of things: To give away other “ people’s money, is called generosity; to attempt what is criminal, forti“ tude. If you must be generous, let it be from the spoils of the Allies;
 “ if merciful, to the plunderers of the Treasury; but be not prodigal “ of the blood of Citizens; nor, by sparing a few bad, destroy all the “ good. Shall any one in the present case talk to me of mildness and “ clemency? There is no room for mercy. Cæsar indeed has spoken well “ and gravely concerning life and death, judging, I presume, that all we “ are told of punishments allotted to the wicked in the infernal regions “ is mere fiction; and he would therefore have the estates of the crimi“ nals confiscated, and their persons closely confined in the municipal “ towns; from an apprehension, I suppose, that, if they should be kept “ at Rome, they might be forcibly rescued by their fellow conspirators, “ or by a mob, hired for that purpose: As if villains were no where but “ in Rome, and not in every part of Italy; or as if the attempts of the “ desperate would not be more likely to succeed where there is less strength “ to resist them: His proposal has not the least shew of reason, if he be “ truly afraid of them: But if, while every body else is in fear, he alone “ fears nothing, there is the more reason for us, Conscript Fathers, to be “ afraid for ourselves. We are not now deliberating on the fate only of “ Lentulus and the other prisoners, but of Catiline’s whole army, “ which will be animated or discouraged in proportion to the vigour or “ remissness of your decrees.—The flagitious lives of the criminals “ confute every argument of mercy: Catiline is hovering over us with “ an army, while his accomplices are within the walls and in the very “ heart of the City; so that whatever you determine cannot be kept secret, “ which makes it the more necessary to determine quickly. My opinion “ therefore is, That, since the criminals have been convicted, both by testimony
 “ and their own confession, of a detestable treason against the Republic, they “ should suffer the punishment of death according to the custom of our an- “ cestors’.”

The

Plut. in Cat.

1 Plutarch reports, that, while Cato was speaking, a sealed letter was delivered to Cæsar in the Senate-house: that Cato, suspecting it might contain some secret advice from the Conspirators, insisted upon its being read to the Assembly. Whereupon Cæsar, who sat near him, delivered the paper into his hands. Cato presently perceived it to be a love-letter from his own sister, Servilia, with whom Cæsar had long had an intrigue:

 the angry Stoic threw back the paper to him; There, Sir! and then resumed the thread of

Y. R. 693.
 Bef. C. 52.
 379. Conf.

The leading men of the Senate, the Oligarchs, having, in concert with Cicero, come, to the Assembly, determined² to put the prisoners to death, had therefore voted accordingly; but some being convinced by Cæsar's discourse, others alarmed by it, they retracted their votes, and Scipio himself, if he did not retract, explained his vote away, pretending, that, by the last punishment he did not mean death, but the severest punishment that could be legally inflicted on a Roman Citizen: nevertheless they all turned now to their first opinion, being encouraged to it by Cato's authority, not only as a Senator highly and universally revered for his virtue, but as being at this time a TRIBUNES OF THE PEOPLE: They extolled him to the skies for his resolution, and reproached one another with cowardice. Cato was the only Hero. A decree, therefore, was drawn conformable to Cato's opinion, and in his very words; and the greater part of the Senate, to do him honour, waited upon him home.

Vell. Pat.
 l. ii. c. 35.

Plut. in
 Cic.

The Consul, thus authorized, resolved to put the decree in execution without delay. Accompanied by a great number of the principal men of the City, who served him for a guard, he went and took Lentulus from the custody of his kinsman Lentulus Spintber, and conveyed him through the Forum to the common prison. The multitude, greatly astonished, followed in silence; the younger sort, especially, were much terrified with this shocking ceremony; a thing quite new to them, and which they considered as a dreadful mystery of aristocratical government. Lentulus was delivered by the Consul to the executioners, who presently strangled him: Cetbegus, Statilius, and Gabinus, were conducted to their execution by the Prætors, and put to death in the same manner, together with Caparius, the only one of their accomplices who was taken after the examination.

As Cicero, in his return from these executions, perceived in the Forum a great many of Catiline's accomplices, who had got together in clusters, of his discourse: In which discourse he addressed himself to Cæsar in particular, "reproaching him with an attribution of popularity and lenity, while he was subverting the Commonwealth; and with endeavouring to intemperate the Senate, while he himself ought to tremble with fear, lest he should be treated as an accomplice of the Conspirators, for having so openly and so audaciously endeavoured to rescue them out of the hands of Justice; confessing that he had no compassion for his country, when he saw it upon the very brink of destruction; and yet being so tender hearted, as almost to shed tears over villains, who ought never to have seen the light of heaven, and whose death was necessary for securing the City from a massacre and a conflagration."

If Cato did really scold in this manner, he must, unquestionably, have been prompted to it by his flaming wrath, which the billet-doux above-mentioned had suddenly kindled. The speech which Sallust ascribes to him, though not so intemperate, is far from being a reasonable answer to Cæsar's discourse.

² Cicero declares this of himself in a letter to Atticus [Lib. XII. Ep. 21.] where he complains of Brutus for not having done him justice, in a relation which Brutus had written of what passed at this time in the Senate. Me autem hic laudat, quod retulerim, non quod patefecerim, quod cohortatus sim, QUOD DENIQUE ANTE, QUAM CONSULEREM, IPSE JUDICAVERIM.

and

and were waiting for the night, in hopes of being then able to rescue the prisoners, he cried out to them with a loud voice, They did live [vixerunt;] a mode of speech among the Romans, to avoid the disagreeable and ominous sound of the word dead. Y. R. 690.
Bef. Chr.
62.
389. Conf.

The affair thus over, the whole body of the Senate, together with the Knights, conducted the Consul home in a kind of triumph, the streets being illuminated, and the women and children at the windows, and on the tops of houses, to see him pass along through infinite acclamations of the multitude, proclaiming him the Preserver of his Country, and Second Founder of Rome.

This was the fifth of December, those celebrated Nones, of which Cicero used to boast ever after as the most glorious day of his life. Midd.
222.

By the seizure and punishment of Catiline's associates, the Senate thought the danger wholly averted; and they, accordingly, proceeded to vote thanksgivings and festivals, looking upon Catiline's army as a crew of fugitives or banditti, whom their forces were sure to destroy, whenever they could meet with them. 223.

Cicero's administration being now at an end, nothing remained but to resign the Consulship, according to custom, in an Assembly of the People, and to take the usual oath, of his having discharged it with fidelity. This was generally accompanied with a speech from the expiring Consul; and after such a year, and from such a Speaker, the City was in no small expectation of what Cicero would say to them: But Metellus Nepos, one of the new Tribunes (who had entered on their office the tenth of December,) resolved to disappoint both the Orator and the Audience: For when Cicero had mounted the Rostra, and was ready to perform this last act of his office, the Tribune would not suffer him to speak, or to do any thing more than barely to take the oath; declaring, That he who had put Catilines to death unheard, ought not to be permitted to speak for himself: Upon which, Cicero, who was never at a loss, instead of pronouncing the ordinary form of the oath, exalting the tone of his voice, swore out aloud, so as all the people might hear him, that he had saved the Republic and the City from ruin; which the multitude below confirmed with an universal shout, and with one voice cried out, that what he had sworn was true; and thus the intended affront was turned, by his presence of mind, to his greater honour. Ep. Fam.
v. 2.
In. Pison.
3.
Ep. Fam.
v. 2.

Catiline

^a Plutarch names two Tribunes, Metellus and Bestia, as making this opposition; and intimates that they were instigated to it by Cæsar, then Prætor elect.

^b “ Before we close the account of the memorable events of this year, we must not omit (says Cicero's English historian) the mention of one which distinguished it

“ afterwards as a particular æra in the annals
“ of Rome, the birth of Octavius surnamed “ Augustus, which happened on the twenty-“ third of September. Velleius calls it an ac“ cession of glory to Cicero's Consulship: But “ it excites speculations rather of a different “ sort; on the inscrutable methods of Provi“ dence, and the short-sighted policy of man;
“ that

Y. R. 691.
 Bef. Chr.
 61.
 390 Conf.
 Mdd.
 123.
 Sall. 56.

Catiline was in a condition to make a stouter resistance than the Senate had imagined: He had filled up his troops to the number of two legions, or about twelve thousand fighting men, of which a fourth part only was completely armed, the rest furnished with what chance offered, darts, lances, clubs. Trusting to the proper strength of the Conspiracy, he refused at first to enlist slaves, who flocked to him in great numbers. He knew that he should quickly have soldiers enough, if his friends performed their part at home: So that when the Consul Antonius approached towards him with his army, he shifted his quarters, and made frequent motions and marches through the mountains, sometimes towards Gaul, sometimes towards the City, in order to avoid an engagement, till he could hear some news from Rome: But when the fatal account came, of the death of Lentulus and the rest, the face of his affairs began presently to change, and his army to dwindle apace, by the desertion of those, whom the hopes of victory and plunder had drawn to his camp. His first attempt, therefore, was by long marches and private roads through the Apennine, to make his escape into Gaul; but Q. Metellus Celer, who had been sent thither before by Cicero, imagining that he would take that resolution, had secured all the passes, and posted himself so advantageously with an army of three legions, that it was impossible for him to force his way on that side; whilst, on the other, the Consul Antonius, with a much greater force, blocked him up behind, and enclosed him within the mountains. It is said that Antonius had no

“that in the moment when Rome was preserved
 “from destruction, and its Liberty thought to be “established more firmly than ever, an infant should “be thrown into the world, who, within the “course of twenty years, effected what Catiline
 “had attempted, and destroyed both Cicero and
 “and REPUBLIC. If Rome could have been “saved by human counsel, it would have been “saved by the skill of Cicero: but its destiny
 “was now approaching. For governments, “like natural bodies, have, with the prin“ciples of their preservation, the seeds of ruin
 “also essentially mixed in their constitution, “which, after a certain period, begin to operate “and exert themselves to the dissolution of the “vital frame. These seeds had long been “fermenting in the bowels of the Republic;
 “when Octavius came, peculiarly formed by “nature, and instructed by art, to quicken “their operation, and exalt them to their “maturity.”

What is here said of the resemblance of governments to natural bodies is unquestionably true: but for the rest of this religiously grave speculation, what solidity is there in it? Cicero had preserved the City from being set on fire, and, perhaps, the greater part of the Senators from being massacred; but the illegal method he had taken, without necessity, to do those services, far from establishing Liberty more firmly than ever, or having a tendency to restore Liberty (of which there was hardly a shadow remaining) hastened the introduction of despotic monarchy. And the speculation of the reverend Historian on the inscrutable methods of Providence, would certainly have appeared not less ingenious, if it had been to this effect: That, during the Consulship of Cicero who, when PRÆTOR, had, for the sake of his own advancement, given the first stab to the Roman ARISTOCRACY, by persuading the People to pass the MANILIAN LAW: and who, from a zeal to support that ARISTOCRACY, when it was his private interest to have it supported, gave the second stab to it, when CONSUL, by an evil Example of dispensing with the Laws unnecessarily, an infant should be thrown into the world, who, in the course of a few years, gave the finishing blow to the Aristocratic Domination, and delivered up Cicero, its most eloquent and most eloquacious Advocate, to the sword of his particular and implacable enemy.

inclination to fight with Catiline, but would willingly have given him an opportunity to escape, had not his Quæstor Sextius (who was Cicero's creature) and his Lieutenant Petreius, urged him on, against his will, to force Catiline to the necessity of a battle: Who, seeing all things desperate, and nothing left but either to die or conquer, resolved to try his fortune against Antonius, though much the stronger, rather than against Metellus, in hopes (says Dio) that out of regard to their former friendship and connections, the Consul might possibly contrive some way at last of throwing the victory into his hands. But Antonius happening to be seized at that very time with a fit of the Gout, or pretending so to be, the command fell of course to his Lieutenant Petreius. This officer had served with great reputation for above thirty years together in the army, either as a Tribune, a Præfekt, a Lieutenant, or a Prætor; so that he was acquainted with most of the soldiers, and with the gallant actions they had performed; by the mention of which he spirited them up to maintain their character: and at the same time he represented to them that they were going to fight for their Altars, their Children, their Country, against a gang of robbers, who were not half armed.

On the other hand, Catiline, having first, in a speech to his followers, urged them by every motive he could think of to exert their utmost courage, sent away all the horses in his army, and among the rest his own, chusing to fight on foot, that, by letting his men see the danger to him and to them was equal, they might be the more animated to a gallant behaviour. All his Centurions, his Evocati [experienced veterans who had served out their legal time] and the stoutest and best armed of his other soldiers he placed in the front, where he himself stood by Marius's Silver Eagle, before-mentioned. To Manlius he gave the command of the right; to a native of Fesula the left. A desperate battle ensued. The legions of the Republic fought with unconquerable bravery, those of Catiline with desperate and immoveable obstinacy; resolved to vanquish or die, not a man recoiled; there was not one who would either give or accept of quarter. Catiline, at the head of a select company, moved about in the van, relieving those who were hard pressed, bringing up fresh men to supply the place of the wounded, and providing for all exigencies: he himself often fighting in person, and performing the part of a stout soldier as well as of a good commander. Petreius finding a resistance beyond his expectation, brought up the Prætorian Cohort against the enemies center, which was thereby broken; and though they rallied here and there, faced about upon him, and made some short resistance, in the end he put them all to the sword; and then turned upon the flanks of the wings. Manlius and the Fesulan, the two commanders, were among the first that fell. Catiline, seeing his forces reduced to a very small number, and calling to mind (as Sallust supposes) his noble family, and the figure he had formerly made in the world, rushed into the thickest of the enemy,

Y. R. 691.
Bef. Chr.
61.
390 Conf.

and was there slain, fighting to the last. Some few soldiers of the center (which had been broke by the Prætorian cohort) lay scattered about, yet not one of them wounded in the back. Except these, almost every one lay dead upon the very spot where he had stood at first. But Catiline himself was found at a great distance from his own men, among the dead bodies of his enemies. Not yet quite breathless, he retained, in the agonies of death, that fierceness of countenance which had been always natural to him. Out of the whole number of the rebels not so much as one man, above the rank of a slave, was taken, either fighting or running away. It proved a bloody and a mournful victory to the army of the Republic, the bravest men of the legions being all either killed or grievously wounded.

Mfid.
p. 226.

Thus ended this famed Conspiracy in the beginning of the Consulship of Silanus and Murena. "Whilst the sense of all Cicero's services (says his English Historian) was fresh, he was repaid for them to the full of his wishes, and in the very way that he desired, by the warm and grateful applauses of all orders of the City. For, besides the honours already mentioned, L. Gellius, who had been Consul and Censor, said in a speech to the Senate, that the Republic owed him a Civic-Crown for saving them from ruin. And Catulus, in a full House, declared him the Father of his Country, as Cato likewise did from the Rostra, with the loud acclamations of the whole People: Whence Pliny, in honour of his memory, cries out, Hail thou, who wast first saluted the parent of thy Country. This title, the most glorious that a mortal can wear, was, from this precedent, usurped afterwards by those who of all mortals deserved it the least, the Emperors; proud to extort from slaves and flatterers what Cicero obtained from the FREE vote of the Senate and People of Rome.

In Pison.
3.
Plut in
Cic. &
Appian.
p. 431.
Plin. Hist.
Nat. l. vii.
30.

" ————— Roma parentem,
" Roma Patrem Patriæ Ciceronem libera dixit.
Juv. viii.

" THEE, Cicero, Rome, while FREE, nor yet entbrall'd
" To Tyrant's will, thy Country's Parent call'd.

In Pison.
11.

" All the towns of Italy followed the example of the metropolis in decreeing extraordinary honours to him; and Capua in particular chose him their Patron, and erected a gilt statue to him,
" Sallust, who allows him the character of an excellent Consul, says not a word of any of these honours, nor gives him any greater share of praise than what could not be dissembled by an Historian. There are two obvious reasons for this reservedness: First, The personal enmity, which, according to tradition, subsisted between them. Secondly, The time of publishing his History, in the reign of Augustus, while the name of Cicero was still obnoxious to envy."

To this it may be answered, that Sallust might think the compliments made to the Consul by particular Senators of his own faction not worthy of an Historian's notice : That he has related the affair throughout, not like an enemy to Cicero, but in a manner so honourable for him, as to make some think, that the misunderstanding between them was not subsisting when Sallust wrote the History of Catiline's Conspiracy.

But what shall we say of his omitting to mention Cicero's Fourth Oration against Catiline, and of his giving (as M. Morabin observes) all the honour of the day to Cato, to whom alone he ascribes the Senate's being brought to decree the death of the Conspirators ? Cicero's English Historian has built much upon that fourth Oration, and has filled seven pages of his History with the substance of it : Yet it is observable, that this notable speech is no where taken notice of by Plutarch in his life of Cicero, or of Cæsar, or of Cato ; nay, Plutarch reports, that what Cicero said, after Cæsar had spoke, was in support of Cæsar's opinion. Nor is the said fourth Oration mentioned by Appian, or Dio, or Suetonius, or Vell. Paterculus ; and one may reasonably conjecture, from a letter of Cicero to Atticus, L. xii. Ep. 21. that, seven years after Cicero's Consulship, neither Brutus nor Atticus knew any thing of that fourth Oration ; which was probably composed on occasion of Brutus's having given more honour to Cato, in relating the debate about Catiline, than Cicero thought was consistent with his own glory : Indeed it seems to have many internal probable proofs of its being, not an extemporary speech, but a laboured composition, made at leisure, many years after the debate ; a disgustful panegyric upon his own foresight, wisdom, disinterestedness, magnanimity, prodigious courage and contempt of death ; though Plutarch, writing of this very transaction, tells us, that the Orator was in no reputation for courage.

His English Historian, concerning the debate in the Senate, writes thus :

“ These two contrary opinions (that of Silanus and that of Cæsar) being proposed, the next question was, which of them should take place, Cæsar's had made a great impression on the Assembly, and staggered even Silanus, who began to excuse and mitigate the severity of his vote ; and Cicero's friends were going forwardly into it as likely to create the least trouble to Cicero himself, for whose peace and safety they began to be solicitous : When Cicero, observing the inclinations of the House, and rising up to put the question, made his fourth Speech, which now remains on the subject of this transaction ; in which he delivered his sentiments with all the skill both of the Orator and the Statesman ; and while he seemed to shew a perfect neutrality, and to give

* Caton, dans Salluste, a tout l'honneur de cette journée ; en sorte qu'on ne fait auquel croire, ou de l'Historien qui rapporte le fait à l'avantage de celui-là, ou de notre Orateur qui s'en attribuant toute la gloire, devient son propre panégyriste. Morab. Hist. de Cic. p. 143.

Y. R. 691. " equal commendation to both the opinions, was artfully labouring all Bef. Chr. 61. " the while to turn the scale in favour of Silanus's, which he considered 390 Conf. " as a necessary example of severity in the present circumstances of the " Public."

That this master-piece of oratory and political skill was never spoken, one may reasonably conclude from the following considerations :

Midd. 1. He tells the House that there are two opinions before them, whereas
P. 273- in reality there was but one ; for Silanus, and all those who had assented to
 • Suet. in what he at first advised (among whom was the Consul's * brother Quintus)
Cæf. 14. had gone over to Cæsar's opinion.

2. He represents Cæsar as voting for every other way of punishment except death, which not being true, but directly contrary to what Cæsar had advised, it is not likely the Orator, while Cæsar was present, would impute it to him. For instance, Cæsar did not advise to have the criminals beaten with rods, but speaks of that punishment as no less illegal, without a hearing and judgment of the whole People, than death itself.

3. He represents Cæsar as having voted for perpetual imprisonment, which his words, in the speech given us by Sallust, do not import : Neither could a vote of the SENATE deprive the PEOPLE of their right of judging the Prisoners, and determining their Fate.

Plut. in Add to this, that Cæsar (according to Plutarch's repeated testimony)
Cæf. moved for the close confinement of the prisoners only till Catiline should be
Id. in Cic. defeated and crushed, and more ample information of the Conspiracy could be & in Cat. taken at leisure. And Appian says expressly, that the imprisonment proposed by Cæsar was only till the war should be ended, and the criminals could be brought to trial.

4. Cicero's answer to Cæsar, concerning Caius Gracchus's law, which forbade the punishing CITIZENS, uncondemned by the PEOPLE, with death, is quite ludicrous. ENEMIES, says the Orator, are no CITIZENS ; therefore the prisoners, having been declared ENEMIES by the SENATE, have no title to the benefit of that law. Would he have talked thus, Cæsar present ?

5. He affirms, that Caius Gracchus had suffered death by ORDER of the PEOPLE : A notorious falsity, and contradictory to what he had said in his first speech against Catiline. But, had it been true, would the Orator thence infer that the PEOPLE were dissatisfied with the Law in question ? Or would he infer from the PEOPLE's having sentenced Caius Gracchus to death, that the SENATE might legally inflict on a Citizen the same punishment ? Can we suppose such discourse from Cicero in full Senate ?

6. He refutes, beforehand, Cato's ARGUMENT for putting the prisoners to death without trial, by saying, That the People were not wanting in their zeal and duty on this occasion ; that the whole body of the People were assembled for the defence of the Senate ; that the whole Roman People were of one and the same mind. If so, there could be no ground to apprehend a rescue, nor therefore any necessity of sentencing the prisoners to immediate death.

If

If any admirer of Cicero's virtues should pretend, that more regard ought to be had to what Cicero himself says concerning the affair of Cataline, than to what Sallust has written, or any, or all of the writers abovementioned; this, to my apprehension, may be safely denied; nay, with great appearance of reason it may be said, that no one of those writers can possibly deserve less credit than Cicero, when his Glory or the Interest of his Party is in question.

Plutarch informs us, that "Cicero, in an Oration which he made upon his Consulship, expressly wrote, that Crassus came to his house one night, and put into his hands a letter, containing an account of Catiline's proceedings; and assured him, at the same time, that the conspiracy, there spoken of, was real and certain." Yet, the same Cicero, in another of his Orations, which did not appear till after Crassus and Cæsar were dead, accused them both of being in that Conspiracy. What shall we think of such a Writer? What credit can he deserve as an Historian? his English Panegyrist makes no mention, in the proper place, of this nightly visit of Crassus to the Consul; but, after he has finished the story, tells us, that "Crassus, who had always been Cicero's enemy, by an officiousness of bringing letters of intelligence to him, during the alarm of the plot, seemed to betray a consciousness of some guilt." I shall make no comment on this instance of the Historian's immoveable prejudice against the supposed enemies of his Hero.

Perhaps the Reader will not be displeased, if some Remarks, which have been made on Cicero's conduct in the affair of Catiline, should close this subject.

Dedication of Gordon's Translation of Cicero's Orat. against Cat. to Mr. Doddington, 1744.

THE SOLEMN, sententious Mr. Thomas Gordon has pronounced, that Cicero, "in his Consulship, saved the Public with such HIGH CAPACITY as was hardly ever equalled, surely never exceeded, by that of any statesman; and with such HIGH COURAGE as was never surpassed by that of any Hero." He proceeds: "I think no Roman but himself could have defeated the Conspiracy of Catiline. — I question whether Pompey could, in Cicero's place, have done what Cicero did: I even question whether he would have ventured upon doing it. — Pompey was a wary and distrustful man; a quality commonly joined to limited parts: He was likewise a selfish man, making all his PUBLIC PROCEEDINGS subservient to PERSONAL ENDS; often pursuing those ends at the expence, and even at the peril, of the Public."

[N. B. Cicero was a great admirer of Pompey: Is it certain that he did not make Pompey his pattern of conduct in PUBLIC AFFAIRS? Consider the part he acted in relation to the Manilian Law; his unjust and cruel opposition to the sons of the proscribed; his intended defence of Catiline, &c.]

THE FACETIOUS Colley Cibber, Esq; Poet Laureat, not submitting to the sentence of this grave and wise Judge, has, in a work dedicated to their common Patron, made no scruple to deliver a contrary opinion.

In the entrance of his work, which was occasioned by Dr. Middleton's History of the Life of Cicero, he observes, that, "As the greatest part of Cicero's actions, in this History, are taken from his own account of them, we may reasonably suppose, they are set in full as good, if not a better light, than sometimes they will naturally bear."

After making himself merry with Cicero's shining breast-plate, considering it as meer grimace, an expedient unworthy of the spirit of a Consul, he thus continues:

"We

Vid. sup. p. 341.

1747.

Vid. sup. p. 340.

“ We are now entering upon the notorious “ conspiracy of Catiline, the defeat of which “ Cicero has it at heart to erect into the mo“ nument of his Glory: But, in giving it our “ equal admiration, let us follow his own ad“ vice *, by first enquiring what share either “ CHANCE, RASHNESS, or PRUDENCE, had “ in this memorable transaction. —
 “ When by his vigilance and management
 “ with Fulvia (a mistress to one of the conspi-“ rator) he was master of Catiline’s whole “ scheme, and of his resolutions taken for the “ execution of it, Cicero brings at the same “ time his discovery of the plot, and his ac“ cusation of Catiline before the Senate, with“ out thinking it necessary to shew any fur“ ther evidence than the splendor of his elo“ quence to support it; which notwithstanding “ so far prevailed, that the Senate gave an in-“ tire credit to the charge, and looked upon “ Catiline with the abhorrence due to a cri“ minal condemned. But Catiline, less dis“ mayed by the Orator, and observing no wit“ nesses produced to confront him, so boldly “ stood upon his innocence, that, in defiance “ of his accuser, he represented the whole as a “ fabric of his enemy, offering to give security for “ his liberator, and to deliver himself to the “ custody of any whom the Senate would name,
 “ even to Cicero himself. But Cicero plainly “ told him, That he should never think him- self “ safe in the same house, when he was in dan- “ ger by living in the same City with him.
 “ Such a pretty-turned conclusion might “ sound well in the original round cadence of a “ Ciceronian period; but, when our ear has “ been pleased, what has it said to our under“ standing? Why, that, because it was not safe
 “ to live in the same City with a Traitor,
 “ it must therefore be dangerous to secure “ him! If Cicero had a better reason for let“ ting him escape, might not this as well “ have been concealed?”

Guthrie’s
 Ora. of
 Cic. transl.
 p. 23. note
 (n)
 The ingenious Translator of many of Cicero’s orations, in a note on that part of the first oration against Catiline, which speaks of his offer to surrender himself a Prisoner, and the rejection of that offer, thus expresses his surprise: “ Why, in the name of Heaven, “ did not Cicero accept of Catiline’s offer?
 “ Why was so fair, so frank a proposal re“ jected by the Government? The reason he “ gives here is an affront upon the common“ sense of mankind. Was there not a place
